[262] Abū Jaʿfar. Looking at my father, he said, "Now then, did you join Muḥammad's rebellion against me?" "That is so," my father replied. Abū Jaʿfar shouted coarse remarks at him and kept at him for a long time. Finally, he ordered him to be beheaded. He next commanded Mūsā to be beaten with scourges and ordered that I be brought to him, saying, "Have them bring him in and make him stand right next to his father. While he is looking at him, behead him over his father's cadaver." ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī spoke to the caliph, saying, "By God, I would not judge he has yet reached manhood." I added, "O Commander of the Faithful, I am but a lad, a gullible youth, simply obeying my father's command." Abū Jaʿfar therefore ordered me to be given fifty lashes and had me confined in the Muṭbaq.[1075] One of the inmates at that time was Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd,[1076] who was extremely kind to me and of whom I grew very fond. He even fed me from his food and let me drink from what he had. Such was our situation until Abū Jaʿfar died and al-Mahdī assumed the caliphate. At that point he released Yaʿqūb, who spoke with al-Mahdī on my behalf, so that the caliph let me go [too].

According to ʿUmar—Ayyūb b. ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Khālid—Muḥammad b. ʿUrwah b. Hishām b. ʿUrwah: I was with Abū Jaʿfar when someone came and told him that ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Khālid had just been brought in.[1077] When the caliph had him brought in and Abū Jaʿfar saw him, he said, "Where's the money you had?" "I handed it over to the Commander of the Faithful, may God have mercy upon him," ʿUthmān replied. "And who," asked the caliph, "is the Commander of the Faithful?" "Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh," he said. The caliph asked, "Did you give him the oath of allegiance?" "Yes," answered ʿUthmān, "just as you did." Abū Jaʿfar retorted, "O son 1075. The Muṭbaq was a fortress-like prison that al-Manṣūr built in the southwest quadrant of Baghdad. Le Strange, Baghdad, 27, and Lassner, Topography, 243, both of whom vocalize it as maṭbaq. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ṭabaqa, gives the vocalization muṭbaq, as does Dozy, Supplément, II, 26.

---

1076. Abū ʿAbdallāh Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd (d. 186/802) became vizier to Abū Jaʿfar's son, the caliph al-Mahdī. He eventually fell from favor for suspected treason and was imprisoned once again. *EI*², s.v. [S. Moscati]; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 155–63.

1077. See note 741.

of an uncircumcised woman!" To this ʿUthmān replied, "That is said of those whom slave women have born."[1078] The caliph then ordered him to be executed so ʿUthmān was dragged away and beheaded.

According to ʿUmar—Saʿd b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar—Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān [b. Muḥammad] b. Khālid al-Zubayrī: At the time Muḥammad made his uprising one of those who joined him was a man from the family of Kathīr b. al-Ṣalt.[1079] When Muḥammad was killed and his partisans were routed and went into hiding, my father and the Kathīrī disappeared with them. They remained hidden until Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān was made governor of Medina and intensified the search for Muḥammad's associates. [263] At this point my father hired camels belonging to the Kathīrī, and we [all] left Medina for al-Baṣrah. Jaʿfar heard about this and wrote to his brother Muḥammad to let him know that we were on our way to al-Baṣrah. He ordered him to keep an eye out for us and to be alert to our situation and our progress. When we arrived, therefore, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān knew of it and knew where we were. He sent men for us, and we were seized and brought before him. My father turned to him and said, "Listen here, go in fear of God in your treatment of this fellow who rented mounts to us. He's a bedouin who knows nothing about us. Wanting to keep body and soul together, he simply rented [mounts] to us. Had he known of our offense, he never would have done so. If you make him vulnerable to Abū Jaʿfar, whose nature you know well, you will be his killer and bear the guilt of his death." Muḥammad b. Sulaymān was silent for a long time and then he said, "He, by God, is Abū Jaʿfar; I will not oppose him." We were then transported all together and taken before Abū Jaʿfar. No one in the caliph's entourage recognized the Kathīrī except al-Ḥasan b. Zayd. He went up to him and said, "O enemy of God, are you in the habit of renting [mounts] to the Commander of the Faithful's enemy and conveying him from one country to another? Do you sometimes hide him away and at other times let him show 1078. Dhāka man qāmat ʿanhu al-imāʾu. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. qāma. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 553, glosses this as a reference to al-Manṣūr himself; see also note 817.

1079. Kathīr b. al-Ṣalt was a clan of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. ʿAmr. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 239, II, 370.

himself?" "O Commander of the Faithful," the Kathīrī replied, "I know nothing about him, his crime, or his enmity toward you. I simply hired [mounts] out to him, knowing nothing about him and thinking him merely a Muslim of innocent intention and sound purpose.[1080] Had I been aware of his case, I would not have done so." Al-Ḥasan b. Zayd bent down to look at the ground and did not raise his head, while Abū Jaʿfar threatened the Kathīrī and tried to intimidate him. Finally, he ordered him to be released, and the man went off into hiding. The caliph then turned to my father and said, "Now then, ʿUthmān, so you rebel against the [264] Commander of the Faithful and help to oppose him?" ʿUthmān replied, "I gave the oath of allegiance to a man in Mecca just as you did. I lived up to my oath while you betrayed yours." The caliph ordered him to be beheaded.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—his father: ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was brought before Abū Jaʿfar. The caliph looked at him, and said, "If I kill a Qurashī like this, whom shall I spare?" Then he released him. Subsequently, ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. Khālid was brought before him. He had him killed, while yet releasing a number of Qurashīs. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, how unlucky this one was with you among all the rest!" "Indeed," replied the caliph, "this one comes from a noble family."[1081]

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā—Ḥasan b. Zayd: I went to see Abū Jaʿfar one morning and discovered that he had ordered a bench to be made on which he then took up his position, without moving. ʿAlī b. al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥanṭab was brought before him, and he commanded that ʿAlī be given 500 lashes. Next, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muṭīʿ[1082] was brought forward,

---

1080. This follows Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 608, with the transcription of barī'.

1081. Inna hādhā baytiyyun. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLII, and Glossarium, s.v. bāta as nobili familia ortus est, and Dozy, Supplément, I, 132. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 608, offers the alternative hādhā yadī, "this is my power," i.e., "this is what lies within my discretion."

1082. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Ibrāhīm was a grandson of Abdallāh b. Muṭīʿ b. al-Aswad al-ʿAdawī, who led the Qurashī opposition against the Umayyad caliph Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah and fought in the battle of the Ḥarrah. He later became ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr's governor of al-Kūfah and perished with the anticaliph in 73/692. Ṭabarī, II, 413, 601–37 passim; *EI*², s.v. (K. V. Zetterstéen and C. Pellat); Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVII, 620–21.

and the caliph ordered him to be flogged 500 lashes. Neither of them made the slightest move, prompting Abū Jaʿfar to say to me, "Have you ever seen anyone with more endurance than these two? By God, those who've lived rough and toilsome lives have been brought before us, but they have not shown this sort of endurance. These men, on the other hand, are used to a life of ease, shelter, and comfort." "O Commander of the Faithful," I replied, "these are your people, people of nobility and rank." He turned away from me, saying, "All you care about is [tribal] solidarity." After that he had ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Ibrāhīm brought back for a beating. "O Commander of the Faithful," implored ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, "God, God be with us. Lord knows I've been flat on my face for forty nights, not once able to pray to God." The caliph replied, "This is something which you've brought upon yourselves." "But [265] where is forgiveness, O Commander of the Faithful?" begged ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. To this Abū Jaʿfar responded, "All right, you're forgiven." Then he released him.

According to ʿUmar—al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar: ʿĪsā's forces outnumbered Muḥammad's and fought relentlessly until Muḥammad was finally killed in the middle of the month of Ramaḍān in 145. His head was carried to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, who called for Ibn Abī al-Karrām and had him look at it. He recognized it as Muḥammad, so ʿĪsā b. Mūsā made a prostration, entered Medina, and gave all the people amnesty. From the time of his uprising until the time he was killed, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh held out for two months and seventeen days.

In this year ʿĪsā b. Mūsā appointed Kathīr b. Ḥuṣayn as his deputy when he left Medina after Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan was killed. Kathīr b. Ḥuṣayn's term as governor of Medina lasted one month. Then ʿAbdallāh b. al-Rabīʿ al-Ḥārithī arrived as governor of Medina on behalf of Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr.

In this year the blacks in Medina rebelled against ʿAbdallāh b. Rabīʿ and he fled from them.

The Uprising of the Blacks in Medina in This Year and What Incited It

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Riyāḥ b. ʿUthmān had installed Abū Bakr b.

ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Sabrah as tax collector over Asad and Ṭayyiʾ.[1083] When Muḥammad rebelled, Abū Bakr took what he had collected to Muḥammad and threw in his lot with him. When ʿĪsā made [266] Kathīr b. Ḥuṣayn his deputy in Medina, the latter seized Abū Bakr, beat him with seventy lashes, bound him in irons, and imprisoned him. Then ʿAbdallāh b. al-Rabīʿ arrived as governor on Saturday, 25 Shawwāl 145, on behalf of Abū Jaʿfar. His troops got into a dispute with the merchants about some of the purchases that they made from them. Eventually a group of merchants went off to the Dār Marwān, where Ibn al-Rabīʿ was staying, and complained to him about the situation. But Ibn al-Rabīʿ yelled at them and called them names. At this, the army began to act against the merchants with even greater avidity, and both sides grew increasingly hostile to each other.

According to ʿUmar—ʿUmar b. Rāshid: The troops made off with various goods from the market. One morning they came upon a money changer named ʿUthmān b. Zayd and tried to wrest his purse away from him. ʿUthmān yelled for help, thus saving his money from them. At this juncture the leading citizens of Medina met and complained to Ibn al-Rabīʿ about the matter. Ibn al-Rabīʿ, however, did nothing to either condemn or bring about a change in the troops' behavior. On Friday a soldier came to buy meat from a butcher but refused to pay his price, drawing his sword against him instead. From under the butcher's block the butcher came at him with a big knife and stabbed the soldier in the hip. The man tumbled from his mount, and all the butchers fell upon him and killed him. The blacks issued a call against the army as they went to the Friday prayer (jumʿah), killing the soldiers with clubs on all sides. They kept at this until well into evening, and the next morning Ibn al-Rabīʿ fled.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: The blacks sounded a trumpet they had. People from high and low in Medina told me that they saw black men living there stop whatever work they were doing and listen to the trumpet 1083. Asad b. Khuzaymah and Ṭayyiʾ b. Udad were North Arabian tribes whose histories include both mutual alliances and warfare. *EI*², s.v. Asad (W. Caskel); *EI*¹, s.v. Ṭaiy (H. H. Bräu); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab I, 3, 50, 176, 249, II, 194, 555; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 190–2, 398–99.

blast, cocking their ears to it until they were quite certain of the sound. Then the black would drop whatever he held and follow the sound until he reached it. ʿUmar continued: That was Friday, [267]
22 Dhū al-Ḥijjah 145. There were three individuals who led the blacks, Wathīq,[1084] Yaʿqul, and Ramaqah. During the morning they broke in upon Ibn al-Rabīʿ and the people during the Friday prayer. The blacks hurried the people out from the prescribed prayer, and Ibn al-Rabīʿ went out against them. They chased after him as far as the market, where he passed five people who were begging on the road to the mosque. In company with those who were with him, Ibn al-Rabīʿ attacked and killed them. Then he passed some small boys on a house ledge and, supposing that the people [he sought] were among them, he told them to come down, tricking them with guarantees of safety. But when they actually descended, he had them beheaded. He continued on and stopped near the wheat dealers. There the blacks attacked him [again], so he took off in flight. They followed him as far as the Baqīʿ cemetery, where they overtook him. At this point he scattered dirhams before the blacks, thereby distracting them, and kept going straight ahead until he encamped in Baṭn Nakhl some two nights out of Medina.

According to ʿUmar—ʿĪsā: The blacks rebelled against Ibn al-Rabīʿ. Their leaders were Wathīq, Ḥadyā, ʿUnqūd, and Abū Qays. Ibn al-Rabīʿ fought them, but they routed him, so he left [Medina] and went to stay in Baṭn Nakhl.

According to ʿUmar—ʿUmar b. Rāshid: When Ibn al-Rabīʿ fled, the blacks pounced upon various food supplies belonging to Abū Jaʿfar, such as barley mush, flour, oil, and hard dates, and confiscated them. The load of flour was worth two dirhams, whereas the skin of oil was worth four dirhams.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: The blacks raided both the Dār Marwān and the Dār Yazīd, two places contining food supplies that had been brought to the army by sea, and left nothing in either location. On that day, Sulaymān b. Fulayḥ b. Sulaymān left to go to Abū Jaʿfar. As soon as he reached him, he informed Abū Jaʿfar of the situation.

1084. Wathīq is earlier identified, III, 219, as the trumpet blower in al-Ḥasan b. Muʿāwiyah's attack on Abū Jaʿfar's governor of Mecca, al-Sarī b. ʿAbdallāh.

[268] According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Since the blacks killed a number of the troops, the army was so intimidated by them that if a cavalry man encountered a black man wearing nothing but a light shirt and two rags over his private parts, the black would scornfully turn his back on him but would then waste no time in bashing him with one of the market poles and killing him. They said that these blacks were nothing but sorcerers or satans.

According to ʿUmar—ʿUthāmah b. ʿAmr al-Sahmī—al-Musawwar b. ʿAbd al-Malik:[1085] When Ibn al-Rabīʿ imprisoned Abū Bakr b. Abī Sabrah for bringing the taxes (jibāyah) from Ṭayyiʾ and Asad and handing them over to Muḥammad, the Qurashīs felt sympathy for Ibn Abī Sabrah. When the blacks rebelled against Ibn al-Rabīʿ, Ibn Abī Sabrah left the prison, addressed the people, and called upon them to remain loyal. He acted as prayer leader for the people until Ibn al-Rabīʿ returned.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Ibn Abī Sabrah left the prison and went on to the mosque still wearing irons. He sent for Muḥammad b. ʿImrān,[1086] Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz,[1087] and others. These men came and met with him, and he said, "I swear this is a catastrophe that has befallen. If it runs its full course against us, in the Commander of the Faithful's eyes, especially after the first action [i.e., Muḥammad's rebellion], it will lead to the destruction of the land and its people. The slaves are all in the market. So, for God's sake, won't you go and talk them into returning and coming around to your point of view? They have no proper discipline and have pressed no claim to authority. They're simply a group motivated by passion." They did go to the slaves and spoke with them. At which the latter said, "Welcome, masters of ours. We attacked only out of resentment at what's been done to you. Our hands join yours, and our affair is at your disposal." They then went forward to the mosque with them.

1085. Al-Musawwar b. ʿAbd al-Malik al-Yarbūʿī; he also transmits from ʿUthāmah (ʿImāmah) b. al-Sahmī in I, 1313.

1086. Abū Sulaymān Muḥammad b. ʿImrān b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah. See note 584.

1087. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf al-Zuhrī. See note 512.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Zabālah—al- [269]
Ḥusayn b. Muṣʿab:[1088] When the blacks made their uprising and Ibn al-Rabīʿ fled, I went to see them, accompanied by certain others, at their encampment in the market. We asked them to disperse, informing them that neither we nor they had any power over what they had set themselves against. Wathīq said to us, "The situation has developed as you see, and he will spare neither us nor you. Let us take revenge for you, and we ourselves shall be avenged, too." We refused, however, and stayed with them until they dispersed.

According to ʿUmar—ʿUmar b. Rāshid: Their leader was Wathīq, and his deputy was Yaʿqul the butcher. Ibn ʿImrān went to see him and asked, "With whom will you negotiate terms, Wathīq?" "With four of the Banū Hāshim," replied Wathīq, "with four Qurashīs, with four of the Anṣār, and with four of the mawlās. The matter shall be arranged by consultation among them." "I ask God to sustain us with your justice, if He entrusts you with anything to do with us." To this he replied, "Already, by God, has God charged me with it."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: The blacks were there at the mosque along with Ibn Abī Sabrah. Still in an iron fetter he climbed up the minbar to settle himself on the seat of God's Messenger. Muḥammad b. ʿImrān followed, taking a position below him. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz followed them, taking a yet lower seat, while Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Sabrah followed all of the above and sat at the lowest level of all. The people began to raise a great clamor while Ibn Abī Sabrah remained sitting in silence. Ibn ʿImrān announced that he was going off to the market and climbed down the minbar, as did those sitting beneath him. Ibn Abī Sabrah remained unmoving, however, and began to speak, urging the people to obey the Commander of the Faithful and recounting the affair of 1088. Al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣʿab b. Ruzayq (d. 199/814–15). Ṭabarī later identifies him as one of the Khurāsānī leaders. His father fought against the Umayyads under Abū Muslim's general, Sulaymān b. Kathīr al-Khuzāʿī, while his son Ṭāhir became the eponymous founder of the Ṭāhirid dynasty in Khurāsān. In 191/806–7 he aroused the ire of Hārūn al-Rashīd's governor in Khurāsān, ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān, for drunken remarks that he made against him. Ṭabarī, III, 714–25, 771; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVI, 394–99; EI[1], s.v. Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusain (W. Barthold); Crone, Slaves, 75, 78, 258 n. 10; Daniel, Khurasan, 174, 179, 181–82.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh at length. In the meantime, Ibn ʿImrān went on as far as the market. There he stood on a sack of wheat and started to talk from that position. Little by little the people came back, and no one led the people in prayer that day except [270] the muezzin. When it was time for the final night prayer, the people had at last returned, and the Qurashīs had gathered in the reserved section of the mosque. Muḥammad b. ʿAmmār, the muezzin whose nickname was Kasākas,[1089] recited the prelude to the prayer (iqāmah). He asked the Qurashīs, "Who will lead the prayer for you?" but no one answered him. "Didn't you hear me?" he repeated, but again they did not answer. Next he called out, "O Ibn ʿImrān and O Ibn So-and-So [what about you?]," but no one responded. At this point al-Aṣbagh b. Sufyān b. ʿĀṣim b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Marwān[1090] stood up[1091] and said, "I will lead the prayer." He then stood in the proper place and told the people to take their positions. When the prayer rows were properly arranged, he turned to face them and shouted at the top of his voice, "Will you not listen? I am al-Aṣbagh b. Sufyān b. ʿĀṣim b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Marwān and I shall lead the people in prayer in full loyalty to Abū Jaʿfar." He repeated that declaration two or three times and called out Allāhu akbar and performed the prayer. When the people awoke next morning, Ibn Abī Sabrah said, "Yesterday, as on your part you well know, you plundered what was in your governor's house as well as provisions intended for the Commander of the Faithful's troops. Nothing should be retained and not returned by any of you. I have therefore set al-Ḥakam b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Mughīrah b. Mawhab to deal with you." To him the people returned what they had plundered, and it is said to have reached a value of 1,000 dīnārs.

According to ʿUmar—ʿUthāmah b. ʿAmr—al-Musawwar b. ʿAbd al-Malik: The Qurashīs plotted to prevail upon Ibn al-Rabīʿ to leave. After that they would talk to him about making Ibn Abī Sabrah his deputy over Medina so that what the Commander of 1089. More probably Persian "Kashākash." See the Leiden text, note a, and Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 613.

---

1090. Al-Aṣbagh b. Sufyān was the great-great-grandson of the fourth Umayyad caliph, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, and grand-nephew of the eighth, ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. His grandmother was Umm ʿĀṣim bt. ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XXII, 506–10 s.v. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz.

1091. The second fa-qāma is a typographical error.

the Faithful had against him would eventually dissolve. When the blacks drove Ibn al-Rabīʿ out, Ibn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz said to him, "Are you leaving without the installation of a deputy governor? Put somebody or other in charge of Medina." "Who?" asked Ibn al-Rabīʿ. "Qudāmah b. Mūsā," Ibn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz replied. At this point they shouted for Qudāmah, and he came in and sat down between Ibn al-Rabīʿ and Ibn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. "Go back, Qudāmah," said Ibn al-Rabīʿ, "I have appointed you governor of Medina and its administrative districts." To this Qudāmah responded, "By God, whoever suggested this to you did not have your best interests at heart. He has not looked at the one who is behind it and [271] has in mind nothing but evil. The one who has a greater claim to this office than I or my nominator is the one who can manage the affairs of the people. He, i.e., Ibn Abī Sabrah, is sitting in his house. Go back, man! By God, you have no excuse to leave!" Ibn al-Rabīʿ therefore went back.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—al-Ḥārith b. Isḥāq: Ibn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz rode out to Ibn al-Rabīʿ with a group of Quraysh and implored him while he was at Baṭn Nakhl to return to his post as governor. Ibn al-Rabīʿ, however, turned them down. Ibn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz then spoke to him in private and kept at him until finally he came back, and the people became peaceful and calm.

According to ʿUmar—ʿUmar b. Rāshid: Ibn ʿImrān and others rode out to Ibn al-Rabīʿ, who had stopped at al-Aʿwaṣ. They spoke with him, and Ibn al-Rabīʿ came back and suppressed Wathīq, Abū al-Nār, Yaʿqul, and Masʿur.[1092]

In this year the city of Baghdad, which is called "The City of al-Manṣūr," was founded.[1093]

The Reason Abū Jaʿfar Built Baghdad

The reason for that is as follows: Tradition has it that at the time when the caliphate devolved upon Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr, he built al-Hāshimiyyah opposite Madīnat Ibn Hubayrah.[1094] Between the 1092. Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 614, vocalizes this as Misʿar.

---

1093. Additional sources: Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, II, 449; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 100; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 194; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 557–60; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, Fakhrī, 161–64; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 96–103; Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 417–20.

1094. Although the Leiden index equates this with Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah, Lassner (*EI*², s.v. Ḳaṣr Ibn Hubayra) argues that the former was founded somewhat earlier, on a site closer to al-Kūfah. See note 638.

two was the whole extent of the road. Madīnat Ibn Hubayrah, opposite which stood Abū Jaʿfar's al-Hāshimiyyah, lay toward al-Kūfah. Al-Manṣūr also built a city behind al-Kūfah by the name of al-Ruṣāfah.[1095] When the Rāwandiyyah[1096] were stirred up by [their beliefs about] Abū Jaʿfar in his city called al-Hāshimiyyah—the one that lies opposite Madīnat Ibn Hubayrah—the caliph began to dislike living there. His dislike was due to the disturbance that various of the Rāwandiyyah set in motion against him as well as to the city's close proximity to al-Kūfah.
[272] Abū Jaʿfar had no confidence in the loyalty of its inhabitants and wanted to distance himself from them. He is said to have gone out personally, exploring for a site that he could use as a settlement for himself and for his army, and where he could build a city. He began by going down to Jarjarāyā.[1097] From there he went to Baghdad and then on to al-Mawṣil. Finally, he went back to Baghdad and said, "This is a good place for an army camp. Here's the Tigris, with nothing between us and China, and on it arrives all that the sea can bring, as well as provisions from the Jazīrah, Armenia and surrounding areas. Further, there is the Euphrates on which can arrive everything from Syria, al-Raqqah, and surrounding areas. The caliph therefore dismounted and pitched his camp on the Ṣarāt Canal.[1098] He sketched a plan of the city and put an army commander in charge of each quarter.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Muḥammad b. Maʿrūf b. Suwayd—his father[1099]—Sulaymān b. Mujālid:[1100] The people of al-Kūfah fomented rebellion against him in the the Commander of 1095. The name was used for a number of sites from Andalusia to Khurāsān, of which Ṭabarī mentions, in addition to this one in al-Kūfah, those in Baghdad, in al-Baṭā'iḥ, and in al-Ruṣafah of Hishām in Syria. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 46–50.

---

1096. The account of this uprising may be found under the year 141.

1097. Jarjarāyā was a town on the east bank of the Tigris about seventy-five kilometers southeast of al-Madā'in. Cornu, Répertoires, 28; Le Strange, Lands, 37, and Baghdad, 9; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 123.

1098. The Ṣarāt Canal was a branch of the great ʿĪsā Canal that flowed eastward through the upper Karkh section of Baghdad, while the ʿĪsā itself flowed through the lower part of this section. Le Strange, Baghdad, 50–54; Lassner, Topography, 122; Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 399–400.

1099. Abū Salamah Maʿrūf b. Suwayd al-Judhāmī was an Egyptian traditionist who died about 150/767. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 208.

1100. Sulaymān b. Mujālid is later, III, 273, 429, mentioned among various of al-Manṣūr's commanders and personal retinue.

the Faithful's, i.e., al-Manṣūr's, army. Therefore he headed for al-Jabal[1101] in search of a place to settle. At that time the road went by way of al-Madā'in. We left via Sābāṭ,[1102] but one of our companions fell behind, afflicted with an eye inflammation. As he stayed there to have his eyes treated, the physician asked him where the Commander of the Faithful was heading. "He is looking for a place to settle," the man replied. To this the physician responded: "In one of our books we find it written that a man named Miqlāṣ[1103] will build a city called al-Zawrā'[1104] between the Tigris and the Ṣarāt. After he has laid its foundation and built one course of its walls, a problem will erupt for him in the Ḥijāz, and he will interrupt construction of the city and turn his attention to repairing that breach of the peace. When this is almost done, trouble will arise for him in al-Baṣrah, this one more difficult for him than the first. Before long, however, the two breaches will be mended, and he will return to building the city and will complete it. Then will he be given a long life and sovereignty shall remain in his progeny."[1105] Sulaymān continued: The Commander of the Faithful was on the outskirts of al-Jibāl searching for a place to settle when my companion reached me and gave me [273] this account. I reported this to the Commander of the Faithful, and he summoned the man, who repeated the story to Abū Ja'far. At this the caliph turned right around and went back to his start-1101. Or al-Jibāl. As well as naming a province of Persia (see note 193),"al-Jibāl" was also the name of a town known additionally as "'Ayn al-Gibāl" or "Ḥiyal," in the Jazīrah about 140 kilometers west of al-Mawṣil. EI[2], s.v. al-Djibāl (L. Lockhart); Le Strange, Lands, 185–231; Cornu, Repertoires, 17; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 99, 103.

1102. Sābāṭ was one of the cities comprising the Sāsānid metropolis that is known in Arabic as "al-Madā'in." It was situated at the point where the Nahr al-Malik met the Tigris. EI[2], s.v. al-Madā'in (M. Streck and M. Morony); Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 166–67.

1103. Steingass, Persian-English Dictionary, 1295, identifies this word as the term for a camel that is growing fat in the summer, noting also that it was the nickname of a famous thief. It was apparently on the latter account that a childhood prank that involved filching left Abū Ja'far with this nickname. Lassner, Shaping, 165.

1104. The word itself means "the crooked," and the name has been the subject of much historical speculation.

1105. Among other prophecies associated with Baghdad is one predicting that no caliph would die a natural death there. Yāqūt, I, Buldān, 460, records it as najidu fī adillati al-nujūmi annahu lā yamūtu bihā khalīfatun abadan ḥatfa anfihi. See also Eisenstein, "Vom Tode der Kalifen."

ing point, saying, "By God, I'm that very man! I was called Miqlāṣ as a lad but then the name for me fell into disuse."

According to al-Haytham b. ʿAdī—Ibn ʿAyyāsh: Intending to move from al-Hāshimiyyah, Abū Jaʿfar sent scouts to search out a site for him, a place where he could settle that would be centrally located and comfortable for both the common people and the army. A site near Bārimmā[1106] was described to him, and it was commended to him as having excellent victuals. He went to take a look at it himself and even spent the night there. Searchingly he scanned the site, seeing it to be a good place, and then questioned a group of his associates, including Sulaymān b. Mujālid, Abū Ayyūb al-Khūzī,[1107] ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ḥumayd,[1108] the secretary, and others, about their opinion of it. "We've not seen anything to equal it," they replied; "it is pleasant, fitting, and congenial." To this the caliph responded, "You are right; it is just as you say, yet it could not support the army, the people, and the various groups. What I want is a place that is comfortable for the people and congenial for them as well as for me, a place where the prices will not become too high for them and the food supplies will not prove too hard to obtain. If I live in a place where it is impossible to import anything by land or sea, the prices will be high, goods will be scarce, and shortages in the food supply will cause hardship for the people. On the way here, I actually passed a place that combines these various natural qualities, so I shall stop and stay overnight there. If I find it to be the precise combination that I want, i.e., a healthful nocturnal environment, convenience, and the capacity to support both the army and the people, I shall build there.

According to al-Haytham b. ʿAdī: I was told that Abū Jaʿfar came toward the bridge, crossed over at [what is now] Qaṣr al-Salām,[1109] and then performed the late-afternoon prayer. It 1106. Bārimmā was a town in the province of al-Jazīrah on the east bank of the Tigris somewhat south of al-Sinn. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 320; Cornu, Répertoires, 26; Le Strange, Lands, 91.

1107. See note 106.

1108. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ḥumayd is earlier identified as a mawlā of Ḥātim b. al-Nuʿmān al-Bāhilī, who is listed among the administrative officers in Khurāsān when al-Ḥakam b. ʿAmr al-Ghifārī was governor. Ṭabarī, II, 81, 840.

1109. As Qaṣr al-Salāmah, Ṭabarī, III, 502, mentions the construction of this palace by al-Mahdī in the events of 164/780–81. Its site was ʿĪsābādh, a village was summertime, and at the site of al-Qaṣr was a priest's church.[1110] The caliph stayed there all night and into the next [274] morning, enjoying the most pleasant and refreshing night's rest on earth. The caliph then remained for the rest of the day without seeing anything he did not like. Consequently he declared, "This is the site on which I shall build. Goods can come here via the Tigris, the Euphrates, and various canals. Only a place like this can support both the army and the populace." He marked the boundaries of the city and calculated the extent of its construction. With his own hand he set the first brick in place while saying the words "In the name of God" and "Praise God" and "The earth belongs to God who makes heirs of it those of His servants whom He wishes, and the outcome is to the upright."[1111] He concluded with the statement "Build, then, with God's blessing."

According to Bishr b. Maymūn al-Sharawī—Sulaymān b. Mujālid: Upon al-Manṣūr's return from the region of al-Jibāl, he asked about the account that the army commander had heard from the physician. This was the physician who had told him about the report of a certain Miqlāṣ that they had found in their books. He stopped at the monastery that lay opposite his [future] palace known as al-Khuld.[1112] Al-Manṣūr summoned the head of the monastery and had the Patricius, the master of Raḥā al-Biṭrīq ("Mills of the Patricius"),[1113] brought to him as well. Others whom he summoned were the overlord of [the village of] Bagh-owned by ʿĪsā b. al-Mahdī, to the east of Baghdad. Le Strange, Baghdad, 194; Lassner, Topography, 231, n. 3; Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 357.

1110. Biʾatu qassin. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 132, for association of this with the subsequent mention of Bustān al-Qass.

1111. Qurʾān, 7:128.

1112. The name means "Eternity," and the palace complex that al-Manṣūr began to build there in 157/773–74 included gardens thought to rival those of paradise (cf. Qurʾān 25:15, for jannat al-khuld). The monastery itself is identified as Dayr Mārfathion or al-Dayr al-ʿAtīq. Ṭabarī, III, 379; *EI*², s.v. Baghdād (A. A. Duri); Lassner, Topography, 149; Le Strange, Baghdad, 101–5.

1113. Or Arḥāʾ al-Biṭrīq; according to al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī's Taʾrīkh Baghdād, these mills, which were situated at the junction of the Greater and Lesser Ṣarāt Canals, were a commercial venture between the caliph al-Mahdī (Abū Jaʿfar's son) and the Byzantine ambassador to his court. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 31–32; Lassner, Topography, 184, 259–60; Le Strange, Baghdad, 142–44; *EI*², s.v. Biṭrīḳ (I. Kawar).

dad, the overlord of al-Mukharrim,[1114] and head of the monastery known as Bustān al-Qass ("Garden of the Priest")[1115] and the overlord of al-ʿAtīqah.[1116] The caliph questioned them about the places where they lived, asking what they were like in heat and cold, in rainy and muddy weather, and in terms of bugs and vermin. Each one told him what he knew from personal experience. Next, the caliph dispatched men on his own behest and ordered each of them to spend the night in one of these villages. Accordingly, each of these men passed the night in one of these villages and brought the caliph information about it. Al-Manṣūr next sought the advice of those whom he had summoned and examined carefully[1117] what they said. Their unanimous choice fell upon the overlord of Baghdad, so the caliph had him brought for consultation and careful questioning. (Now he was the dihqān[1118] whose village still stands in the quarter known as that of Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān al-Ṭūsī.[1119] To this very day the domes of the village are still maintained in good [275] repair, and his house survives intact.) The overlord of Baghdad said, "O Commander of the Faithful, you have asked me about these places, about their [relative] suitability, and about which of them should be chosen. What I think, O Commander of the Faithful, is that you should settle in four sectors, the two on the west side being Quṭrabbul and Bādūrayā,[1120] and the two on

---

1114. Mukharrim was a district of Baghdad that lay to the south of the Shammāsiyyah and Ruṣāfah quarters on the east side of the Tigris. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 295, states that it is named after Mukharrim b. Shurayḥ b. Ḥazn al-Ḥārithī. Le Strange, Baghdad, 169–76, 217–30; Lassner, Topography, 81, 264.

1115. Bustān al-Qass was located on the west side of Baghdad between the Damascus and al-Kūfah gates. Le Strange, Baghdad, 132, notes the identification of al-Qass as a freedman of al-Manṣūr but is puzzled about the significance of this earlier, and more generic, place name. Lassner, Topography, 68, 254.

1116. Al-ʿAtīqah, also known as al-Sūq al-ʿAtīqah, was one the "suburbs" of Baghdad that lay somewhat to the southeast of the Round City. Le Strange, Baghdad, 90; Lassner, Topography, 73–74, 258.

1117. Wa-tanaḥḥara akhbārahum. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. naḥara; Dozy, Supplément, I, 653.

1118. The dihqāns were the landed nobility of Sāsānid Persia. EI^{2}, s.v. Dihḳān (Ann K. S. Lambton).

1119. See Lassner, Topography, 67. For Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān al-Ṭūsī, see note 304.

1120. Quṭrabbul and Bādūrayā were the administrative districts west of Baghdad that were separated by the Ṣarāt Canal. EI^{2}, s.v. Bādūrayā (M. Streck) and s.v. Ḳuṭrabbul (J. Lassner); Cornu, Répertoires, 26, 32; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 317–18, IV, 371–72.

the east side being Nahr Būq and Kalwādhā.[1121] There you would be among date palms and near water. If one sector suffers from drought and its productivity is delayed, the other could be cultivated. Further, O Commander of the Faithful, you would be on the Ṣarāt Canal, permitting provisions to come to you along the Euphrates in ships from the west, as well as the choice products of Egypt and Syria. Supplies would also come to you along the Tigris in ships from China, India, al-Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ. Finally, stores would reach you from Armenia and those adjacent areas via the Tāmarrā Canal[1122] connecting to the Zāb, as well as from Byzantium, Āmid,[1123] the Jazīrah, and al-Mawṣil down the Tigris. You would be among waterways where no enemy of yours could reach you except by a floating or fixed bridge. When you cut the floating bridge and destroy the fixed bridges, your enemy will not be able to reach you at all. You would be between the Tigris and Euphrates, where no one could come to you from either the east or west without having to make a crossing. You would be midway among al-Baṣrah, Wāsiṭ, al-Kūfah, al-Mawṣil, and the whole Sawād. You would be near land, sea, and mountain." Al-Manṣūr became ever more determined to settle on the site that he had selected. The overlord of Baghdad added, "Furthermore, O Commander of the Faithful, God has blessed the Commander of the Faithful with such a great quantity of forces, commanders, and troops that not one of his enemies would aspire to come anywhere near him. The proper organization of cities requires you to make walls, moats and forts, but the Tigris and Euphrates shall be the moats for the Commander of the Faithful's city."

1121. Nahr Būq and Kalwādhā were localities on the east side of the Tigris. The Nahr Būq branched off from the Nahrawān Canal, and from it issued tributaries in east Baghdad. The name of the town of Kalwādhā is associated with kilwādh, the Ark of the Covenant, said to be buried there. EI^{2}, s.v. Kalwādhā (Ed.); Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 318; Le Strange, Baghdad, 50.

1122. The great Qāṭūl-Tāmarrā-Nahrawān canal system, which was well over 200 kilometers long, watered the lands east of the Tigris from above Sāmarrā' to around al-Nu'māniyyah. EI^{2}, s.v. Didjla (R. Hartmann and S. H. Longrigg) and Diyālā (S. H. Longrigg); Cornu, Répertoires, 30; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 7; Le Strange, Lands, 59–60.

1123. Āmid was the principal city of Diyār Bakr, the northern province of the Jazīrah, from which the Tigris flows. EI^{2}, s.v. Diyār Bakr (M. Canard and C. Cahen); Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 56–58; Le Strange, Lands, 108–11.

[276] According to Ibrāhīm b. ʿIsā[1124]—Ḥammād the Turk:[1125] In the year 145 al-Manṣūr sent men to search out for him a place where he could build his city. They investigated and explored, but the caliph remained dissatisfied with every site until he came to stop at the monastery on the Ṣarāt Canal and declared, "This is a site with which I am satisfied. Provisions come to it from the Euphrates, from the Tigris, and from this Ṣarāt Canal."

According to Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. al-Naṭṭāḥ[1126]—Muḥammad b. Jābir[1127]—his father: At the time when Abū Jaʿfar was of a mind to build his city at Baghdad, he saw a monk and called out to him. When the monk responded to him, Abū Jaʿfar asked, "In your books do you find it predicted that a city will be built here?" "Yes," the monk replied, "a certain Miqlāṣ is to build it." At this Abū Jaʿfar exclaimed, "Miqlāṣ was my name as a lad!" The monk answered, "Then you're the man for it!" Similarly, when the caliph wanted to build al-Rāfiqah[1128] in [former] Byzantium territory, the people of al-Raqqah[1129] opposed this and were intent on fighting him. They argued, "You will ruin our markets, take away our livelihood, and reduce our way stations to hardship." Abū Jaʿfar was minded to make war on them when he sent for a monk in the local hermitage and asked, "Do you know any prediction that a city is to be built here?" "I have heard that 1124. Ibrāhīm b. ʿĪsā b. al-Manṣūr Ibn Burayh (III, 331) or Ibn Burayhah b. al-Manṣūr (III, 1141) was the grandson of Abū Jaʿfar, his father being one of the sons born to the caliph by Fāṭimah bt. Muḥammad, a descendant of the prophet Muḥammad's companion, Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh. Ṭabarī, III, 442.

1125. Ḥammād the Turk was a personal retainer to al-Manṣūr who on occasion handled his horses and was responsible for the caliph's locked personal records. Ṭabarī, III, 392, 429, 443; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 143.

1126. Abū ʿAbdallāh Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Mihrān (d. 252/866), a mawlā of the Banū Hāshim, was a Baṣran traditionist and geneaologist who settled in Baghdad. Al-Nadīm (Dodge, Fihrist of al-Nadīm, I, 236) cites his as the first history of the ʿAbbāsid dynasty (but see Rosenthal, Muslim Historiography, 89). He was known as "Abū Tayyāḥ," probably in reference to a twisted gait. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 201–2; GAS, I, 317; GAL, I, 216.

1127. Transmitting on the authority of his father, Muḥammad b. Jābir, is cited again in the reference to the building of al-Rāfiqah in 158/770–71. Ṭabarī, III, 372.

1128. Al-Rāfiqah was a garrison city, built on the plan of Baghdad, that eventually became part of al-Raqqah. A variant of this account from Muḥammad b. Jābir's father is included with the events for 154/770–71. Ṭabarī, III, 372; Le Strange, Lands, 101–2; Cornu, Répertoires, 21; Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 15–16.

1129. Creswell, Short Account, 243–48, describes the building done during al-Manṣūr's reign in al-Raqqah itself.

a man called Miqlāṣ will build it," the monk replied. At this Abū Ja'far exclaimed, "I am Miqlāṣ!" and built al-Rāfiqah on the model of Baghdad except for the walls, iron gates, and a moat at some distance.

According to al-Sarī[1130]—Sulaymān b. Mujālid: Al-Manṣūr sent for a host of craftsmen and laborers from Syria, al-Mawṣil, al-Jabal, al-Kūfah, Wāsiṭ, and al-Baṣrah to be brought to him, commanding [also] the selection of a group of people endowed with virtue, integrity, intelligence, fidelity, and surveying competence.[1131] Consequently, among those brought to him were al-Ḥajjāj b. Arṭāh[1132] and Abū Ḥanīfah al-Nu'mān b. Thābit.[1133] The [277] caliph ordered the city to be marked out, its foundations excavated, its mud bricks shaped, and its baked bricks fired.[1134] Thus was it begun, the first stage of the project being initiated in 145.

It is said: When al-Manṣūr decided to build Baghdad, he wanted to see for himself what it would look like, so he commanded that its outline be drawn with ashes. He then proceeded to enter through each gate and to walk among its outside walls, its arched areas, and its courtyards, all of which were outlined in ashes. He made the rounds, looking at the workmen and at the trenches that had been sketched. Having done that, he ordered cotton seeds placed on this outline and oil poured on it. Then he watched as the fire flared up, seeing the city as a whole and 1130. Abū al-Haytham al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā b. Iyās (d. 167/783–84) was a Baṣran traditionist and a principal source for Ṭabarī's accounts of the conquests undertaken during the earliest caliphates. GAS, I, 312; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 400–1.

1131. Hitti, Capital Cities, 88, reckons the laborers as 100,000 and the cost of the city's construction as 4,883,000 dirhams. See also Alsayyad, Cities and Caliphs, 117, on Ṭabarī's use of the term handasah.

1132. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Arṭāh b. Thawr b. Hubayrah, Abū Arṭāh al-Nakha'ī (d. 154/771), was a traditionist and faqīh who lived in al-Kūfah along with Abū Ḥanīfah and later served as judge of al-Baṣrah and secretary to al-Manṣūr. Ṭabarī, II, 1850, III, 66; Dhahabī, Siyar, VII, 68–75; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XI, 306–7; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 172–74; Crone, Slaves, 157.

1133. Abū Ḥanīfah was the famous faqīh of al-Kūfah from whose teachings the Ḥanafī madhhab claims descent. He died in a Baghdad prison in 150/767. EI[2], s.v. (J. Schacht). For more about the relations between al-Manṣūr and Abū Ḥanīfah see Rustum, Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, 102–5.

1134. Creswell, Short Account, 232–33, describes the use of both kinds of brick, while Levy, Baghdad Chronicle, 19–20, notes that the bricks were huge, with some weighing about 200 pounds.

recognizing its full plan. Subsequently, he ordered the foundations to be excavated along those lines and commenced its construction.

According to Ḥammād the Turk: Al-Manṣūr sent men to search out a site on which to build his city. They made such exploration in 144, a year or so before Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's uprising. The scouts' selection fell upon a place called Baghdad, a village on the bank of the Ṣarāt, in the area adjacent to [the future] al-Khuld. On the site of al-Khuld stood a monastery, and in the curve of the Ṣarāt, adjacent to al-Khuld on the east side, was also a village called Sūq al-Baqar ("Cattle Market")[1135] and a large monastery. The village itself, [also] known as al-ʿAtīqah, was the one conquered by al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah al-Shaybānī.[1136] Ḥammād continued: Al-Manṣūr came to stay in the monastery located at al-Khuld on the Ṣarāt Canal. Finding there few noisome insects, he stated, "This is a place with which I am satisfied. Supplies can reach it via the Euphrates and Tigris. It's a good place to build a city." The caliph therefore said to the monk in the monastery, "O monk, I intend to build a city here." To this the monk responded, "It cannot be. The only one who is to build a [278] city here is a king called Abū al-Dawānīq." Al-Manṣūr chuckled to himself, saying, "I, in fact, am Abū Dawānīq."[1137] He then commanded the outline of the city drawn and assigned to it four army commanders, one for each quarter.

According to Sulaymān b. Mujālid: Al-Manṣūr wanted Abū Ḥanīfah al-Nuʿmān b. Thābit to head the judiciary, but he refused that appointment. Al-Manṣūr swore that he should assume office, but Abū Ḥanīfah, in turn, swore that he would not do so. The caliph, therefore, put him in charge of the city's construction, i.e., making the mud bricks, calculating the amount, and overseeing the men at work. Al-Manṣūr made that appointment simply to relieve himself of the oath he had sworn. Abū Ḥanīfah 1135. Sūq al-Baqar was a site in east Baghdad. Lassner, Topography, 103.

---

1136. Al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah al-Shaybānī was an officer who fought with Khālid b. al-Walīd in the early conquest of Iraq. He was wounded in the Persian victory at al-Qarqas, the Battle of the Bridge, which occurred in 13/634 or 14/635, and died about about a year later. Ṭabarī, I, 2156; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 241–56; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, V, 276; Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 377–78, 380–81.

1137. See note 800.

remained in charge of the project until he completed final construction, in 149, of the city wall next to the moat.

According to al-Haytham b. ʿAdī: Al-Manṣūr asked Abū Ḥanīfah to head the judiciary and the court for complaints and petitions (maẓālim),[1138] but the latter turned him down. The caliph then swore that he would give him no rest until he took the job, and this was reported to Abū Ḥanīfah. The latter called for a reed linear measure (qaṣabah)[1139] and counted the bricks that a [given] man made—Abū Ḥanīfah was the first to count bricks with reeds—and this served to discharge Abū Jaʿfar's oath. Eventually, Abū Ḥanīfah fell ill and died in Baghdad.

According to some sources: When Abū Jaʿfar ordered trenches[1140] to be dug, construction begun, and the foundations firmed up, he commanded that at its lowest point the wall should be fifty cubits (dhirāʾ)[1141] thick, and at its highest, twenty cubits.[1142] In the construction he used cane beams rather than wood for every corridor. In 145, when the wall had reached the height of one fathom (qāmah),[1143] the caliph received word of Muḥammad's uprising, so he interrupted construction.

According to Aḥmad b. Ḥumayd b. Jabalah[1144]—his father—his father Jabalah: Before it was built, [the site of] Abū Jaʿfar's city was a common field known as al-Mubārakah ("the Blessed") that was shared by sixty citizens of Baghdad. The caliph compensated these people in a manner that satisfied them. My grandfather received a share of this reimbursement.

1138. The maẓālim court sessions were a judicial structure of broad responsibility that functioned as both a complement and a constraint to the power of judges. *EI*², s.v. [J. S. Nielsen]; Schacht, Islamic Law, 51.

1139. A qaṣabah was the equivalent of about four meters. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 63.

1140. Bi-ḥafri al-khandādiq. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLIII.

1141. The various equivalences for the dhirāʾ, which average about fifty centimeters, may be found in Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 55–62.

1142. According to Levy, Baghdad Chronicle, 21, the top of the wall was about twenty-five cubits. It could function as a roadway to which horsemen mounted via inclined pathways.

1143. The qāmah equaled about two meters. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 54.

1144. Perhaps Abū al-Ḥasan Aḥmad b. Ḥumayd al-Ṭuraythīthī, known as Dār Umm Salamah, who was a traditionist and ḥāfiẓ of al-Kūfah. His death date is reported as 220/835 and 229/843–44. This is his only mention in Ṭabarī. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 23; Dhahabī, Siyar, X, 509–10.

[279] According to Ibrāhīm b. ʿĪsā b. al-Manṣūr—Ḥammād the Turk: Surrounding Abū Jaʿfar's future city stood various villages. Near the site of what is now the Syrian gate stood a village called al-Khaṭṭābiyyah, which ran from Darb al-Nūrah gate to Darb al-Aqfāṣ.[1145] Some of its date palms actually stood on the main street leading to the Syrian gate until the days of the deposed caliph [al-Amīn],[1146] when they were cut down during the period of civil disorder. This al-Khaṭṭābiyyah belonged to a group of dihqān families known as the Banū Farwah and the Banū Qunūrā, whose members included Ismāʿīl b. Dīnār, Yaʿqūb b. Sulaymān, and their associates.

According to Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. al-Furāt:[1147] The village that stood in what is now the Abū al-ʿAbbās quarter[1148] was the village of Muḥammad b. Mūsā's maternal grandfather, whose people were a dihqān family known as the Banū Zurārī.[1149] The village itself was called al-Wardāniyyah.[1150] Another village still existing today lies adjacent to the Abū Farwah[1151] quarter.

According to Ibrāhīm b. ʿĪsā: The area today known as Dār Saʿīd al-Khaṭīb was once a village called Sharafāniyyah.[1152] A palm grove belonging to it is still standing near Abū al-Jawn Bridge,[1153] Abū al-Jawn being one of the dihqāns of Baghdad who came from this village.

1145. The village and the two roads, i.e., the road of the Cages and the Chalk Road, were located in the Ḥarbiyyah quarter, a northwestern suburb of the Round City.

1146. Muḥammad b. Hārūn al-Rashīd (d. 198/813) was deposed by his brother al-Maʾmūn (for attempting to displace him in the accepted order of succession) after prolonged warfare between the Iraqī and Khurāsānī supporters of these two claimants. *EI*², s.v. al-Amīn (F. Gabrieli).

1147. According to Lassner, Topography, 252, Muḥammad b. Mūsā was one of a famous family of public officials.

1148. For its site on the west side of Baghdad, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 126, and Lassner, Topography, 67.

1149. See Lassner, Topography, 67, for Banū Zarārī.

1150. According to Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 371, the village was named after a certain Wardān.

1151. See the mention of Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh's protector on p. 258.

1152. See Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 336; Le Strange, Baghdad, 129; Lassner, Topography, 67, 252.

1153. See Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 336; Lassner, Topography, 67, and Le Strange, Baghdad, 129.

According to a source: The land grant (qaṭīʿah) of al-Rabīʿ[1154] was a common field for the people from a village called Banāwarī in the market town (rustāq) of al-Farawsyaj of Bādūrayā.[1155]

According to Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. al-Furāt—his father or [280] grandfather (he was unsure of the transmitter): One of the Bādūrayā dihqāns came to see me dressed in a torn shawl (ṭaylasān).[1156] I asked him who tore his shawl, and he replied, "It was torn, by God, in the crush of people today at a place where for ages hares and gazelles have been hunted." He was referring to what is now the Bāb al-Karkh[1157] area. They say that the outer land grant of al-Rabīʿ was only bestowed upon al-Rabīʿ by al-Mahdī. Al-Manṣūr had given him no more than the inner land grant of al-Rabīʿ on the same basis.

It is said that the Ṭābaq Canal[1158] dates from the time of Kisrā[1159] and that it is [identical with] the Bābak b. Bahrām b. Bābak Canal, named for the Bābak who built the palace[1160] that lies under the castle of ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī[1161] and who excavated this canal.

1154. Al-Rabīʿ b. Yūnus, al-Manṣūr's chamberlain and vizier (see note 162), whose land grant was divided into an inner and an outer portion. The area that these occupied eventually became a commercial center of one of the most densely populated sections of the suburb al-Karkh. Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 377; Lassner, Topography, 71, 187, 256–57; Le Strange, Baghdad, 58.

1155. For the rustāq of al-Farawsyaj and Bādūrayā, see Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 257, and I, 317, respectively.

1156. See Ahsan, Social Life, 42–43, and Agius, Arabic Literary Works, 217–20.

1157. Bāb al-Karkh was the gate that opened onto the suburb of al-Karkh from the west. In 146/763–64, for reasons of security, Abū Jaʿfar had the markets relocated from within the walls of the Round City to this area. Ṭabarī, III, 323–25; Le Strange, Baghdad, 63; Lassner, Topography, 60, 102, 247–48, and Shaping, 195, 197–202.

1158. "Ṭābaq" was the designation given to the section of the Karkhāyā that connected to the ʿĪsā Canal. The name of the canal is variously attributed to a certain Ṭābaq b. Ṣamyah, to a corruption of the name Bābak, and to a term for the construction tiles that were manufactured near where it flowed. Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 321; Lassner, Topography, 74–75, 258–59; Le Strange, Baghdad, 69, 81–84.

1159. Kisrā Anūshirwān (531–79 C.E.) and Kisrā Aparwīz (591–628 C.E.) were emperors of the late Sāsānid period renowned in Arab sources. EI^{2}, s.v. Kisrā (M. Morony).

1160. The Leiden edition reads al-ʿaqr, while Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 321, gives al-ʿaqd, which can mean "vault" or "arch."

1161. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās. See note 137.

It is mentioned that the Jaʿfar Harbor was a land grant (iqṭāʿ) from Abū Jaʿfar to his son Jaʿfar and that the Old Bridge[1162] dates from Persian times.

According to Ḥammād the Turk: Al-Manṣūr stayed in the monastery on the bank of the Tigris in the place [later] known as al-Khuld. We were there on a very hot summer day in 145. I had gone outside to sit with al-Rabīʿ and his retainers when a man approached and passed the guard on the way to the ruler's section of the mosque. He sought permission to enter, so we announced him to al-Manṣūr. As he was accompanied by Salm b. Abī Salm, the caliph gave permission for him to enter. The man then informed the caliph of Muḥammad's uprising. Al-Manṣūr responded, "We shall immediately write to Egypt that supplies to the Ḥaramayn[1163] be suspended." "They are going to be in a kind of tight squeeze,"[1164] he added, "when Egyptian supplies and provisions are withheld from them." The caliph then ordered a letter sent to al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad,[1165] governor of the Jazīrah, informing him about Muḥammad and saying, "I am leaving as soon as I have written to al-Kūfah. Send me daily as many reinforcement troops from the Jazīrah as you can." He wrote in a similar [281] fashion to the Syrian commanders, "If even one man were to show up here every day, I could augment my present Khurāsānī contingent. Furthermore, if that impostor [Muḥammad] hears that I am being reinforced, he will lose heart." The caliph then proclaimed his immediate departure, and we left in a fierce heat for al-Kūfah, where he stayed until the war between Muḥammad, Ibrāhīm and him was concluded. When he was free of them, he returned to Baghdad.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit[1166]—a shaykh of the Quraysh: When Abū Jaʿfar pulled out of Baghdad heading for al-Kūfah 1162. Al-Qanṭarah al-ʿAtīqah, which was located at the conjuction of the Greater Ṣarāt Canal with the Lesser Ṣarāt. Lassner, Topography, 277.

1163. The two sacred places, i.e., Mecca and Medina.

1164. Hum fī mithli ḥarajatin. Glossarium, s.v. ḥaraja, which explains the expression with allusion to an overgrown thicket.

1165. Abū Jaʿfar's brother. See note 218.

1166. Aḥmad b. Thābit b. ʿAttāb al-Rāzī, frequently a transmitter for Abū Maʿshar Najīḥ b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Sindī (d. 170/787), was a source for maghāzī material who was born in Medina but died in Baghdad. GAS, I, 292; EI^{2}, s.v. Abū Maʿshar (F. Rosenthal).

(having received news via post dispatch about Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's uprising in Medina), several of his close companions, i.e., ʿUthmān b. ʿUmārah b. Ḥuraym,[1167] Isḥāq b. Muslim al-ʿUqaylī,[1168] ʿAbdallāh b. Rabīʿ al-Madānī, watched him go off on his mount surrounded by his brothers. ʿUthmān said, "I think Muḥammad is going to lose, as will those of his family who have sided with him. Wiliness, cunning, and sagacity form the very stuffing of the robes of this ʿAbbāsī. As for Muḥammad's waging war against him, the words of Ibn Jidhl al-Ṭiʿān[1169] are apposite:

How many raids and cavalry charges has he faced when the meeting grew hot, Forcing their arrogance back until he made them bend, with a lance in which no warp could be seen."

At this Isḥāq b. Muslim added, "By God, I have examined him closely! I touched his shaft and found it rough. I clasped it and found it hard. I tasted it and found it bitter. Al-Manṣūr and his accompanying brothers remind one of what Rabīʿah b. Mukaddam[1170] said:

Horsemen rise up before me, their faces like lamps appearing in the darkness, shining brightly.
Guided by a leader who is calamity's brother, frowning on the night march, for noon suns have scorched him."

1167. While this is the only mention of ʿUthmān in Ṭabarī, his father, ʿUmārah b. Ḥuraym (or Khuraym) al-Murrī, appears in the year 111/729–30 as head of the vanguard for al-Junayd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik's newly appointed governor of Khurāsān. He was subsequently imprisoned by al-Junayd's successor, ʿĀṣim b. ʿAbdallāh al-Hilālī. Ṭabarī, II, 1529, 1565; Crone, Slaves, 98.

1168. Isḥāq b. Muslim served in Armenia under Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik's governor Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik and was later appointed governor there. Ṭabarī, II, 1635, 1871, III, 57–58; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 206; Crone, Slaves, 106.

1169. ʿAbdallāh b. Jidhl al-Tiʿān. Fischer and Braünlich, Schawāhid-Indices, 170; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 47, II, 262.

1170. Rabīʿah b. Mukaddam was a poet-hero of the Banū Kināna. Ibid., I, 47, II, 480.

[282] Finally ʿAbdallāh b. al-Rabīʿ said, "He is the lion in a lair, a restless wild cat, a predator to his peers who robs them of their spirit. When war is stirred up he is as Abū Sufyān b. al-Ḥārith[1171] said:

Ours is a shaykh, who when war rolls up its sleeves, instantly takes the initiative before his brethren."

Abū Jaʿfar continued on to Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah and then settled in al-Kūfah, from where he dispatched troops. When the war was over, he went back to Baghdad and finished building it.

In this year Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, the brother of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, came out in open revolt in al-Baṣrah and waged war against Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr. In this year he also was killed.

The Reason for Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh's Revolt and Murder and How It Came About

According to ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ—his father: Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm grew apprehensive when Abū Jaʿfar seized ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan. They left for ʿAdan, but feeling afraid there, they continued on by sea as far as Sind. There, however, they were denounced to ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ,[1172] so they left for al-Kūfah where Abū Jaʿfar was currently in residence.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—Saʿīd b. Nūḥ al-Ḍubaʿī,[1173] son of Abū al-Sāj al-Ḍubaʿī's daughter—Minnah bt. Abī al-Minhāl: Ibrāhīm stayed at al-Ḥārith b. ʿĪsā's house in the Banū Ḍubayʿah[1174] quarter but was not seen during the daytime. He 1171. Al-Mughīrah b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was a cousin of the Prophet. He first appears in Ṭabarī giving Abū Lahab an account of the Qurashī defeat at Badr, but is especially remembered for his loyalty to Muḥammad at the battle of Ḥunayn. Ṭabarī, I, 1339; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 7, II, 419; Balādhurī, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 4, 266; Dhahabī, Siyar, I, 202–5.

---

1172. ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ b. Abī Ṣufrah al-ʿAtakī who, like the army commander of ʿĪsā b. Mūsā mentioned earlier, was also known as Hazārmard. See note 374.

1173. Saʿīd b. Nūḥ b. Mujālid b. Yazīd b. ʿImrān al-Ḍubaʿī was the grandson of one of Abū Jaʿfar's army commanders. Ṭabarī, III, 293.

1174. The Banū Ḍubayʿah were a tribe of Rabīʿah b. Nizār. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 243, II, 141, 173; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 292–93.

had a concubine of his with him, and I used to chat with her, but we didn't realize who they were until Ibrāhīm made his uprising. At that time I went to her and asked, "Are you my friend?" "I am so," was her reply. "No, by God, the earth has not given us a safe place to settle for five years, being at various times in Fārs, Kirmān,[1175] al-Jabal, the Ḥijāz, and the Yemen." [283]

According to ʿUmar—Abū Nuʿaym al-Faḍl b. Dukayn—Muṭahhar b. al-Ḥārith: Together with Ibrāhīm we were on our way from Mecca to al-Baṣrah, our group numbering ten in all. A bedouin accompanied us part of the way, so we asked him his name. "So and so, son of Abū Maṣād al-Kalbī,"[1176] he replied, staying with us until we drew near al-Baṣrah. One day the bedouin turned to me and asked, "Isn't that Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan?" "No," said I, "that's a Syrian fellow." When we were a night's journey out from al-Baṣrah, Ibrāhīm went on ahead while we stayed behind him and entered the next morning.

According to ʿUmar—Abū Ṣafwān Naṣr b. Qudayd b. Naṣr b. Sayyār: Ibrāhīm's arrival in al-Baṣrah occurred at the beginning of the year 143 as people were returning from the Pilgrimage. The person who made advance preparations for him, took care of his expenses, and rode as counterbalance in his litter was Yaḥyā b. Ziyād b. Ḥassān al-Nabaṭī. He lodged Ibrāhīm in his house in the Banū Layth[1177] [quarter], and purchased a foreign slave girl from Sind for him. Ibrāhīm got her with child in Yaḥyā b. Ziyād's house.

According to Ibn Qudayd b. Naṣr: He was present at the funeral procession for that child, and Yaḥyā b. Ziyād said the prayer for him.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Maʿrūf—his father: Ibrāhīm stayed in al-Ḥiyār,[1178] which is in Syria, with al-Qaʿqāʿ b.

1175. Fārs and Kirmān were adjoining provinces that lay between the Persian Gulf and the Great Desert.

1176. Maṣād b. Kaʿb was a branch of ʿAbdallāh b. Kinānah, an important subdivision of the Banū Kalb. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 283, II, 403.

1177. Layth b. Bakr was a clan of the Banū Kinānah. Ibid., I, 36, II, 376; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 81, 389.

1178. Ḥiyār Banī Qaʿqāʿ was a locality near Qinnasrīn that Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik had given to his secretary al-Qaʿqāʿ b. Khulayd (or Khālid) al-ʿAbsī. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 327; Ṭabarī, II, 837.

Khulayd al-ʿAbsī's family.[1179] Al-Faḍl b. Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī, who was then in authority at Qinnasrīn, wrote to Abū Jaʿfar on a slip of paper that he appended to the foot of his letter. He told him about Ibrāhīm, about how he had searched for him but had found that now Ibrāhīm had been one step ahead of him, moving down to al-Baṣrah. The letter reached Abū Jaʿfar, and he read the first part of it, but finding nothing but the [final] salutation, he tossed the [284] letter to Abū Ayyūb al-Mūriyānī who, in turn, pitched it into his register. When they were about to answer the governors' correspondence, Abān b. Ṣadaqah,[1180] who was then Abū Ayyūb's secretary, opened al-Faḍl's letter to look at its date, and he came upon the slip of paper. As soon as he saw the beginning of it, i.e., the words "I am informing[1181] the Commander of the Faithful," he put it back in the letter. Abān then went to see Abū Jaʿfar and read the letter aloud. Consequently, the caliph ordered spies sent as well as checkpoints and watch posts set up.

According to ʿUmar—al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Faḍl—his father: I heard Ibrāhīm say, "The search in al-Mawṣil pressed upon me until I actually sat at the tables of Abū Jaʿfar. It happened this way: He arrived there in search of me and, confused and exposed [lit. the earth spat me forth],[1182] I was at my wits' end. But the caliph had established a search and checkpoints, and had summoned the people to eat with him in the morning. I, therefore, entered with those who entered and ate with those who ate. Then I left when the search had been called off."

According to ʿUmar—Abū Nuʿaym al-Faḍl b. Dukayn: A man said to Muṭahhar b. al-Ḥārith, "Ibrāhīm passed through al-Kūfah and I met him." Muṭahhar denied that Ibrāhīm entered al-Kūfah and added, "Having been in al-Mawṣil, he passed through al-Anbār, then Baghdad, al-Madāʾin, al-Nīl[1183] and Wāsiṭ."

1179. Al-Qaʿqāʿ b. Khulayd was secretary to the Umayyad caliph al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik (86–96/705–15). Ṭabarī, II, 837; Caskel, Gamharat an-nasab, I, 132, II, 465; Crone, Slaves, 105–6.

1180. During the caliphate of al-Mahdī, Abān b. Ṣadaqah (d. 167/783–84) was appointed secretary to the caliph's son Hārūn al-Rashīd in 160 and then to his son Mūsā al-Hādī in 161. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, V, 301; Sourdel, Vizirat ʿabbāside, I, 97–98.

1181. Ukhbiru. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLIV.

1182. Qadimahā yaṭlubunī fa-taḥabbartu fa-lafaẓatnī al-arḍ. Ibid.

1183. Al-Nīl was a city southwest of Baghdad that lay just below a canal linking the Euphrates and Tigris, i.e., the Great Ṣarāt. Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 334; Cornu, Répertoires, 31; Le Strange, Lands, 72–73.

According to ʿUmar—Naṣr b. Qudayd b. Naṣr: Ibrāhīm had corresponded with a group of people in [Abū Jaʿfar's] camp who were sympathetic to his cause. They wrote asking him to come to them and promising him to make a violent attack on Abū Jaʿfar. Ibrāhīm, therefore, went as far as Abū Jaʿfar's encampment. At that time, the caliph was staying in Baghdad at the monastery. He had already drawn the city plan of Baghdad and made up his mind to build. Now Abū Jaʿfar owned a mirror into which he could look and tell his enemy from his friend. It has been asserted that he looked into it and said, "O Musayyab,[1184] by God, I have seen Ibrāhīm in my camp. Nowhere on on earth is there an enemy more hostile to me than he. Consider carefully what you are doing."

According to ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad, the son of the gatekeeper: Abū Jaʿfar ordered the Old Bridge built over the Ṣarāt Canal. Going out to view it, he spotted Ibrāhīm, but the latter slipped off. He left with the crowd and went to a corn chandler, seeking asylum with him. The corn seller had Ibrāhīm ascend to one of his upper rooms. As Abū Jaʿfar intensified the search for him and posted lookouts everywhere, Ibrāhīm was confined to his hiding place. Abū Jaʿfar made the most exhaustive search possible, but Ibrāhīm kept his whereabouts well concealed. [285]

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Maʿrūf—his father and Naṣr b. Qudayd—Ibn Qudayd's father—ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad Ibn al-Bawwāb, Kathīr b. al-Naḍr b. Kathīr, ʿUmar b. Idrīs, Ibn Abī Sufyān al-ʿAmmī, who agree on the main part of the account but disagree about some of it: While Ibrāhīm kept close, living in fear of the watch, he had the company of a man from the Banū al-ʿAmm.[1185] [ʿUmar said: Abū Ṣafwān [Naṣr b. Qudayd] told me that the man's name was Rawḥ b. Thaqaf, and Ibn al-Bawwāb said that his patronymic was Abū ʿAbdallāh; others have told me that his name was Sufyān b. Ḥayyān b. Mūsā.] This man, whom ʿUmar identified as the grandfather of the ʿAmmī who recounted this to him, said: "I said to Ibrāhīm, 'Events have fallen out as you see. There is no way out of risk and hazard.' Ibrāhīm replied, "You do it, then!" The man then approached al-Rabīʿ[1186] and asked his permission to enter. "Who are you?" asked al-Rabīʿ. "I am Sufyān al-ʿAmmī," the man replied. Al-Rabīʿ then ushered him into Abū Jaʿfar's presence, but when the caliph saw him, he spoke abusively to the man. Sufyān said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I deserve what you say, yet I come to you now in abstention and repentance. From me you shall have anything you want, if you will give me what I ask." "What do you have for me?" asked the caliph. Sufyān answered, "I can bring you Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b.

1184. Musayyab b. Zuhayr b. ʿAmr al-Ḍabbī. See note 333.

1185. Ṭabarī, I, 2535, gives the genealogy of "b. Mālik b. Ḥanzalah b. Mālik b. Zayd Manāt b. Tamīm," but the affiliation with Tamīm has been questioned. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 212, II, 166.

[286] Ḥasan. I've had long experience of him and his family but I have not found anything good in them. What will you give me if I do this?" "Anything you request," replied the caliph; "now tell me where is Ibrāhīm?" "He has already entered Baghdād," Sufyān said, "or he will enter it in the near future."

According to ʿUmar: Abū Ṣafwān [Naṣr b. Qudayd] told me that he said to the caliph, "Ibrāhīm is in ʿAbdasī;[1187] I left him in the house of Khālid b. Nahīk.[1188] [In return for this information] please write a travel authorization for me, for a servant of mine, and for an official guide, and transport me by postal courier."

According to ʿUmar: A certain person said to the caliph: "Send an army with me and write a travel authorization for me and for a servant of mine, and I will bring Ibrāhīm to you." The caliph, therefore, wrote a travel authorization and gave him an armed force, saying, "Here are 1,000 dīnārs; make good use of them." "I don't need that much," the man replied, taking 300 dīnārs. Approaching his goal, he came to Ibrāhīm while the latter was staying in a house. He was wearing a coarse shirt of wool and a turban. [Others say that he was wearing a full-sleeved gown (qabāʾ)][1189] of the type worn by servants.] The man yelled at him to stand, and Ibrāhīm jumped up with [apparent] fright. The man 1186. Abū Faḍl al-Rabīʿ b. Yūnus. See note 162.

1187. Or ʿAbdāsī/ʿAbdās. Although precise identification has not been made, this place (Persian Afdāsahī) is thought to have been in the vicinity of the Nahr al-Madhār, a name given to the most eastern stretch of the Tigris. Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 77; Le Strange, Lands, 42–43; Cornu, Répertoires, 25; Morony, Iraq, 155, 161.

1188. Khālid b. Nahīk b. Qays al-Kindī, whose tribal affiliation is identified more precisely as the Banū Dhuhl b. Muʿāwiyah, was killed in battle against the Khārijite rebel Shabīb b. Yazīd while commanding ʿUthmān b. Qaṭan's right wing. Ṭabarī, II, 910, 935–36; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 233, II, 342.

1189. See note 980.

then proceeded to issue commands and prohibitions all the way to al-Madā'in. There the bridge master would not allow him to cross, so he handed over to him the travel authorization. "Where is your servant?" asked the bridge master. "Here he is," the man replied. When the bridge master looked into the servant's face, he exclaimed, "By God, this is no servant of yours; this is Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan. Still, go right ahead." Thus he let the two of them go and then ran away himself.

According to ʿUmar: Another source said, "The two of them rode the post road as far as ʿAbdasī. From there they took a boat to al-Baṣrah, where they went into hiding." Yet another source reports: "The ʿAmmī left Abū Jaʿfar's presence and went straight to al-Baṣrah. He contrived to bring them to a house having two doors and, posting ten of the escort at one of the doors, said, "Do not move until I come to you." He then went out the other door and left them, getting rid of the armed escort, so as to be on his own. Having done that, he went into hiding. Eventually news of [287] these activities reached Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah,[1190] who sent for and assembled them [those whom he had left]. He also made a search for the ʿAmmī, which proved fruitless.

According to ʿUmar—Ibn ʿĀ'ishah—his father: The one who schemed to rescue Ibrāhīm and the ʿAmmī[1191] from Ibn Muʿāwiyah was [named] ʿAmr b. Shaddād.[1192]

According to ʿUmar—someone from al-Madā'in—al-Ḥasan b. ʿAmr b. Shaddād—his father: Ibrāhīm came my way in al-Madā'in looking for a place to hide. I let him stay in a house of mine that lay on the bank of the Tigris. Subsequently, I was denounced to the governor of al-Madā'in, who beat me with one hundred lashes. I did not disclose Ibrāhīm's whereabouts, however, and when he stopped beating me, I went to tell Ibrāhīm, who then went off.

According to ʿUmar—al-ʿAbbās b. Sufyān b. Yaḥyā b. Ziyād, the mawlā of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf [Yaḥyā b. Ziyād[1193] was one of those 1190. The governor of al-Baṣrah. See note 262.

1191. As suggested by the Leiden text's editor.

1192. ʿAmr b. Shaddād subsequently claimed Fārs for Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh and in 156/772–73 was arrested and crucified by Abū Jaʿfar's governor of al-Baṣrah, al-Haytham b. Muʿāwiyah. Ṭabarī, III, 377–78.

1193. Yaḥyā b. Ziyād b. Ḥassān al-Nabaṭī. See p. 253.

captured from the camp of Qaṭarī b. al-Fujāʾah[1194]): When Ibrāhīm made his uprising, I was a lad of five. I heard our elders say that he came through here on his way down to al-Baṣrah from Syria. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm b. Ṣafwān (one of the mawlās attached to al-Ḥajjāj who were captured from the camp of Qaṭarī) went out to him and walked along with him, getting him across the tight spots. Later someone who had seen him came forward and said, "I saw ʿAbd al-Raḥīm with a sly-looking fellow who was wearing a rose-colored waist wrap and carrying a hazelwood bow[1195] to shoot." When ʿAbd al-Raḥīm returned, he was asked about such a man but feigned ignorance. In fact, Ibrāhīm used to disguise himself in that way.

According to ʿUmar—Naṣr b. Qudayd: Upon his return from Baghdad, Ibrāhīm stayed with Abū Farwah among the Kindah.[1196] He went into hiding and sent for his followers to give them assignments for the revolt.

[288] According to ʿUmar—ʿAlī b. Ismāʿīl b. Ṣāliḥ b. Mītham al-Ahwāzī—ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. Ḥabīb—his father: While Muḥammad b. Ḥuṣayn[1197] was searching for him, Ibrāhīm was in hiding at my place on the bank of the Dujayl[1198] near the city of al-Ahwāz.[1199] One day Muḥammad said, "The Commander of the Faithful wrote to tell me that astrologers had informed him that Ibrāhīm was in al-Ahwāz living on an island between two 1194. Qaṭarī b. al-Fujāʾah was the last important leader of the Azraqī branch of Khārijites. He died in 78–79/698–99 during the attack against the Azāriqah made under the command of Sufyān b. al-Abrad. *EI*², s.v. (G. Levi della Vida); Madelung, Religious Trends, 57–58; Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 209–11.

---

1195. Qawsu julāhiqin. Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, X, 37, offers bunduq as a synonym for julāhiq and notes a Persian etymology for the latter.

1196. Kindah were a prominent tribal group of South Arabian origin. *EI*², s.v. (I. Shahid); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 176, 233, II, 371–72.

1197. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-ʿAbdī was governor of al-Ahwāz. See note 10.

1198. "Dujayl" was the Arabic designation for the Kārūn river, the largest river in southern Iran. It was known as the Dujayl of al-Ahwāz to distinguish it from the Dujayl Canal, which, during the time of al-Manṣūr, connected the Tigris and Euphrates on a northern course parallel to the Nahr ʿĪsā. *EI*², s.v. Kārūn (M. Streck and J. Lassner); Le Strange, Lands, 232–36, and Baghdad, 48–49; Barthold, Geography of Iran, 188–92.

1199. Al-Ahwāz was the capital of the province of Khūzistān. In the ʿAbbāsid period it was a point of transshipment for the commercial use of the Kārūn River. *EI*², s.v. (L. Lockhart); Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 284–86; Le Strange, Lands, 232–34.

rivers. I have searched so thoroughly for him on the island, i.e., the one between the al-Shāh Jurd and the Dujayl rivers, that I am sure he is not there. I have now decided to search the city for him in the morning, because the Commander of the Faithful may have meant the area between the Dujayl River and the Masruqān Canal."[1200] So I went to Ibrāhīm and said to him, "Tomorrow you will be the object of a search in this area." I then stayed with him for the rest of the day and at nightfall I took him to stay in the closer area of Dasht Arbuk,[1201] which lies outside of al-Kaththh.[1202] I returned that night and stood waiting to see if Muḥammad would make a search for him in the morning. He did so, however, only as the day was waning and the sun about to set. At this point I went out to Ibrāhīm and brought him back in. Riding on two donkeys, we appeared in the city at the time of the last prayer of evening. As we entered the city and passed near the fissured mountain (al-jabal al-maqṭūʿ), we ran into the vanguard of Ibn Ḥuṣayn's cavalry. While the cavalry closed in on me, Ibrāhīm threw himself from his donkey, withdrew aside and squatted down to urinate. Not one of the horsemen turned toward me until I reached Ibn Ḥuṣayn. The latter asked me, "Abū Muḥammad, where are you coming from at such an hour?" I replied, "I spent the evening with a member of my family." [289]
"Shouldn't I send with you someone who can help you to get where you're going?" he inquired. "No," I answered, "I'm quite close to home." Ibn Ḥuṣayn went on searching while I kept going my way until the last of his associates was out of sight. I then turned around to go back to Ibrāhīm and hunted around for his donkey until I found it. We mounted[1203] and went on our way to spend the night with our people. Ibrāhīm said, "You know, by 1200. Above the city of Shustar (Arabic Tustar), the Kārūn River divided into two branches (thus creating an island) that reunited after about thirty miles at ʿAskar Makram. The eastern branch of this divide was known as the Masruqān Canal. The river designation "al-Shāh Jurd" here, which is mentioned only here in Ṭabarī, might be the name given to a stretch of one of these branches. Le Strange, Lands, 235–38; *EI*², s.v. Kārūn (M. Streck and J. Lassner).

1201. Ṭabarī later, III, 301, 1845, identifies this as a desert area that lay about one mīl from the citadel of al-Ahwāz. See also Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 137.

1202. The only identification for this vocalization that Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 638, is able to offer is a village near Bukhārā.

1203. Fa-rakibnā, following the Leiden edition, note b.

God, yesterday I urinated blood. Send someone to look." Coming to the place where he had urinated, I found that he had indeed passed blood.

According to ʿUmar—al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī: Abū Jaʿfar said, "Since the crowds of al-Baṣrah encompassed him, the matter of Ibrāhīm has become hard for me to follow up."

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Misʿar b. al-ʿAlāʾ: When Ibrāhīm reached al-Baṣrah, he called upon the people to support his cause, and Mūsā b. ʿUmar b. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim[1204] responded. Mūsā then took Ibrāhīm, incognito, to see al-Naḍr b. Isḥāq b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim. Mūsā said to al-Naḍr b. Isḥāq, "This fellow is Ibrāhīm's messenger." Ibrāhīm then talked with him, asking him to join his uprising. "O fellow," replied al-Naḍr, "how could I give the oath of allegiance to your master when my grandfather ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim was at odds with his grandfather[1205] ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, joining forces with those who opposed him?" Ibrāhīm responded, "Quit talking about the deeds and ways of our forefathers. All of that is an ancient debt, while I am summoning you to a [clear] duty." "By God," retorted al-Naḍr, "I only mentioned that to you as a joke. That's not what keeps me from supporting your master. Rather, I see no point in fighting, and I'm not indebted to him." Ibrāhīm then left, but Mūsā stayed behind and said to al-Naḍr, "By God, that was Ibrāhīm himself." Al-Naḍr exclaimed, "By God's life, you shouldn't have done that!
[290] If you had let me know, I would have spoken to him in quite another way."

According to ʿUmar—Naṣr b. Qudayd: Ibrāhīm summoned people to his cause while living in Abū Farwah's house. The first to give him the oath of allegiance were Numaylah b. Murrah,[1206] ʿAfwallāh b. Sufyān, ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. Ziyād,[1207] ʿUmar b. Salamah al-Hujaymī, and ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn[1208] al-1204. His great-grandfather ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim al-Sulamī (d. 73/692–93) was an Umayyad governor of Khurāsān. *EI*², s.v. ʿAbd Allāh b. Khāzim (H. A. R. Gibb).

1205. Ibrāhīm was actually the great-great-grandson of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

1206. See note 1071.

1207. When Muḥammad b. Sulaymān became governor of al-Baṣrah, Ibn Ziyād's house and that of Ibn Sufyān were among those he destroyed upon orders from Abū Jaʿfar. Ṭabarī, III, 327.

1208. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLIV.

Raqāshī. They, in turn, urged the people to join him. After them, enough young men among the Arabs answered the call, including al-Mughīrah b. al-Faz[c][1209] and others like him, that people assumed Ibrāhīm could count 4,000 men in his enlistment rolls. As his affair became well known, they said to him, "If only you were to move to the heart of al-Baṣrah, just see how many would join you!" Feeling revived, Ibrāhīm moved and stayed at the house of Abū Marwān,[1210] a Naysābūrī mawlā of the Banū Sulaym.

According to [c]Umar—Yūnus b. Najdah: Ibrāhīm was staying among the Banū Rāsib at [c]Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥarb's house. He then left his house, leading a group of his partisans that included [c]Afwallāh b. Sufyān, Burd b. Labīd (one of the Banū Yashkur)[1211], al-Maḍā' al-Taghlibī,[1212] al-Ṭuhawī,[1213] al-Mughīrah b. al-Faz[c], Numaylah b. Murrah, and Yaḥyā b. [c]Amr al-Humānī. They passed the extensive tract of the Banū [c]Aqīl[1214] on their way out to al-Ṭufāwah.[1215] They then passed Karzam's house[1216] and Nāfi[c] Iblīs[1217] on their way to Abū Marwān's house in the Banū Yashkur graveyard.

According to [c]Umar—Ibn [c]Afwallāh b. Sufyān—his father: One day I came to Ibrāhīm, finding him upset. He told me that he had received a letter from his brother informing him that he [Muḥammad] had made his uprising and commanding Ibrāhīm to stage his own revolt. He was dumbfounded with that news and [291] greatly worried about it. I tried to smooth over the matter for him, saying, "Affairs have already worked together for you. You have al-Maḍā, al-Ṭuhawī, al-Mughīrah, and me, as well as various 1209. Al-Mughīrah b. al-Faz[c] is first identified in Ṭabarī, III, 76, as a supporter of Bassām b. Ibrāhīm, a Khurāsānī officer who rebelled against the caliph Abū al-[c]Abbās in 134/751–52.

1210. His house, too, is listed by Ṭabarī, III, 327, as among those destroyed upon Abū Ja[c]far's orders. See note 1207.

1211. Yashkur b. Bakr was a tribe of Rabī[c]ah. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 141, 162, II, 592.

1212. Al-Maḍā' b. al-Qāsim al-Taghlibī al-Jazarī.

1213. His full name is never given in Ṭabarī.

1214. Presumably [c]Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib. See note 866, and Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 5, II, 191.

1215. Although not included in Yāqūt, this place is later mentioned in Ṭabarī's account of the Zanj rebellion at III, 1855.

1216. Karzam al-Sadūsī. See note 1251.

1217. The site is not mentioned in the standard geographical sources.

others, on your side. Tonight we will go and break open the prison, and when you awake tomorrow you will have a host of people with you." At this he regained his spirits.

According to ʿUmar—Sahl b. ʿAqīl b. Ismāʿīl—his father: When Muḥammad came out in open revolt, Abū Jaʿfar sent for Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah al-Bahrānī, a man of good judgment, and said, "Tell me what you think. Muḥammad has now made an uprising in Medina." "Send the armies to al-Baṣrah," said Jaʿfar. The caliph then told him to leave until he was sent for. When Ibrāhīm reached al-Baṣrah, the caliph again sent for Jaʿfar and said, "Ibrāhīm has now reached al-Baṣrah." Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah responded, "That's why I was afraid for it; dispatch armies against him posthaste." "Why are you afraid for al-Baṣrah?" asked Abū Jaʿfar. "Because Muḥammad has made his uprising in Medina," said Jaʿfar, "and they are not sufficiently warlike to sustain the situation by themselves. The people of al-Kūfah are under your foot, while the Syrians are enemies of the family of Abū Ṭālib. That leaves only al-Baṣrah."[1218] Abū Jaʿfar thus sent the two sons of ʿAqīl, both Khurāsānī officers from the tribe of Ṭayyiʾ. They arrived in al-Baṣrah, which was then governed by Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah, and he gave them a place to stay.

According to ʿUmar—Jawwād b. Ghālib b. Mūsā, the mawlā of the Banū ʿIjl—Yaḥyā b. Budayl b. Yaḥyā b. Budayl: When Muḥammad came out in open revolt, Abū Jaʿfar asked Abū Ayyūb and ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ḥumayd,[1219] "Do you know someone of sound opinions with whom we could put our heads together?" "There's Budayl b. Yaḥyā in al-Kūfah." they replied. "Abū al-ʿAbbās used to seek counsel with him, so send for him." The caliph did so and said to Budayl, "Muḥammad has now made an uprising in Medina." "Invest al-Ahwāz with an army," was his [292] reply. The caliph retorted, "But he made his uprising in Medina." "I understand that," said Budayl, "But al-Ahwāz is their gate through which they can be brought." Abū Jaʿfar accepted Budyal's assessment.

According to ʿUmar: When Ibrāhīm arrived in al-Baṣrah, the caliph sent for Budayl and said, "Ibrāhīm has now reached al-1218. On this conversation, see Lassner, "Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr," 45–47.

1219. See note 1108.

Baṣrah. Overtake him with the army and set al-Ahwāz ablaze[1220] against him."

According to Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ al-Dimashqī, a Qurashī mawlā: When Muḥammad made his uprising, Abū Jaʿfar sought the advice of a Syrian shaykh who had sound opinions. The shaykh said, "Dispatch 4,000 Syrian troops to al-Baṣrah." The caliph paid no attention to him, saying, "The shaykh is feeble-minded." Later, however, he sent for him again and said, "Ibrāhīm has now made an uprising in al-Baṣrah." To this the shaykh responded, "Send against him a force of Syrians." "Woe to you," said the caliph, "whom can I trust to deal with them?" The shaykh replied, "Write to your governor there, telling him to send you ten men every day by the post road." Accordingly, Abū Jaʿfar sent that order to Syria.

According to ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ: I remember my father paying the army during that time. Although but a mere lad then, I held the lantern for him while he paid them at night.

According to ʿUmar—Sahl b. ʿAqīl—Salm b. Farqad:[1221] When Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah counseled Abū Jaʿfar to have the Syrian army sent down to him,[1222] they began arriving in contingents, some right on the tracks of others. Intending to alarm the people of al-Kūfah with them, Abū Jaʿfar ordered the soldiers, when dark of night concealed them in his camp, to go back but to keep well away from the road. The next morning they entered, leaving the people of al-Kūfah in no doubt that they were another army in addition to the first.

According to ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd,[1223] a servant to Abū al-ʿAbbās: Muḥammad b. Yazīd[1224] was one of Abū Jaʿfar's army commanders. He had a chestnut-colored mount of Persian breed, and frequently while we were in al-Kūfah he rode by us on it. [When he stood] his [293] head was on level with that of the horse.[1225] Abū Jaʿfar dispatched 1220. Wa-ashʿil al-Ahwāza ʿalayhi. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCLXV.

---

1221. Ṭabarī, III, 294, later identifies him as chamberlain to Sulaymān b. Mujālid.

1222. Bi-ḥadri jundi al-shaʾmi ilayhi. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ḥadara.

1223. Abū Saʿd ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Jaʿfar b. ʿAbdallāh b. (Abī) al-Ḥakam b. Rāfiʿ. See note 674.

1224. Muḥammad b. Yazīd b. ʿImrān.

1225. Qad sāwā raʾsuhu raʾsahu. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. sawiya.

him to al-Baṣrah, where he stayed until Ibrāhīm came out in open revolt. Eventually, Ibrāhīm seized and imprisoned him.

According to Saʿīd b. Nūḥ b. Mujālid al-Ḍubaʿī: Abū Jaʿfar sent Mujālid and Muḥammad, the sons of Yazīd b. ʿImrān and natives of Abīward,[1226] as army commanders. Mujālid arrived before Muḥammad; then Muḥammad arrived on the night that Ibrāhīm began his rebellion. Sufyān obstructed them, imprisoning them near him in the governor's quarters until Ibrāhīm made his uprising. Then Ibrāhīm seized and shackled them. Along with those two, Abū Jaʿfar had also dispatched an army commander from ʿAbd al-Qays[1227] whose name was Muʿammar.

According to Yūnus b. Najdah: Mujālid b. Yazīd al-Ḍubaʿī reached Sufyān at Abū Jaʿfar's behest with 1,500 cavalry and 500 foot soldiers.

According to Saʿīd b. al-Ḥasan b. Tasnīm b. al-Ḥawārī b. Ziyād b. ʿAmr b. al-Ashraf:[1228] I heard various people I do not count among our associates mention that Abū Jaʿfar sought advice about the situation with Ibrāhīm and was told, "The people of al-Kūfah are Ibrāhīm's partisans (shīʿah). In fact, al-Kūfah is a furiously boiling pot and you are its lid, so go and remain there." The caliph did so.

According to Muslim al-Khaṣī ("the Eunuch"), Muḥammad b. Sulaymān's mawlā: The affair of Ibrāhīm occurred when I was some ten years old. In those days I belonged to Abū Jaʿfar, and we were lodged in al-Hāshimiyyah (of al-Kūfah) while the caliph himself was living in al-Ruṣāfah, behind al-Kūfah. The totality of his army stationed in his encampment numbered about 1,500, and al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr commanded his personal guard. The army was divided into three parts of 500 men each. As soldiers patrolled around the whole of al-Kūfah every night, the caliph commanded a herald to call out: "Whomever we seize after dark [294] has declared himself open game." When the guard seized a man after dark, they would wrap him in a woolen cloak, carry 1226. "Abīward," or "Bāward," was the name of a town and district in northwestern Khurāsān. *EI*², s.v. (V. Minorsky); Le Strange, Lands, 394–95; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 86–87.

1227. Banū ʿAbd al-Qays b. Afṣā were a component tribe of Rabīʿah. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 141, 168, II, 127; *EI*², s.v. ʿAbd al-Ḳays (W. Caskel).

1228. Al-Ashraf was the son of al-Manṣūr's governor in Oman. See note 796.

him off, and make him spend the night near them. In the morning they would make inquiries about him, and if they could ascertain his innocence, they would release him. If not, they imprisoned him.

According to Abū al-Ḥasan al-Ḥadhdhā' ("the Cobbler"): Abū Ja'far made the people wear black, so I used to see people dyeing their clothes with ink.

According to 'Alī b. al-Ja'd: In those days I saw the people of al-Kūfah take to wearing black clothes to such an extent that, even among the grocers, one of them would dye his garment [from his stock of] paints and then wear it.

According to Jawwād b. Ghālib—al-'Abbās b. Salm, Qaḥṭabah's mawlā: Whenever the Commander of the Faithful Abū Ja'far suspected anyone in al-Kūfah of favoring Ibrāhīm, he would order my father Salm to search for him. The latter would then wait until nightfall, when people were quiet, to set a ladder against the man's dwelling. He would thereby burst in upon him in his house in order to drive him out, kill him, and take his signet ring.

According to Abū Sahl Jawwād:[1229] I heard Jamīl, Muḥammad b. Abī al-'Abbās's mawlā, say to al-'Abbās b. Salm, "By God, had your father bequeathed nothing but the signet rings of those citizens of al-Kūfah whom he killed, you would be the best provided for of sons."

According to Sahl b. 'Aqīl—Salm b. Farqad, the chamberlain of Sulaymān b. Mujālid: I had a friend in al-Kūfah who came to me and said, "My dear fellow, you should know that the people of al-Kūfah are preparing to pounce on your master. If you can settle your family in a safe place, then do so. I went to Sulaymān b. Mujālid and gave him this information. He, in turn, informed Abū Ja'far. Now Abū Ja'far had a spy named Ibn Muqrin[1230] [295] among the citizens of al-Kūfah, who was by profession a money changer. He sent for him and said, "Woe to you, the people of al-Kūfah have become stirred up." "No, by God, Commander of the Faithful," replied Ibn Muqrin, "I am your advocate with them." The caliph relied on his statement and left them alone.

1229. Probably Jawwād b. Ghālib b. Mūsā, the mawlā of the Banū 'Ijl. See the preceding paragraph and p. 262.

1230. Thus vocalized in the Leiden text, but see I, 2025, for Ma'qil b. Muqarrin.

According to Yaḥyā b. Maymūn of the people of al-Qādisiyyah: I heard a number of the people of al-Qādisiyyah mention that a Khurāsānī named something-or-other b. Maʿqil, and whose patronymic was Abū al-Faḍl, was put in charge of al-Qādisiyyah to prevent the people of al-Kūfah from coming to [the aid of] Ibrāhīm. People were posted as watchmen on the road to al-Baṣrah because Kūfans would come first to al-Qādisiyyah, then to al-ʿUdhayb,[1231] and finally to Wādī al-Sibāʿ.[1232] At this point they would detour to the left through open country until they reached al-Baṣrah. A band of twelve men left al-Kūfah and got as far as Wādī al-Sibāʿ. There one of the Banū Asad[1233] mawlās, named Bakr, who was from the town of Sharāf,[1234] encountered them outside Wāqiṣah,[1235] two mīls from the people living near the mosque called the Mosque of the Mawlās. Then Ibn Maʿqil came, and Bakr told him what was happening. Ibn Maʿqil, therefore, followed the group of twelve, overtaking them in Khaffān,[1236] which is four farsakhs[1237] from al-Qādisiyyah, and killed them all.

According to Ibrāhīm b. Salm:[1238] Al-Furāfiṣah al-ʿIjlī had planned to make a surprise assault on al-Kūfah but refrained from 1231. Al-ʿUdhayb was an oasis belonging to the Banū Tamīm that lay about ten miles south of al-Qādisiyyah on the pilgrimage route from al-Kūfah to Mecca. Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 92; Morony, Iraq, 153; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳādisiyya (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

---

1232. Sibāʿ are predatory animals whose flesh is forbidden under Muslim dietary law. See Cook, "Early Islamic Dietary Law," 248–51. Among the places thus identified by Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 343–44, are a locality in the environs of al-Kūfah and another some five mīls south of al-Baṣrah on the way to Mecca. The latter is remembered as the site of al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām's death in the Battle of the Camel.

1233. Asad b. Khuzaymah was a component of Khindif. For their presence in the vicinity of al-Qādisiyyah, see *EI*², s.v. (W. Caskel); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 3, 50, II, 194; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 190–92.

1234. Sharāf was a watering place between Wāqiṣah and Qarʿāʾ on the road from al-Kūfah to Mecca. Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 331.

1235. Wāqiṣah was a fortified watering place about 125 kilometers south of al-Qādisiyyah. Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 353–54; Cornu, Répertoires, 94.

1236. Khaffān was a stage on the pilgrimage route from al-Kūfah about two or three mīls below al-Nusūkh. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 379.

1237. The farsakh is the equivalent of about six kilometers. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 62.

1238. Perhaps this is Ibrāhīm b. Salm b. Qutaybah al-Bāhilī, grandson of the Umayyad governor Qutaybah b. Muslim, and governor of the Yemen for al-Hādī, Ṭabarī, III, 568; Crone, Slaves, 138.

doing so because of Abū Jaʿfar's presence and his continued stay there. Ibn Māʿiz al-Asadī secretly took the oath of allegiance to Ibrāhīm there.

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Rāshid b. Yazīd: I heard Ismāʿīl b. Mūsā al-Bajalī and ʿĪsā b. al-Naḍr, the two Sammānīs, and others report that Ghazwān belonged to the family of al-Qaʿqāʿ b. Ḍirār.[1239] Then Abū Jaʿfar purchased him, and one day Ghazwān said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, behold, there are ships coming down from al-Mawṣil that contain wearers of white,[1240] heading for Ibrāhīm in al-Baṣrah." The caliph therefore [296] assigned Ghazwān an army, and he encountered the wearers of white in Bāḥamshā,[1241] which lies between Baghdad and al-Mawṣil, and killed them all. Those traveling were merchants, and with them was a group of devotees, people of pious bent, as well as others. Leading them was a man named Abū al-ʿIrfān,[1242] from the people of Shuʿayb al-Sammān, who began to say, "Woe unto you, O Ghazwān, don't you recognize me? I'm your neighbor Abū al-ʿIrfān. All I did was set out with some slaves of mine, and now I have sold them." But Ghazwān did not accept his story and killed them all. He then sent their heads to al-Kūfah, and they were set up for display all the way from the house of Isḥāq al-Azraq,[1243] which stands next to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā's house, to Madīnat Ibn Hubayrah. Abū Aḥmad ʿAbdallāh b. Rāshid said, "I actually saw them raised up on a pile of earth."

According to ʿUmar—Abū ʿAlī al-Qaddāḥ ("the Cup maker")—Dāwūd b. Sulaymān,[1244] Naybakht,[1245] and a group of [his] fellow-

1239. See note 305.

1240. I.e., ʿAlid supporters, as distinguished from the ʿAbbāsid wearers of black.

1241. Bāḥamshā was a village that lay between Awānā and al-Ḥazīrah in the region north of Baghdad before Sāmarrāʾ. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 316.

1242. With some strands of classical Sufism, ʿirfān came to denote a kind of experiential mystical knowledge or gnosis.

1243. Abū Muḥammad Isḥāq b. Yūsuf b. Mirdās al-Azraq (d. 195/810) was a traditionist and Qurʾān reciter from al-Wāsiṭ. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, VIII, 431; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 225; Dhahabī, Siyar, IX, 171–72; GAS, I, 75.

1244. Perhaps Abū Sahl al-Daqqāq Dāwūd b. Sulaymān b. Ḥafṣ al-ʿAskarī, mawlā of the Banū Hāshim and a source for such muḥaddithūn as al-Nasāʾī, Ibn Mājah, and Ibn Abī Dāwūd. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 161.

1245. Or Nawbakht. He is later, III, 317, identified as an astrologer at the court of al-Manṣūr and was listed (Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 238–41) among the group of astronomers, astrologers, and mathematicians who were consulted about the founding tradesmen: We were in al-Mawṣil at the time that Ḥarb al-Rāwandī[1246] was there as a frontier soldier in charge of 2,000 because of the Khārijī presence in the Jazīrah. He received a letter from Abū Jaʿfar ordering him to return. Ḥarb left, but when he was in Bāḥamshā, its people obstructed him, saying, "We will not let you through our lines to help Abū Jaʿfar against Ibrāhīm." Ḥarb replied, "Woe to you, I mean you no harm! I'm simply passing through, so give me leave." "No, by God," they cried, "you shall never pass us!" Ḥarb therefore fought them and wiped them out, carrying off 500 of their heads. These he brought to Abū Jaʿfar and told him how things had gone with them. Abū Jafar said, "This is the beginning of victory."

According to ʿUmar—Khālid b. Khidāsh b. ʿAjlān,[1247] ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ's mawlā: A group of our shaykhs told me that they were [297] present when Dafīf b. Rāshid, the mawlā of the Banū Yazīd b. Ḥātim,[1248] came to Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah the night before Ibrāhīm's revolt and said, "Assign me some cavalry troops and I shall bring you Ibrāhīm or his head." Sufyān replied, "Have you no work to do? Go do your job!" Dafīf left that very night and caught up with Yazīd b. Ḥātim when he was in Egypt.

According to ʿUmar—Khālid b. Khidāsh: I heard a number of the Azdīs speaking about Jābir b. Ḥammād, the head of Sufyān's police force,[1249] who the day before Ibrāhīm's revolt said to Sufyān, "I was passing the graveyard of the Banū Yashkur, and of Baghdad. Nawbakht is a Persian patronymic meaning "new fortune" that was carried by a number of Baghdādī scholars, including several important Shīʿī theologians. EI[1], s.v. (L. Massignon); Dodge, Fihrist of al-Nadīm, II, 1071.

---

1246. Ḥarb b. ʿAbdallāh al-Rāwandī, who headed al-Manṣūr's shurṭah, first in Baghdad and then here in al-Mawṣil. The Ḥarbiyyah quarter of Baghdad was named after him, and the ruins of a fortress that he built in al-Mawṣil were visible in the seventh/thirteenth century. The information that follows mention of his name is repeated, and Ḥarb's death at the hands of a Turkish force is related, among the first events of the year 147/764–65. Ṭabarī, III, 328–29; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, II, 172–73; Le Strange, Baghdad, 122–35; Lassner, Topography, 158–59, 176–77.

1247. Abū al-Haytham Khālid b. Khidāsh (thus vocalized in the Leiden text) b. ʿAjlān al-Muhallabī was a Baghdādī muḥaddith who died in 223/838. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, VIII, 304–7; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XIII, 276 (where the nasab is given as Ibn Khaddāsh); Dhahabī, Siyar, X, 488–89.

1248. Yazīd b. Ḥātim b. Qabīṣah b. al-Muhallab. See note 205. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 204, II, 594.

1249. ʿĀqibu ṣāḥibi shurați Sufyān. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. ʿaqaba.

they yelled at me and threw stones at me." Sufyān said to him, "Couldn't you have gone some other way?"

According to ʿUmar—Abū ʿUmar al-Ḥawḍī Ḥafṣ b. ʿUmar:[1250] On Sunday, the day before Ibrāhīm's uprising, the deputy head of Sufyān's police force was passing the graveyard of the Banū Yashkur. He was told, "Watch out for Ibrāhīm, who is planning to revolt." "You have lied," said the deputy, and did not let himself be diverted.

According to Abū ʿUmar al-Ḥawḍī: When he was surrounded, Ibrāhīm's partisans started to shout at Sufyān. "Remember the oath of allegiance you took in the house of the Makhzūmīs."

According to Abū ʿUmar—Muḥārib b. Naṣr: After Ibrāhīm was killed, Sufyān passed by in a boat. Looking down from his stronghold, Abū Jaʿfar asked, "Is this fellow really Sufyān?" When they told him it was, the caliph said, "By God, that's astonishing! How did the son of a whore escape me?"

According to al-Ḥawḍī: Sufyān said to one of Ibrāhīm's army commanders, "Stand with me; not all your associates know what lay between Ibrāhīm and me."

According to ʿUmar—Naṣr b. Farqad: Karzam al-Sadūsī[1251] would come to Sufyān in the morning with news of Ibrāhīm. In the evening he would return and tell Sufyān who had come to Ibrāhīm. Sufyān, however, paid no attention to him and made no attempt to follow a single one of these leads.

Another source: In those days Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah was al-Manṣūr's governor of al-Baṣrah. He was conspiring with Ibrāhīm [298]
b. ʿAbdallāh in his affair and, therefore, did not give sincere advice to his master (Abū Jaʿfar).

There is disagreement about the time of Ibrāhīm's arrival in al-Baṣrah. Some say that he reached there on the first day of the month Ramaḍān in 145. The account of those who hold that view is as follows:

According to ʿUmar—al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar: When Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan came out in 1250. Abū ʿUmar al-Ḥawḍī Ḥafṣ b. ʿUmar b. al-Ḥārith b. Sakhbarah al-Azdī al-Namirī was a muḥaddith and ḥāfiẓ of al-Baṣrah who died in 225/840. Dhahabī, Siyar, X, 354–55; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 349–50; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XIII, 101–2.

1251. Sadūs b. Shaybān was a branch of Dhuhl b. Thaʿlabah, part of the Bakr b. Wā'il confederation. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 152, 153, II, 498.

open revolt, took control of Medina and Mecca, and was greeted as caliph, he dispatched his brother Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh to al-Baṣrah. Ibrāhīm entered al-Baṣrah on the first day of the month of Ramaḍān in 145. He was victorious over it and put on white there, as did the people of al-Baṣrah in union with him. Those who joined his revolt were ʿĪsā b. Yūnus,[1252] Muʿādh b. Muʿādh,[1253] ʿAbbād b. al-ʿAwwām,[1254] Isḥāq b. Yūsuf al-Azraq, Muʿāwiyah b. Hishām,[1255] and a considerable number of jurisprudents and scholars. He remained in al-Baṣrah for the months of Ramaḍān and Shawwāl. When Ibrāhīm learned of his brother Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's slaying, he made preparations and provisions and headed out to an encounter with Abū Jaʿfar in al-Kūfah.

We have already mentioned the view of those who say that Ibrāhīm arrived in al-Baṣrah in the beginning of 143. According to this account, however, he lived in hiding there, secretly calling upon the people of al-Baṣrah to give the oath of allegiance to his brother Muḥammad.

According to Sahl b. ʿAqīl—his father: Before Ibrāhīm's uprising, Sufyān sent for two army commanders who had come to him [299] on Abū Jaʿfar's authority as reinforcements. They were still with him, and when Ibrāhīm gave him a firm date for the rebellion, Sufyān sent for the two commanders and kept them with him that night until Ibrāhīm had staged his revolt. Ibrāhīm then surrounded Sufyān, and the two commanders and took the latter into custody.

1252. Abū ʿAmr ʿĪsā b. Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq b. al-Sabīʿī al-Hamdānī (d. 187/803) was a Syrian muḥaddith and ḥāfiẓ who is said to have taken part in raids against the Byzantine border and to have made the Pilgrimage every year. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 212–15; Dhahabī, Siyar, VIII, 489–94; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, V, 111.

1253. Abū Muthannā Muʿādh b. Muʿādh b. Naṣr b. Ḥassān b. al-Ḥārith al-ʿAnbarī (d. 196/812) was a muḥaddith who served as judge of al-Baṣrah for Hārūn al-Rashīd. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, XIII, 131–34; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 175–76; Dhahabī, Siyar, IX, 54–57; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VII, 258.

1254. Abū Sahl ʿAbbād b. al-ʿAwwām b. ʿUmar b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Mundhir al-Kilābī was a traditionist who died in Baghdad about 186/802. He was imprisoned for a time by Hārūn al-Rashīd and then released. Dhahabī, Siyar, VIII, 511–12; Ṣafadī, Wafī, XVI, 614; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 86–87.

1255. Abū al-Ḥasan Muʿāwiyah b. Hishām al-Qaṣṣār al-Azdī was a traditionist of al-Kūfah who died about 205/820–21. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 196–97.

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Maʿrūf b. Suwayd—his father: Before Ibrāhīm's uprising, Abū Jaʿfar sent [to al-Baṣrah] three army commanders, Mujālid, Muḥammad, and Yazīd, who were brothers. They advanced with their armies and started to enter al-Baṣrah successively, one right after the other. Concerned that the forces would continue to increase there, Ibrāhīm made his uprising.

According to Naṣr b. Qudayd: Ibrāhīm staged his revolt on the eve of Monday, the first day of the month of Ramaḍān in 145. He reached the graveyard of the Banū Yashkur with some ten mounted men, including ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥudayn[1256] al-Raqāshī. That same night, Abū Ḥammād al-Abraṣ[1257] arrived with 2,000 men as reinforcement for Sufyān. He stayed in the courtyard until the soldiers were settled. Ibrāhīm set off, first going straight for the mounts and weapons of these soldiers. The next morning he led the people in prayer in the main mosque. Meanwhile, Sufyān blockaded himself in his quarters, having a group of his [paternal] brothers there with him. So many people approached Ibrāhīm, either to gaze or to offer support, that their number grew large. When Sufyān saw that, he sought the guarantee of safety, and his request was granted. (Muṭahhar b. Juwayriyyah al-Sadūsī went in secret to Ibrāhīm and obtained the guarantee of safety for Sufyān.) Sufyān then opened the door so that Ibrāhīm could enter the house. As he entered, a reed mat was thrown down for him at the entrance to the portico and a gusting wind turned it upside down. The people took it as an evil omen, but Ibrāhīm said, "We do not take auguries" and proceeded to sit on it wrong-side-up (although repugnance could be seen on his face.) When Ibrāhīm entered the house, he let them go their ways—as the source recounts—except Sufyān b. Muʿāwiyah. The latter he confined in the fort and bound with a light chain. According to the sources that describe his action, Ibrāhīm wanted Abū Jaʿfar to think that Sufyān was imprisoned near him. Jaʿfar and Muḥammad, the sons of Sulaymān b. ʿAlī, who were then in [300] al-Baṣrah, heard about Ibrāhīm's reaching the governor's quarters and imprisoning Sufyān. It is said that they advanced toward Ibrāhīm with 600 foot soldiers, cavalry, and archers. Against them Ibrāhīm sent al-Maḍāʾ b. al-Qāsim al-Jazarī with eighteen horsemen and thirty foot soldiers, and al-Maḍāʾ routed them. One of al-Maḍāʾ's associates caught up with Muḥammad and stabbed him in the thigh. A herald of Ibrāhīm's cried out, "Anyone retreating will not be pursued." Muḥammad then went himself to stand at Zaynab bt. Sulaymān's gate. There he called out that the family of Sulaymān had a guarantee of safety and that no one should trouble them.

1256. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLIV.

1257. A mawlā of the Banū Sulaym who is earlier mentioned, III, 122, as fighting under the command of Khāzim b. Khuzaymah in the battle against the Khārijī al-Mulabbid.

According to Bakr b. Kathīr: When Ibrāhīm was victorious against Jaʿfar and Muḥammad and took control of al-Baṣrah, he found 600,000 [dirhams] in the treasury, which he ordered taken into safekeeping. (Another source states that he found 2 million dirhams in the treasury.) His position was strengthened by that, and he assigned fifty dirhams to every man. It is said that when Ibrāhīm had conquered al-Baṣrah, he sent a man named al-Ḥusayn b. Thawlāʾ to al-Ahwāz so that he could call upon its people to give the oath of allegiance. Al-Ḥusayn, therefore, went and received their oaths of allegiance and then returned to Ibrāhīm. At this point, Ibrāhīm sent al-Mughīrah off with fifty men, while another fully 200 joined him when he reached al-Ahwāz. In those days Abū Jaʿfar's appointed governor in al-Ahwāz was Muḥammad b. al-Ḥuṣayn. When Ibn al-Ḥuṣayn learned that al-Mughīrah was drawing near him, he went forth against him with those who were with him, a force said to number 4,000. The opposing sides met each other about a mīl from the citadel of al-[301] Ahwāz in a place called Dasht Arbuk. Ibn Ḥuṣayn and his associates were put to flight, and al-Mughīrah entered al-Ahwāz.

It has been said that al-Mughīrah went to al-Ahwāz after Ibrāhīm left al-Baṣrah for Bākhamrā.[1258]

According to Muḥammad b. Khālid al-Murabbaʿī: After Ibrāhīm had gained control of al-Baṣrah, he intended to head for the district of al-Kūfah. He therefore appointed Numaylah b. Murrah al-ʿAbshamī as his deputy in al-Baṣrah and ordered him to send al-1258. Bākhamrā was a village about seventeen farsakhs (about 100 kilometers) from al-Kūfah on the road to Wāsiṭ. Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 316.

Mughīrah b. al-Faz', one of the Banū Bahdalah b. 'Awf,[1259] to al-Ahwāz, which at that time was governed by Muḥammad b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-'Abdī. To Fārs, Ibrāhīm sent 'Amr b. Shaddād as governor. Ibn Shaddād went by Rām Hurmuz,[1260] where Ya'qūb b. al-Faḍl[1261] was, and asked him to follow him. Ya'qūb b. al-Faḍl went with him as far as Fārs, where Ismā'īl b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh was Abū Ja'far's appointed governor. With Ismā'īl was his brother, 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī. When they heard that 'Amr b. Shaddād and Ya'qūb b. al-Faḍl were approaching, Ismā'īl b. 'Alī and 'Abd al-Ṣamad were in Iṣṭakhr.[1262] Immediately they hurried off to Dārābjird[1263] and fortified themselves there. Fārs thus fell to the control of 'Amr b. Shaddād and Ya'qūb b. al-Faḍl, thereby placing al-Baṣrah, al-Ahwāz, and Fārs [all three] under Ibrāhīm's jurisdiction.

According to 'Umar—Sulaymān b. Abī Shaykh (or Shaḥḥ):[1264] When Ibrāhīm made his uprising in al-Baṣrah, al-Ḥakam b. Abī Ghaylān al-Yashkurī approached with 17,000 men to enter Wāsiṭ, where Hārūn b. Ḥumayd al-Iyādī was Abū Ja'far's appointed [governor]. Hārūn, therefore, took refuge in an oven in the fortress until he was brought out from it. The people of Wāsiṭ went to Ḥafṣ b. 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah[1265] and said to him: "You are more [302]

1259. Bahdalah b. 'Awf b. Ka'b b. Sa'd was a clan of the Banū Tamīm. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 77, II, 220; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-'arab, 218–19, 466.

1260. Rām Hurmuz, or Rāmahurmuz, was a town in Khūzistān that lay about eighty-five kilometers east of al-Ahwāz. EI[1], s.v. Rām Hormuz (V. Minorsky); Le Strange, Lands, 243, 247; Yāqūt, Buldān, III, 17.

1261. Ya'qūb b. al-Faḍl b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abbās b. Rabī'ah b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. His ancestor, al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, was the Prophet's uncle. Ya'qūb's execution for heresy in 169/785 was among the first acts of Mūsā al-Hādī's caliphate. Ṭabarī, III, 549–50; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-'arab, 71.

1262. Iṣṭakhr, which was situated near the ruins of Persepolis, was the principal city of the province of Fārs. Persepolis, in fact, provided building material for the construction of Iṣṭakhr. EI[2], s.v. (M. Streck and G. C. Miles); Barthold, Geography of Iran, 148, 151–52; Cornu, Répertoires, 51; Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 211–12.

1263. Dārābjird was a town in the province of Fārs that lay about 280 kilometers east of Shīrāz. EI[2], s.v. (D. N. Wilber); Barthold, Geography of Iran, 152–53, 161–62; Cornu, Répertoires, 48; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 419.

1264. Abū Ayyūb Sulaymān b. Abī Shaykh was a traditionist and poet of Wāsiṭ. Dodge, Fihrist of al-Nadīm, 1099.

1265. His great-great-grandfather Abū Muḥammad al-Makhzūmī 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām (d. 43/663) was among the tābi'ūn, the Successors entitled than this Hujaymī [i.e., Hārūn].[1266] Ḥafṣ, therefore, took control of the city and al-Yashkurī left. Ḥafṣ, however, put Abū Muqrin al-Hujaymī in charge of his police forces.

According to ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Ghaffār b. ʿAmr al-Fuqaymī, al-Faḍl b. ʿAmr al-Fuqaymī's nephew: Ibrāhīm was at odds with Hārūn b. Saʿd[1267] and would not speak to him. When Ibrāhīm made his uprising, Hārūn b. Saʿd turned up and went to see Salm b. Abī Wāṣil, saying to him: "Tell me about your master. Has he no need of us in this affair of his?" "Yes, God's life!" Salm replied. Then he stood up, went into Ibrāhīm, and said, "Here is Hārūn b. Saʿd who has come to you." Ibrāhīm replied, "I have no need of him." "Don't shun Hārūn; restrain yourself," responded Salm, and he kept at Ibrāhīm until he agreed to receive Hārūn, giving him permission to enter. Hārūn went into Ibrāhīm and said to him, "Ask me to do what is of greatest importance to you." Ibrāhīm therefore asked him to take charge of Wāsiṭ and installed him as governor there.

According to Sulaymān b. Abī Shaykh—Abū al-Ṣaʿdī: The Kūfan Hārūn b. Saʿd al-ʿIjlī came to us, having been sent by Ibrāhīm from al-Baṣrah. He was an important shaykh, but the most famous Baṣran who was in his entourage was al-Ṭuhawī. The man from Wāsiṭ among those accompanying him whose bravery most resembled that of al-Ṭuhawī was the valiant ʿAbd al-Raḥīm al-Kalbī. Among those who marched with Ibrāhīm [from the start] or came out to join him [later] was ʿAbdawayh[1268] Kardām of Khurāsān, while Ṣadaqah b. Bakkār was a member of their cavalry. Manṣūr b. Jumhūr[1269] was wont to say, "With to Muḥammad's Companions, and among those commissioned by the caliph ʿUthmān to collect and transcribe the official text (muṣḥaf) of the Qurʾān. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVIII, 130; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, III, 303.

---

1266. Al-Hujaym b. ʿAlī b. Sūd and Iyād b. Sūd are clans of the Banū al-Azd. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 206, II, 360. See also Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, X, 603.

1267. Hārūn b. Saʿd al-ʿIjlī. See note 1032.

1268. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLV, with this vocalization or ʿAbdūyah.

1269. Manṣūr b. Jumhūr b. Ḥaṣan b. ʿAmr al-Kalbī was an Umayyad general who plotted the assassination of the caliph Walīd b. Yazīd in 126/744. Subsequently, he governed Iraq for a very brief period and eventually moved on to Sind as governor there. After Abū al-ʿAbbās became caliph, Mūsā b. Kaʿb was sent Ṣadaqah b. Bakkār on my side, I don't care whom I encounter!" According to some sources, Abū Jaʿfar dispatched ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl al-Muslī[1270] with 5,000 troops to Wāsiṭ to wage war against Hārūn b. Saʿd—other sources say 20,000—and there were various battles between them.

According to [i.e., on the authority of] Ibn Abī al-Karrām:[1271] I reached Abū Jaʿfar with the head of Muḥammad while ʿĀmir b. [303] Ismāʿīl was in Wāsiṭ besieging Hārūn b. Saʿd. The war between the people of Wāsiṭ and the associates of Abū Jaʿfar occurred before Ibrāhīm left al-Baṣrah.

According to Sulaymān b. Abī Shaykh: ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl's camp lay behind al-Nīl. The first battle occurred between Hārūn and ʿĀmir, and [in it] a slave water-bearer struck the latter, wounded him, and brought him to the ground without recognizing him. Abū Jaʿfar sent him a small bag contining gum arabic and said, "Treat your wound with it." The opposing forces then met each other in battle more than once, and many from al-Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ were killed. Hārūn kept forbidding their fighting, saying, "If our master were to meet their master, the situation would become clear to us, so hold yourselves back." But they would not do so. After Ibrāhīm left for Bākhamrā, however, the two sides, i.e., the troops of Wāsiṭ and those of ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl, quit battling each other and agreed to cease warring until both armies could meet. Then they would follow the victor. When Ibrāhīm was killed, ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl wanted to enter Wāsiṭ but its people kept him from doing so.

According to Sulaymān: When the news that Ibrāhīm had been killed reached Wāsiṭ, Hārūn b. Saʿd fled, and the people of Wāsiṭ made peace with ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl on condition that he extend a guarantee of safety. Many of them, however, had no faith in any guarantee of his, so they left the city. ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl entered Wāsiṭ and stayed there without disturbing anyone.

---

against him, and Manṣūr died about 134/751–52. (According to Balādhurī, Futuḥ, 444, Mūsā b. Kaʿb was sent by Abū Muslim.) Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VII, 298; Crone, Slaves, 158–59; Omar, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate, 161–63.

1270. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLV, gives a manuscript reference from Balādhurī for this as "al-Shalīmī," but the printed text, Ansāb al-ashrāf, III, 100, does not reflect this.

1271. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Karrām al-Jaʿfarī.

According to Sulaymān: It has been said that ʿĀmir made a peace agreement with the people of Wāsiṭ that he would not kill anyone in Wāsiṭ, but they did [in fact] kill anyone found leaving the city. After Ibrāhīm's slaying, when peace was declared between ʿĀmir and the people of Wāsiṭ, Hārūn b. Saʿd fled to al-[304] Baṣrah but died before he got there, or so it is said.

It is said that Hārūn b. Saʿd went into hiding and stayed there until Muḥammad b. Sulaymān became governor of al-Kūfah. Offering Hārūn the guarantee of safety, Muḥammad enticed him into the open. He even ordered Hārūn to assign positions to 200 of the members of his household. Hārūn was about to do so and rode off to present himself to Muḥammad when one of his cousins met him and said to him, "You've been deceived." Hārūn, therefore, turned back and disappeared from sight until he died. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān tore down his house.

According to ʿUmar: After making his uprising there, Ibrāhīm remained in al-Basṛah, assigning governors to the various administrative districts and dispatching troops to the regions, until news of his brother Muḥammad's death reached him.

According to Naṣr b. Qudayd: Ibrāhīm assigned various administrative positions in al-Baṣrah. Three days before the feast of the Fiṭr, news of his brother Muḥammad's death reached him. Although he led the people in observance of the feast, they recognized the deep sadness in him. He told the people about Muḥammad's slaying, and with burning hearts[1272] they redoubled their efforts against Abū Jaʿfar. Upon awaking the next morning, Ibrāhīm gathered his army and appointed Numaylah as his deputy over al-Baṣrah, leaving his son Ḥasan[1273] behind with him.

According to Saʿīd b. Huraym—his father—ʿAlī b. Dāwūd:[1274] When he preached to us on the day of the Fiṭr, I saw death on 1273. Al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥasan. He escaped from the caliph al-Mahdī's confinement but was eventually recaptured through the intervention of Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd. During al-Mahdī's Pilgrimage in 160/777, al-Ḥasan was restored to caliphal favor. Ṭabarī, III, 461–64, 482.

---

1272. Fa-izdādū fī qitāli Abī Jaʿfarin baṣiratan. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. baṣura.

1274. ʿAlī b. Dāwūd b. Ṭahmān was the brother of Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd, a vizier to al-Mahdī. Although both brothers were imprisoned by al-Manṣūr for the duration of his life because of their support for the rebellions of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, they were released when al-Mahdī became caliph. Tabarī, III, 507; Sourdel, Vizirat ʿabbāside, I, 103–11; *EI*², s.v. Abū ʿAbd Allāh Yaʿḳūb (S. Moscati).

Ibrāhīm's face. Returning to my family I said, "That man, by God, is going to be killed."

According to Muḥammad b. Maʿrūf—his father: When Jaʿfar and Muḥammad, the sons of Sulaymān, left al-Baṣrah, they sent Maʿrūf to Abū Jaʿfar to give him the news about Ibrāhīm. He said, "I gave the caliph information from Jaʿfar and Muḥammad, and he said, 'By God, I don't know what I should do. By God, there are only 2,000 men in my force [here]. I have scattered my army: With al-Mahdī in al-Rayy are 30,000 and with Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath in Ifrīqiyah[1275] are 40,000, while the rest are with ʿĪsā b. Mūsā. But, by God, if I am to come safely out of this, my force [305] [here] should not be 30,000 short.' "

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Rāshid: There were not many in Abū Jaʿfar's army camp, almost no one[1276] but some blacks and a few other people. The caliph regularly ordered firewood to be stacked and kindled at night. Anyone seeing the blaze would figure that there were a lot of people there. But, in fact, it was only a burning fire with no one near it.

According to Muḥammad b. Maʿrūf b. Suwayd—his father: When the news reached Abū Jaʿfar, he wrote to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, who was then in Medina: "When you read this letter from me, stop whatever you are doing and come right here." ʿĪsā wasted no time getting there, and the caliph dispatched him against the people. He also wrote to Salm b. Qutaybah,[1277] who came to him from al-Rayy. The caliph then attached him to Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān.

According to [i.e., on the authority of] Yūsuf b. Qutaybah b. Muslim[1278]—his brother, Salm b. Qutaybah b. Muslim: When I entered the presence of Abū Jaʿfar, he said to me, "Be on your way; the sons of ʿAbdallāh have now come out in open revolt. Go after Ibrāhīm; his band should certainly not scare you! By God, those two camels of the Banū Hāshim will be slaughtered together. Stretch forth your hand and have faith in what I have told you.

1275. That part of the North African littoral that comprises essentially modern Tunisia. *EI*², s.v. (M. Talbi).

1276. Kathīru aḥadin mā hum illā. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. aḥad.

1277. Salm b. Qutaybah b. Muslim al-Bāhilī. See note 797.

1278. Yūsuf was another son of Qutaybah b. Muslim, a noted governor of Khurāsān under al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik. *EI*², s.v. Ḳutayba b. Muslim (C. E. Bosworth).

You will remember what I have said to you." By God, what should happen but that Ibrāhīm was killed, and I began to remember what he had said, and I was astonished!

According to Saʿīd b. Salm:[1279] The caliph put Salm b. Qutaybah in charge of the left wing of the people and detailed to him Bashshār b. Salm al-ʿUqaylī, Abū Yaḥyā b. Khuraym, and Abū Hurāsah Sinān b. Mukhayyas al-Qushayrī. Salm wrote to al-Baṣrah and the Bāhilah[1280] joined him, both Arabs and mawlās. Al-Manṣūr wrote to al-Mahdī, who was then in al-Rayy, commanding him to dispatch Khāzim b. Khuzaymah to al-Ahwāz. It is said that al-Mahdī sent Khāzim at the head of 4,000 troops.
[306] Khāzim marched to al-Ahwāz and waged war there against al-Mughīrah. The latter then left for al-Baṣrah, while Khāzim entered al-Ahwāz and allowed the troops to plunder for three days.

According to [i.e., on the authority of] al-Faḍl b. ʿAbbās b. Mūsā[1281] and ʿUmar b. Māhān[1282]—al-Sindī: In the days of war against Muḥammad I was an attendant who would stand beside al-Manṣūr's head with the flyswatter. As the situation with Ibrāhīm grew ever more dense and intractable, I saw him stay on the prayer mat some fifty nights, sleeping there and sitting there. He was wearing a colored jubbah, of which the collar and the part under his beard had become soiled. Yet he did not change the jubbah and did not leave the prayer mat until God achieved victory over Ibrāhīm. When he appeared before people, however, he covered the jubbah with a black garment and sat on his cushion. But when he was in private,[1283] he returned to his former aspect.

During these days Raysānah came to him. This was after two Medinan women had been given to the caliph as brides. One of them was Fāṭimah bt. Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā b. Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbay-1279. Saʿīd b. Salm b. Qutaybah b. Muslim al-Bāhilī (d. 217/832) served Hārūn al-Rashīd as governor of Armenia, al-Mawṣil, al-Sind, Ṭabaristān, Sijistān, and al-Jazīrah. Crone, Slaves, 137–38; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XV, 225.

1280. See W. Caskel, EI^{2}, s.v. Bāhila.

1281. Al-Faḍl b. ʿAbbās b. Mūsā is later mentioned as governor of al-Kūfah during the reign of al-Amīn. Ṭabarī, III, 857; Zambaur, Manuel, 43.

1282. The Leiden edition index suggests that this may be ʿUmar b. Abī ʿAmr b. Nuʿaym b. Māhān, who is mentioned on III, 227.

1283. Fa-idhā baṭana ʿāda hayʾatihi. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. baṭana

dallāh,[1284] while the other was Amah al-Karīm bt. ʿAbdallāh,[1285] a descendant of Khālid b. Asīd b. Abī al-ʿĪṣ.[1286] Since the caliph had not even taken a look at them, Raysānah said, "O Commander of the Faithful, the souls of these two women are sadly disturbed[1287] and prey to bad thoughts because of the cruelty you show toward them." He chased her away, saying, "These days are no days for women. I will have nothing to do with them until I know whether Ibrāhīm's head is mine or my head belongs to Ibrāhīm."

It is said that after leaving al-Baṣrah, Muḥammad and Jaʿfar, the sons of Sulaymān, wrote to inform Abū Jaʿfar [of the state of affairs], using a scrap of sacking because they could get nothing other than that to write on. When the letter reached the caliph's headquarters and he spied the scrap of sacking in the messenger's hand, he exclaimed, "By God, the people of al-Baṣrah have renounced their allegiance together with Ibrāhīm!" Then he read the letter and summoned ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Khatlī[1288] and Abū [307]
Yaʿqūb, a relative by marriage of Mālik b. al-Haytham. He sent them off to Muḥammad and Jaʿfar at the head of a numerous cavalry unit. The caliph ordered ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and Yaʿqūb to detain Muḥammad and Jaʿfar as soon as they met up with them, and to camp with them, to make them listen, and to bring them into line. He also wrote to Muḥammad and Jaʿfar, calling them weak and impotent and rebuking them for [allowing] Ibrāhīm's unbridled urge to revolt against a stronghold where they were and his successfully concealing his plans from them until he made his uprising. He wrote at the end of the letter:

1284. A descendant of one of the Companions of the Prophet Muḥammad, Fāṭimah bt. Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā is later mentioned as the mother of Abū Jaʿfar's sons Sulaymān, ʿĪsā, and Yaʿqūb. Ṭabarī, III, 442.

1285. Ṭabarī Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLVI, based on al-Maqrīzī's Muqaffā, where her father's name is given as "ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh."

1286. Khālid b. Asīd b. Umayyah b. ʿAbd Shams was a Meccan butcher who became a Muslim in the year that city was conquered. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XIII, 246; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 8, II, 341; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 53; *EI*², Suppl., s.v. Djazzār (M. A. J. Beg).

1287. Qad khabuthat anfusuhumā. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. khabutha.

1288. The Leiden text's vocalization. Khuttal, or Khuttalān, is a region of central Asia that lies just north of the Oxus river. *EI*², s.v. Khuttalān (C. E. Bosworth); Le Strange, Lands, 235–39; Cornu, Répertoires, 165; Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 346–47.

Give to the Banū Hāshim this message conveyed from me,
Be watchful; this is the action of sleepers Wolves attack the one who has no dogs but are wary of the fold of the one striking terror,[1289] the protector.

According to [i.e., on the authority of] Jaʿfar b. Rabīʿah al-ʿĀmirī—al-Ḥajjāj b. Qutaybah b. Muslim:[1290] I entered the presence of al-Manṣūr during the days of the war with Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm. He had already heard about the defection of al-Baṣrah, al-Ahwāz, Fārs, Wāsiṭ, al-Madāʾin, and the Sawād, and he was scratching at the ground with his staff and quoting the following:

I've set myself up as a target for spears.
Truly the leader always behaves [thus] in such matters.

I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, may God uphold your might and aid you against your enemy! You are as al-Aʿshā[1291] said:

If between them conflict is ignited and grows hot for them after it had been cooled.
I shall be found enduring its heat, yea, though wars come round ever and again.

He said, "O Ḥajjāj, truly Ibrāhīm has now recognized how ragged my flank is, how hard my side and how rough my horn.[1292] He's [308] been emboldened to head for me by way of al-Baṣrah by the adhesion of these districts that dominate the Commander of the Faithful's forces. Moreover, the people of the Sawād side with him

1289. Mustanfir. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. nafara (which explains that it is an epithet of lions); Lane, Lexicon, VIII, 2824.

1290. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Qutaybah, son of Qutaybah b. Muslim, a noted governor of Khurāsān under al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik. His only appearance in Ṭabarī, other than as a rāwī, is at an audience with the mother of the defeated ruler of Farghānah. Ṭabarī, II, 1697.

1291. Abū Baṣīr Maymūn b. Qays b. Jandal, a prominent jāhilī poet of Qays b. Thaʿlabah of the Bakr b. Wāʾil who died about 7/629. GAS, II, 130–32; *EI*², s.v. (W. Caskel); Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VII, 341.

1292. For an assessment of the caliph's strategic vulnerability, see Lassner, "Provincial Administration: Amṣār of Iraq," 25–29.

in conflict and disobedience. I, however, have aimed against each district its stone and against each region its arrow by sending against them the gallant, the bold, the fortunate, the victorious ʿĪsā b. Mūsā at the head of a great mass of men and equipment. I call upon God to help him, and I rely on Him to make him capable of that affair, for there is no might and no power to the Commander of the Faithful except through God."

According to Jaʿfar b. Rabīʿah—al-Ḥajjāj b. Quṭaybah: On that day I entered the presence of the Commander of the Faithful al-Manṣūr with a word of greeting. I judged him incapable of returning the salutation, however, because of the uninterrupted succession of rips and rents in the fabric of his regime, the armies surrounding him, as well as the 100,000 swords lying in wait for him in al-Kūfah and facing his own army, all waiting for him in one ferocious horde, ready to pounce. I found him to be like a solitary hawk, intensely concentrated, a man who has risen to meet the vicissitudes that have befallen him, facing up to them and contending with them. He tackled them, his spirit never letting him buckle under. Truly he was like what the early poet said:[1293]

The soul of ʿIṣām [is what] made ʿIṣām a sovereign.
It taught him to wheel and attack,
And made him a gallant ruler,
so that he surpassed and excelled all peoples.[1294]

According to Abū ʿUbaydah:[1295] He was with Yūnus al-Jarmī at the time when Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh had sent his brother to war against Abū Jaʿfar. Yūnus said, "This fellow arrived intending to eliminate a ruler, but the daughter of ʿUmar b. Salamah[1296] distracted him from what he was trying to do." In those days the 1293. The editor of the Leiden text identifies the poet as Nābighah [al-Dhubyānī], a renowned jāhilī poet who is thought to have died in the early years of the seventh century. GAS, II, 110–13; *EI*², s.v. (A. Arazi).

1294. Hattā ʿalā wa-jāwaza al-aqwānā. This final line is supplied in Ibrāhīm's edition, VII, 641.

1295. Abū ʿUbaydah Maʿmar b. al-Muthannā (d. 209/824–25) was a noted historian and philologist from al-Baṣrah who wrote, among many other works, one of the first treatises of Qurʾānic tafsīr. *EI*², s.v. (H. A. R. Gibb); GAS, I, 48.

1296. ʿUmar b. Salamah al-Hujaymī. See p. 260.

woman from the [Banū] Taym[1297] was presented to Abū Jaʿfar, but he kept her at a distance,[1298] not even looking at her until the [309] matter of Ibrāhīm was settled. Ibrāhīm, however, after his arrival in al-Baṣrah, married Bamakah bt. ʿUmar b. Salamah.[1299] She would come to him with her cosmetics and many-hued garments.

According to Bishr b. Salm: When Ibrāhīm intended to head toward Abū Jaʿfar, Numaylah, al-Ṭuhawī, and a group of his Baṣran army commanders came to see him and said, "May God prosper you! You have gained control of al-Baṣrah, al-Ahwāz, Fārs, and Wāsiṭ, so stay where you are and send the armies. If one of your armies is put to flight, you can send another army as reinforcement. Similarly, if one of your army commanders is routed, you can reinforce him with another army commander. Your position is feared and your enemy is on guard against you. The monies have been raised and your footing is firm. All we need now is your [good] judgment." But the Kūfans said, "May God prosper you! In al-Kūfah there are men who would die in your place, were they to see you. But if they do not see you, various reasons will lead them to stay where they are so that they don't come to you." These men kept on at Ibrāhīm until he left.

According to [i.e. on the authority of] ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar al-Madīnī:[1300] We went forth with Ibrāhīm to Bākhamrā. When we had made camp, he came to us one night and said, "Come out with us for a stroll around our camp." On his stroll, Ibrāhīm listened to the sounds of mandolins (ṭanābīr) and singing and then went back inside. He came to me on yet another night and said, "Come out with us." I joined him as he listened to similar sounds and then went back in, saying, "I don't much crave the support of an army with goings-on like these in it!"

1297. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLVI; the Leiden text's original vocalization was al-Yatīmah, a word meaning "orphan." She is not mentioned in the list of women who bore children to Abū Jaʿfar. Ṭabarī, III, 442–43.

1298. Tarakahu bi-mazjari al-kalb. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. zajara (which explains this as the distance from which one would rebuke a dog).

1299. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLVI; the Leiden text's original vocalization was Bahkanah.

1300. Abū ʿAlī b. al-Madīnī ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Najīḥ al-Saʿdī was a traditionist of al-Baṣrah who died in 178/794. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVII, 104–5; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 152–53.

According to [i.e. on the authority of] ʿAffān b. Muslim al-Ṣaffār:[1301] When Ibrāhīm was encamped, there were [some prominent] men from our neighborhood who were in his pay. Having gone to his camp, I estimated that there were fewer than 10,000 men with him.

According to Dāwūd b. Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān: On Ibrāhīm's stipends register were counted 100,000 men from al-Baṣrah.

According to Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā: Abū Jaʿfar dispatched ʿĪsā b. Mūsā with 15,000, and he put Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah in charge [310] of a 3,000-man vanguard. It is said that when ʿĪsā b. Mūsā started out toward Ibrāhīm, Abū Jaʿfar traveled as far as Nahr al-Baṣriyyīn[1302] with him. Then Abū Jaʿfar returned, and Ibrāhīm headed from his encampment by the wine house in Khuraybat al-Baṣrah[1303] toward al-Kūfah.

According to one of the Banū Taymallāh[1304]—Aws b. Muhalhil al-Quṭaʿī:[1305] Ibrāhīm passed by us on the route he was taking, while we were living in the domed houses called the Domes of Aws (Qibāb Aws).[1306] I went out to meet him in the company of my father and uncle, and eventually we reached him. He was on 1301. Abū ʿUthmān ʿAffān b. Muslim b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ṣaffār (d. 220/835) was a traditionist born in al-Baṣrah but who lived his adult life in Baghdad. He was among those summoned by the governor of Baghdad, Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, to acknowledge the caliph al-Maʾmūn's doctrine of the createdness of the Qurʾān. When threatened with the loss of sustenance (rizq) in the amount of 500 dirhams per month, which he received from the caliph, ʿAffān recited, "In the heaven is your sustenance and what you are promised" (Qurʾān, 51: 22). Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, XII, 269–77; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 205–9; Dhahabī, Siyar, X, 242–55; GAS, I, 102.

---

1302. According to Ṭabarī, II, 748, this was a site on the banks of the Euphrates that was so named ("Canal of the Baṣrans") because Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr, an early governor of al-Baṣrah, had a canal dug there.

1303. Al-Khuraybah ("the little ruin") was the Arab name for the first encampment at the site of the former Persian settlement, which was to become al-Baṣrah. *EI*², s.v. al-Baṣrah (Ch. Pellat); Yāqūt Buldān, II, 363; Morony, Iraq, 246–47; Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 3.

1304. Taymallāh b. Thaʿlabah was a clan of the Banū Bakr b. Wāʾil. *EI*¹, s.v. (G. Levi Della Vida); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 141, 150, II, 543.

1305. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 92, 132, II, 220, 473, citing Quṭayʿah b. ʿAbs as a descendant of Baghīḍ b. Rayth.

1306. Aws b. Ḥārithah was one of the two principal tribes in Medina who formed Muḥammad's Anṣār after the hijrah. *EI*², s.v. al-Aws (W. Montgomery Watt); Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 177, II, 214; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿarab, 331–32.

a packhorse of his, looking around for somewhere to encamp in that region. I heard him quote verses of al-Quṭāmī:[1307]

These are matters that, if the even-tempered man deals with them,
then he forbids and incites fear as he can.
Disobeying one concerned about you could enhance your giving ear to him another time.
The best thing is what you go to meet,
not what you [merely] follow, coming after.
But when the skin is rent, rotten and despoiled, it defeats the most skillful.

I said to the one with me that I was hearing the words of a man who was regretting his journey.

Then Ibrāhīm continued on and when he reached Karkhthā,[1308] ʿAbd al-Wāḥid said to him (according to what is reported on the authority of Sulaymān b. Abī Shaykh from ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. Ziyād b. Labīd),[1309] "This is the territory of my people, and I know it well. Do not pursue ʿĪsā b. Mūsā and these armies that have been dispatched against you. I will go with you, however, if you will leave me [to choose] a road where Abū Jaʿfar will not know where you are until you are suddenly upon him in al-Kūfah." But Ibrāhīm refused him. Then ʿAbd al-Wāḥid said, "We are the men [311] of Rabīʿah, masters of the night raid. So let me make a night raid against the associates of ʿĪsā." "Truly I detest raiding at night," Ibrāhīm responded.

According to [i.e., on the authority of] Saʿīd b. Huraym—his father: I said to Ibrāhīm, "You will never be victorious against this man [Abū Jaʿfar] until you take al-Kūfah. If, despite his being well-fortified there, al-Kūfah falls to you, he can offer no 1307. Abū Saʿīd ʿUmayr b. Shuyaym b. ʿAmr was a (probably) Christian bedouin poet who died in 101/719–20. *EI*², s.v. (H. H. Bräu and Ch. Pellat); GAS, II, 338–39.

1308. Neither this place name nor the variants suggested by the Leiden text's note, i.e., "Kūkhthā" and "Karkhyā," are mentioned in the standard geographical sources. Karkh Maysān, a place in the Sawād north of al-Baṣrah, is a possible identification. Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 449; Morony, Iraq, 159.

1309. See note 1207.

resistance[1310] once it is gone. I still have a few close relatives there; let me travel to al-Kūfah in disguise so that I can secretly summon people to your cause. Then I will come out into the open, because if they hear someone proclaim your cause [publicly], they will respond to him. If the faint-hearted Abū Jaʿfar hears [about it] throughout al-Kūfah, nothing will turn back his face this side of Ḥulwān."

Ibrāhīm turned to Bashīr al-Raḥḥāl[1311] and asked, "What do you think, Abū Muḥammad?" "Were we to put our trust in the scenario you've described," said Bashīr, "that would be a sound idea. But we don't believe that a [significant] group of Kūfans will respond to your call. Abū Jaʿfar will send cavalry against them that will trample underfoot the innocent and the corrupt, the young and the old. You will have exposed yourself to the sin of that without even achieving what you hoped." I said to Bashīr, "Whenever you've gone out to fight Abū Jaʿfar and his associates, were you afraid of killing the weak and the small, and women as well as men? Didn't the Messenger of God send out raiding parties at night and himself engage in fighting, thereby doing what you find repugnant?" "But those were all idolaters," retorted Bashīr, "whereas these are people of our religious community (millah), our [prophetic] call (daʿwah), and our prayer orientation (qiblah). Their case is not the same as those others." Ibrāhīm therefore followed his opinion, refusing permission to Huraym, and went on to encamp in Bākhamrā.

According to Khālid b. Asīd al-Bāhilī: After Ibrāhīm camped in Bākhamrā, Salm b. Qutaybah sent Ḥakīm b. ʿAbd al-Karīm to him to say, "You have now gone into the desert, and someone like you is further from death there. Dig a trench for yourself so that there is only one access to you. If you won't do that, [then know that] Abū Jaʿfar has depleted his army, so hurry off to him at the [312] head of a contingent[1312] and seize him from the rear."

Ibrāhīm summoned his associates and suggested that to them. They said, "Why should we dig a trench for ourselves when we are victorious against them? No, by God, we shall not do that!" "Then we should go after him," said Ibrāhīm. "Why," they answered, "when he is in our hands whenever we want him?" Ibrāhīm said to Ḥakīm, "Now you have heard, so go back [conscious of] having done your duty."

1310. Lam taqum lahu baʿdahā qāʾimatun. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. qāma; Dozy, Supplément, II, 431.

1311. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLVI. See note 649.

1312. Fa-takhaffaf fī ṭāʾifatin. Ṭabarī, Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCXLVI, and Glossarium, s.v. khaffa.

According to Ibrāhīm b. Salm—his brother—his father: When we met for battle, our forces were lined up in one rank facing them. Leaving the battle line, I said to Ibrāhīm: "If one section of the line is routed, the rest will collapse, for they are not [properly] deployed. Organize the men in squadrons; then if one squadron is put to flight, another will stand firm." But they cried out, "Only the Islamic way of fighting,"[1313] thereby alluding to God's saying, "[they] fight in His way in a line."[1314]

According to Yaḥyā b. Shukr, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān's mawlā: Al-Maḍāʾ said, "When we settled in Bākhamrā, I went to Ibrāhīm and said to him, "In the morning these people will greet you with enough weapons and mounts to block your view of the setting sun. Meanwhile, you have only naked [i.e., poorly equipped] Baṣran forces with you. Let me make a night raid against him so that I can really cut his forces to pieces." "How I detest killing," said Ibrāhīm. I exclaimed, "You want the sovereignty but you detest the killing!"

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar: When Ibrāhīm heard about his brother Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's slaying, he set out against Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr in al-Kūfah. Abū Jaʿfar wrote to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, informing him of that and ordering him to report in person to him. Abū Jaʿfar's messenger and letter reached ʿĪsā after he had entered the state of consecration for the Lesser Pilgrimage (ʿumrah).[1315] He abandoned the state of purification, however, and presented himself to Abū Jaʿfar. The caliph then dispatched ʿĪsā with commanders, troops, and weapons [313] against Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh. Meanwhile, Ibrāhīm advanced with 1313. In Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 568, this is given as "We should form a line only as the people of Islam did."

1314. Qurʾān 61:4. The verse actually begins "God loves those who. . . ."

1315. The ʿumrah is a series of prescribed ritual actions that can be performed within the confines of Mecca at any time during the Muslim liturgical year. According to R. Paret (EI[1], s.v. ʿUmrah), entering the necessary state of ritual purity is usually accomplished at Jiʿrānah, Ḥudaybiyah, or Tanʿīm.

a large force of troops of unknown origin, larger than ʿĪsā b. Mūsā's force. They met in Bākhamrā, which is situated about sixteen farsakhs from al-Kūfah, and there fought a hard-pitched battle. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah, head of ʿĪsā b. Mūsā's vanguard, was put to flight, as were the people with him. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā stood in their way, beseeching them in the name of God to maintain obedience, but they paid no attention to him and ran off in flight. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah came running by, and ʿĪsā b. Mūsā said to him, "O Ḥumayd, return to God, to God and obedience!" Ḥumayd retorted, "There is no obedience in defeat" and took off.[1316] All the troops ran away, leaving ʿĪsā b. Mūsā quite alone before Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh's army. But ʿĪsā b. Mūsā held his position without moving, although he commanded only 100 men drawn from his personal guard and retinue. Someone said to him, "May God prosper the Amīr! Would that you abandoned this position until the troops come back to you. Then you could return to the charge with them." ʿĪsā replied, "Never shall I leave this position of mine until I am killed or God is victorious by my hand. It will not be said, 'He was routed.' "

According to ʿAbd al-Raḥīm b. Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī[1317]—Isḥāq b. ʿIsā b. ʿAlī[1318]—his father—ʿĪsā b. Mūsā: As he was about to dispatch me against Ibrāhīm, the Commander of the Faithful said, "These wicked men, i.e., the astrologers, assert that you will meet the man and that you will have an inconclusive round when you encounter him. Then your associates will return to you, and outcome will be in your favor." By God, it happened exactly as he said. What should occur but that we met in battle and we were routed. I found myself with not more than three or four [314] supporters. One of my mawlās came up to me, grabbing the bridle of my mount, and said, "May I be made your ransom, why stay when your associates have already left?" "No, by God," I responded, "may my family never look upon my face if I flee from their enemy!" By God, I could do no more than begin to say to those whom I recognized of the people passing me in flight. "Give my family my greetings and tell them, 'I can find no ransom to redeem you more precious to me than my own life. Freely have I spent it for your sakes.' "

1316. Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, p. DCCXLVI, for this addition.

1317. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm b. Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib (d. 229/843–44) was a son of the cousin to al-Manṣūr who served as governor of Medina 146–50/763–67. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm himself was appointed governor of the Yemen by the caliph al-Muʿtaṣim, but was later dismissed and eventually imprisoned by the caliph al-Wāthiq. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVIII, 325.

1318. Abū al-Ḥasan Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbadallāh b. ʿAbbās (d. 203/818–19) was a cousin of Abū Jaʿfar who served as his governor of Medina 167–69/783–86. He was subsequently governor of al-Baṣrah and of Damascus for Hārūn al-Rashīd. Ṣafadī, Wāfī, VIII, 420; Zambaur, Manuel, 24, 40.

By God, that was the state we were in, what with the troops fleeing and paying no heed to anyone else. But the sons of Sulaymān, Jaʿfar and Muḥammad, held their ground against Ibrāhīm and attacked him from behind. Those of Ibrāhīm's partisans who were on our heels did not realize what was going on until some of them looked back at the others and saw that fighting had erupted behind them. They wheeled around to face the battle, and we followed round right in their tracks. So it went.[1319]

That day I heard ʿĪsā b. Mūsā say to my father, "By God, Abū al-ʿAbbās, were it not for Sulaymān's sons, we would have been publicly disgraced on that day. It was part of God's design that when our associates were put to flight on that day, a canal with steep embankments stood in their way, obstructing their rush. Finding no place to ford, they all had to turn back.

According to [i.e., on the authority of] Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Mihrān: People from the Ṭalḥah family living in Bākhamrā opened the irrigation dikes against Ibrāhīm and his followers, letting the water overflow so that the troops of his army became mired in the water.

Some maintain that Ibrāhīm was the one who released the water so that he would be fighting in only one direction. When they were routed, the water prevented his forces from running away.
[315] After his supporters were put to flight, Ibrāhīm stood firm, as did a group of his partisans who stood fighting in defense of him. The sources disagree about their actual numbers, some saying 500, some 400, while others say seventy.

According to ʿUmar—al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar: As ʿĪsā held his position, even though his followers had been put to flight, Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh approached at the head of his army, coming ever closer. The dust cloud of his army finally drew close enough for ʿĪsā and those with him to see it. While they were so disposed, a horseman suddenly approached and wheeled about, heading straight for Ibrāhīm and not turning aside for anything. Lo and behold, it was Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah, who had altered his breastplate and wrapped his head with a yellow headcloth! So many warriors turned back to follow him that not a single person who had been routed failed to do so. Running back into battle, the troops mingled with each other and fought fiercely until several on each of the two sides were killed. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah then started to send severed heads to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā. At one point, in the midst of crowd, clamor, and outcry, ʿĪsā was brought a head, and the shout went up, "It's the head of Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh!" ʿĪsā b. Mūsā called for Ibn Abī al-Karrām al-Jaʿfarī and showed it to him, but he said that it was not Ibrāhīm's. The opposing forces began a battle that very day, and a stray arrow, shot by no one knows who, pierced Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh's throat and felled him. Falling back from its impact, he cried, "Help me down." As they took him down from his mount he was saying, " 'God's command is a fate foreordained';[1320] we had proposed one thing, but God willed otherwise." He was set down on the ground, he being a [heavily built] man, and his associates and close companions gathered about him to guard him and fight in his defense. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah saw their gathering round, but did not know who they were. He said to his followers, "Direct your best efforts at that group until you've displaced them and can tell what they've gathered around." His forces pressed hard against them, fighting the most intense battle, until they had prised them apart from Ibrāhīm, gained free access to him, and cut off his head. They brought it to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā and he showed it to Ibn Abī al-Karrām al-Jaʿfarī. This time he said, "Yes, this is his head." ʿĪsā set it on the ground and made a prostration [thanking God]. He then sent Ibrāhīm's head to Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr. Ibrāhīm was killed on Monday, 25 Dhū al-Qaʿdah 145, being forty-eight years old at the time. The interval from the time he came out in revolt until he was killed was three months less five days. [316]

1319. Fa-kānat iyyāhā. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.v. iyyā

1320. Qurʾān, 33:38.

According to ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd: He asked Abū Ṣalābah how Ibrāhīm was killed. Abū Ṣalābah responded, "I saw him come to a halt on his mount to watch ʿĪsā's partisans, who had turned around and had put his enemies to flight.[1321] ʿĪsā had retreated on his mount while his soldiers were killing them. Ibrāhīm was wearing a shirt of mail, but because the heat troubled him, he undid the fastenings of his shirt and took off the mail to leave his chest free and to uncover his throat. A stray arrow came and struck him in the throat. I saw him grab on to his horse and wheel about until the Zaydīs [i.e., the former supporters of the ʿAlid claimant in al-Kūfah, Zayd b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn] encircled him.

According to Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Karrām—his father: When ʿĪsā's associates were put to flight, Ibrāhīm's standard [-bearers] followed in their tracks. Ibrāhīm's herald shouted out, "Do not follow anyone in flight," so the standard [-bearers] turned about to go back. Seeing this, ʿĪsā's associates thought that they were fleeing, so they turned in their tracks and the rout actually occurred.

[317] A source: When news of the mêlée involving ʿĪsā's forces reached Abū Jaʿfar, he decided to make a trip to al-Rayy.

According to Salm b. Farqad, Sulaymān b. Mujālid's chamberlain: When the opposing forces met, ʿĪsā's associates suffered such a disgraceful rout that the leading contingents actually entered al-Kūfah [i.e., they were driven back that far]. One of my Kūfan friends came to me and said, "Hey, fellow, by God, do you know that your associates have already entered al-Kūfah? Here we have Abū Hurayrah's brother at so-and-so's house, and there's another one in the house of so-and-so. Look out for yourself, your family, and your possessions." I informed Sulaymān b. Mujālid of that, and he, in turn, informed Abū Jaʿfar. The caliph said, "Be sure not to disclose any of this or pay it any attention. I am not sure that what I dread won't take me by surprise, so prepare camels and mounts at every gate of the city. If we are assailed from one direction, we shall go by another." Salm was then asked, "Where does Abū Jaʿfar intend to go, should something take him unaware?" "He has decided to go to al-Rayy," replied Salm.

1321. Literally, "given him their shoulders;" see Dozy, Supplément, II, 625–26.

According to Salm b. Farqad: I heard that the astrologer Naybakht went to see Abū Jaʿfar and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, victory is yours. Ibrāhīm will be killed." The caliph, however, would not believe him, so Naybakht said to him, "Imprison me near you, and if the affair does not go as I've told you, then kill me." Being still in prison when news of Ibrāhīm's defeat reached him, he quoted a verse of Muʿaqqir b. Aws b. Ḥimār al-Bāriqī.[1322]

She threw down her staff, feeling herself settled there at journey's end,
as the traveler feels cheered on [his] return.

Abū Jaʿfar allotted Naybakht 2,000 jarīb[1323] by the Jawbar Canal.[1324] [318]

According to Abū Nuʿaym al-Faḍl b. Dukayn: The morning after the night he had been brought Ibrāhīm's head, i.e., Monday night, 25 Dhū al-Qaʿdah, Abū Jaʿfar ordered his head to be put on display in the market.

According to a source: When Abū Jaʿfar was brought Ibrāhīm's head and it was placed before him, he wept until his tears dripped down on Ibrāhīm's cheek. Then he said, "By God, how I hate to see this! Yet you put me to the test, as I did you."

According to Ṣāliḥ, al-Manṣūr's mawlā: When al-Manṣūr was brought the head of Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh, he set it before him and held a general audience, allowing the people to enter. Upon entering, each person would offer his salutations, reach out a hand to Ibrāhīm, and make some derogatory statement about him, saying bad things about him in hopes of Abū Jaʿfar's approval. Abū Jaʿfar kept silent, his color [constantly] changing until Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah al-Bahrānī entered. The latter stopped before the caliph, made his salutations, and said, "May God enhance your reward, O Commander of the Faithful, in the matter of your 1322. Muʿaqqir b. Aws was a jāhilī poet and horseman who was allied to the Yamāmī tribe Numayr b. ʿĀmir. GAS, II, 218; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, VII, 270.

1323. The jarīb was equivalent to about 1,600 square meters. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 65.

1324. The Jawbar Canal was a branch canal of the Nahr Kūthā, one of the major waterways connecting the Tigris and Euphrates below al-Madāʾin. Le Strange, Lands, 68. Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 177, V, 319, also mentions a Nahr Jūbarah in al-Baṣrah as a canal that flows into the Nahr al-Ijjānah.

cousin, and may He forgive him for ignoring your rightful claim." His complexion lightening, Abū Jaʿfar turned to him and said, "Abū Khālid, welcome, and make yourself at home here!" The people, realizing that this had made an impression on him, then entered and spoke as Jaʿfar b. Ḥanẓalah had.

In this year the Turks and the Khazars revolted at Bāb al-Abwāb[1325] and killed a great many Muslims in Armenia.

In this year al-Sarī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib led the people in the Pilgrimage. He was Abū Jaʿfar's [319] appointed governor of Mecca. The governor of Medina in this year was ʿAbdallāh b. al-Rabīʿ al-Ḥārithī, while the governor of al-Kūfah and of its administrative territory was ʿĪsā b. Mūsā. The governor of al-Baṣrah was Salm b. Qutaybah al-Bāhilī, while ʿAbbād b. Manṣūr was charged with its judiciary. Yazīd b. Ḥātim was the governor of Egypt.

1325. Bāb al-Abwāb ("the Gate of Gates") was the Arab name for the Caspian port of Darband/Derbent. The "gates" are the openings from the Caucasus range into the eastern valleys. EI^{2}, s.v. (D. M. Dunlop); Yāqūt, Buldān, I, 303–6; Le Strange, Lands, 180, 184; Cornu, Répertoires, 134.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXIX

Al-Manṣūr and al-Mahdī

TRANSLATED BY HUGH KENNEDY

The Events of the Year 146

(MARCH 21, 763–MARCH 9, 764)

[319]

The events of this year:

Among these was Abū Ja'far's[1] completion of his city, Baghdad.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar:[2] Abū Ja'far moved from Madīnat Ibn Hubayrah[3] to Baghdad in Ṣafar 146 (April 20–May 18, 763) and settled in it and built his city.

Information about the description of the building.

We have mentioned before the reason that impelled Abū Ja'far to build it and the reason why he chose the site on which he built his city, and we will now describe the building of it.

According to Rashīd Abū Dāwūd b. Rashīd: Abū Ja'far set out for al-Kūfah when he received news of the rebellion of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh. He had prepared the necessary wood and teak

1. The caliph al-Manṣūr. In contrast to other 'Abbāsid caliphs, he was frequently known by his kunyah, Abū Ja'far, perhaps because his ism (first name), 'Abdallāh, and his father's name, Muḥammad, were so common.

2. The well-known historian al-Wāqidī, d. 207/823, author of the surviving Kitāb al-Maghāzī and other, lost works; see EI[1], s v. "al-Wāḳidī." Al-Ṭabarī frequently quotes him for exact dates but rarely for extended narrative.

3. Between Baghdad and al-Kūfah, near modern Hillah: Le Strange, Lands, 71.

and other things, for the building of the city of Baghdad and when he set out he left his freedman Aslam in charge of completing what he had prepared. Aslam heard that Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh had defeated the army of Abū Jaʿfar, and he burned the teak and wood [320] that Abū Jaʿfar had left him in charge of, for fear that that might be taken from him if his master was defeated. When Abū Jaʿfar heard what his freedman Aslam had done, he wrote to him, censuring him for that, and Aslam wrote to him, informing him that he had feared that Ibrāhīm would be victorious over them and take it, and he did not say anything to him.

According to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī—his father[4]: When al-Manṣūr wished to build his city of Baghdad, he asked the advice of his companions, and and one of those whose advice he sought was Khālid b. Barmak,[5] and he gave him advice.

According to ʿAlī b. ʿIṣmah: Khālid b. Barmak laid out the city of Abū Jaʿfar for him and gave him advice about it. When he needed rubble he said to him, "What do you think about demolishing the city of the īwān of Chosroes at al-Madāʾin[6] and taking the rubble from it to this city of mine?" He replied, "I do not think that [is a good idea] O Commander of the Faithful," and he asked him why, and he answered, "It is one of the proofs of Islam by which the observer is convinced that people like its (the palace's) lords were not swept away by the power of this world but only by the power of religion. Furthermore, O Commander of the Faithful, there is in it a place where ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib prayed." The caliph said, "How wrong you are Khālid; you did not agree because of your partiality for your friends the Persians."

---

4. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī, d. 188/804, was a famous poet and singer at the ʿAbbāsid court, and his son Isḥāq succeeded him. Al-Ṭabarī uses them as a source for much incidental detail and anecdotal information. See *EI*², s.v. "Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī."

5. The founder of the fortunes of the Barmakid family. Khālid's ancestors were hereditary guardians of a Buddhist shrine at Balkh in northern Afghanistan, but the family converted to Islam in the Umayyad period. Khālid joined the ʿAbbāsid movement early and distinguished himself in an administrative role. He was employed by al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr in the financial administration and as governor of Fārs. He died in 163/780: Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 129–34. See Crone, Slaves, 176–77; Kennedy, Abbasid Caliphate, 101–2.

6. Al-Madāʾin was the ancient Ctesiphon, the Sasanian capital, southeast of Baghdad; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 74–75; Le Strange, Lands, 33–35. The īwān of Chosroes is the giant arch of the royal palace, part of which still survives to this day.

He ordered that the white palace be demolished, and a section of it was and the materials were brought. He investigated the amount it cost them to demolish and transport it, and they found that that would be more expensive than it would be if it were newly made. This was reported to al-Manṣūr, and he summoned Khālid b. Barmak and told him what it cost them to demolish and transport and asked him for his opinion. He said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I thought before that you should not do it, but since you have done it I think that you should demolish it now down to the foundations because, if you do not, it will be said that you failed to demolish it." Al-Manṣūr rejected that advice and [321] ordered that it should not be demolished.

According to Mūsā b. Dāwūd al-Muhandis (engineer): Al-Ma'mūn told me this story, "If you build me a building, make it impossible to demolish so that its remains and traces may last."

It is said: Abū Ja'far needed gates for the city and Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Humānī alleged that Sulaymān b. Dāwūd had built a city called Zandaward near the site on which al-Ḥajjāj[7] had built Wāsiṭ. The devils had made five doors of iron for it the likes of which people today could not make, and he set them up in it. They remained there until al-Ḥajjāj built Wāsiṭ and this city was in ruins. Al-Ḥajjāj transported its doors and used them in his city of Wāsiṭ. When Abū Ja'far built the city, he took those doors and used them for his city, and they are there until today. The city has eight doors, four inside and four outside, and four out of these five doors were used on the inside ones and the fifth on the outside gate of the palace.

On the outside Khurāsān gate he used a door that was brought from Syria, of pharaonic workmanship. On the outside Kūfah gate, he used a door brought from al-Kūfah, which had been made by Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī.[8] He ordered that a door be produced for the Syrian gate, so one was made in Baghdad, and it was the weakest of all the gates.

---

7. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf al-Thaqafī, d. 95/714, the celebrated governor of Iraq and the east for the Umayyads who founded the city of Wāsiṭ. Sulaymān b. Dāwūd is the biblical King Solomon, who is credited with numerous building achievements in the Muslim tradition. For Zandaward, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 154, where he explains that the city fell into ruins with the foundation of Baghdad.

8. Governor of Iraq for the Umayyads, 105–20/723–38.

The city was built round so that, if the king settled in the middle of it, he was not nearer one place of it than another. He set up four gates on the model of military camps in war, and he built two walls, the inside wall being higher than the outside one. He built his palace in the middle of it and the congregational mosque next to (ḥawla) the palace.[9]

It is said that al-Ḥajjāj b. Arṭāh[10] was the man who laid out the [322] plan of the congregational mosque on the orders of Abū Ja'far and laid its foundations. It is said that its qiblah was not in the right direction and that anyone praying in it had to turn a little toward the Baṣrah Gate and that the qiblah of the mosque of al-Ruṣāfah[11] was more correct than the qiblah of the mosque of the city because the mosque of the city was built onto the palace, while the mosque of al-Ruṣāfah was built before the palace and the palace was built onto it and it happened because of that.

According to Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-Khāliq[12]—his father: Abū Ja'far appointed a commander to every quarter of the city to hurry the completion of the building of that quarter.

According to Hārūn b. Ziyād b. Khālid b. al-Ṣalt—his father: Al-Manṣūr appointed Khālid b. al-Ṣalt in charge of the expenses of one of the quarters of the city when it was being built. Khālid said: When I had finished the building of that quarter, I brought him all the expenses on it, and he added them up with his own hand, and I still owed fifteen dirhams, and he imprisoned me in the Sharqiyyah prison for some days until I paid it. The mud bricks that were made for the building of the city were each a cubit by a cubit.

---

9. For the design of the Round City and the problems it raises, see Le Strange, Baghdad; Creswell, Early Muslim Architecture, II, 1–38; and Lassner, Baghdad.

10. Al-Nakha'ī: Having served the Umayyads, he went over to the 'Abbāsid cause and became qāḍī of al-Baṣrah and later a secretary to Abū Ja'far. He died in 150/767 (Crone, Slaves, 157). For his role in planning the northern suburbs of Baghdad, see Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 241, where he is described as a muhandis or engineer. His obituary is given by al-Dhahabī, Tārīkh, VI, 51–53.

11. The settlement founded by al-Mahdī on the east bank of the Tigris at Baghdad. The qiblah is the direction of prayer and should be oriented toward Mecca.

12. Yaḥyā was a maternal uncle of al-Faḍl, son of al-Manṣūr's chamberlain al-Rabī' b. Yūnus. Al-Ṭabarī draws on him extensively for inside information on court and bureaucratic intrigues.

According to one source: He demolished a section of the wall on the Muḥawwal Gate side and found in it a mud brick on which was written in red its weight, 117 raṭls,[13] and he said, "We weighed it, and we found it was the weight that was written on it." The doors of the chambers of the mass of the military commanders and secretaries of Abū Ja'far opened onto the courtyard of the mosque.

According to Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Abd al-Khāliq, the maternal uncle of al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī': 'Īsā b. 'Alī[14] complained to Abū Ja'far, "O Commander of the Faithful, it is tiring for me to walk from the gate of the courtyard to the palace, for I have become [323] weak," and he replied, "Have yourself carried in a litter," but he responded, "I am embarrassed because of the people." Al-Manṣūr said, "Is there anyone who continues to be embarrassed because of them?" but 'Īsā continued, "Allow me, O Commander of the Faithful, what is allowed, one of the water-carrying camels." He said, "Does any water-carrying or riding animal enter the city?" Thus he ordered that everyone move their doors to the intervalla (fuṣlān) of the arcades and that no one should enter the courtyard except on foot. When al-Manṣūr ordered that the doors that led into the courtyard should be blocked and opened to the intervals of the arcades, the markets were established in the four arcades of the city, each one having a market. This continued until one of the patrikioi[15] of Byzantium came as an ambassador, and he ordered al-Rabī'[16] to take him on a tour of the city and its sur-

13. A raṭl was a dry measure that varied from place to place but was usually between 2 and 4 kg.

14. One of al-Manṣūr's paternal uncles. In 132/750, immediately after the 'Abbāsid revolution, he had been sent by al-Saffāḥ to Fārs as governor. It seems that he was worsted in an unsuccessful struggle for power there with Abū Muslim's nominee, Muḥammad b al-Ash'ath al-Khuzā'ī, after which, unlike his brothers, he never held a governorate. He remained at court, an influential adviser and promoter of the interests of his brothers and their children. He acquired extensive properties in Baghdad on the west bank and was the first member of the 'Abbāsid family to build a palace there. He died in Baghdad in 163/780.

15. For the most recent discussion of the interior of the Round City and the problems raised by this text, see Lassner, 'Abbasid Rule, 184–97, where the role of the intervalla between different rings of the Round City is explained. A Patrikios, or patrician: a Byzantine official title. The Arab transliteration biṭrīq is used to designate Byzantine officials in general, see *EI*², s.v. Biṭrīḳ."

16. A man of obscure origin, apparently a freed slave, who rose to great impor-

roundings to see the development and the building. Al-Rabī' took him on a tour, and when it was finished he asked, "What do you think of my city?" He had gone up on the walls of the city and in the domes of the gates, and he said, "I saw a beautiful building, but I saw your enemies with you in the city." The caliph asked him who they were, and he replied, "The market people." Abū Ja'far was silent about it and, when the patrikios had gone, he ordered that the market be sent out of the city. He appointed Ibrāhīm b. Ḥubaysh al-Kūfī and attached Jawwās b. al-Musayyab al-Yamānī, his freedman, and ordered the two of them to build the markets in the Karkh area and ordered them to make booths (ṣufūf, lit: rows or ranks) and houses for every trade and to hand them over to the people. When they had done this, he moved the market there from the city and imposed rents on them according to size.

When the number of people grew, they built markets on sites Ibrāhīm b. Ḥubaysh and Jawwās had not sought to build on because they were unable (to construct) the booths from their resources.
[324] They were charged less in rents than was collected from those who settled in the buildings of the authorities.

One of them said: The reason Abū Ja'far moved the merchants from the city to al-Karkh and the nearby areas outside the city was that it was said to Abū Ja'far that foreigners and others stayed the night in it and that it was not safe because there might be spies and intelligence agents among them or they might open the gates of the city by night because of the position of the markets. So he ordered that the market be removed from the city and he established the shurṭah and ḥaras[17] in it and for the merchants, tance in the service of al-Manṣūr and al-Mahdī. He was officially ḥājib, or chamberlain, but he used this position to become one of the most powerful men at court, masterminding the succession of al-Mahdī. He became leader of the mawālī (freedmen) at court and a bitter opponent of the kuttāb (secretaries) and their leaders, like Abū 'Ubaydallāh Mu'āwiyah and the Barmakid family. He had very extensive properties in Baghdad, notably in the market area of al-Karkh to the south of the Round City. He died c. 169/786 after the death of al-Mahdī, but his position was inherited by his son al-Faḍl, who became the chief rival of the Barmakids during Hārūn's reign. On al-Rabī', see Crone, Slaves, 193–94; Kennedy, 'Abbasid Caliphate, 103–4.

---

17. "Police" is the conventional translation of the Arabic shurṭah. In fact, the shurṭah seems to have been a small, elite military force attached to a ruler or governor to maintain order in peacetime and to act as a stiffening to other military built at the Gate of the Ḥarrāni Arch, the Syrian Gate, and in al-Karkh.

According to al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān al-Hāshimī—his father: The reason for the removal of the markets from the City of Peace and the City of al-Sharqiyyah to the Karkh Gate, the Barley Gate, and the Muḥawwal Gate,[18] was that al-Manṣūr had appointed a man called Abū Zakkariyyā' Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh in charge of the ḥisbah (accounts) of Baghdad and the markets in the year 157 (November 21, 773–November 10, 774), when the market was in the city. Al-Manṣūr was pursuing those who had rebelled with Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm sons of 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan.[19] This muḥtasib[20] had some connection with them, and he gathered a group against al-Manṣūr and led the lower classes of them astray, and they caused a commotion and gathered together. Al-Manṣūr sent Abū al-'Abbās al-Ṭūsī[21] to them, and he calmed them down and took Abū Zakariyyā' and put him in in his custody. Abū Ja'far ordered him to kill him, so a chamberlain of Abū al-'Abbās al-Ṭūsī, called Mūsā, killed him with his own hands at the Golden Gate in the courtyard on the order of al-Manṣūr. Abū Ja'far ordered that those houses that extended into the street of the city be destroyed and that the street be forty cubits wide. He demolished whatever had been extended into that width and ordered that the markets be removed to al-Karkh.

According to Abū Ja'far: When he ordered the removal of the merchants from the city to Karkh, Abān b. Ṣadaqah spoke[22] to [325] forces in war. The shurṭah referred to here is the caliph's shurṭah in Baghdad, but it seems that most provincial governors also had such forces at their disposal. The guard (ḥaras) seems to have been a personal bodyguard attached to the caliph.

---

18. For the geography of these areas, see Le Strange, Baghdad, pp. 57–80.

19. The 'Alid rebels of 145/762.

20. An official responsible for maintaining law, order, and fair trading in the market.

21. Al-Ṭā'ī. a Khurāsānī officer, who participated in the wars of the 'Abbāsid Revolution, notably the siege of Wāsiṭ. He seems to have remained in Iraq until 166/782–83, when he was appointed governor of Khurāsān. In 171/787–88 he returned to the west to take control of the khātam, the caliph's official seal, but he died shortly afterward. He was responsible for dividing up land on the west bank in Baghdad and kept extensive properties for himself (Crone, Slaves, 174)

22. Originally a secretary (kātib) to al-Manṣūr's wazīr Abū Ayyūb al-Mūryānī, he later became secretary and wazīr to Hārūn and then Mūsā, sons of al-Mahdī, during their father's reign. He died in 167/783–84, while in service with Mūsā b. al-Mahdī in Jurjān (Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 97–98).

him on behalf of a vegetable seller and he consented on the condition that he should sell vinegar and greens alone. Then he ordered that in each quarter one vegetable seller should be established following that example.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad[23]—al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī': When al-Manṣūr had finished building his palace in the city, he entered it and toured it and approved of it and examined it and admired what he saw in it, except that he thought he had spent too much money on it.

He looked at one part of it and thought it excellent, and he said to me, "Go out to al-Rabī' and tell him to go out to al-Musayyab[24] and tell him to bring me a competent builder immediately." I went out to al-Musayyab and told him, and he sent for the chief of the builders and summoned him and sent him in to Abū Ja'far, and when he stood before him he said to him, "How did you work for our overseers on this palace, and how much did you take in wages for each thousand baked bricks and sun-dried bricks?" The builder stood and was not able to make any reply, and al-Musayyab was afraid of him. Al-Manṣūr said to him, "What is the matter with you that you do not speak?" and he said, "I do not know, O Commander of the Faithful," and he said, "Damn you! tell me! You are safe from everything you are afraid of." He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, I do not concern myself with it, and I do not know it." He took his hand and said, "Come, may God not teach you the right thing!" He took him into the room he admired and showed him a majlis[25] that was in it and said, "Look at this

23. Probably the historian al-Madā'inī. Al-Ṭabarī uses three sources he refers to as 'Alī b. Muḥammad in this period, 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī, 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Nawfalī, and 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Hāshimī. It is often difficult to know which source is being referred to. The problem is mitigated by the fact that al-Nawfalī's information is obtained from his father, whereas al-Madā'inī does not quote his father at all. Al-Hāshimī also received information from his father, the important 'Abbāsid Muḥammad b. Sulaymān. Al-Madā'inī's information tends to be matters of fact and date, whereas both al-Nawfalī and al-Hāshimī retell court gossip and circumstantial eyewitness accounts.

24. B. Zuhayr al-Ḍabbī: a long serving Khurāsānī officer. He had participated in the early stages of the 'Abbasid Revolution in Khurāsān and come to Iraq with the 'Abbāsid army. He was at various times chief of police for al-Saffāḥ, al-Manṣūr and al-Rashīd, as well as being governor of Khurāsān from 163/780 to 166/782–83 (Crone, Slaves, 186–88).

25. Majlis is used in two senses by al-Ṭabarī and his sources, as an assembly of majlis, and build an arch next to it so that it will be similar to the house, and do not use any wood in it." The builder said, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful," and the builder and all those who were with him began to marvel at his understanding of building and engineering. The builder said to him, "I am not expert enough to construct it in this way and cannot do it as you want," and he said, "I will help you." [326]

He ordered baked bricks and plaster, and these were brought, and then he began to calculate the amount of baked bricks and plaster involved in the construction of the arch, and he continued doing it for the rest of that day and part of the next. He called al-Musayyab and said to him, "Give him his pay for the amount of his work with you." Al-Musayyab calculated it and reached five dirhams, and al-Manṣūr thought that was too much and said, "I am not satisfied with that," and he went on until he had reduced it by a dirham. Then he took the measurements and looked into the measurement of the arch of the room so that he understood it. He obliged the agents and al-Musayyab to take the expenses and with him took reliable builders and engineers, who told him the value of the work. He went on adding one thing after another and charged them what he had calculated the cost of the building of the arch to be. He demanded from al-Musayyab more than six thousand dirhams of the money he had, and he arrested him for it and interned him, and he did not leave the palace until he had paid it to him.

According to ʿĪsā b. al-Manṣūr: I found in the treasuries of my father, al-Manṣūr, among the papers that he spent on the City of Peace and its mosque and the Palace of Gold in it and the markets and the intervals and the trenches and its domes and its gates, four million eight hundred and thirty three dirhams. The equivalent in fulūs was 100,023,000. that was when a master mason was paid a qīrāṭ of silver a day and a laborer (rūzgārī) two or three ḥabbah.[26] people or audience and also as the setting in which such an assembly takes place, either a building or a tent. See *EI*², s.v. "Madjlis."

---

26. Baghdad was officially known as Madīnat al-Salām, the City of Peace, and I have translated it as such when it is used. The old name, Baghdad, remained more common. Fulūs were small copper coins of differing values; see *EI*² s.v. "Fals." Ḥabbah and qīrāṭ were fractions of a dirham and units of account, not minted coins, a ḥabbah being 1/160 dirham and a qīrāṭ 4 habbahs.

In this year al-Manṣūr deposed Salm b. Qutaybah[27] from al-Baṣrah and appointed as governor[28] Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. [327] ʿAlī.[29] The reason for his deposition:

According to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Shaybān—Yaʿqūb b. al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Hāshimī: Abū Jaʿfar wrote to Salm b. Qutaybah when he appointed him governor of al-Baṣrah, "To continue: demolish the houses and destroy the palm trees of those who rebelled with Ibrāhīm,"[30] and Salm wrote back, "With which of those shall I begin, the houses or the palm trees?" and Abū Jaʿfar wrote, "To continue: if I had written ordering you to destroy their dates, you would have written asking me whether you should begin with the barnī dates or the shahrīz dates," and he deposed him and appointed Muḥammad b. Sulaymān as governor. He arrived and caused havoc.

According to Yūnus b. Najdah: Salm b. Qutaybah came to us as governor after the rout with Abū Barqah Yazīd b. Salm[31] in charge of his police. Salm remained there five months; then he was deposed, and Muḥammad b. Sulaymān was appointed governor over us.

According to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Shaybān: When Muḥammad b. Sulaymān arrived, he destroyed the houses of Yaʿqūb b. al-Faḍl and Abū Marwān in the quarter of the Banū Yashkūr and those of 27. Son of the celebrated Qutaybah b. Muslim al-Bāhilī, conqueror of much of Transoxiana for the Muslims. He himself was governor of al-Baṣrah for the Umayyads at the time of the ʿAbbāsid Revolution and thereafter lived in retirement in al-Rayy until he was summoned by al-Manṣūr, who needed his support in al-Baṣrah when the city was taken by the ʿAlid rebel Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh in 145/762. He died in 149/766–67 (Crone, Slaves, 136–38).

---

28. Al-Ṭabarī uses the word wallāhu for the appointment. The two words commonly used for provincial governors are wālī and ʿāmil. Although the former is slightly more common and occurs also in the verbal forms wallā or the passive wulliya, there is no discernible distinction between the two terms. The office of governor is also frequently indicated by the preposition ʿalā, which I have translated as "in charge of."

29. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī was the able and most important of the younger generation of the ʿAbbāsid family at this time. His father, Sulaymān, uncle of al-Manṣūr, had been governor of al-Baṣrah. He died in 142/759–60, and Muḥammad inherited his status. He was at times governor of al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah and a firm opponent of the claims of ʿĪsā b. Mūsā to the succession. He died as governor of al-Baṣrah in 173/789–90, and al-Rashīd's agents confiscated much of his vast wealth.

30. See note 19 above.

31. Salm's son.

'Awn b. Mālik, 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. Ziyād and al-Khalīl b. al-Ḥusayn in the quarter of the Banū 'Adī and the house of 'Afw Allah b. Sufyān and destroyed their palm trees.[32]

In this year Ja'far b. Ḥanẓalah al-Bahrānī[33] led the summer expedition against the Byzantines.

In this year 'Abdallāh b. al-Rabī'[34] was deposed from Medina, and Ja'far b. Sulaymān[35] was appointed in his place, and he arrived there in the month of Rabī' I (May 19–June 17, 763).

In this year also al-Sariyy b. 'Abdallāh[36] was deposed from [328]
Mecca, and 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī[37] was appointed governor.

The leader of the pilgrims in this year was 'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās,[38] as is said by Muḥammad b. 'Umar and others.

---

32. 'Alid supporters in al-Baṣrah.

33. A long-time supporter of the Umayyads, who served on the Byzantine frontier in the early 'Abbāsid period. Al-Manṣūr sought his advice at the time of the 'Alid rebellion in 145/762. This is his last appearance in the historical record, and we must assume that he died soon after.

34. Al-Ḥārithī. The Ḥarithīs had no record of service in the 'Abbāsid cause but became important because of their kinship with the mother of al-Saffāḥ. 'Abdallāh b. al-Rabī', who was an intimate of al-Manṣūr, had been appointed governor of Medina the previous year. This is his last datable appearance in the historical record. In the treasury of St. Germer in Cologne, West Germany, there is an ivory box with an inscription saying that it was made for him in Aden (Crone, Slaves, 149).

35. Less successful brother of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān (see note 29). He was later absentee governor of al-Baḥrayn in 157/773–74 and of Mecca and Medina in the reign of al-Mahdī, c. 166/782. Apart from these, he held no high office and died in 177/793–94.

36. B. al-Ḥārith b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās, hence a distant relative of al-Manṣūr. He was with al-Mahdī in Khurāsān in 141/758–59 and had been governor of Mecca since 143/760–61. According to al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 470, he led the summer expedition against the Byzantines in 147/764.

37. The youngest of the Banū 'Alī, al-Manṣūr's uncles. He was in some ways the black sheep of the family, joining the unsuccessful rebellion of his brother 'Abdallāh against al-Manṣūr in 137/754 and being deposed from the governorate of al-Jazīrah and imprisoned for insulting al-Mahdī (see below p. 214). He also emerged as spokesman for the family interests against the power of the freedmen (mawālī) at this time. He was briefly governor of Damascus, where he caused trouble by favoring the Yamāniyyah, and al-Baṣrah, at the beginning of al-Rashīd's reign. He survived until 185/801.

38. Despite the fact that he was the son of the martyred Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad, the 'Abbāsid pretender killed by the Umayyads shortly before the 'Abbāsid Revolution, he never became a political figure of consequence. He spent most of his time in Syria and the Byzantine frontier areas, where he led the summer raid at least twice, and he died as governor of Syria or Palestine, c. 157/774.

The Events of the Year

147

(MARCH 10, 764–JANUARY 28, 765)

The events of this year:

Among these was the attack by Istarkhān al-Khwārazmī[39] with a body of Turks on the Muslims in the area of Armenia and his taking of many of the Muslims and the ahl al-dhimmah[40] prisoner, their entry into Tiflīs,[41] and their killing of Ḥarb b. ʿAbdallāh al-Rāwandī after whom the Ḥarbiyyah in Baghdad is named.[42] It is said that this Ḥarb was stationed in Mosul with 2,000 soldiers because of the Khārijites in al-Jazīrah.[43] When Abū Jaʿfar heard

39. The invaders were Khazars from north of the Caucasus. Barthold reads the name as Tarkhān and suggests that he came from the Muslim bodyguard of the Khazar Khaghans, who were recruited in Khwārazm: *EI*², s.v. "Khazar."

40. Protected people; the name given to Jews or Christians who lived under Muslim rule but were free to practice their own religion: See *EI*², s.v. "Dhimma."

41. Tblisi, capital of Georgia, strategically located where the Kura river emerges from the northern Caucasus mountains into the broad plains of Azerbaijān; it was the farthest outpost of Muslim rule in this direction.

42. A Khurāsānī officer who served in Baghdad before being posted to Mosul. The Ḥarbiyyah quarter was situated immediately northwest of the Round City (Le Strange, Baghdad, 122–33) and was the area of western Baghdad where most of the Khurāsānī soldiers settled.

43. See Azdī, Tārīkh al-Mawṣil, 194–95, Kennedy, Provincial Elites, 30–31.

about the gathering of the Turks in those areas, he sent Jibra'īl b. Yaḥyā[44] to fight them, and he wrote to Ḥarb ordering him to go with him. He went with him, and Ḥarb was killed and Jibra'īl was put to flight, and those Muslims whom I have mentioned were killed.

In this year the death of 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās occurred.[45] Opinions differ as to the cause of his death, and some follow 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Nawfalī from his father: Abū Ja'far [329] went on the pilgrimage in the year 147 some months after he had given al-Mahdī precedence over 'Īsā b. Mūsā.[46] He had deposed 'Īsā b. Mūsā from al-Kūfah and its territory and appointed Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī as governor in his place. He sent 'Īsā to the City of Peace and al-Manṣūr summoned him and handed 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī over to him secretly in the depths of the night. Then he said, "O 'Īsā, this man wishes to remove God's favor from you and from me. You are my heir apparent after al-Mahdī, and the caliphate will pass to you, so take this man and behead him without being weak or half-hearted. You must do this, or the power that I have built up will be weakened and destroyed." He then set off on his way and wrote to him three times on the road asking him what he had done in the matter that he had been

44. Al-Bajalī: a Khurāsānī officer who had previously been stationed on the Byzantine frontier. He survived this defeat and later served in his native Khurāsān, being governor of Samarqand in 159/775–76 (see below, pp. 45, 171; Crone, Slaves, 179–80)

45. One of al-Manṣūr's paternal uncles, the Banū 'Alī, he had led the 'Abbāsid armies in pursuit of Marwān, the last Umayyad caliph. He then became governor of Syria and attracted the support of many cadres of the Umayyad regime. With their encouragement, he launched a rebellion against al-Manṣūr immediately after his accession but was defeated and forced to take refuge with his brother Sulaymān in al-Baṣrah After Sulaymān's death in 142/759–60 his position became increasingly exposed, but he continued to enjoy the support of his surviving brothers. See Kennedy, 'Abbasid Caliphate, 59–61; Lassner, 'Abbasid Rule, 39–57.

46. 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās. He had participated in the defeat of the Umayyad forces in Iraq at the time of the 'Abbāsid Revolution and was rewarded with the governorate of al-Kūfah, which he held for the next fifteen years. He also played a major part in the defeat of the 'Alid rebellion of 145/762. On his deathbed al-Saffāḥ had been concerned that his heir, al-Manṣūr, then on the pilgrimage, might not return alive, so as a precaution he had stipulated that al-Manṣūr should be succeeded in turn by 'Īsā b. Mūsā The oath of allegiance was then taken to both of them. By this time al-Manṣūr was trying to revise the succession so that it would pass directly to his own son Muḥammad, but 'Īsā was resisting stubbornly.

instructed in, and he wrote to him, "I have executed what you ordered," and Abū Ja'far had no doubt that he had done what he had ordered him to do and that he had killed 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī. When he had been handed over to him, 'Īsā had hidden him, and he called his secretary Yūnus b. Farwah and said to him, "This man has handed over his paternal uncle to me and ordered me to do such and such to him," and he replied, "He wants to kill you and kill him. He ordered you to kill him secretly, and he will claim him from you openly and then he will retaliate on you for his death." 'Īsā asked for his advice, and he said, "I think that you should hide him in your house and do not let anyone know about his affair. If he seeks him openly from you, then hand him over openly but do not ever hand him over secretly, for, although he had entrusted him secretly to you, his affair will be produced in public." 'Īsā did this.

Al-Manṣūr came and conspired with his paternal uncles, urging them to ask him to give 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī to them, and he gave them hope that he would do that.[47] They came to him and spoke to him and aroused his compassion and reminded him of their [330] kinship and showed their good will to him, and he said, "Yes, bring me 'Īsā b. Mūsā." So he came to him, and he said, "O 'Īsā, you know that I handed over to you my paternal uncle and your paternal uncle, 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī, before I set out on the pilgrimage and I ordered you to keep him in your house," and he replied, "You did that, O Commander of the Faithful," and he went on, "Your paternal uncles have spoken to me on his behalf, and I have decided to pardon him and release him. Bring him to me!" He said, "O Commander of the Faithful, did you not order me to kill him so I killed him?" but al-Manṣūr replied, "I only ordered you to imprison him in your house," but he insisted, "You ordered me to kill him." Then al-Manṣūr said, "You have lied; I did not order you to kill him." He said to his paternal uncles, "This man has confessed to you that he has killed your brother and claims that I ordered him to do that, but he has told a lie."

They said, "Hand him over to us so that we can kill him in retaliation," and he said, "Do as you like with him!" and they sent him out to the courtyard. People gathered, and the matter became widely known. One of them stood up and drew his sword and advanced on ʿĪsā to strike him, and ʿĪsā said to him, "Are you going to do it?" and he said, "Yes by God!" and ʿĪsā said, "Do not be hasty but send me back to the Commander of the Faithful," and so they returned him to him, and he said, "You only wanted me to kill him so that you could kill me. Your paternal uncle is alive and well, and, if you order me to hand him over to you, I will do so." Al-Manṣūr said, "Bring him to us," so he brought him to him, and ʿĪsā said to him, "You schemed against me something toward which I was suspicious and my suspicion was right. Deal with your paternal uncle as you like." He said, "Let him enter so that I can consider my opinion." Then they left, and he ordered him to be put in a house with salt in the foundations and that water be poured into the foundations, and it collapsed on him and he died, and it happened to him as it happened.

47. 'Abdallāh was, of course, brother to these paternal uncles, who seem to have been led at this time by 'Īsā b. 'Alī and Muḥammad, son of the dead Sulaymān b. 'Alī, and they are seen acting together to protect 'Abdallāh.

ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī died in this year, and he was buried in the cemetery at the Syrian Gate, and he was the first person to be buried there.[48]

According to Ibrāhīm b. ʿĪsā b. al-Manṣūr Ibn Burayh: ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī died in prison in 147 at the age of 52. [331]

According to Ibrāhīm b. ʿĪsā: When ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī died, al-Manṣūr was riding one day, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAyyāsh was with him, and he said to him as he was alongside him, "Do you know that three caliphs whose name began with ʿayn killed three rebels whose names began with ʿayn?" He replied, "I only know that the common people say that ʿAlī killed ʿUthmān, and they lie, and ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān killed ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath and ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr and ʿAmr b. Saʿīd[49] and a house collapsed on ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī." Al-Manṣūr said, "Am I to blame if the house collapsed on ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī?" and he replied, "I never said you were to blame."

In this year al-Manṣūr deposed ʿĪsā b. Mūsā and had the oath of allegiance taken to his son al-Mahdī and appointed him heir apparent after him and, some say, ʿĪsā b. Mūsā after him.

---

48. Le Strange, Baghdad, 130–49.
49. All these names begin with the Arabic letter ʿayn. The caliph ʿUthmān

The reasons for his deposition and how the matter happened:

Opinions differ as to what brought al-Manṣūr to the point of deposing him. Some say the reason that brought al-Manṣūr to do that was that Abū Ja'far confirmed 'Īsā b. Mūsā, after the death [332] of Abū al-'Abbās, in what Abū al-'Abbās had appointed him to, the governorship of al-Kūfah and its Sawād. He honored him and treated him with respect, and when he came in to him he sat him on his right hand and sat al-Mahdī on his left. This was his attitude to him until al-Manṣūr decided to give al-Mahdī precedence over him in the caliphate. Abū al-'Abbās had decided that the succession after him should pass to Abū Ja'far and then after Abū Ja'far to 'Īsā b. Mūsā.

When al-Manṣūr decided on that he spoke to 'Īsā b. Mūsā about giving his son precedence over him with kind words, and 'Īsā replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, what about the oaths and agreements that bind me and bind the Muslims in my favor and the freeing and divorcing and other guarantees of the oaths?[50] There is no way to that, O Commander of the Faithful."

When Abū Ja'far saw his refusal, his mood (color) changed, and he became rather estranged from him. He ordered that al-Mahdī be given permission[51] (to enter) before him, and he used to come in and sit on al-Manṣūr's right hand in 'Īsā's seat. Then he gave 'Īsā permission, and he entered and sat beyond al-Mahdī on al-Manṣūr's right as well, and nobody sat on his left on the seat that al-Mahdī used to sit on. Al-Manṣūr was furious about that, and matters were coming to a head. He used to order that al-Mahdī be given permission, then that 'Īsā b. 'Alī be given permission after him. Then he waited a little while and ordered that 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī be given permission, and then he waited a little while was murdered in 35/656 by insurgents from Iraq and Egypt. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, who succeeded him, was not directly involved. The Umayyad caliph 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān was responsible for the deaths of the rebels Ibn al-Ash'ath (85/704) and Ibn al-Zubayr (72/792). 'Amr b. Sa'īd al-Ashdaq was an Umayyad rival to 'Abd al-Malik, executed by him in 70/689–90.

---

50. He had sworn oaths with the condition that his slaves would be freed and his wives divorced if he broke them.

51. Allowing people to enter the caliph's audience was the function of the ḥājib (chamberlain), and the order in which people were admitted was an important indication of status.

before ordering that ʿĪsā b. Mūsā be given permission. After that he always gave al-Mahdī permission first on every occasion, but he mixed up the rest, giving precedence to some who had been kept waiting and keeping waiting some who had been given precedence, letting ʿĪsā b. Mūsā think that he gave them precedence only because of some business that had cropped up and to discuss his affair with them. Then he used to give ʿĪsā b. Mūsā permission after them, and he was silent about all that and did not complain at all and did not criticize.

Then he moved on to harsher measures. There were with ʿĪsā [333] in the audience some of his children, and he heard digging at the foot of the wall and feared that the wall would fall down on top of him. Dust was scattered on him, and he looked up to the wood of the ceiling of the audience room and saw that one of its sides had been dug out to be removed from its place, and dust fell on his qalansūwah[52] and his clothes. He ordered those of his children who were with him to move, and he stood up to pray. Then permission came to him, so he stood up to go in in that state with the dust on him and he did not shake it off. When al-Manṣūr saw him, he said, "O ʿĪsā, no one ever comes in to me in a state like yours with so much dirt and dust on you. Does all this come from the street?" He replied, "I suppose so, O Commander of the Faithful." Al-Manṣūr had only spoken to him like that because he wanted him to complain to him about something. Al-Manṣūr had sent ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī to him about the matter that he wanted from him, and ʿĪsā b. Mūsā did not appreciate his visit to him, for it was as if he were provoking him.

It is said that he administered to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā something that would make him perish, and he rose up from the audience and al-Manṣūr said, "Where are you going, O Abū Mūsā?" and he replied, "I have a stomach ache, O Commander of the Faithful." "Then retire to the house." He replied, "The ache that I have is more severe than I can bear in the house." "Where are you going to?" "To the (my) lodging." So he got up from the audience and went to his river boat and al-Manṣūr got up after him and followed in his tracks to the river boat, pretending alarm for him. ʿĪsā asked him for permission to go to al-Kūfah, but he said, "Stay rather, and be treated here." He refused and pressed him, and he gave him permission. The person who encouraged him to do that was his doctor Bukhtīshūʿ Abū Jibraʾīl,[53] who said, "I, by God, would not venture to treat you at court, and my soul would not be safe." Al-Manṣūr gave him permission and said, "I am going on the [334] pilgrimage in this year of mine, and I will stay with you in al-Kūfah until you recover, if God wills."

52. The qalansūwah was a tall hat in the shape of a cone or truncated cone. See Ahsan, Social Life, 30–31.

When the time of the pilgrimage approached, al-Manṣūr set out and reached a place outside al-Kūfah called al-Ruṣāfah,[54] and he stayed there for several days. He held horse races there and visited ʿĪsā more than once. Then he returned to the City of Peace and did not go on the pilgrimage, giving the shortage of water on the road as an excuse. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā's illness reached such a point that his hair fell out, and then he recovered from that illness. Yaḥyā b. Ziyād b. Abī Ḥuzābah al-Burjumī Abū Ziyād[55] said about this:

You escaped from the medicine of the doctor as the gazelle escapes well-aimed arrows.
From a hunter whose arrow penetrates al farīṣ (the flesh behind the shoulder blades) when he prepares the arrow of death in his bowstring.
God defended you from the assault of a lion who wants (to hunt) lions inside his thicket.
That is why he came to us carrying within him a hidden (illness)[56]
made known through hearing and seeing him,
A man with little hair, for from his head
the thick black hair has gone away.

It is said that ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī used to say to al-Manṣūr that ʿĪsā b. Mūsā refused to take the oath of allegiance to al-Mahdī only 53. Well-known physician, d. 185/801.

54. Near al-Kūfah, not to be confused with al-Ruṣāfah of Baghdad or Ruṣāfat Hishām. For the numerous al-Ruṣāfahs scattered through the Muslim world from Cordova to Nīshāpūr, Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 46–50. The word means a causeway or bank of masonry.

55. Grandson of the poet Abū Ḥuzābah al-Walīd b. Ḥanafiyyah; Aghānī, Būlāq XIX, 152, Beirut, XXII, 273.

56. Referring to ʿĪsā.

because he was looking after this matter for his son Mūsā,[57] and it was Mūsā who was preventing him. Al-Manṣūr said to ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī, "Speak to Mūsā b. ʿĪsā and make him afraid for his father and for his son." ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī spoke to Mūsā about that, made him give up hope, threatened him, and warned him of the wrath of al-Manṣūr. When Mūsā was filled with fear and became apprehensive [335] and feared that something dreadful would happen to him, he came to al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad[58] and said to him, "O my paternal uncle, I am speaking to you with speech that no one, by God, has ever heard from me before, nor will anyone ever hear again and only my position of trust and confidence in you has extracted it from me. It is entrusted with you and I am putting my life in your hands." He replied, "Speak, O son of my brother, you appreciate my feelings toward you." He said, "I can see what my father is facing in order to resign this matter and have it transferred to al-Mahdī. He is treated with different sorts of harm and evil. Once he is threatened and once his permission to enter is delayed, once the walls are demolished on him, once death is plotted for him. My father will not give in because of this. That will never be. But here is an idea according to which he may give up if ever he will." He said, "What is it, O my brother's son? You are certainly correct and have earned my sympathy." Mūsā continued, "Let the Commander of the Faithful speak to him in my presence and say to him, 'O ʿĪsā, I know that you are not withholding this matter from al-Manṣūr for yourself because of your advanced age and your nearness to death, and indeed you know that you do not have a long span, but you are withholding it because of the position of your son Mūsā. Do you think that I should allow your son to survive you and my son to survive with him, so that he can have 57. He survived to be restored to his father's old office of governor of al-Kūfah in 167/783–84 by al-Mahdī. In Hārūn's reign he was serveral times governor of al-Kūfah, as well as of Syria and Egypt. He never made any attempt to claim the caliphate and died in 183/799–800.

58. Brother of the caliphs al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr. He spent much of his time leading expeditions on the Byzantine frontier and does not seem to have played an important role in politics. He was, however, immensely wealthy, being the owner and developer of the ʿAbbāsiyah Island in Baghdad, among other properties: see Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 243, 252; Le Strange, Baghdad, 142, 148. He is last recorded at the court of al-Hādī in 170/786–87.

power over him? Absolutely not, by God, that would never be! I would fall upon your son with you watching until you despaired for him and I was safe from him dominating my son. Do you think that your son is preferable to me than my son?' Then he would order either that I was suffocated or that the sword was drawn on me. If he ('Īsā) will agree to anything, then perhaps he will do it for this reason and not for any other."

[336] Al-'Abbās said, "May God reward you well, O son of my brother! You have sacrificed your life for your father, and you have preferred his survival to your own fortune. You have had the best opinion and followed the best of paths." Then he came to Abū Ja'far and told the news, and al-Manṣūr rewarded Mūsā well and said, "He has acted well and decently, and I will do as he has advised me, if God wills." When they gathered and 'Īsā b. 'Alī was there, al-Manṣūr turned to 'Īsā b. Mūsā and said, "O 'Īsā, I am not ignorant of the motive that you harbor nor of the aim you have pursued in this matter that I asked of you; you wanted this affair only for your son, who has been an evil omen both for you and for himself."

'Īsā b. 'Alī said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I need to relieve myself," and he said, "We will call for a receptacle so that you can urinate in it." He said, "In your audience, O Commander of the Faithful? That cannot be, but let me be guided to the nearest latrine to get to it." He ordered a man to guide him, and there he went.[59] 'Īsā b. Mūsā said to his son Mūsā, "Get up with your paternal uncle and gather his garments up behind him and give him a cloth if you have one so that he can wipe himself with it." When 'Īsā squatted down to urinate, Mūsā gathered his clothes up behind him, and he did not see him and he said, "Who is that?" and he replied "Mūsā b. 'Īsā." 'Īsā said, "May you be saved with my father and may the father who begot you be saved with my father! By God, I know that there will be no good in this matter after you two have departed, and I know that you two have the best right to it, but man is fond of what he can get soon!" Mūsā said to himself, "By God, this man has exposed his vulnerable spot to me, and it is he who urged (al-Manṣūr) on against my father. By God I will kill him because of what he said to me. I don't care if the Commander of the Faithful kills me after him, but there would be consolation for my father in his killing, and he would forget that I had been killed."[60]

59. The story suggests that 'Īsā b. 'Alī, an old man at this date, was blind, but there is no other evidence for this in the sources.

When they returned to their positions, Mūsā asked, "O Commander of the Faithful, may I say something to my father?" and that pleased him, and he thought that he wanted to discuss some [337] of their affair with him. So he said, "Go on," so he went to him and said, "O my father, ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī has killed you and me many times because of what he has said about us. He has exposed his vulnerable spot to me." His father asked, "How?" and he replied, "He said to me this and that, and if I tell the Commander of the Faithful he will kill him, and you will satisfy your thirst for revenge and kill him before he kills you and me. We don't care what happens afterwards." His father said, "Damn this thought and opinion! Your paternal uncle said words to you in confidence that he hoped would please you, and you have made them into a reason for doing him evil and annihilating him! Keep silent and do not let anyone hear this from you and go back to your place." He stood up and returned to his place, and Abū Jaʿfar waited to see if he could see any result from his going to his father and speaking with him, and when he saw nothing he went back to his original threats and tried to intimidate him. "By God, I will swiftly do to you what harms you and what will make you despair of his surviving after you! O Rabīʿ, go up to Mūsā and strangle him with his sword belt!"[61] Al-Rabīʿ came up to him and gathered his sword belt and began to strangle him slowly.

Mūsā shouted out, "O Commander of the Faithful, (fear) God in killing me and shedding my blood! I am not in the position you imagine, and ʿĪsā will not care if you kill me, for he has more than ten male children, all of whom are like me or have precedence over me." The caliph said, "Tighten more, O Rabīʿ; finish him off!" Al-Rabīʿ made as if he were going to annihilate him and

60. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī admits that ʿĪsā b. Mūsā is in the right, and so Mūsā b. ʿĪsā could have accused him of disloyalty to al-Manṣūr.

61. The strap by which the wearer hangs a sword around his neck; see Lane, s.v. miḥmal.

undid the belt and Mūsā cried out, and when ʿĪsā saw that he said, "By God, O Commander of the Faithful, I did not think that the affair would go as far as all this. Order him to leave him alone, for I could not go back to my family if one of my slaves had been killed because of this affair, never mind my son. I give you witness that my wives will be divorced, my slaves free, and what I own spent in the path of God among whomever you wish, O Commander of the Faithful. Here is my hand for the oath of allegiance to al-Mahdī."

He took the oath of allegiance to him as he wanted, and then he [338] said, "O Abū Mūsā, you have answered this request of mine in hate, and I have a request I would like you to answer in obedience so that you expunge with it your feelings toward me concerning the first request." ʿĪsā asked, "What is that, O Commander of the Faithful?" and he replied, "That this affair will pass to you after al-Mahdī." ʿĪsā said, "I cannot enter into it after I have gone out from it." The caliph and those of his family who were present did not stop pressing him until finally he said, "O Commander of the Faithful, you know best."

One of the people of al-Kūfah said, when ʿĪsā passed by him with retinue: "This is the man who was tomorrow and became the day after tomorrow." This story, it is said, is attributed to the family of ʿĪsā, who told it.

According to those who relate this matter from other sources: Al-Manṣūr wanted the oath of allegiance for al-Mahdī and he spoke to the army about that and when they saw ʿĪsā riding they made him hear what he did not like and he complained to al-Manṣūr and he said to the soldiers, "Do not annoy my brother's son for he is the skin that lies between my eyes, and, if I come closer to you, I would cut off your heads" and they used to stop and then begin again and continued with it for some time. Then he wrote to ʿĪsā:

> In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate.
> From the slave of God ʿAbdallāh al-Manṣūr, Commander of the Faithful, to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā: peace be upon you. I praise to you God, beside Whom there is no other god.
> To continue: praise be to God of ancient grace, great kindness and magnificent blessing who began creation with His knowledge and puts the decree into effect by His order. No creature reaches the end of His justice or attains the end of describing His glory. He arranges affairs as He wishes with His power and dispatches according to His will and there is no judge in them except Him and no executing of them except through Him. He carries them through with ease and He consults no wazīr about them [339] nor asks the advice of any helper. He is not confounded about anything He wishes and its completion comes to pass whether the worshippers like it or hate it. They are unable to protect themselves from Him nor do they have any defense for themselves against Him. He is the Lord of the earth and what is on it. To Him belong creation and affairs, may God be blessed, the Lord of the universe.

You know the position we were in during the rule of oppressors and the state of our power and our expedients against what the cursed house[62] inflicted on us whether we liked it or not. So we patiently accepted having to give up things to those [rulers] to whom they committed our affairs and whose opinions were unanimously agreed upon. We were unjustly treated and downtrodden by oppression, not resisting tyranny, not preventing injustice, not giving right nor forbidding wrong. We were unable to accomplish it or to benefit ourselves until what was ordained came to pass and the affair reached its allotted span. God allowed the destruction of His enemy and blessed with compassion the people of the family of His Prophet. God sent helpers [anṣār][63] for them to seek to avenge them and to strive against their enemies, to summon to support them and to give victory to their state from scattered lands and different reasons but united wishes. God gathered them in obedience to us and formed in their hearts affection for us to give us victory and made them glorious through our victory. We would not have met many of them, nor drawn a sword with them if God had not affected their hearts and sent them to us from their countries with committed enthusiasm and pure obedience to meet victory and to return victorious and to win victory by fear. They did not meet anyone without putting him to flight nor any offender without killing him so that God brought to us by [340] that the end of our waiting, the limit of our affliction, the fulfillment of our hopes, the manifestation of our right, the slaughter of our enemies through the blessing of God, great and glorious, as a favor from Him to us without any effort or power from us.

62. The Umayyads.

63. The term anṣār (helpers) was used for the people of Medina who supported the Prophet Muḥammad. 'Abbāsid propaganda often drew parallels between them and the Prophet and referred to the Khurāsānīs as their anṣār.

After that we remained in the blessing of God and His favor until this young man[64] grew up and for him God worked on the hearts of the helpers of the Faith whom he had sent to us as He had done to us at the beginning of our power. He filled their hearts with affection for him and spread love of him in their breasts. They got to the point where they could only talk of his virtue, only gave praise to his name and only recognized his right.

Then when the Commander of the Faithful saw how God had filled their hearts with affection for him (al-Mahdī) and put his name on their tongues and (saw) their recognition of him by his characteristics and his name and the demand of the common people that he should be obeyed, the Commander of the Faithful became certain that this was a matter that God had decreed and wrought. His servants had no authority or power or counsel or discussion about it because of what the Commander of the Faithful saw of the consensus of opinion and attachment of the people. The Commander of the Faithful thought that even if al-Mahdī was not recognized by right of descent, power would pass to him. The Commander of the Faithful was not preventing what the people had agreed on and was not seeking to avoid granting what they claimed for him.

64. Al-Manṣūr's son al-Mahdī.

The most pressing of the people on the Commander of the Faithful in that were the very closest of his courtiers and the trustworthy men of his Guard and Police. The Commander of the Faithful saw no alternative to approving of and following them. The Commander of the Faithful and the people of his family were the most justified of those who hastened to that and strove for him and desired him and recognized his virtue and hoped for his blessing and told true reports about him and thanked God if He [341] put in his offspring what the Prophets asked for before him when the true servant said, "Lord give me an heir as from Thyself, one that will truly represent me, and represent the posterity of Jacob; and make him, O my Lord! One with whom Thou art well pleased!"[65] God gave to the Commander of the Faithful an heir and made him God fearing, blessed and rightly guided (mahdī) and a namesake of the Prophet.[66] He seized those who assumed this name and claimed that resemblance, which confused the people of that intention about it and stirred up strife among the people of that misery. He removed that from them and put upon them the calamity that befalls.[67] He established the right firmly and raised up to al-Mahdī his splendor and to the Faith its supporters.

The Commander of the Faithful wanted to inform you what the subjects had agreed. You were like a child of his to him and he wants to protect you and guide you and make you glorious, as he would himself and his children. He thinks about you that if you hear about what you see the people have agreed on concerning the position of your cousin (al-Mahdī) you will take the start unurged, so that our helpers, the people of Khurāsān and others come to know that you will be more speedy than themselves in doing what they would like according to their opinion about their own well-being; that for any merit they recognize in al-Mahdī or hope from him, you would still be the most happy of men over that and delighted about it because of his position and kinship. Accept the advice of the Commander of the Faithful to you, for through it you get better and are guided. Peace be upon you and the mercy of God.

65. Zacharias, father of John the Baptist. Qur'ān, XIX: 5–6.

66. A play on the name of al-Mahdī, whose name was Muḥammad and whose title, al-Mahdī, means "rightly guided."

67. Cf. Qur'ān, IX: 99 and XLVIII: 66.

So ʿĪsā b. Mūsā wrote to him in reply:

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate.

To the servant of God ʿAbdallāh Commander of the Faithful from ʿĪsā b. Mūsā: Peace be upon you, O Com-[342] mander of the Faithful, and the Mercy of God. I praise to you God, other than Whom there is no god. To continue: Your letter has reached me in which you mention what you have decided on in contradicting the law and committing sin in the cutting off of your kin and violating the pact that God has accepted from the people about faithfulness to the caliphate and to my inheriting it after you in order to cut off what God made close by bonds of affection and to split up what God joined together and join together business that God separated in defiance of God in His heaven and turning from God in His decree and following Satan in his desire.

Whoever defies God He throws him down and whoever goes against Him He subdues and whoever tries to deceive Him about anything He requites, but whoever puts his trust in God He protects and whoever humbles himself before God He raises up. The rule on which the building was founded and that should be followed is that there is an inheritance to me from the last Caliph from God and a command before which we are the same and no one Muslim has more right to change than another. The fulfillment of it is obligatory and the first has no more right to change it than the last and if something is legal for the second then it cannot be forbidden for the first. The first who followed information about it and recognized its sign and revealed what he thought about it and hoped from it has precedence. He who wished to work first was more entitled to the right.[68] Neither being made negligent by God nor giving license to the people to abandon fulfillment (of the oath) will get you safety from affliction. Anyone who answered you in abandoning anything that was due to me and considered that legal against me would not feel embarrassed when opportunity enabled him and license tempted him to be more hasty in finding it licit against you also and to be more destructive to what you have established.

So accept the consequence and be pleased with God for what He has done, take what you were given strongly and be among those who are grateful (to God) for God, Great and Glorious, increases him who gives Him thanks as a just promise from Him with no breaking in it. Whoever fears God He protects and whoever decides to oppose Him He turns away from, for God "knows of (the tricks) that deceive with the eyes and all that the hearts (of men) conceal."[69] [343]

In addition to that, we are not safe from disasters or sudden death before (the completion of) what you have begun in cutting me out. If death comes quickly to me, you will have been saved the trouble and you would have hidden the ugliness of what you wished to make open. And if I survive after you, you would not have put my back up (lit: aroused my bitter feelings) and severed relationships with me and helped my enemies to follow in your traces, accept your tutelage and act according to your examples.

You mentioned that all affairs are in the hands of God and He is their organizer and measurer and executor according to His wish. You are right. Affairs are in the hands of God, and he who knows this fact and can define it should accomplish it and try to reach it (as a goal). Know that we ourselves did not acquire any benefit to ourselves or push away any mischief and we did not obtain what you know by our own power or by our own strength. If we had been left to depend on our own efforts and desires, our power would be weakened and our ability diminished to seek what God brought us. But God, if He wishes firmly to execute His order and carry out His promise and complete His covenant and make certain His pact, decides His conclusion and concludes His decision and gives light to his announcement and establishes His pillars when He founds His building, and (His) servants are not able to delay what He is hastening or to hasten what He is delaying. But Satan, the beguiling and obvious enemy, whom God has warned against obeying and made clear his enmity, causes disputes among the agents of the right and the people of His obedience so that they divide their community and scatter their gathering. He sows discord and [344] hatred among them and washes his hands of them when the realities of affairs and the straits of tribulation become conspicuous.

68. ʿĪsā being the first, al-Mahdī the second.
69. Qurʾān, XX:19.

God, Great and Glorious, has said in His Book, "Never did We send an apostle or a prophet before thee, but, when he framed a desire, Satan threw some (vanity) into his desire: but God will cancel anything (vain) that Satan throws in and God will confirm (and establish) His signs: for God is full of knowledge and wisdom."[70] and He described those who fear (Him) and said, "When a thought of evil from Satan assaults them, bring God to remembrance, when lo! they see (aright)!"[71]

So I ask God's protection for the Commander of the Faithful, lest his intentions and the innermost part of his soul are in opposition to what God, Great and Glorious, granted to those who were before him. Indeed their sons asked them and their desires had led them to a similar position to what the Commander of the Faithful was considering, but they preferred the right over its opposite and they knew that nobody overcomes the decree of God, nor turns away His gifts. And beside that, they did not feel secure from the change of fortune and the hastening of afflictions. So they chose the life to come and accepted the consequences and hated change and feared alteration. They showed fine conduct and God brought their affairs to completion and sufficed for what concerned them and protected their authority and glorified their helpers and honored their supporters and made their buildings noble so the prosperity was completed and the blessings became apparent and they felt obliged to give thanks. So the order of God was completed, even if they did not like it.

70. Qur'ān, XXII: 52.
71. Qur'ān, VII: 200.

Peace be upon the Commander of the Faithful and the mercy of God.

When his letter reached Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, he kept aloof from him and was exceedingly angry. The army renewed what they had been doing more violently. Among them were Asad b. al-Marzbān, 'Uqbah b. Salm, Naṣr b. Ḥarb b. 'Abdallāh[72] with a group, and they came to 'Īsā's door and prevented anyone from going in to him and when he rode out they walked behind him [345] and said, "You are the cow of which God said, "They offered her in sacrifice, but not with good will."[73] He returned and complained about them, and al-Manṣūr said to him, "O son of my brother, I am afraid what they might do to you and me. Their hearts are full of the love of this young man,[74] but if you give him precedence before you so that he is between you and me, they will refrain." 'Īsā agreed to do it.

According to Isḥāq al-Mawṣilī—al-Rabī': When 'Īsā's answering letter reached al-Manṣūr, as we have described, he wrote on 72. Asad, a soldier presumably of Persian origin, Marzbān being a Persian title given to military officials in frontier districts of the Sasanian Empire. For his subsequent relations with 'Uqbah and his death, see below p 60. 'Uqbah was from Hunā'ah of Azd (Caskel, table 211). He is first recorded in Sind with 'Uyaynah b. Mūsā in 142/759–60 (Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 448). For his subsequent role in al-Baḥrayn, see below p. 60. He was assassinated in 167/783–84, apparently in revenge for a man he had killed in al-Yamāmah (below p. 238; Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 478). Naṣr, a Tamīmī and a member of Abū Ja'far's guard, was subsequently appointed to the frontiers of Fārs (below p. 85). He was probably the son of Ḥarb b. 'Abdallāh al-Rāwandī (see note 42 above).

73. Qur'ān, II 71.

74. Al-Mahdī.

it "If you accept its loss, you may obtain compensation for it in this world, and you may be secure from it responsibilities in the next."

There has been given on the subject of al-Manṣūr's deposition of ʿĪsā b. Mūsā a version other than these two, which is the one which Abū Muḥammad known as al-Aswārī recounted on the authority of al-Ḥasan b. ʿĪsā the secretary;[75] Abū Jaʿfar wanted to depose ʿĪsā b. Mūsā from his position as heir apparent and to give al-Mahdī precedence over him, but he refused to agree to that. The affair defied all Abū Jaʿfar's efforts so he sent for Khālid b. Barmak and said to him, "Speak to him, O Khālid. You have seen his refusal to give the oath of allegiance to al-Mahdī and what we have done before about his affair. Do you have any stratagem for it? All sorts of tricks have exhausted us, and our ideas have come to nothing." He replied, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful. Choose thirty senior men of the party[76] and attach them to me." Khālid b. Barmak rode out, and they rode with him and reached ʿĪsā b. Mūsā and brought him Abū Jaʿfar's message. He replied, "I will not depose myself for God, Great and Glorious, has entrusted this matter to me." Khālid worked on him with every sort of warning and desire, but he refused (to change his mind).

Khālid left him and the members of the party left after him, and [346] Khālid said to them, "What is your advice in this matter?" and they said, "Let us bring the Commander of the Faithful his message and tell him what we did and what he did," but Khālid said, "No, we will tell the Commander of the Faithful that he has agreed and we will bear witness against him if he denies it." They replied, "Do it and we will do our part," and he said, "It is the right course," and he informed the Commander of the Faithful about what he attempted and wished.

They went to Abū Jaʿfar, and Khālid was with them, and told him that he had agreed so he issued the document for the oath of allegiance to al-Mahdī and wrote all areas.

When the news reached ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, he came to Abū Jaʿfar 75. Nothing seems to be known of these.

76. The word shīʿah here, and elsewhere in al-Ṭabarī's work, applies to the ʿAbbāsid party; only later does it come to be applied exclusively to the pro-ʿAlid party in the modern sense.

denying the claim that he had agreed to giving al-Mahdī precedence over himself and he reminded him of God in what he had intended. Abū Ja'far summoned them and asked them, and they said, "We bear witness against him that he did agree and he should not go back on it." Abū Ja'far carried the matter through and thanked Khālid for what he had done and al-Mahdī was aware of what had happened and praised the excellence of his opinion in this affair..

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān—his father—'Abdallāh b. Abī Sulaym, freedman of 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal:[77] I was traveling with Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal when Abū Ja'far had decided to give al-Mahdī precedence over 'Īsā b. Mūsā in the oath of allegiance. We met Abū Nakhīlah the poet[78] with his two sons and two slaves, both of them carrying some of the luggage of their people. Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh stopped by them and said, "Abū Nakhīlah, what is this I see and what position are you in?" He replied, "I was staying [347] with al-Qa'qā', who was a man of the family of Zurārah who was in command of 'Īsā b. Mūsā's shurṭah, and he said, "Leave me, for this man has done good to me, and it has reached my notice that you composed a poem about this oath of allegiance to al-Mahdī. I am afraid that he will hear of it and I will be exposed to reproach because you stayed with me," and he pestered me until I left.

He said to me, "O 'Abdallāh, go with Abū Nakhīlah and give him a safe place to spend the night in my house and treat him and those with him well. Then Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh told Abū Ja'far about the poem of Abū Nakhīlah in which he says,

'Īsā let it slide to Muḥammad (al-Mahdī)
so that it may be passed from hand to hand
Among you, and it rests there while it is increasing.
We are delighted with the beardless youth (al-Mahdī).

---

77. See note 23 above.

78. Abū Nakhīlah (his ism, not his kunyah) b. Ḥazn al-Tamīmī was court poet to the Umayyads from the time of Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik, his first patron. He transferred his allegiance to the 'Abbāsids and became their panegyrist, styling himself the "poet of the Banū Hāshim" (Aghānī, Būlāq, XVIII, 139; Beirut, XX, 361.) For the family of Zurārah, see Crone, Slaves, 121–23.

When it was the day on which Abū Ja'far had the oath of allegiance taken to his son al-Mahdī and gave him precedence over 'Īsā, he summoned Abū Nakhīlah and ordered him to recite the poem. Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh spoke to Abū Ja'far and advised him in what he said to give him the most magnificent reward. He said, "It is something that will remain about you in books and people will talk about it at the time and for eternity," and he continued until Abū Ja'far ordered that he be given ten thousand dirhams.

According to Ḥayyān b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥibrān al-Ḥimmānī—Abū Nakhīlah: I came to Abū Ja'far and waited for a month at his gate and did not reach him until the day when 'Abdallāh b. al-Rabī' al-Ḥārithī said to me, "O Abū Nakhīlah, the Commander of the Faithful has nominated his son for the caliphate and the oath of [348] allegiance ('ahd), and he is giving him precedence before 'Īsā b. Mūsā. If you said something encouraging him in that and mentioning the virtue of al-Mahdī, you would be likely to receive some favor from him and from his son," so I said:[79]

Take care, 'Abdallāh, who is worthy of it,
(I mean) the caliphate of God, which He has given you.
He has chosen you, he has chosen you for it, He has chosen you.
We had looked for a time to your father,
Then we looked to you for it.
We were among them,[80] but our longing was for you.
Yes, we shelter in your protection.
Rest your staff on Muḥammad,
Your son, who, whatever you entrust to him, can bear the responsibility.
The best man to protect it (the caliphate) is the nearest kin to you.
I fatigued my legs and thighs,
I roamed until I found no place to go,
I turned here and there and everywhere,

79. For a variant version of this poem, Aghānī, Būlāq, XVIII, 152; Beirut, XX, 391.

80. Supporters of the Umayyads. Much of the poem is concerned with the author's attempt to excuse his support of the previous dynasty.

and every word I spoke except about you
Was a lie, and this has done penance for that.

I also recited my poem in which I said:[81]

To the Commander of the Faithful betake yourself, O my she-camel, traveling to the foamy sea of seas (or to the most generous of men).
You are he, O son of the namesake of Aḥmad,[82]
O son of the noble Arab house,
Yes, the trustworthy of the Eternal One,
it is you who was appointed by the Lord of the mosque.
The heir apparent to it (the caliphate) most fortunately was ʿĪsā, and he let it slide to Muḥammad
And before ʿĪsā it was gradually surrendered from one to one,
so that it may be passed from hand to hand
Among you, and it rests there while it is increasing [349]
and we are delighted with the beardless youth.[83]
We have arrived to witness, but we did not,
the pact has not been confirmed.
So, if we hear the clamor "Stretch out! Stretch out!" (your hand), it will be for us like the torrent of rain for a thirsty horse.
So call to the oath of allegiance the surging crowds.
It will become clear to you today or tomorrow.
It is he (al-Mahdī) who has become perfect, and no obstacle [stands in his way].
He has increased as you wish, so give him more, that he may increase further.
Clothe him yourself in the mantle you choose and he is ready to wear, for it is the mantle of the garlanded horse that goes before.
It had been related that it was as if it (the caliphate) had returned, and when it did it was not rejected.
For it used to wander from one wilderness to another

81. For a variant, see Aghānī, Būlāq, XVIII, 151; Beirut, XX, 288–89.
82. Muḥammad al-Mahdī was the namesake of the Prophet.
83. Al-Mahdī.

for some time. So, when the time for the drinkers to gather around the spring has arrived,
And the time of turning the vile seducer (into a man of virtue) has also arrived God would say to it, "Come along quickly and be rightly guided!"
Then it is settled in the right place, in the best lineage, in the best lineage,[84] in the most glorious lineage.
The loud complaint of jealous souls has not been silenced by better than a firm and reliable lord.
When they started striking fire by unsparkling firesteel, they were tested with the extremely firm and powerful
Who increases in watchfulness against threats.
So they changed to compliance and supplication
Toward a determined sword, which eats up every file.

This was recited and spread through the mouths of the servants [350] and reached Abū Ja'far, who asked who the author was. He was informed that it was a member of the Banū Sa'd b. Zayd Manāt and he was pleased. He called me and I was brought into his presence. 'Īsā b. Mūsā was on his right-hand side, and the people were with him with the chiefs of the commanders and the army. When I was in a place he could see me, I cried out, "O Commander of the Faithful, bring me near you so that I can make you understand and you can listen to what I have to say." He beckoned with his hand, and I came near until I was closed to him. When I was in front of him I spoke and raised my voice and recited to him from this position. Then I returned to the beginning of the urjūzah,[85] and I recited it from the beginning to this place also. I repeated it a second time until I came to its end. The people were listening, and he was delighted with what I recited to him when he was listening to it. When we left him, there was a man putting his hand on my shoulder, and I turned and there was 'Iqāl b. Shabbah saying, "As for you, you have delighted the Commander of the Faithful and, if the affair is resolved as you wish and you said, by

84. That is, the caliphate was settled on al-Mahdī.
85. A poem in the rajaz meter.

my life you will be well rewarded by him, but, if it is otherwise, then look for a tunnel in the earth or a ladder to the sky."[86]

Al-Manṣūr wrote to him at al-Rayy that he be given a reward, and ʿĪsā sent men after him and he was intercepted on his way and he had his throat cut and the skin stripped off his face. It is said that he was killed after he left al-Rayy and he had taken his reward.

According to al-Walīd b. Muḥammad al-ʿAnbarī: The reason why ʿĪsā gave Abū Jaʿfar his consent for giving al-Mahdī precedence over him was that Salm b. Qutaybah said to him, "O man, take the oath of allegiance and give him precedence over yourself. If you resign from the affair, he will assign it to you (ʿĪsā) after him (al-Mahdī), and you will please the Commander of the Faithful." He said, "I will succeed him?" and he replied, "Yes," and ʿĪsā said, "I will do it." Salm came to al-Manṣūr and told him of ʿĪsā's reply, and he was pleased about that and Salm's status with him increased, and the people took the oath of allegiance to [351] al-Mahdī and to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā after him. Al-Manṣūr preached the sermon in which was the announcement of the precedence of al-Mahdī over ʿĪsā, and ʿĪsā preached after that and gave precedence to al-Mahdī over himself, and al-Manṣūr fulfilled what he had promised him.

According to some of the companions of Abū Jaʿfar: We were reminiscing about the affair of Abū Jaʿfar and ʿĪsā b. Mūsā and the oath of allegiance and his resigning of it and giving precedence to al-Mahdī, and one of the commanders, whose name he gave, said, "By God, other than Whom there is no god, the deposition of ʿĪsā from it happened only with ʿĪsā's consent, his dependence on dirhams, and his failure to appreciate the importance of the caliphate and his desire to escape it. When the day came when he went out to the deposition and resigned, I was in the maqṣūrah[87] (of the mosque) in the City of Peace when Abū ʿUbaydallāh,[88]

---

86. That is, if al-Mahdī is made heir apparent.

87. An enclosure in the mosque, usually to separate the ruler and his entourage from the people.

88. Abū ʿUbaydallāh Muʿāwiyah b. ʿUbaydallāh was vizier and secretary to al-Mahdī. Originally from Palestine, his father had served the Umayyads (Jāḥiẓ, 126; ʿUyūn, 281). He was attached to al-Mahdī when he was sent to al-Rayy and continued as his vizier after he became caliph. He aroused the jealousy of Yaʿqūb secretary to al-Mahdī, with a group of people of Khurāsān came out and ʿĪsā spoke and said, "I have handed over the position of heir apparent to Muḥammad, son of the Commander of the Faithful, and have given him precedence over me." Abū ʿUbaydallāh said, "It was not like that, may God glorify the Amīr, but tell it in truth and honesty and say what you wanted for it and what you were given." ʿĪsā replied, "Yes, I sold my rights of precedence in the position of heir apparent to ʿAbdallāh, Commander of the Faithful, to his son Muḥammad al-Mahdī for ten million *dirham*s and three hundred thousand to be divided among my children such and such and such (and he named them) and seven hundred thousand to so-and-so (one of his wives, and he named her), with a good heart on my part and desire that it might pass to him because he is most worthy of it and has the most right and strongest claim to [352] it and to undertake it. I do not have any right to precedence over him in big or in little. If ever I claim anything after this day of mine, then I am in the wrong and have no rights in it, no claim and no demand."

He said: Sometimes he forgot one thing or another about that and Abū ʿUbaydallāh reminded him until he finished up. Abū ʿUbaydallāh only sought confirmation and sealed the document and the witnesses witnessed it. I was present until ʿĪsā put his own handwriting and seal on it with the people gathered there. Then they went in from the maqṣūrah to the palace.

He said: The Commander of the Faithful robed ʿĪsā and his son Mūsā and other children of his with robes to the value of over one million, two hundred thousand *dirham*s.

The governorship of ʿĪsā b. Mūsā over al-Kūfah and its Sawād and the area around it lasted thirteen years[89] until al-Manṣūr deposed him and appointed Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī as governor when he refused to give al-Mahdī precedence over himself.

---

b. Dāwūd and of al-Rabīʿ and the mawālī, which eventually led to his fall; he lost his post as vizier in 163/779–80 and as ṣāḥib al-rasāʾil (in charge of correspondence) in 166/782–83. He survived into the reign of Hārūn, when Yaḥyā b. Khālid invited him to return to government, but he declined because of his great age. See below, pp. 199–202, al-Jahshiyārī, 141–57, 179; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 94–103.

89. According to al-Ṭabarī, III, 72, ʿĪsā had been appointed governor of al-Kūfah in 132/750. This would have given him fifteen years as governor.

It is said: Al-Manṣūr only appointed Muḥammad b. Sulaymān as governor when he did because he wanted to humiliate ʿĪsā, but Muḥammad did not do that and continued to treat him highly and to show him respect.

In this year Abū Jaʿfar appointed Muḥammad b. Abī al-ʿAbbās, his brother's son, as governor of al-Baṣrah, but he asked to be excused, so he was, and he left there for the City of Peace and died there. His wife al-Baghūm b. ʿAlī b. al-Rabīʿ shrieked and lamented him. One of the guards struck her with a bridle rein on the posterior, and the servants of Muḥammad b. Abī al-ʿAbbās took turns in beating him until he was killed, and his blood was unavenged. When Muḥammad b. Abī al-ʿAbbās set out from al-Baṣrah he left ʿUqbah b. Salm as his deputy over it, and Abū Jaʿfar confirmed him in charge of it until 151 (January 26, 768–January 13, 769).

Al-Manṣūr led the pilgrimage in this year. In this year his [353]
governor of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif was his paternal uncle ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī, over Medina Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān, over al-Kūfah and its territory Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, over al-Baṣrah ʿUqbah b. Salm with Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh in charge of the judiciary there, and Yazīd b. Ḥātim was in charge of Egypt.[90]

90. B. Qabīṣah b. al-Muhallab: He had been governor of Egypt since 143/760–61. A descendant of the famous al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah, he is said to have been instrumental in saving Abū Jaʿfar's life before the ʿAbbāsid revolution. He was governor of Azerbaijān, Egypt, and, in 154–70 (771–786/7), of Ifrīqiyah, where he died. See also his brother Rawḥ and cousin ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ (al-Ṭabarī, III, 68, 142, 370, 372, 373, 569; al-Kindī, Governors, 111–15; Ibn Idhārī, Bayān, 78–82). Ibn Idhārī gives his date of death as Ramaḍān 171/February–March 788. For the Muhallabids in the early ʿAbbāsid period, see Kennedy, ʿAbbasid Caliphate, 82–83; Crone, Slaves, 133–35.

The Events of the Year

148

(FEBRUARY 27, 765–FEBRUARY 15, 766)

The events of this year:

In this year Al-Manṣūr sent Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah[91] to Armenia to make war on the Turks who had killed Ḥarb b. 'Abdallāh and ravaged Tiflīs. Ḥumayd went to Armenia and found that they had gone, so he left without meeting a single one of them.

In this year Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī[92] made camp at Dābiq,[93] it is said, and did not go on a raid.

---

91. Son of Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb, who had led the 'Abbāsid armies from Khurāsān at the time of the revolution. He had initially supported the rebellion of 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī against al-Manṣūr in 137/754 but was restored to favor, serving briefly as governor of Egypt in 143–45/761–63 and, from 151 until his death in 159 (768–76), as governor of Khurāsān. See al-Ṭabarī, III, 15, 21, 48, 55, 92–93, 369, 459; al-Kindī, Governors, 110; Ḥamzah, 141. For the role of his family in the early 'Abbāsid state, see Kennedy, 'Abbasid Caliphate, 79–80; Crone, Slaves, 188–89.

92. Paternal uncle of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr. He had been active in the 'Abbāsid conquest of Syria and was the leader of the 'Abbāsid force that killed Marwān, the last Umayyad caliph in Egypt. He was briefly in charge of Egypt on two occasions, but most of his career was spent in Syria, where he took over many former Umayyad properties, and on the Byzantine frontier, where he was an active builder of fortifications. He and his family had a celebrated residence at Salamiyyah in central Syria. He was the same age as his nephew al-Manṣūr but died before him, in 152/769. See al-Ṭabarī, III, 48; al-Balādhurī, Buldān, 170, 197; Ibn al-'Adīm, Zubdat, 59–60; al-Kindī, Governors, 102–6. See also Kennedy, 'Abbasid Caliphate, 74–75.

93. An important Muslim base on the Byzantine frontier, north of Aleppo. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 416–17; Le Strange, Palestine, 426.

In this year Ja'far b. Abī Ja'far al-Manṣūr[94] led the pilgrimage, and the governors of the amṣār[95] in this year were the same as in the year before.

---

94. Known as Ja'far the Elder, to distinguish him from his younger brother of the same name. He was at one time considered as a possible rival to al-Mahdī for the succession but died in 150/758 (see below pp. 49, 145–46).

95. Plural of miṣr. The amṣār were originally the towns established by the Muslims in the years immediately after the conquests at al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah and al-Fusṭāṭ. In the early 'Abbāsid period, the term is applied generally to the major provincial capitals.

The Events of the Year

149

(FEBRUARY 16, 766–FEBRUARY 5, 767)

The events of this year:

In this year al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad led the summer raid on the Byzantine lands. With him were al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah[96] and Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, and Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath died on the road.[97]

In this year al-Manṣūr completed the building of the walls of the city of Baghdad and finished with the ditch and all the work.

---

96. Brother of Ḥumayd (see note 91 above). On his father's death, he took over command of the ʿAbbāsid army. The rest of his career was spent in Armenia and on the Byzantine frontier, where he built numerous fortresses and frequently led expeditions against the Greeks. He died in 181/797, full of honor and years, at the age of eighty-four (al-Ṭabarī, III, 17, 95, 353, 493, 495, 646; al-Balādhurī, Buldān, 223). For the family properties in Baghdad, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 140–41.

97. Al-Khuzāʿī. A close colleague of Abū Muslim, he was sent to Ifrīqiyah by Abū Jaʿfar in 144/761, but he was subsequently driven out by a mutiny of his Khurāsānī troops. (al-Ṭabarī, II, 2001, III, 71, 122; Ibn Idhārī, Bayān, 72). In the Leiden edition of al-Ṭabarī, III, 74, his appointment to Ifrīqiyah is wrongly dated to 133. See Crone, Slaves, 184–85

In this year he went to Ḥadīthah[98] of Mosul and then back to the City of Peace. [354]

In this year Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās[99] led the pilgrimage.

In this year ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī was deposed from Mecca, and Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm was appointed as governor.

The governors of the amṣār in this year were the same as those in the years 147 and 148, except for Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif, where the governor in this year was Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās.

---

98. On the east bank of the Tigris, about thirty miles southeast of Mosul. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 230; Le Strange, Lands, 90–91.

99. Son of Ibrāhīm al-Imām, the leader of the ʿAbbāsid family put to death by the Umayyads immediately before the ʿAbbāsid Revolution. He had an unspectacular career, mostly in the Holy Cities. He led the pilgrimage on three occasions in al-Manṣūr's reign (149/757, 151/759, 154/762) and was governor of Medina at the time of the caliph's death (see below, pp 86–87). He died in 185/801.

The Events of the Year 150

(FEBRUARY 6, 767–JANUARY 25, 768)

One of the events of this year was the rebellion of Ustādhsīs[100] with people from Harāt,[101] Bādhghīs,[102] Sijistān[103] and other areas of Khurāsān. They were said to have numbered about 300,000 fighting men and conquered most of Khurāsān and proceeded until they came up against the people of Marw al-Rūdh.[104] Al-

100. Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 457, and Gardīzī, Zayn, 74b, both make it clear that there was a religious aspect to the rebellion and that Ustādhsīs claimed to be a prophet. The independent account in Agapius of Manbij, 'Unwān, 544–45, suggests that there were economic causes, notably a dispute over control of silver mines in Bādhghīs. See Sadighi, Mouvements, 155–62; Kennedy, 'Abbasid Caliphate, 183–84; Daniel, Khurasan, 133–37.

101. Herat, in western Afghanistan.

102. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 318; Le Strange, Lands, 412–15.

103. Or Sīstān, the province of eastern Iran around the delta of the Helmand river, near the modern Iran-Afghanistan frontier. On the history of the area, see Bosworth, Sistan under the Arabs.

104. Marw al-Rūdh lay on the Murghāb river south of Marw, near the modern Soviet-Afghan border. It was an important center of Muslim settlement in the area, and its people has played an important part in the 'Abbāsid Revolution. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 112; Le Strange, Lands, 404–5.

Ajtham al-Marwarrūdhī[105] went out to meet them with the people of Marw al-Rūdh, and they fought him fiercely until al-Ajtham was killed and many of the people of Marw al-Rūdh with him. Ustādhsīs defeated many commanders, including Mu'ādh b. Muslim b. Mu'ādh,[106] Jibra'īl b. Yaḥyā, Ḥammād b. 'Amr,[107] Abū al-Najm al-Sijistānī,[108] and Dāwūd b. Kirāz[109] until al-Manṣūr, who was then at al-Baradān,[110] sent Khāzim b. Khuzaymah[111] to al-Mahdī, who then put him in charge of the campaign against Ustādhsīs and assigned commanders to him. [355]

It is said that Mu'āwiyah b. 'Ubaydallāh, al-Mahdī's vizier, was undermining Khāzim's position. At that time al-Mahdī was in Nishapur.[112] Mu'āwiyah despatched letters to Khāzim b. Khuzaymah and to other commanders giving himself unlimited powers. Khāzim, who was with his army, was ill, but he drank some medicine and rode with the postal service until he reached al-Mahdī in Nishapur. He greeted him and asked to speak with him alone because Abū 'Ubaydallāh was present, but al-Mahdī

105. Otherwise unknown.

106. He later became governor of Khurāsān, 161–63/780–83, but disappears from the record after that. His son Yaḥyā was prominent in the early years of al-Ma'mūn's reign, while another son, al-Ḥusayn, was foster brother to the future caliph al-Hādī, suggesting that Mu'ādh was more important than his brief appearance in the historical record would suggest. (See below, pp 196, 215; Gardīzī, 76b; Ḥamzah, 141; Crone, Slaves, 183–84).

107. Otherwise unknown.

108. Otherwise unknown.

109. Otherwise unknown.

110. On the east bank of the Tigris, about ten miles north of Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 375; Le Strange, Lands, 50.

111. Al-Tamīmī al-Marwarrūdhī, one of the most important figures in the 'Abbāsid Revolution in Khurāsān and subsequently in the army of the early 'Abbāsid caliphate. He led the people of Marw al-Rūdh in support of the 'Abbāsid Revolution and was one of the leaders of the 'Abbāsid armies in Iran and Iraq. In 134/751–52 he took 'Umān for the 'Abbāsids, and in 141/758–59 he was sent with the young al-Mahdī to al-Rayy and played a prominent part in the defeat of the rebel governor 'Abd al-Jabbār al-Azdī; he was governor of Khurāsān on two occasions. He disappears from the record after 151/768. His son Khuzaymah was an important military figure in Hārūn's reign and in the civil war that followed his death (al-Ṭabarī, II, 1959, III, 13, 20, 69, 76–78, 134–35; Ḥamzah 140–41; Crone, Slaves, 180–81; Kennedy, 'Abbasid Caliphate, 81–82).

112. In northeastern Iran, some thirty miles west of Mashhad, and one of the most important cities of Khurāsān in the early Islamic period. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 331–33; Le Strange, Lands, 382–88.

said, "Abū 'Ubaydallāh will not spy on you, so say what is on your mind," but Khāzim refused to tell him or talk to him until Abū 'Ubaydallāh rose and left. When he was alone with him, he complained to him about Mu'āwiyah b. 'Ubaydallāh and his hostility and his prejudice against him and what he was saying in his letters to him and the commanders under him. He explained how they were corrupted, how they acquired a domineering manner, how they tried to be independent in their opinions and became heedless and rather disobedient. Khāzim argued that the war could not be conducted properly without a sole head and that no banner[113] should fly over the head of anyone in the army except his banner or a banner he had given. He also told al-Mahdī that he would not return to fight Ustādhsīs and his men unless he was given complete control and exempted from the authority of Mu'āwiyah b. 'Ubaydallāh. He asked for permission to unfurl the banners of the commanders who were with him, and that al-Mahdī write to them ordering them to obey him.

Al-Mahdī granted him everything he requested and Khāzim departed for his army. He did what he had said and unfurled the banners of the commanders that he deemed wise to unfurl, and he [356] entrusted banners to those he wished. He was joined by those soldiers who had fled, using them as a surplus reinforcement in the rear, just to increase the numbers of the soldiers. He did not put them in the vanguard because of the feelings of fear of defeat that were in the hearts of those who had been defeated; those in this category who joined him numbered 22,000. He then chose 6,000 of the army and joined them to 12,000 specially chosen men who were with him. Bakkār b. Muslim al-'Uqaylī[114] was among those chosen.

Then he prepared for battle; he dug a trench and appointed al-

113. The banner (liwā') was important as a symbol of command of an army or of the governorate of a province. Here it means that Khāzim should have an independent command and be able to choose his own subordinates.

114. He came from a family that had been prominent supporters of the last Umayyad caliph, Marwān, and he himself had been one of the leaders of 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī's rebellion against al-Manṣūr. Despite this, the caliph valued his military expertise and support; he later, in 153/770, became governor of Armenia. See also his brother Isḥāq (al-Ṭabarī, III, 96, 371; Crone, Slaves, 106–7).

Haytham b. Shu'bah b. Ẓuhayr[115] in charge of the right wing and Nahār b. Ḥuṣayn al-Sa'di[116] over the left wing. Bakkār b. Muslim al-'Uqaylī led the vanguard and Turārkhudā[117] was over the rear guard; he was one of the descendants (abnā') of the Persian kings of Khurāsān. His banner was held by al-Zibriqān and his standard by his freedman Bassām.[118] He tricked and deceived the enemy by moving from place to place and trench to trench, so that they were totally exhausted, as most of them were on foot.

Then Khāzim went to a place and stopped there and dug a trench around it. He brought inside it all that he wanted to, including all his companions. He made four gates in it and appointed man from his chosen companions, who were 4,000 strong, in charge of every gate. He assigned to Bakkār b. Muslim, the commander of his vanguard, 2,000 men to supplement the 18,000 he had already.

The other side came, bringing with them spades, axes, and large baskets, intending to fill in the trench and enter it. They reached the trench at the gate that Bakkār b. Muslim was in charge of and attacked it so fiercely that Bakkār's companions had no choice but to flee and they were pursued into the trench by the enemy. When Bakkār saw that, he dismounted and rushed and stood at the gate of the trench and shouted to his companions, "You sons [357] of harlots, the Muslims are attacked from the side I guard!"[119] and there dismounted about fifty of his tribe and family who were with him and they blocked the gate so that they held the enemy back from it.

Then a man from Sijistān called al-Ḥarīsh,[120] who was with 115. Al-Tamīmī, like Khāzim. He had fought under Khāzim's command before and was later to serve his son Khuzaymah (al-Ṭabarī, III, 69, 130, 856).

---

116. Otherwise unknown.

117. The second element of his name, khudā, means "lord" in Persian. The word "kings" (mulūk) is used loosely here to refer to the semi-independent princes and lords of Khurāsān. See Shaban, Political Geography of Khurasan. Turārkhudā himself had been, like Bakkār b. Muslim, a supporter of 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī but is otherwise unknown.

118. Zibriqān is a Persian word meaning either the moon or the man with the little beard. Neither he nor Bassām is recorded elsewhere.

119. Suggesting, of course, that Ustādhsīs' supporters were non-Muslims, a useful clue to the nature of the rebellion.

120. The name means "rough" or "harsh" in Arabic, but it may be either a nickname or a corruption of a Persian word; it is not recorded elsewhere.

Ustādhsīs and was the man who was managing his affairs, came to the gate where Khāzim was. When Khāzim saw him coming, he sent to al-Haytham b. Shu'bah who was on the right wing, saying, "Go out of the gate you are in charge of and take a different route from the one that leads to Bakkār's gate while the enemy is occupied with fighting and attacking us and, when you are behind them and beyond the range of their vision, come upon them from the rear." At that time they were expecting the arrival of Abū 'Awn[121] and 'Amr b. Salm b. Qutaybah[122] from Ṭukhāristān[123] so Khāzim ordered Bakkār, "When you see the banners of al-Haytham b. Shu'bah approaching you from behind, say, 'God is great!' and, 'The people of Ṭukhāristān have arrived!'" So al-Haytham's men did that while Khāzim, with the main body of the army, attacked al-Ḥarīsh al-Sijistānī and engaged in fierce and prolonged sword fighting. While they were locked in combat they saw al-Haytham's banners and shouted to each other, "The people of Ṭukhāristān have come!" and when the people of al-Ḥarīsh and those who were fighting Bakkār saw those standards, Khāzim's men attacked them fiercely and exposed them so that al-Haytham's men attacked them with spears and arrows. Nahār b. Ḥuṣayn and [358] his men from the left and Bakkār b. Muslim and his men from their direction also attacked and they routed them and put them to the sword. The Muslims made a great slaughter and those who were killed in that battle numbered about 70,000 and 14,000 were taken prisoners.

Ustādhsīs took refuge in the mountains with a small number of his companions. Khāzim took the fourteen thousand prisoners and cut off their heads. Then he went and besieged Ustādhsīs in 121. 'Abd al-Malik b. Yazīd al-Azdī, a Khurāsānī from Jurjān who played an important role in the 'Abbāsid Revolution and came west with the 'Abbāsid armies. He was later governor of Egypt, 133–36/751–35 and 137–41/755–58, and of Khurāsān, in c. 159–60/775–77, but was deposed by al-Mahdī for his failure to defeat the rebel al-Muqanna'. He died in 168/784–85. See al-Ṭabarī, III, 38, 48, 72, 459, 477, 536–37, for his relations with al-Mahdī and his son; Gardīzī, Zayn, 74b, 76b, gives him two periods as governor of Khurāsān; Kindī, Governors, 102–5, says he was a mawlā of Hunā'ah of Azd; see Crone, Slaves, 174.

122. Son of Salm b. Qutaybah; see note 27 above; not recorded elsewhere.

123. A district of Khurāsān in the Oxus valley east of Balkh; see Le Strange, Lands, 426–27.

his mountain refuge, and there joined him Abū 'Awn and 'Amr b. Salm b. Qutaybah with their companions at that place. Khāzim settled them in an area and told them to stay where they were until they were needed. Khāzim besieged Ustādhsīs and his companions until they agreed to accept the judgment of Abū 'Awn:[124] they would not accept any other terms and Khāzim agreed to that and ordered Abū 'Awn to allow them to accept his judgment so he did. When they came down to the judgment of Abū 'Awn, he decided that Ustādhsīs and his sons and his household[125] should be secured with irons and that the rest, 30,000 in number, should be released. Khāzim put Abū 'Awn's judgment into effect and gave each of them two garments. Khāzim wrote about the conquests God had given him and the destruction of his enemies to al-Mahdī who in turn wrote to the Commander of the Faithful al-Manṣūr about it.

Muḥammad b. 'Umar[126] mentioned that the rebellion of Ustādhsīs and al-Ḥarīsh took place in the year 150/767 and that Ustādhsīs was defeated in the year 151/768.

In this year al-Manṣūr deposed Ja'far b. Sulaymān from Medina and appointed al-Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. Zayd b. Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.[127]

In it Ja'far b. Abī Ja'far al-Manṣūr the Elder died in Baghdad and his father al-Manṣūr prayed over him. He was buried by night in the cemetery of Quraysh.[128]

There was no summer expedition for the people against the Byzantines in this year: it is said that Abū Ja'far had put Usayd[129] [359]

124. Abū 'Awn was clearly known and trusted by the rebels as no other Muslim leader was, but the sources give no indication as to why this was so.

125. According to other sources (Gardīzī, Zayn, 74b; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IV, 299), Ustādhsīs' daughter Marājil, mother of the future caliph al-Ma'mūn, was among the captives taken to Baghdad on this occasion.

126. Al-Wāqidī.

127. An important and significant move: Al-Ḥasan was an 'Alid who had proved loyal to al-Manṣūr, and there is no doubt that his appointment to Medina, a center of 'Alid support, was a conciliatory gesture. He remained governor until 155/772 and died in 168/784–85.

128. Le Strange, Baghdad, 158, says that this was situated at Kāẓimayn, north of Baghdad, on the west bank.

129. Possibly Usayd (or Asīd) b. 'Abdallāh al-Khuzā'ī (Crone, Slaves, 175–76), but he is said to have been governor of Khurāsān at this time (Ḥamzah, 141). More in charge of the expedition in this year but he did not lead the people to the land of the enemy but stayed in Marj Dābiq.[130]

ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās led the pilgrimage in this year.

The governor of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif was ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās but it is also said that the governor of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif was Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad. The governor of Medina was al-Ḥasan b. Zayd al-ʿAlawī. The governor of al-Kūfah was Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī and of al-Baṣrah ʿUqbah b. Salm, with Sawwār[131] in charge of the judiciary, and the governor of Egypt was Yazīd b. Ḥātim.

---

likely this is a mistake for Yazīd b. Usayd al-Sulamī (see note 190 below), as Brooks suggests ("Byzantines and Arabs", 734).

130. The fertile meadows and pastures around Dābiq (see note 93, above), which were frequently used as a base for Muslim raids.

131. Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh, d. 157/773–74, was qāḍī of al-Baṣrah for many years.

The Events of the Year

151

(JANUARY 26, 768–JANUARY 13, 769)

Among the events of this year was the seaborne attack on Jeddah by the Kurk[132] mentioned by Muḥammad b. ʿUmar.

In this year ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ b. ʿUthmān b. Abī Ṣufrah[133] was appointed governor of Ifrīqiyah. He was deposed from Sind and replaced by Hishām b. ʿAmr al-Taghlibī.[134]

The circumstances of the deposition of ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ from Sind and his appointment as governor of Ifrīqiyah, and of the appointment of Hishām b. ʿAmr as governor of Sind.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī al-ʿAbbāsī [360]
—his father: The reason for that was that al-Manṣūr had appointed

---

132. Pirates of unknown origin. See Omar, ʿAbbasid Caliphate, 319.

133. A member of the Muhallabī family (see note 90 above). He had been governor of Sind since 142/759–60. He remained governor of Ifrīqiyah until he was killed by the Berbers and the Khārijites in an uprising in 153/770 (al-Ṭabarī, III, 139, 370; al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 232; Ibn Idhārī, Bayān, 75–76).

134. A chief of the Jazīrah tribe of Taghlib, he is said to have secured the allegiance of Mosul to the ʿAbbāsids at the time of the revolution. According to Yaʿqūbī (Tārīkh, II, 448), he conquered Multan and died soon after his return from Sind in 157/773–74 (al-Ṭabarī, III, 47, 380).

'Umar b. Ḥafṣ al-Ṣufrī, called Hazārmard[135] to Sind. He remained there until the rebellions of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh in Medina and Ibrāhīm in al-Baṣrah. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh sent his son 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad who was known as al-Ashtar,[136] with some members of the Zaydiyyah[137] to Baṣrah and ordered them to buy the foals of excellent horses and take them with them to Sind so that Muḥammad could use them as a means to reach 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ. He did this because 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ was one of Abū Ja'far commanders who had taken the oath of allegiance to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh, as he was a sympathizer of the family of Abū Ṭālib.

They went to Ibrāhīm b. 'Abdallāh in al-Baṣrah and bought foals from there. There is nothing in the land of Sind and Hind[138] more valuable than good horses. They traveled by sea until they reached Sind and then they went to 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ and said to him, "We are horse dealers and have some excellent horses with us," and he ordered them to show their horses so they showed them to him. When they came to him one of them said to him, "Come near me and I will tell you something," so he came near and he went on, "We have brought you something that is better for you than the horses and that has in it for you all the best of his world and the next. Give us a guarantee on two points: that you accept what we bring you or that you will conceal it and refrain from making it public until we leave your country on our return journey." He gave them the guarantee and they said, "We did not come to you because of the horses but we have here the son of the Prophet of God, 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan who has been sent to you by his father who has come out in rebellion in Medina and proclaimed himself Caliph. His brother Ibrāhīm has

135. The name means "thousand men" in Persian, but it is not clear why he was so called.

136. The word is applied to someone who has either an inversion of the eyelid or a split bottom lip (see Lane, s.v. shtr).

137. The Zaydiyyah were originally followers of Zayd b. 'Alī, who rebelled unsuccessfully in al-Kūfah against the Umayyads in 122/740. They continued in existence as a small group of 'Alid activists, based mostly in al-Kūfah, and they supported all the main 'Alid rebellions of the early 'Abbāsid period (see Kennedy, 'Abbasid Caliphate, 203–9).

138. Sind was the Muslim province on the lower Indus, roughly equivalent to the modern province of Sind in Pakistan. Hind was used in a more general sense for the neighboring parts of the Indian subcontinent not under Muslim rule.

risen in al-Baṣrah and taken it over." He said, "You are most welcome," and he took the oath of allegiance to him from them and ordered him to be concealed with him. [361]

Then he called the people of his household, his commanders and the great men of the town to take the oath of allegiance and they accepted. He cut up white standards, white turbans and white *qalansūwah*s and on Thursday he prepared white garments in which to go up to the pulpit. On Wednesday there came a boat from Baṣrah with a messenger of Khulaydah bint al-Mu'ārik, wife of 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ with a letter telling him of the killing of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh. He went to 'Abdallāh, told him the news and consoled him and said to him, "I have sworn the oath of allegiance to your father and now this had happened." 'Abdallāh said, "My activities are now notorious and my position well-known and my safety is your responsibility so look after yourself or leave." 'Umar replied, "I have a suggestion to make: there is here one of the Kings of Sind with a great kingdom and following. He is, despite his polytheism, a great admirer of the Prophet of God and he is a trustworthy man. I will write to him and make an agreement between you and him and send you to him to stay with him, and you will be beyond reach with him." 'Abdallāh replied, "Do as you wish." So he did that and he went to the king who was very generous to him and showed him great kindness. The Zaydiyyah escaped to join him until there were about 400 "people of perspicacity"[139] with him and he used to go out riding and hunting among them and he amused himself in the manner of kings and their families.

When Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm were killed, news of 'Abdallāh al-Ashtar reached al-Manṣūr and he was worried about it so he wrote to 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ, informing him what he had heard. 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ gathered his kin and read al-Manṣūr's letter to them and told them that if he admitted the story, al-Manṣūr would not hesitate to depose him and if he went to him, he would kill him and if he refused he would make war on him. Then one of his kin said, "Put the blame on me and write to him telling him about me. Arrest me immediately, put me in chains and throw me into [362] prison. If he writes that I should be sent to him, send me to him. He will not dare to take action against me because of your position in Sind and the status of your family in Baṣrah." 'Umar replied, "I fear things may not turn out as you think." "If I am killed," the man said, "I will be a sacrifice for you, and I am pleased to be a sacrifice for you, and if I am spared that is God's will." So 'Umar ordered him to be chained and imprisoned and he wrote to al-Manṣūr about that. Al-Manṣūr wrote back ordering 'Umar to send the man to him and he arrived; he was brought before him and he was executed.

139. Ahl al-baṣā'ir, presumably the description they adopted for themselves.

Al-Manṣūr continued to think whom he might appoint as governor of Sind. He would begin to talk of someone and then change his mind. One day he was going along with Hishām b. 'Amr al-Taghlibī and al-Manṣūr observed him in his retinue when he went off to his house. When he had thrown off his robe, al-Rabī' came in and announced Hishām. Al-Manṣūr said, "Has he not just been with me?" and al-Rabī' replied, "He said that he has a request that has become important." So he called for a chair and installed himself on it and then he gave Hishām permission to enter. When he appeared before him he said, "Commander of the Faithful, when I left the retinue and went to my house, my sister, so-and-so, daughter of 'Amr, met me. I saw her beauty, her intelligence and her piety which would please the Commander of the Faithful, so I came to offer her as a gift to him." Al-Manṣūr bowed his head and began to scratch the ground with a cane he had in his hand. "You may go," he said, "and my decision will reach you later." When he left he said, "Al-Rabī', if it were not for a verse of Jarīr's[140] about the Banū Taghlib, I would marry his sister. This was Jarīr's verse:

Do not seek maternal unclehood among the Taghlib;
even the Zanj are more high-bred than they as maternal uncles.

I am afraid she will bear me a son who will be taunted with this verse. But go out and say to him, 'The Commander of the Faithful says, "I would not refuse you any request except marriage, and, if I had need to marry, I would accept what you offered me, so may [363] God reward you for the good you intended to do for him. Instead of that I have given you the governorate of Sind." ' He ordered him to write to the king commanding him to hand over 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad and, if he did not obey, to make war on him. He also wrote to 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ appointing him governor of Ifrīqiyah.

140. Jarīr b. 'Aṭiyyah al-Tamīmī, d.c. 110/728–29, the celebrated poet of Umayyad times, active at the courts of al-Ḥajjāj and 'Abd al-Malik and famous for his invective against his great rival al-Farazdaq; see EI^{2}, s.v. "Djarīr."

Hishām b. 'Amr al-Taghlibī left for Sind as governor, and 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ began to make his way through the provinces to Ifrīqiyah. When Hishām b. 'Amr reached Sind, he was extremely reluctant to capture 'Abdallāh and pretended to people that he was writing to the king and treating him gently. Abū Ja'far heard about this and he began to write to urge him into action. While this was going on, a group of rebels rose up in a certain part of Sind, so Hishām sent his brother Safannajā against the rebels. He led his army out and his route lay along the borders of that kingdom, and while he was going there appeared a cloud of dust that arose from a troop of horsemen. Safannajā thought that it was the advance guard of the enemy he was attacking, so he sent out scouts.

When they returned, they said, "This is not the enemy you are looking for but 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad al-Ashtar al-'Alawī riding for pleasure along the banks of the Indus." Safannajā went to meet him, and his advisers said to him, "This is the son of the Prophet of God. You know that your brother is leaving him alone intentionally for fear of shedding his blood. He has not come to attack you but only for pleasure and you have come out seeking someone else; so turn away from him." Safannajā replied, "I will not leave him for any other to capture him, and I will not give up the prospect of gaining favor with al-Manṣūr by taking him and killing him."

He was with ten men, so he rushed toward him and urged on his companions and he attacked him. 'Abdallāh fought and his companions fought in front of him until 'Abdallāh and all his companions were killed and not a single one of them escaped to take the news and he was among the slain. His fate was not known, but it is said that his companions hurled him into the [364] Indus when he was killed so that his head would not be taken.[141]

141. As a trophy and sent to al-Manṣūr.

Hishām b. 'Amr wrote a victory letter about this to al-Manṣūr, telling him that he had attacked 'Abdallāh vigorously, so al-Manṣūr wrote back, praising his conduct and ordering him to make war on the king who had given 'Abdallāh refuge. This was because 'Abdallāh had taken slave girls when he was staying with that king, and one of them had given birth to a son, Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh, Abū al-Ḥasan Muḥammad al-'Alawī, who was known as Ibn al-Ashtar. So Hishām made war on the king until he had conquered his kingdom and killed him. The slave girl of al-Ashtar and her son were sent to al-Manṣūr. Al-Manṣūr wrote to his governor of Medina,[142] telling him that the boy was of true descent. He sent the boy to him and ordered that he should gather all the family of Abū Ṭālib and read them his letter about the true descent of the boy and hand him over to his relations.

In this year al-Manṣūr's son al-Mahdī came to him from Khurāsān in the month of Shawwāl (October 18–November 15, 768). There came to meet him and welcome him many members of his family from Syria, al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah, and other places. Al-Mahdī rewarded them, gave them robes, and was generous to them, and al-Manṣūr did the same for them. He appointed some of them as courtiers (ṣaḥābah)[143] for al-Mahdī and assigned each of them an allowance of five hundred dirhams.

In this year al-Manṣūr began the building of al-Ruṣāfah[144] on the east side of the City of Peace for his son Muḥammad al-Mahdī.

The reasons for building it.

According to Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Sharawī—his father:
[365] When al-Mahdī came from Khurāsān, al-Manṣūr ordered him to stay on the east bank (of the Tigris) and built al-Ruṣāfah for him, making a wall, a moat, a square,[145] and a garden and he brought water to it. The water used to run from the River of al-Mahdī to al-Ruṣāfah.[146]

---

142. At this time the 'Alid, al-Ḥasan b. Zayd.

143. Ṣaḥābah were advisers and friends permanently attached to an important figure and given salaries. They were often poets and scholars, as opposed to important political or military figures.

144. Al-Ruṣāfah was to form the nucleus of the developments on the east bank of the river. Le Strange, Baghdad, 187–98. See also note 54, above.

145. Maydān implies a large open space for horse racing and polo, a smaller piazza would have been called a raḥbah.

146. A branch of the Khāliṣ Canal; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 175.

According to Khālid b. Yazīd b. Wahb b. Jarīr b. Khāzim—Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās[147]—his father: When the Rāwandiyyah rioted against Abū Jaʿfar and did battle with him at the Golden Gate,[148] Qutham b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās,[149] who was at that time a very old man, respected by the people, came in to him. Abū Jaʿfar said to him, "What is your opinion about the situation we are in concerning the slowness of the army to help us? I am afraid that they will agree together and this power will slip from our hands. What do you think?"

He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, I have an idea but if I explain it to you it will not work, but if you let me I will go ahead with it, and your caliphate will be made secure for you and your soldiers will be in awe of you." The caliph asked, "Are you going ahead with a plan for my caliphate that you will not tell me about?"

He said, "If you think I am suspect in regard to your state, do not ask my opinion, but if you think I am faithful to it let me go ahead with my idea."

Al-Manṣūr said, "Go ahead."

Qutham went to his lodging and called a page of his and said to him, "When tomorrow comes, go ahead of me and sit in the palace of the Commander of the Faithful. When you see that I have entered and am in the middle of the people of rank (aṣḥāb al-marātib),[150] take hold of the bridle of my mule and stop me and entreat me, by the Prophet of God, by al-ʿAbbās, and by the Commander of the Faithful, to halt, to hear your request, and to fulfill it for you. I will chide you and speak harshly to you, but do not let that make you frightened of me but repeat your request, [366] and I will curse you, but do not let that intimidate you but repeat 147. For Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, see note 99, above.

148. The Rāwandiyyah rioted in 141/758–59, three or four years before the beginning of work on Baghdad (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 129–30). The Golden Gate, or Bāb al-Dhahab, was one of the names given to al-Manṣūr's palace in the Round City in Baghdad; see also note 391 below.

149. A distant cousin of the caliph's who was governor of al-Yamāmah in eastern Arabia for many years, until his death in 159/775–76.

150. In formal audiences courtiers lined up in order of precedence or rank before the caliph your speech and request to me, and I will hit you with my whip, but let that not be unbearable and say to me, 'Which tribe is more noble, al-Yaman or Muḍar?'[151] and when I answer you, let go of the bridle of my mule and you will be a free man."

The page left early in the morning and sat where he had ordered him in the palace of the caliph and, when the old man came, the page did as his master had ordered, and his master did as he had said he would and then he said to him, "Speak!" and he asked, "Which of the two tribes is more noble, al-Yaman or Muḍar?"

Qutham said, "Muḍar among which was the Prophet of God and in which is the Book of God and the House of God (the Ka'bah) and among which is the caliph of God."

Al-Yaman were resentful that he had mentioned nothing of their honor and one of the commanders of al-Yaman said to him, "The matter is not absolutely like that, with no honor or merit in al-Yaman." Then the Yamanī commander said to his page, "Get up and take the bridle of the old man's mule and restrain it forcibly until he is lowered down."

The page did as his master ordered him, so that he almost brought it down on its hamstrings. Muḍar were annoyed about this and said, "Is he doing this to our old man (shaykh)?" and one of them ordered his page "Cut off the hand of the slave," so he came up to the Yamanī's page and cut off his hand. The two tribes began to quarrel and Qutham sent away his mule and went in to Abū Ja'far. The army split into groups, Muḍar being a group, al-Yaman another, the Khurāsāniyyah[152] another, and Rabī'ah another, and Qutham said to Abū Ja'far, "I have split your army into groups and divided them into parties, each one fearing that, if it does any evil to you, you will strike it with the other. It remains to you to organize the rest."

---

151. Muḍar, al-Yaman, and Rabī'ah were the large groupings to which Arab tribes were traditionally assigned. Under the Umayyad caliphate these divisions had become a major source of conflict, and this continued, though to a lesser extent, under the 'Abbāsids. The word used for tribe here is ḥayy, while the smaller tribes that made up the group might be called qabīlah (pl. qabā'il), but the usages are not always consistent (cf. EI[2], s.v. "Ḥayy," where it is defined as the smallest unit).

152. Interestingly, the Khurāsāniyyah are considered here as a group with a separate indentity, though many of them in fact came from Arab tribes attached in theory to one of the other groups.

Al-Manṣūr asked, "What is that?" and he replied, "Cross your [367] son over and settle him on the other side (of the Tigris) in a palace and move him over and move over some of your army with him, and make that a town and this a town. If the people of this side turn against you, you can strike them with the people of the other side, and, if the people of the other side turn against you, you can strike them with the people of this side. If Muḍar turn against you, you can strike them with al-Yaman and Rabī'ah and the Khurāsāniyyah, and, if al-Yaman turn against you you can strike them with Muḍar and others who obey you."

He accepted his idea and opinion, and his power was firmly established. This was the reason for building on the east side and in al-Ruṣāfah and the granting of property to commanders there.

Ṣāliḥ Ṣāḥib al-Muṣallā[153] was put in charge of the plots on the east side, and he did as Abū al-'Abbās al-Ṭūsī had done about distributing the remaining[154] plots on the west bank. He had for himself building plots at the Gate of the Bridge, the market of Yaḥyā, the mosque of Khuḍayr and in al-Ruṣāfah and the Road of the Skiffs on the Tigris,[155] which he asked for as a gift from the plots that were undistributed among owners. Ṣāliḥ came from the people of Khurāsān.

In this year al-Manṣūr caused the oath of allegiance to himself, to his son Muḥammad al-Mahdī after him, and to 'Īsā b. Mūsā after al-Mahdī to be renewed by all the people of his family in his audience on Friday. He gave them a general permission to enter, and every one who took the oath to him kissed his hand and the hand of al-Mahdī and then pressed the hand of 'Īsā b. Mūsā but did not kiss it.

In this year 'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad led the summer raid (against the Byzantines).

---

153. A high-ranking palace servant; from his title he would seem to have been in charge of the caliph's oratory, but he seems actually to have been employed extensively as a financial administrator, and (p. 82, below) he was a friend of Khālid b. Barmak. He served al-Mahdī, Hārūn, and al-Amīn and is last recorded in 202/817–18, among the opponents of al-Ma'mūn in Baghdad (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 1016).

154. See note 21, above.

155. Le Strange, Baghdad, 197–99. The word for skiffs is zawāriq (sing., zawraq).

In this year 'Uqbah b. Salm left al-Baṣrah, where he left his son Nāfi' b. 'Uqbah in charge, for al-Baḥrayn[156] and killed Sulaymān [368] b. Ḥakīm al-'Abdī[157] and took prisoner the people of al-Baḥrayn. He sent some of those he captured and made prisoner to Abū Ja'far, who killed some of them and gave the rest to al-Mahdī, who was generous to them, released them, and attired each of them with two Marw cloaks. Then 'Uqbah b. Salm was deposed from al-Baṣrah.

According to Afrīk, the slave girl of Asad b. al-Marzbān: Al-Manṣūr sent Asad b. al-Marzbān to 'Uqbah b. Salm to al-Baḥrayn when he executed those he executed to investigate his affairs. Asad got on well with 'Uqbah and did not examine him in depth and did not expose him fully. Abū Ja'far heard about this and that Asad had taken money from him so he sent Abū Suwayd al-Khurāsānī,[158] a friend and brother of his, to him. When Asad saw him coming on the post, he was happy. He was in the neighborhood of 'Uqbah's camp and greeted him and said, "My friend." Abū Suwayd stopped by him, and he jumped up to stand by him. Abū Suwayd said (in Persian) "Sit down, sit down," so he sat down and he asked, "Are you heeding and obeying?" "Yes," replied Asad. "Stretch out your hand." So he stretched it out and Abū Suwayd struck it and cut if off. Then he stretched out his leg. then his hand, and then his leg until all four were cut off. Then he said, "Stretch out your neck," so he stretched it out, and his head was cut off. Afrīk said: I took his head and kept it, but he took it from me and brought it to Abū Ja'far. Afrīk never again ate meat until her death.

Al-Wāqidī claimed that Abū Ja'far appointed Ma'n b. Zā'idah[159] to Sijistān in this year.

---

156. Al-Baḥrayn at this time referred not just to the island now known by that name but also to the mainland areas opposite (around modern Dhahran). The island itself was called Uwāl at this time; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 274, 346–49.

157. Nothing else is known of him. He came from 'Abd al-Qays, an Arab tribe powerful in al-Baḥrayn since pre-Islamic times.

158. According to Balādhurī, he was sent by 'Uqbah b. Salm on the orders of Abū Ja'far. Ibn al-Athīr says that his son Suwayd was governor of al-Baḥrayn in 169/785–86.

159. Al-Shaybānī, an almost legendary figure at the court of al-Manṣūr, many picturesque anecdotes were recorded about him. He had supported the Umayyads at the time of the 'Abbāsid Revolution and claimed to have killed Qaḥṭabah,

The leader of the pilgrims in this year was Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās. The governor of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif was Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm. Al-Ḥasan b. Zayd was in charge of Medina, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī of al- [369] Kūfah, Jābir b. Tūbah al-Kilābī[160] of al-Baṣrah, with Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh over the judiciary, and Yazīd b. Ḥātim was over Egypt.

---

leader of the ʿAbbāsid armies. Al-Manṣūr restored him to favor as a reward for his help against the Rāwandiyyah rebels. He was later appointed as governor of Yemen in 142/759–60 and Sīstān in 151/768 and was assassinated in the latter in the next year. He was important as a patron of poets, notably Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah, and as a symbol of old Arab bedouin qualities (al-Ṭabarī, II, 16, 63, 129–30, 368, 369, 394–97; ʿUyūn, 229, 264; Yaʿqūbī, Tārīkh, II, 448, 462, Crone, Slaves, 169–70; EI^{2}, s.v. "Maʿn b. Zāʾidah."

160. According to Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 322, he had sent Abū Jaʿfar to al-Baṣrah to oppose the ʿAlid revolt of 145/762–63, he is otherwise unknown.

The Events of the Year

152

(JANUARY 14, 769–JANUARY 3, 770)

Among these was the assassination of Ma'n b. Zā'idah al-Shaybānī by the Khawārij in Bust[161] in Sijistān.

In this year Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah raided Kābul.[162] Al-Manṣūr had appointed him governor of Khurāsān in 152.

It is said that 'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm led the summer expedition but that he did not go through the passes. It is also said that Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm led the summer expedition in this year.

In this year al-Manṣūr dismissed Jābir b. Tūbah from al-Baṣrah and appointed Yazīd b. Manṣūr[163] as governor.

---

161. One of the most important towns in Sīstān, on the Helmand river, some sixty miles west of Kandahar in the south of modern Afghanistan; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 414–19; Le Strange, Lands, 344–45.

162. Capital of modern Afghanistan. Although repeatedly raided by the Muslims, Kābul was never incorporated permanently into the caliphate.

163. He was al-Mahdī's maternal uncle, brother to Arwā, wife of al-Manṣūr and mother of al-Mahdī and Ja'far the elder. He came from Yemen, of which he was later governor. He was a close adviser to al-Mahdī as caliph but died in 163/779–80.

In this year Abū Ja'far killed Hāshim b. al-Ishtākhanj,[164] who had mutinied and raised a rebellion in Ifrīqiyah. He and Abū Khālid al-Marwarrūdhī[165] were brought to Abū Ja'far, and he killed Ibn al-Ishtākhanj at Qādisiyyah[166] while he was on the way to Mecca.

The leader of the pilgrims in this year was al-Manṣūr. It is said that he set out from the City of Peace in the month of Ramaḍān and that neither Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, his governor of al-Kūfah at that time, nor 'Īsā b. Mūsā nor anyone else in al-Kūfah knew that he had set out until he was nearly there.

In this year Yazīd b. Ḥātim was dismissed from Egypt, and [370]
Muḥammad b. Sa'īd was appointed as governor.[167]

The governors of the main cities (amṣār) in this year were the same as in the previous year except al-Baṣrah, where the governor was Yazīd b. Manṣūr, and Egypt, where the governor in this year was Muḥammad b. Sa'īd.

---

164. Otherwise unknown except for a reference in Jāḥiẓ, Manāqib al-Turk, where the Khurāsāniyyah boast of his prowess.

165 From Marw al-Rūdh in Khurāsān, an early supporter of the 'Abbāsid Revolution, he and the Marwarrūdhiyyah had a quarter in Baghdad. He and Hāshim seem to have represented "rank and file" opinion among the Khurāsāniyyah, and neither held government office. Abū Khālid survived this incident and was one of the leaders of the Khurāsāniyyah who demanded the removal of 'Īsā b. Mūsā from the succession. He is last recorded in 171/787–88, but his son Muḥammad was to be one of the leaders of the Khurāsāniyyah in the civil wars that followed the death of Hārūn (al-Ṭabarī, II, 2004, III, 21, 455, 606; Yāqūbī, Buldān, 247)

166. About ten miles southeast of al-Kūfah on the road to Mecca (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 391–93; Le Strange, Lands, 76).

167. The governors of Egypt given by al-Ṭabarī at this period differ from those recorded by the local historian al-Kindī. It seems that al-Ṭabarī recorded the names given in the records of the financial administration in Baghdad, whereas al-Kindī gives those of the prayer leaders and military commanders; see Kennedy, "Provincial Elites," 33–34, n. 46.

The Events of the Year 153

(JANUARY 4, 770–DECEMBER 23, 770)

In this year al-Manṣūr prepared a naval expedition to fight the Kurk when he reached al-Baṣrah, returning from Mecca after completing the pilgrimage. The Kurk had sacked Jeddah and when he reached al-Baṣrah in this year he prepared an army to fight them. It is said that he stayed at the Great Bridge when he was there.[168] This was his last visit to al-Baṣrah, although it is said that his last visit was in 155 (771–72); his first visit was in 145 (752–53). He stayed there for forty days and built a palace before he left for the City of Peace.

In this year al-Manṣūr was angry with Abū Ayyūb al-Mūryānī[169] and imprisoned him and his brother and his brother's sons, Sa'īd, Mas'ūd, Mukhallad, and Muḥammad, and demanded restitution 168. Great Bridge at al-Baṣrah.

169. Sulaymān b. Ayyūb, from the village of Mūryān in Khūzistān. A confidant and adviser to al-Manṣūr, he had helped plan the assassination of Abū Muslim. He became vizier, and he and his family amassed vast estates and had a bad reputation for taking bribes and financial oppression (al-Ṭabarī, III, 108; al-Jahshiyārī, 97–121; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 78–87).

from them. Their dwellings were at al-Manāthir. It is said that the reason for his anger against him was the intrigue of Abān b. Ṣadaqah, Abū Ayyūb's secretary, against him.

In this year 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ b. 'Uthmān b. Abī Ṣufrah was killed in Ifrīqiyah by Abū Ḥātim al-'Ibāḍi and Abū 'Ād and those Berbers who were with them. It was said that they were 350,000 in number, of whom 35,000 were horsemen. Abū Qurrah al-Ṣufrī was with them with 40,000 men; forty days previously he had been acknowledged as caliph.[170] [371]

In this year 'Abbād, freedman of al-Manṣūr, Harthamah b. A'yan, and Yūsuf b. 'Ulwān[171] were brought from Khurāsān in chains because of their support for 'Īsā b. Mūsā.

In this year al-Manṣūr urged the people to wear extremely tall qalansūwahs,[172] which they used to keep up, it was said, by putting canes inside. Abū Dulāmah[173] said,

We used to look to the imām for increase (in donations)
but so the chosen imām increased qalansūwahs.
You will see them on the heads of men looking like a Jew's wine jugs covered with cloaks.

In this year 'Ubayd b. bt. Abī Laylā,[174] judge of al-Kūfah, died and was replaced by Sharīk b. 'Abdallāh al-Nakha'ī.[175]

The leader of the summer expedition this year was Ma'yūf b.

---

170. Abū Ḥātim, Abū 'Ād, and Abū Qurrah were the Khārijite leaders of this largely Berber rebellion (Ibn Idhārī, Bayān, 74–75; Kennedy, 'Abbasid Caliphate, 187–91).

171. Neither 'Abbād nor Yūsuf is recorded elsewhere. Harthamah b. A'yan was to achieve great power as a trusted servant of Hārūn and played a central role in the civil war that followed Hārūn's death (Crone, Slaves, 177–78).

172. See above, note 52.

173. Zand b. al-Jawn, d. ca. 160/776–77; he was a sort of court jester for the first three 'Abbāsid caliphs, famous for his outrageous humor and doubtful religious views. He is also quoted in al-Ṭabarī, III, 541. See Aghānī, Būlāq, IX, 120; Beirut, X, 247; EI^{2}, s.v. "Abū Dulāma."

174. That is 'Ubayd, son of the daughter of Abū Laylā. Ibn Abī Laylā was qāḍī of al-Kūfah under the last Umayyads and was reappointed by 'Īsā b. Mūsā after the 'Abbāsid Revolution. For the family, see EI^{2}, s.v. "Ibn Abī Laylā," but nothing more seems to be known of 'Ubayd.

175. Born in Bukhārā in 75/694–95, died in Ahwāz, where he was qāḍī, in 177/793–94 (Ibn Khallikan, I, 622). Later, it seems, he combined the offices of qāḍī and governor in al-Kūfah, most unusual for this period (see below, pp. 168–69).

Yaḥyā al-Ḥajūrī.[176] He attacked a Byzantine fortress by night when its inhabitants were asleep. He captured the garrison and took them prisoner before going on to Burnt Laodiceia,[177] which he took, taking 6,000 prisoners beside mature men.

In this year al-Manṣūr appointed Bakkār b. Muslīm al-ʿUqaylī governor of Armenia.

Muḥammad al-Mahdī, son of Abū Jaʿfar, led the pilgrimage this year.

At that time Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm was in charge of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif, al-Ḥasan b. Zayd b. al-Ḥasan of Medina, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān of al-Kūfah, Yazīd b. Manṣūr of al-Baṣrah, with Sawwār [372] in charge of the judiciary there, and Muḥammad b. Saʿīd was in charge of Egypt. Al-Wāqidī mentioned that Yazīd b. Manṣūr was governor of Yemen for Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr in this year.

176. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 734; Maʿyūf led the summer expedition again in 158/775 and 169/785–86 and a naval raid on Cyprus in 191/807. Ḥajūr was a branch of Ḥamdān, well established in Syria (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 385, 568, 711).

177. Laodikeia Katakekaumene, northwest of Iconium, on the road to Amorion.

The Events of the Year

154

(DECEMBER 24, 770–DECEMBER 12, 771)

Among these was the expedition of al-Manṣūr to Syria and his visit to Jerusalem. He sent Yazīd b. Ḥātim to Ifrīqiyah with 50,000 men, it was said, to fight the Khawārij who were there and who killed his governor 'Umar b. Ḥafṣ. It was said that he spent 63,000,000 dirhams on that army.

In this year, it is said, al-Manṣūr decided on the building of the city of al-Rāfiqah.[178]

According to Muḥammad b. Jābir—his father: When Abū Ja'far wished to build it, the people of al-Raqqah opposed him and wanted to make war on him, saying that it would ruin their markets, take away their livelihood, and reduce the size of their dwellings. He was anxious about fighting them and sent to a monk in a monastery there and asked him if he had any knowledge that a man would build a city there. He replied that he had been informed

178. On the Euphrates by al-Raqqah, it soon merged with the older city, and the whole became known as al-Raqqah; for the design of the city and outlines of the walls, which are still visible, see Creswell, Early Muslim Architecture, II.

that a man called Miqlāṣ would build it, so al-Manṣūr said, "I, by God, am Miqlāṣ."[179]

Muḥammad b. 'Umar (al-Wāqidī) mentioned that a thunderbolt fell this year in the Mosque of the Ḥarām,[180] killing five people.

In this year Abū Ayyūb al-Mūryānī and his brother Khālid perished. Al-Manṣūr ordered Mūsā b. Dīnār,[181] the chamberlain of Abū al-'Abbās al-Ṭūsī, to cut off the hands of the nephews of Abū Ayyūb and their legs and their heads, and he wrote to that effect to al-Mahdī. Mūsā did that and carried out what he had been ordered to do to them.

[373] In this year 'Abd al-Malik b. Ẓabyān al-Numayrī[182] was appointed governor of al-Baṣrah.

Zufar b. 'Āsim al-Hilālī[183] led the summer expedition in this year and reached the Euphrates.

Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm led the pilgrims this year; he was Abū Ja'far's governor of Mecca and al-Ṭā'if. Al-Ḥasan b. Zayd was governor of Medina, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān of al-Kūfah, 'Abd al-Malik b. Ayyūb b. Ẓabyān was in charge of al-Baṣrah, with Sawwār b. 'Abdallāh (in charge) of its judiciary, Hishām b. 'Amr was in charge of Sind, Yazīd b. Ḥātim of Ifrīqiyah and Muḥammad b. Sa'īd of Eygpt.

---

179. This prophecy also appears in connection with the foundation of Baghdad and is discussed in Lassner, 'Abbasid Rule, 164–65. The word miqlāṣ is said to mean a "fat she-camel." See Lane, s.v. qlṣ.

180. In Mecca.

181. Unknown elsewhere.

182. Properly 'Abd al-Malik b. Ayyūb b. Ẓabyān. He was briefly governor of al-Baṣrah a second time in 159/775–76 but is not recorded elsewhere.

183. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 734; Zufar's father had been governor of Armenia for the Umayyad caliph Marwān b. Muḥammad. He himself joined the rebellion of 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī against al-Manṣūr. He led the ṣā'ifah several times and was governor of Medina in 160–63/776–80 and, according to Azdī, Tārīkh, 243–44, briefly of al-Jazīrah thereafter (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 94, 378, 482, 500; Crone, Slaves, 166).

The Events of the Year

155

(December 13, 771–December 1, 772)

Among these was Yazīd b. Ḥātim's conquest of Ifrīqiyah and his killing of Abū ʿĀd and Abū Ḥātim and their supporters. The lands of the Maghrib became peaceful, and Yazīd b. Ḥātim entered Qayrawān.[184]

In this year al-Manṣūr sent his son al-Mahdī to build the city of al-Rāfiqah. He went there and built it with the same gates, arcades (fuṣūl), squares, and streets as Baghdad. He built the walls and dug the moat and then departed for his city.[185]

In this year, according to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar, Abū Jaʿfar dug moats around al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah and constructed walls for them.[186] He paid for the expenses of the walls and moats out of the wealth of their inhabitants.

In this year al-Manṣūr dismissed ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ayyūb b.

---

184. See Ibn Idhārī, Bayān, 78–82, for a fuller account.

185. I.e., al-Rusāfah. In what sense the plan of al-Rāfiqah resembled that of Baghdad is not clear; certainly the surviving walls show an irregular plan very different from the round plan of Baghdad.

186. These towns seem to have been unfortified before this date.

Ẓabyān from al-Baṣrah and appointed as governor al-Haytham b Mu'āwiyah al-'Atakī[187] and attached Sa'īd b. Da'laj to him.[188]
[374] He ordered him to build walls to surround the city and a moat outside the walls using the wealth of its people, so he did this.

It is said that, when al-Manṣūr wanted to order the building of the walls of al-Kūfah and the digging of the moat, he ordered that each of the people of al-Kūfah should be given five *dirham*s to find out how many there were of them. When he knew the number, he ordered forty *dirham*s to be collected from each person, and when this was done he directed that the money should be spent on the walls of al-Kūfah and the digging of the moat. Their poet said:

O my people, look what came to us from the Commander of the Faithful.
He distributed five to us and collected forty.

In this year the Byzantine emperor sought peace from al-Manṣūr on condition that he paid the poll tax.[189]

The leader of the summer expedition in this year was Yazīd b. Usayd al-Sulamī.[190]

In this year al-Manṣūr dismissed his brother al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad from al-Jazīrah, fined him heavily, was angry with him, and imprisoned him.

According to one of the Banū Hāshim: Al-Manṣūr appointed al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad as governor of al-Jazīrah after Yazīd b.

---

187. Al-Khurāsānī; he had been governor of Mecca in 140–43/758–61 and possessed properties in Baghdad, both inside and outside the Round City. Al-Ṭabarī (III, 129) reports that the Rāwandiyyah considered that he was the incarnation of the Angel Gabriel, but it is difficult to know quite what to make of this information.

188. Al-Tamīmī; he was later governor of al-Baḥrayn, Ṭabaristān and Rūyyān, and Sīstān for short periods and disappears from the record after 164/780–81.

189. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 734. Al-Ṭabarī uses the word jizyah, the name given to the poll tax paid by non-Muslim subjects of the caliph.

190. His father was a comrade in arms of Marwān, the last Umayyad caliph, his mother the daughter of the Christian patrician of Sīsajān in the Caucasus. His career was spent largely on the Byzantine and Caucasus frontiers. He was governor of Armenia in the reign of al-Saffāḥ and became a trusted adviser of Abū Ja'far; he disappears from the historical record after 162/779 (al-Ṭabarī, III, 81, 493; al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, trans., 322, 328).

Usayd. Then he was angry with him and continued to be angry with him so that his anger extended to one of his paternal uncles of the children of ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās, either Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī or someone else. His family, his uncles, and their women took it in turns to speak to him on his behalf and put pressure on him so that he was restored to favor.

ʿĪsā b. Mūsā said, "O Commander of the Faithful, look at the family of ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh! Your generosity to them was abundant and they returned it with envy toward us, and for that reason you were angry with Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī for some days and they put pressure on you. You have been angry with al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad for such-and-such a time, but I have not seen any of them [375] intercede with you on his behalf," so he called al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad and restored him to favor.[191]

When Yazīd b. Usayd was dismissed by al-ʿAbbās from al-Jazīrah, he complained to Abū Jaʿfar about al-ʿAbbās, saying that his brother had done evil by dismissing him and had insulted his honor. Al-Manṣūr replied, "Consider whether my goodness to you and my brother's evil to you balance each other out."

Yazīd b. Usayd said, "O Commander of the Faithful, if your goodness were only to balance with your evil, then our obedience would be given to you as a mere courtesy."

In this year al-Manṣūr put Mūsā b. Kaʿb[192] in charge of the military and fiscal administration of al-Jazīrah.[193]

---

191. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā is expressing the rivalry in the ʿAbbāsid family between the descendants of Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, who included al-Saffāḥ, al-Manṣūr, and their brothers, and the families of the other sons of ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh. For the political background, see Lassner, ʿAbbasid Rule, 19–38.

192. This presents problems. Al-Ṭabarī, III, 138, states clearly that Mūsā b Kaʿb died in 141/758–59, and he is not recorded after this date, except III, 383, where his deposition from al-Jazīrah is noted. Al-Azdī, Tārīkh, has Mūsā b. Kaʿb appointed to al-Jazīrah in 154 and deposed in 155 (771–72) but Muṣʿab as governor at the death of Abū Jaʿfar (Azdī, 222–26). Michael the Syrian records the appointment of Mūsā b. Muṣʿab sub anno 1083 (trans. Chabot, III, 526), which is the equivalent of 155/772. His exactions in al-Jazīrah provoked the long diatribe in the history of Pseudo Dionysius of Tell Mahré (Chronique, trans. Chabot, see the discussion in Cahen, "Fiscalité"). Mūsā b. Muṣʿab later became governor of Egypt, where his oppressions were equally severe and led to his death in 168/785 (al-Kindī, 124). It seems most likely that Mūsā b. Muṣʿab should be read for Mūsā b. Kaʿb in both al-Ṭabarī and al-Azdī. See Crone, Slaves, 186.

193. He was in charge of ḥarb and kharāj. This unusual formula may mean that

In this year, according to some sources, al-Manṣūr dismissed Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī from al-Kūfah and appointed ʿAmr b. Zuhayr, brother of al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr, in his place. ʿUmar b. Shabbah,[194] on the other hand, holds that he dismissed Muḥammad b. Sulaymān from al-Kūfah in 153 (770) and appointed ʿAmr b. Zuhayr al-Ḍabbī, brother of al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr, as governor in that year and that it was he who dug the moat round al-Kūfah.

The reasons for the dismissal of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī:

It is said that ʿAbd al-Karīm b. Abī al-ʿAwjāʾ,[195] the maternal uncle of Maʿn b. Zāʾidah, was brought before Muḥammad b. Sulaymān when he was governor of al-Kūfah and he ordered his imprisonment.

According to Abū Zayd[196]—Qutham b. Jaʿfar and al-Ḥusayn b. Ayyūb and others: Many people interceded for him in the City of Peace and importuned Abū Jaʿfar, and, since everyone who interceded on his behalf was suspect, he wrote to Muḥammad ordering him to leave him alone so that he might come to an opinion about him.

[376] Ibn Abī al-ʿAwjāʾ spoke to Abū al-Jabbār,[197] who was an intimate of Abū Jaʿfar and Muḥammad and then of their sons after them, and said, "If the Amīr delays (punishing me) for three days there will be 100,000 *dirham*s for him and you yourself will get such and such." Abū al-Jabbār told Muḥammad about this and he said, "You have reminded me about him, by God, for I had forgotten him. When I leave Friday prayers, remind me about him." When he left he reminded him and he summoned Ibn Abī al-ʿAwjāʾ and ordered him to be beheaded. When he was certain that he would be killed, he said, "But if you kill me, by God I have invented four thousand traditions of the Prophet in which I forbid which is

---

he was not in charge of the prayers (ṣalāt) as well and that he was a military fiscal agent, rather than full governor.

194. The important historian and compiler ʿUmar b. Shabbah, d. 262/876, who wrote on the ʿAlid rebellions of 145/762 and the early ʿAbbāsid caliphs; see Fihrist, 246–47.

195. Crone, Slaves, 169; Vajda, Les Zindiqs, 169.

196. I.e., ʿUmar b. Shabbah.

197. Not known elsewhere.

lawful and make lawful what is forbidden. By God I have made you break fast when you should be fasting and fast when you should be breaking your fast!" So he was beheaded.

Then Abū Ja'far's messenger arrived with his letter to Muḥammad, "Be careful what you do in the case of Ibn Abī al-'Awjā'! If you have taken action (against him) I will do this and that," threatening him. Muḥammad said to the messenger, "This is the head of Ibn Abī al-'Awjā' and his body is crucified in al-Kunāsah,[198] so inform the Commander of the Faithful what I have told you."

When the messenger reached Abū Ja'far he was furious and ordered that a letter be written dismissing him and he said, "By God, I considered killing him for Ibn Abī al-'Awjā'." Then he sent for 'Īsā b. 'Alī and when he came to him he said, "This is your doing. You advised me to appoint this youth as governor so I appointed him, an ignorant young man with no knowledge of what he perpetrates in daring to kill a man without asking my opinion about him and waiting for my orders. I have written ordering his dismissal and, by God, I will do this and that," threatening him.

'Īsā remained silent until his anger had subsided and then he said, "O Commander of the Faithful, Muḥammad only killed this man on account of his Zandaqah.[199] If his killing was right then the credit goes to you and if it was wrong the responsibility is Muḥammad's. By God, O Commander of the Faithful, if you depose him for acting as he did, he will go with praise and reputation [377] and the common people will criticize you." So he ordered that the letters be torn up and that he be confirmed in his post.

One source said that al-Manṣūr only deposed Muḥammad b. Sulaymān from al-Kūfah because of some evil matters that he heard he was accused of. The man who informed him of that was al-Musāwir b. Sawwār al-Jarmī,[200] his chief of police, about whom Ḥammād said:

198. An open place, a traditional site for executions in al-Kūfah.

199. That is to say, his alleged Manichaean tendencies. It seems that the term zandaqah was used fairly generally at this time for different sorts of atheism or attacks on Islam, and it often carried the death penalty.

200. Not known elsewhere.

Do you not consider it one of the wonders of the age that I am afraid and on my guard against the authority of Jarm?[201]

In this year also al-Manṣūr dismissed al-Ḥasan b. Zayd from Medina and appointed ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī as its governor, and he appointed Fulayḥ b. Sulaymān with him to supervise him.[202] Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad was in charge of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif, ʿAmr b. Zuhayr of al-Kūfah, al-Haytham b. Muʿāwiyah of al-Baṣrah, Yazīd b. Ḥātim of Ifrīqiyah and Muḥammad b. Saʿīd of Egypt.

---

201. A branch of Quḍāʿah. Ḥammād was Ḥammād b. Yaḥyā b. ʿAmr, known as Ḥammād ʿAjrad (or "naked Ḥammād"). He was known for his poems of invective against his greater rival Bashshār b. Burd and was patronized by al-Manṣūr but particularly attached to Muḥammad b. Abī al-ʿAbbās. See Aghānī, Būlāq, XIII, 73; Beirut, XIV, 304; *EI*², s.v. "Ḥammād."

202. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad's relations with al-Manṣūr and al-Mahdī were often stormy (cf. p. 214, below), which is why the caliph took the unusual step of appointing Fulayḥ (otherwise unknown) as a mushrif, or supervisor, for him.

The Events of the Year 156

(December 1, 772–November 20, 773)

Among these was the capture by al-Haytham b. Muʿāwiyah, Abū Jaʿfar's governor of al-Baṣrah, of ʿAmr b. Shaddād,[203] Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh's governor of Fārs, and he was executed in al-Baṣrah and crucified.

The reason for this:

According to ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. Maʿrūf—his father: ʿAmr b. Shaddād struck one of his servants who came to the governor, either Ibn Daʿlaj or al-Haytham b. Muʿāwiyah and led him to [378] him. The governor arrested him and executed him and crucified him in the Mirbad,[204] on the site of the house of Isḥāq b. Sulaymān. ʿAmr was a mawlā of the Banū Jumaḥ.

One source says that al-Haytham b. Muʿāwiyah arrested him and left for the City of Peace and stayed in a palace of his on the 203. In the rebellion of 145/762–63, he had taken over Fārs with thirty men in the name of the ʿAlid rebel Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh. On the death of Ibrāhīm he fled to Kirmān and then went into hiding in al-Baṣrah (al-Ṭabarī, III, 287, al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 330–31).

---

204. The principal open space and meeting place in al-Baṣrah.

banks of the river known as the Nahr Ma'qil.[205] The post(man) came from Abū Ja'far with a letter to al-Haytham b. Mu'āwiyah ordering him to hand over 'Amr b. Shaddād to him, which al-Haytham did. He took him to al-Baṣrah and then to the district of al-Raḥbah, where he was kept in solitary confinement for interrogation, but no useful information was obtained from him, so he cut off his hands and his legs and he was beheaded and crucified in the Mirbad of al-Baṣrah.

In this year al-Manṣūr dismissed al-Haytham b. Mu'āwiyah from al-Baṣrah and its offices and appointed Sawwār b. 'Abdallāh al-Qāḍī in charge of the prayers, so that he was responsible for the prayers and the judiciary, and al-Manṣūr appointed Sa'īd b. Da'laj in charge of the police and the aḥdāth there.[206]

In this year, after being dismissed from al-Baṣrah, al-Haytham b. Mu'āwiyah died suddenly in the City of Peace, while he was having sexual intercourse with a slave girl of his. Al-Manṣūr prayed over his body, and he was buried in the cemetery of the Banū Hāshim.[207]

In this year the summer expedition was led by Zufar b. 'Āṣim al-Hilālī.

The leader of the pilgrims in this year was al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī. The governor of Mecca was Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm,[208] but he stayed in the City of Peace and his son Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad was his deputy in Mecca with al-Ṭā'if. 'Amr b. Zuhayr was 205. One of the main canals of al-Baṣrah, connecting the city with the Tigris; see Le Strange, Lands, 44, 46.

---

206. It is not clear what the reason was for the division of the functions of the governorship of al-Baṣrah at this time. There seem to have been four or more elements, the leading of the prayers with the giving of the khuṭbah, or Friday sermon; the qaḍā', or judiciary; the shuraṭ (pl. of shurṭah), meaning police but cf. note 17 above; and the aḥdāth. Aḥdāth at this stage means "incidents," presumably any matter that required the governor to take action. In later centuries the word came to mean "young men." I am indebted to Professor I. Abbas for putting me right on this matter.

207. The cemetery of the Banū Hāshim is probably to be identified with the Cemetery of the Quraysh (at Kāẓimayn, on the west bank, north of the Round City). It is not clear why he was so honored; he was an 'Atakī, that is, he came from a branch of Azd; see note 187, above.

208. According to Ya'qūbī, (Tārikh, II, 498), he was an early governor of Yemen in Hārūn's name, but he is otherwise unknown.

in charge of al-Kūfah, Sa'īd b. Da'laj of the incidents (aḥdāth), poll tax[209] (jawālī), police, and the tithes[210] of the land of the Arabs in al-Baṣrah, while Sawwār b. 'Abdallāh was in charge of [379] the prayers and the judiciary there. 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah[211] was in charge of the districts of the Tigris, Ahwāz, and Fārs; Hishām b. 'Amr of Kirmān and Sind; Yazīd b. Ḥātim of Ifrīqiyah, and Muḥammad b. Sa'īd of Egypt.

---

209. The word for poll tax here is jawālī. See Lane, s.v. jlw.

210. Ṣadaqāt, another sign of the way in which al-Baṣrah retained its early Islamic administrative institutions; elsewhere in the Muslim world land was usually subject to the kharāj, or basic land tax.

211. A mawlā, or freedman, appointed to office by al-Manṣūr. He became governor of al-Baṣrah briefly at the beginning of al-Mahdī's reign but seems to have been most important as a financial administrator. He was a friend of Khālid b. Barmak (see below, p. 82), but others, like the people al-Baṣrah, found him overbearing and corrupt. His period in high office seems to have been short, and he disappears after 160/777 (see Crone, Slaves, 195).

The Events of the Year 157

(NOVEMBER 21, 773–NOVEMBER 10, 774)

Among these was that al-Manṣūr began building his palace on the banks of the Tigris, which is called al-Khuld.[212] He divided responsibility for construction between his freedman al-Rabīʿ and Abān b. Ṣadaqah.

In this year Yaḥyā Abū Zakariyyā' the muḥtasib was executed. We have already mentioned the reasons for his execution.[213]

In this year al-Manṣūr moved the markets from the City of Peace to the Karkh Gate and other areas. We have also mentioned the reasons for this previously.[214]

In this year al-Manṣūr appointed Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān as governor of al-Baḥrayn but he never took up office, and Saʿīd b. Daʿlaj was appointed governor in his place and sent his son Tamīm[215] there.

---

212. The name means eternity. It lay to the east of the Round City, between it and the Tigris. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 101–5.

213. See above, p. 9.

214. See above, pp. 7–10.

215. In 166/782–83 he appears as governor of Sijistān but is not recorded elsewhere.

In this year al-Manṣūr inspected his army with their weapons and horses at a meeting he held on the banks of the Tigris below Qaṭrabbul.[216] He ordered his family, his relatives, and his courtiers to don their arms that day, and he appeared dressed in a coat of mail and a low Egyptian qalansūwah under the helmet.

In this year ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl al-Muslī[217] died in the City of Peace. Al-Manṣūr prayed over his body, and he was buried in the cemetery of the Banū Hāshim. [380]

In this year Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh died and Ibn Daʿlaj prayed over his body. Al-Manṣūr appointed ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-ʿAnbarī in his place.[218]

In this year al-Manṣūr constructed the bridge at the Barley Gate.[219] This was achieved by Ḥumayd b. al-Qāsim al-Ṣayrafī[220] on the orders of al-Rabīʿ the chamberlain.

In this year Muḥammad b. Saʿīd the Secretary was dismissed from Egypt and Maṭar, the freedman of Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr,[221] was appointed as governor.

In this year Maʿbad b. al-Khalīl[222] was appointed to Sind, and Hishām b. ʿAmr was dismissed. At this time Maʿbad was in Khurāsān, and his appointment was made by letter.

The summer expedition this year was led by Yazīd b. Usayd al-Sulamī. He sent Sinān, freedman of al-Baṭṭāl to one of the

---

216. The district that included the northwestern quarters of Baghdad, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 50–51. "Below" (dūna) Qaṭrabbul must mean on the west bank of the Tigris, just north of the Round City.

217. A soldier of no great distinction. He served in Egypt and Ifrīqiyah at the beginning of al-Manṣūr's reign and was sent to police al-Kūfah at the time of the ʿAlid revolt of 145/762–63. He had a property near the Kūfah Gate of Baghdad (al-Ṭabarī, III, 302; al-Kindī, Governors, 103, 110).

218. That is, over the prayers and the judiciary there. He remained qāḍī until 166/782–83 but seems to have been removed from the prayers in 159/775–76, at the beginning of al-Mahdī's reign.

219. This was the lower of the bridges of boats across the Tigris (Le Strange, Baghdad, 95).

220. Unknown elsewhere.

221. Al-Kindī does not report his appointment at all. He had been a slave bought by Abū Ayyūb al-Mūryānī, who gave him to al-Manṣūr, who employed him in the post before appointing him to Egypt (Crone, Slaves, 193).

222. Al-Muzanī. He remained governor for two years until his death in 159/775–76. He did not take the banner of appointment from the caliph in person, as was usual.

fortresses, and he took prisoners and booty.[223] Muḥammad b. ʿUmar[224] said that the summer expedition in this year was led by Zufar b. ʿĀṣim.

The leader of the pilgrims this year was Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar said that he, meaning this Ibrāhīm, was in charge of Medina, but other sources say that ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī was in charge there this year. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm was in charge of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif, ʿUmārah b. Ḥamzah of Ahwāz and Fārs, Maʿbad b. al-Khalīl of Kirmān and Sind, and Maṭar, freedman of al-Manṣūr, of Egypt.

---

223. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 734. Al-Baṭṭāl was a semilegendary Muslim hero of the early wars against the Byzantines.

224. Al-Wāqidī.

The Events of the Year 158

(NOVEMBER 11, 774–OCTOBER 30, 775)

[381]

Among these was al-Manṣūr's sending his son al-Mahdī to al-Raqqah and ordering him to dismiss Mūsā b. Ka'b[225] from Mosul and appoint Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak as governor.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Wahb b. Sa'īd[226]—Ṣāliḥ b. 'Aṭiyyah: The circumstances of that were that al-Manṣūr imposed a fine of 3,000,000 (dirhams) on Khālid b. Barmak on pain of his life and gave him three days to pay. Khālid said to his son Yaḥyā, "O my little son, I have been mulcted and required to pay what I do not have and he had only done this to take my life. Go to your women and your family and do to them what you would do to them after my death." Then he continued, "Do not let that prevent you from going to our brothers and visiting 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah, Ṣāliḥ, Ṣāḥib al-Muṣallā, and Mubārak al-Turkī[227] to tell them of my position."

225. See note 193, above.

226. Brother of the third-century vizier Sulaymān b. Wahb. This is the only time al-Ṭabarī uses him or the otherwise unknown Ṣāliḥ b. 'Atiyyah as a source. An abbreviated version of this story appears in Jāḥiẓ, 99–100, where al-Manṣūr's anger is instigated by the vizier Abū Ayyūb al-Mūryānī. In keeping with the author's more romantic presentation, al-Khayzurān, wife of al-Mahdī and mother of al-Hādī and Hārūn, lends Khālid an extremely valuable jewel because of the milk brotherhood between his son al-Faḍl and the young Hārūn.

According to Ṣāliḥ b. 'Aṭiyyah—Yaḥyā: I came to them and some of them frowned at me but sent money secretly and others would not receive me but sent money after I had gone. I asked permission to see 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah and I went in and found him in the courtyard of his house facing the wall, and he did not turn his head to me. I greeted him and he replied without warmth. Then he said, "O my son, how is your father?" "Well," I replied; "he sends you greetings and informs you of the fine that has been demanded and asks to borrow 100,000 dirhams from you." He made no reply of any sort to me, and my position became awkward and the earth swayed under me.

Then I spoke to him on the matter I had come about, and he [382] said, "If I can manage anything, I will send it to you." So I went on my way saying to myself, "God curse everything that comes from your haughtiness, your pride, and your arrogance," and I came to my father and told him the news and then said, "I think you relied on 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah for what he could not be relied on for." By God, I was just saying that when 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah's messenger arrived with 100,000 dirhams. So we collected 2,700,000 dirhams in two days, leaving only 300,000 to find to reach our target, and if not we would fail.

By God I was on the bridge of Baghdad, preoccupied and gloomy, when a fortune-teller (relying on the flight of birds) accosted me and said, "The young bird has told you," but I left him behind with heavy heart, so he followed me and seized my bridle and said to me, "You are, by God, much concerned and, by God, God will free you from your anxieties and you will pass this way tomorrow with a banner[228] in your hands." I began to wonder at his words 227. All important figures in the palace and fiscal administration at the end of al-Manṣūr's reign. Mubārak al-Turkī appears again as a leader of the 'Abbāsid forces against the uprising of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī the 'Alid in Medina in 169/785–86. He had property on the east bank in Baghdad. The geographer al-Hamadhānī says that he built a stronghold in Qazvīn in central Iran; al-Hamadhānī, 282).

228. That is the liwā', which is the symbol of the governorate of a province. See note 113, above.

and he went on, "If that happens, will you give me five thousand dirhams?" and I replied "Yes" and if he had said fifty thousand, I would still have agreed because it was so unlikely.

I went on my way and news came to al-Manṣūr of the rebellion in Mosul and the spread of the Kurds in the area, and he asked who should be appointed to deal with it. Al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr, who was a friend of Khālid b. Barmak, said, "I have a suggestion, O Commander of the Faithful, which I do not think you will consider good advice and which I think you will refuse but I will still offer and counsel it." He said, "Speak! I do not think you are being dishonest." I[229] said, "Why do you not despatch someone like Khālid?"

The caliph replied, "Woe to you! Will he be loyal to us after what we have done to him?"

"Yes, O Commander of the Faithful. If you appoint him to that, I will be his guarantor."

"He has it! Let him be brought to me tomorrow." So he was brought and excused the 300,000 still outstanding and appointed. [383]

Yaḥyā said: Then I passed by the fortune-teller who had accosted me and, when he saw me, he said, "I have been waiting for you since this morning." I told him to come with me and he came and I gave him 5,000 dirhams.

My father said to me, "O my little son, 'Umārah is a man of great responsibilities, and he is exposed to many difficulties. Go to him and give him greeting and say to him, 'God has given us the good will of the Commander of the Faithful and he has excused us what remained due from us and has appointed me governor of Mosul and ordered the return of the money I borrowed from you.'"

I came to him and found him in the same position as I had met him in before and I greeted him, but he did not return my greeting and said nothing except "How is your father?" and I replied that he was well and that he said such-and-such and he sat up and said, "Was I only a treasurer for your father from whom he takes when he wants to and returns when he wants to? Go away, won't you?"

---

229. Meaning al-Musayyab; the narrative slips into the first person.

I returned to my father and told him and he said to me, "O my little son, he is 'Umārah and one does not argue with him."

Khālid remained in charge of Mosul until al-Manṣūr died and Yaḥyā was in charge of Azerbaijān.

According to Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Sawwār al-Mawṣilī:[230] We were never in awe of a governor as we were of Khālid b. Barmak, not because of the severity of his judgments or because we experienced tyranny at his hands, but awe was in our breasts.

According to Aḥmad b. Mu'āwiyah b. Bakr al-Bāhilī[231]—his father: Abū Ja'far was angry with Mūsā b. Ka'b, who was his governor of al-Jazīrah and Mosul, so he sent al-Mahdī to al-Raqqah to build al-Rāfiqah and said publicly that he was going to Jerusalem, but he ordered him to pass on and proceed to Mosul. When he reached the town (or al-Balad)[232] he arrested Mūsā b. Ka'b and put him in chains and appointed Khālid b. Barmak to Mosul in his [384] place. Al-Mahdī did that and left Khālid in charge of Mosul. Two of Khālid's brothers, al-Ḥasan and Sulaymān, sons of Barmak,[233] set out with him.

Before this, al-Manṣūr had summoned Yaḥyā b. Khālid and said to him, "I have an important command in mind for you and I have chosen you for one of the frontier provinces, so be prepared and do not tell anyone about this until I summon you." He kept the news secret from his father and, when he was waiting at the door with those who were waiting, al-Rabī' came out and said, "Yaḥyā b. Khālid!" So he stood up and al-Rabī' took him by the hand and brought him in to al-Manṣūr. When he came out before the people, his father being present, he had the banner of Azerbaijān in front of him, and he ordered the people to go with him and they went with him in his retinue and they congratulated him and con-

230. Presumably a local Mosul source, not otherwise used by al-Ṭabarī.

231. Also quoted in al-Ṭabarī, III, 567. His father, Mu'āwiyah, appears as a source (below, p. 146) for an anecdote that can be dated to 145–48/762–66, when Ja'far the elder was governor of Mosul. There he quotes from an eyewitness directly; we can probably extrapolate from that that Mu'āwiyah lived before the end of the second century and his son Aḥmad early in the third.

232. Al-Balad can either mean "the town," i.e. Mosul, or be the name of a small town on the Tigris north of Mosul; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 481; Le Strange, Lands, 99.

233. Al-Ḥasan and Sulaymān also accompanied Yaḥyā on the summer expedition of 163/780, when he went with Hārūn (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 497).

gratulated his father Khālid on his appointment and their two offices were joined together. Aḥmad b. Muʿāwiyah said that al-Manṣūr admired Khālid and he used to say, "Khālid gave birth to a son and Yaḥyā gave birth to a father."

In this year al-Manṣūr settled in his palace known as al-Khuld.

In this year al-Manṣūr was angry with al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr and dismissed him from command of the police and ordered that he be imprisoned and chained up. The reason for this was that he had flogged Abān b. Bashīr[234] the Secretary to death because of a grudge he bore him concerning his partnership with his brother ʿAmr b. Zuhayr in the governorate of al-Kūfah and the collection of its taxes. In place of al-Musayyab, he appinted al-Ḥakam b. Yūsuf, Commander of the Lances,[235] but then al-Mahdī spoke to his father on behalf of al-Musayyab, and he was restored to favor after he had been in prison for some days and he was given back his command of the police.

In this year al-Manṣūr sent Naṣr b. Ḥarb al-Tamīmī as governor of the frontier regions of Fārs.[236]

In this year al-Manṣūr fell off his mount at Jarjarāyā[237] and fractured his skull between his eyebrows. This was when he had gone out, when he sent his son al-Mahdī to al-Raqqah, to say farewell to him. When he reached a place called Jubb Summāqā[238] he turned aside to Ḥawlāyā[239] and then went on to the Nahrawāns. [385] He reached, it is said, the sluice gates and the point[240] where the Nahrawān flows into the Diyālā river, and he stayed by the dam there for eighteen days and it wearied him so he went on to

234. Not known elsewhere.

235. Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 248, records that he had a property in the Ḥarbiyyah quarter in Baghdad. Ḥirāb were small, throwing spears (see Lane, s.v. ḥrb), but the title ṣāḥib al-ḥirāb is not, to my knowledge, recorded elsewhere. From the context, it must be presumed that he was second-in-command of the shurṭah.

236. Thughūr Fārs, a curious usage, thughūr usually being applied to the Byzantine frontier area. Perhaps it refers to the wild, eastern part of the province, on the Kirmān border.

237. Small town on the Tigris, southeast of Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 123; Le Strange, Lands, 37.

238. Not noted by Yāqūt or Le Strange. Jubb means a well.

239. A village near Nahrawān. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 322.

240. The hydrology of the Nahrawān area is explained in Adams, Land behind Baghdad.

Jarjarāyā and went out from it to inspect an estate belonging to 'Īsā b. 'Alī there. That day he was thrown from his gray horse and fractured his skull. When he was in Jarjarāyā, Indian prisoners came to him from 'Umān. They had been sent by Tasnīm b. al-Ḥawārī[241] with his son Muḥammad. He contemplated having them executed, so he interrogated them and what they told him about their affairs confused him and he refrained from killing them and divided them among his commanders and agents (nuwwāb).[242]

In this year al-Mahdī came to the City of Peace from al-Raqqah and entered in the month of Ramaḍān (July 5–August 3, 775).

In this year al-Manṣūr ordered the repair of the White Palace, which Chosroes had built, and the fining of all those in whose houses Sasanian brickwork, taken from the buildings of the Chosroes, was found. He said, "This is the booty of the Muslims,"[243] but this was never completed, nor were the repairs to the Palace.

In this year the summer raid was led by Ma'yūf b. Yaḥyā along the Darb al-Ḥadath,[244] and they met the enemy and fought and then broke off the engagement.

In this year Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī, the governor of Mecca, was imprisoned because, it is said, al-Manṣūr ordered him to imprison Ibn Jurayj,[245] 'Abbād b. Kathīr,[246] and al-

241. He appears once as a source for the 'Alid rebellion of 145/762–63 (al-Ṭabarī, III, 206, 293), and his son al-Ḥasan was governor of 'Umān in 169/785–86. For his family, see Crone, Slaves, 121.

242. Nuwwāb, not a usual administrative term at this period; its significance is unclear.

243. In Ctesiphon/al-Madā'in. The building was still used by the Muslims for official purposes in early Umayyad times (Morony, Iraq, 76). Al-Manṣūr was claiming that it formed part of the fay' (booty) of the Muslims and hence should not be divided up but used for the common good.

244. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 734. The Darb al-Ḥadath was the pass that led from the Muslim base at al-Ḥadath across the mountains into Byzantine territory.

245. Probably to be identified with the Ibn Jurayj whom al-Ṭabarī cites extensively as a source in the early part of the History, notably on Old Testament material. He had been in Mecca at the time of the 'Alid rebellion of 145/762 but does not seem to have played a very active part.

246. He had been in Medina in the immediate aftermath of the 'Alid rebellion and interceded for one of the participants, but, like Ibn Jurayj, he does not seem to have played a major part.

Thawrī,[247] and then he released them without Abū Ja'far's permission and Abū Ja'far was angry with him. [386]

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—Muḥammad b. 'Imrān, freedman of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās—his father: Al-Manṣūr wrote to Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, governor of Mecca, ordering him to imprison a man of the family of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib who was in Mecca along with Ibn Jurayj, 'Abbād b. Kathīr, and al-Thawrī, so he imprisoned them. He had companions with whom he used to talk at night[248] and, when it was time for his nighttime conversation, he sat down looking intently at the ground and not uttering a syllable until they dispersed. I approached him and said, "I saw what you did; what is the matter?" He replied, "I came upon the possessor of kinship[249] and imprisoned him and some of the most worthy people[250] and imprisoned them. The Commander of the Faithful might come, and I do not know what will happen. Maybe he will order that they be killed and his authority will be strengthened, but my religion will be destroyed."

I asked him what he would do and he replied, "I will placate God and release the people. Go to my camels and take a female riding camel and take fifty *dīnār*s and give them to the Ṭālibī,[251] give him greeting and say to him, 'Your cousin[252] asks you to release him from his guilt about you. Ride this camel and take this money.'"

When he saw me he had begun to ask God's protection from my evil, but when I told him he said, "He is released.[253] I have no

247. This is the celebrated traditionist Sufyān b. Sa'īd al-Thawrī, d. 161/778, like Ibn Jurayj an important source for the early sections of al-Ṭabarī's history. He spent much of his life in hiding in the Ḥijāz and Yemen to escape appointment as a qāḍī. See EI[1], s.v. "Sufyān."

248. The sāmir or samīr was a friend or courtier with whom one had relaxed conversations at night. These nighttime gatherings were an important social and cultural institution of the period.

249. With the Prophet, by which he means the (anonymous) 'Alid referred to above.

250. The three learned men mentioned above.

251. That is, the 'Alid. The term Ṭālibī was used for desecendants of 'Alī's father, Abū Ṭālib, either through 'Alī himself or through his brother Ja'far.

252. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, being an 'Abbāsid, speaks as a cousin, albeit a very distant one, of the 'Alid.

253. The 'Alid releases Muhammad b. Ibrāhīm from his guilt for imprisoning him.

need of the camel and no need of the money," but I said, "It would be better for his soul if you took them," so he did.

Then I came to Ibn Jurayj, Sufyān b. Sa'īd, and 'Abbād b. Kathīr and told them what he had said and they said, "He is released." I said to them that Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm had said that none of [387] them should appear as long as al-Manṣūr was staying.

When al-Manṣūr approached, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm sent me with gifts but, when al-Manṣūr was told that the messenger of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm had arrived, he ordered that the faces of his camels be struck. When he reached Bi'r Maymūn,[254] Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm came to meet him but, when he was told of that, he ordered that the faces of his mounts should be struck. So Muḥammad was traveling on one side of the road while Abū Ja'far was diverted from the road to the left-hand side and the camel was made to kneel for him (to relieve nature). Muḥammad was waiting facing him, and his doctor was with him. When Abū Ja'far mounted and he and his companion al-Rabī' went on, Muḥammad ordered his doctor to go over to Abū Ja'far's camel-kneeling place, and he saw his excrement and he said to Muḥammad, "I saw the excrement of a man who does not have long to live." When he entered Mecca he remained there only a short time before he died and Muḥammad was saved.

In Shawwāl of this year (August 4–September 1, 775) Abū Ja'far set out from the City of Peace heading for Mecca. It is said that he stayed at Qaṣr 'Abdawayh[255] and while he was there a meteorite fell on 26 Shawwāl (August 29) after the beginning of dawn and remained visible until sunrise; then he went on to al-Kūfah and stayed at al-Ruṣāfah[256] and then set out from there on the pilgrimage and the lesser pilgrimage.[257] With him he drove the camels to be slaughtered in Mecca, branded them, and put signs on their necks for some days into Dhū al-Qa'dah (September 2–

254. On the borders of the sacred area of Mecca, where al-Manṣūr died. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 302.

255. Not noted by Yāqūt or Le Strange.

256. That is al-Ruṣāfah of al-Kūfah; see note 54, above.

257. For the differing rituals of the pilgrimage (ḥajj) and lesser pilgrimage ('umrah), see *EI*², s.v., "Ḥadjdj;" *EI*¹ s.v. "'Umra."

October 1, 775]. When he had gone some stages from al-Kūfah the disease of which he died became apparent.

Opinions differ as to the nature of the disease that he died from.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Nawfalī,[258] his father used to say: Al-Manṣūr was unable to digest his food and he complained of that to the doctors and asked them to bring him digestives, but they did not want to do that so they told him to eat less food and that the digestives would be digested immediately but that the illness would recur and intensify, until an Indian doctor came to him and said the same thing to him as the others had but prepared a drug for him, a digestive powder with hot spices and medicaments, and he took it and his food was digested and he praised the doctor highly. [388]

He continued: My father said that many doctors from Iraq said that Abū Jaʿfar would die only of a stomach complaint. I asked him what the symptoms were of this and he said, "He takes a digestive and it digests his food, but every day some of the lining of his stomach and the fat of his bowels is eroded, and he will die because of his stomach. I will give you an analogy: What would you think if you put a jar on a high place and put a new brick under it and it drips? Is it not the case that its dripping will pierce the brick in the course of time and do you not then know that every drip makes an impression?" Abū Jaʿfar died, as he said, because of his stomach.

One source said: The illness of which he died began when he suffered heatstroke from riding in the midday sun. He was a hot-blooded person in his eating and the red bile afflicted him and he got dysentery in his stomach. He continued in that condition until he reached the Garden of Ibn ʿĀmir, where it became more severe. He moved on from there but could not reach Mecca and stopped at Biʾr Ibn al-Murtafiʿ,[259] where he stayed for a day and a night before going on to Biʾr Maymūn. He asked whether he had entered the Ḥaram and bequeathed what he wished to al-Rabīʿ, and then he died at dawn or sunrise of Saturday 6 Dhū al-Ḥijjah [389]

258. See note 23, above.

259. Bustān Abū ʿĀmir and Biʾr Ibn al-Murtafiʿ were, like Biʾr Maymūn, stages on the route from Iraq to Mecca and Medina.

(October 7, 775). Only his servants and al-Rabī', his freedman, were with him at his death.

Al-Rabī' kept his death hidden and prevented the women and others from weeping and wailing. In the morning the members of his household came as they were accustomed to and sat in their places. 'Īsā b. 'Alī was the first to be summoned and he remained a little while and then permission was given to 'Īsā b. Mūsā, although in time past he used to be given permission before 'Īsā b. 'Alī and that was the rank in which he was established. Then the senior and older members of the family[260] were given permission and then the main body of them. Al-Rabī' took their oath of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful al-Mahdī and to 'Īsā b. Mūsā after him at the hand of Mūsā,[261] son of al-Mahdī.

When the Banū Hāshim[262] had all taken the oath, he summoned the commanders and they took the oath and none of them showed any reluctance except 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān[263] and he refused, at the mention of 'Īsā b. Mūsā, to take the oath to him. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān slapped him and said, "Who is this lout?"[264] and taunted him with being a sucker[265] and considered beheading him, so he took the oath. The people took the oath in

260. Probably meaning the 'Abbāsid family but possibly the family of the Prophet, including the 'Alids, at least one of whom, al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, is known to have been present.

261. The future caliph al-Hādī, at this time a young boy.

262. Hāshim was the ancestor of both 'Abbāsids and 'Alids (and, of course, the Prophet himself) but not of the Umayyads.

263. A soldier of Khurasānī origin, probably the son of 'Īsā b. Māhān, who had been one of the original supporters of the 'Abbāsid movement in Khurāsān. In al-Mahdī's reign 'Alī became a partisan of Mūsā al-Hādī, the heir apparent, and an opponent of the Barmakids. Between 180/796 and 192/807 he was governor of Khurāsān, making himself very unpopular with the local notables. After Hārūn's death, he became the leading champion of al-Amīn and the Khurāsāniyyah of Baghdad but was killed in battle by the forces of al-Ma'mūn led by Ṭāhir at al-Rayy in 195/811 (see below, pp. 455, 494; al-Ṭabarī, III, 666, 675, 714, 799–801, 822–85; al-Jahshiyārī, 167, 228; Ḥamzah, 143; Crone, Slaves, 178–79).

264. 'Ilj; originally referring to a strong or sturdy man, the word acquired a perjorative sense. Here it can mean either "Persian" (which is probably appropriate for 'Alī) or other unbeliever or, more simply, "lout."

265. Amaṣṣahu. The root maṣṣa means "to suck." In this context "sucker" is used as an obscene term of abuse, being short for "sucker of your mother's clitoris." The full form is used below p. 146. The American "mother fucker" is probably the most effective colloquial translation. See Lane s.v., maṣṣa.

turn and the first one who said "If God wills" was al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr, and 'Īsā b. Mūsā said, "It will be thus," and they called him a sucker. Mūsā b. al-Mahdī went out to the public audience and took the oath from the rest of the commanders and leading men. Al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad and Muḥammad b. Sulaymān proceeded to Mecca to take the oath from the people there, and al-'Abbās acted as spokesman at that time. The people took the oath to al-Mahdī between the rukn and the maqām.[266] A number of members of the household of al-Mahdī were sent out in the neighborhood of Mecca and the camp, and they had the people take the oath to him.

Al-Manṣūr was prepared for burial and he was washed and covered in a shroud. Those of his household who were in charge [390] of this were al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad, al-Rabī', al-Rayyān,[267] and a number of his servants and freedmen. The preparations for burial were completed by the afternoon prayer and his face and all his body were covered with his shroud up to the beginning of the hair, and his head remained uncovered because he was in a state of iḥrām.[268] The people of his household and the most intimate of his freedmen went out with him and, as al-Wāqidi claimed, 'Isa b. Mūsā prayed over him in Shi'b al-Khūz.

It is said that Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī[269] prayed over him, and it is said that al-Manṣūr had stipulated that in his will because he was his deputy in charge of the prayers in the City of Peace.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Nawfalī—his father: Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā prayed over him in the tents before he was carried out because al-Rabī' said, "No one should pray over him who is aspiring to the caliphate," so they fetched Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā,

---

266. The rukn is the corner of the Ka'bah in which is the Black Stone, the maqām, short for "maqām Ibrāhīm," is a small building, containing the mark of Abraham's footprint, near the Ka'bah; both of these are in the mosque in Mecca.

267. Mawlā al-Manṣūr; in an anecdote dated 145–48/762–66 he was sent to Mosul to execute a political suspect (see below, p. 145) but is otherwise unknown.

268. That is, he was in the ritual dress for pilgrimage, having entered the ḥarām (sacred area) at Bi'r Maymūn. The iḥrām involves being bareheaded.

269. B. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās and therefore a member of the 'Abbāsid family. He was later governor of Medina from 166 until 167 (782–84), when he died. For Shi'b al-Khūz, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 347.

who was at that time a young man. He was buried in a grave at Thaniyyat al-Madaniyyīn, which is called that and Thaniyyat al-Ma'lāt,[270] because it is above Mecca. 'Īsā b. 'Alī, al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad, 'Īsā b. Mūsā, al-Rabī' and al-Rayyān, his freedmen, and Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā[271] lowered him into his grave.

Opinions differ about his age when he died; some say he was sixty-four years old, some that he was sixty-five, and some that he was sixty-three on the day he died. Hishām b. al-Kalbī[272] said that al-Manṣūr died when he was sixty-eight and that he held power for twenty-two years less twenty-four days. Different riwāyas are [391] related to Abu Ma'shar[273]: Aḥmad b. Thābit al-Rāzī told me on the authority of those who were told by Isḥāq b. 'Īsā on his (Abū Ma'shar's) authority that he said:[274] Abū Ja'far died one day before the day for providing oneself with water (Yawm al-Tarwiyyah: 8 Dhū'l-Ḥijjah/October 9, 775), which was a Saturday. His caliphate lasted twenty-two years less three days. It is related on the authority of Ibn Bakkār that he (Abū Ma'shar)[275] said: Less seven nights. Al-Wāqidī said that the reign of Abū Ja'far was twenty-two years less six days. 'Umar b. Shabbah said that his caliphate was two days short of twenty-two years.

The leader of the pilgrims in this year was Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī.

In this year the Byzantine emperor died.[276]

Information about the appearance of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr:

---

270. Pass of the Medinans, or High Pass.

271. He had a background in the 'Abbāsid movement in Khurāsān and was chiefly employed as a civil servant, dividing up booty and supervising construction work on the road to Mecca and in the ḥarām itself. He died in 185/801 (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 486, 520; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 439).

272. Celebrated early Islamic historian, ca. 120–204/737–819, and author of surviving Jamharat al-Nasab, the definitive work on early Arab genealogy; see *EI*², s.v. "Ibn al-Kalbī."

273. Najīh al-Sindī. An important source for the earlier sections of al-Ṭabarī's history, he contributes only occasional details of appointments and dates, the last being the date of the death of al-Hādī (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 579).

274. He being Abū Ma'shar, Aḥmad b. Thābit and Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, both otherwise unknown, are al-Ṭabarī's usual isnād for Abū Ma'shar's information.

275. Presumably Abū Ma'shar again, by a different isnād. Ibn Bakkār is al-Zubayr b. Bakkār, who is occasionally used elsewhere by al-Ṭabarī.

276. Constantine V, A.D 741–75.

It is said that he was brown-skinned, tall, thin, with a sparse beard. He was born in al-Ḥumaymah.[277]

Some Stories about al-Manṣūr and His Conduct[278]

According to Ṣāliḥ b. al-Wajīh[279]—his father: Al-Manṣūr heard that ʿĪsā b. Mūsā had killed one of the descendants of Naṣr b. Sayyār[280] who was hiding in al-Kūfah. ʿĪsā was directed to him and cut off his head. Al-Manṣūr disapproved of that and was appalled. He was planning something that would be the destruction of ʿĪsā, but ʿĪsā's ignorance of the significance of what he had done stopped him. So he wrote to him:

> Were it not for the discernment and restraint of the Commander of the Faithful, your punishment for the killing of the son of Naṣr b. Sayyar and your high-handedness in going beyond the aspirations of governors would not be delayed. Stop such actions against those whom the Commander of the Faithful appointed you to, whether [392]
> Arab or non-Arab, white[281] or black. Do not act arbitrarily contrary to the Commander of the Faithful in inflicting punishment on anyone who has a case to answer. He does not think that anyone should be arrested for an evil thought for which God will accept penance as reparation, or for any act of his in war that God has brought him safely

277. The estate in southern Jordan that was the main base of the ʿAbbāsid family in late Umayyad times (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 307, Le Strange, Palestine, 455–56).

278. Al-Ṭabarī usually follows the account of the death of a caliph with some undated anecdotes. In general these are arranged at random, but some are loosely arranged according to themes; Abū Jaʿfar's meanness, the contrast between him and his son al-Mahdī, the activities of Maʿn b. Zāʾidah are some of these. The sources of this material are usually named, in contrast with the main body of the text, but are often individuals who contribute only single narratives and about whom nothing else is known.

279. This is the only time al-Ṭabarī uses this source, and nothing more is known of him or his father. The story should probably be dated 145–47/762–65 when ʿĪsā was still governor of al-Kūfah, but al-Manṣūr was attempting to remove him from the succession.

280. Naṣr b. Sayyār was the last Umayyad governor of Khurāsān and an ancient enemy of the ʿAbbāsids.

281. The Arabic uses aḥmar (red) to mean "white."

through, thereby concealing him from the rancorous and preventing investigation of what is in men's hearts. The Commander of the Faithful will not despair of anyone, nor of himself, of God's causing the retreater to advance just as the retreating of one who advances is not sure, if God wills, and peace.

According to 'Abbās b. al-Faḍl[282]—Yaḥyā b. Sulaym,[283] secretary to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī': Entertainment was never seen in the house of al-Manṣūr, nor anything like entertainment games or amusements, except one day, when we saw a son of his called 'Abd al-'Azīz, the brother of Sulaymān and 'Īsā,[284] sons of Abū Ja'far by the Ṭalḥī woman, who died when he was a youth. He came out to the people with a bow on his shoulder, wearing a turban and a striped outer garment and looking like a bedouin boy. He was riding on a young camel between two saddlebags in which there were muql,[285] sandals, and sticks for cleaning the teeth[286] and the things that the bedouin gave as gifts. The people were amazed at this and disapproved of it. The young man went on until he crossed the bridge and came to al-Mahdī in al-Ruṣāfah and gave them to him. Al-Mahdī took what was in the saddlebags and filled them with dirhams, and he set off with the saddlebags. It was made known that this was a sort of royal joke.

According to Ḥammād al-Turkī: I was standing by al-Manṣūr's head when he heard a clamor in the house and he said, "What is that, Ḥammād? Have a look." I went and found one of his servants sitting among the slave girls and playing a ṭunbūr[287] for them, [393] and they were laughing. I came to him and told him and he said, "What sort of thing is a ṭunbūr?" and I replied that it was made of wood and I described it to him. He said, "You have given me a

282. That is, al-'Abbās b. al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī', later ḥājib to al-Amīn as his grandfather had been to al-Manṣūr and al-Mahdī ('Uyūn, 342; Jahshiyārī, 289).

283. Yaḥyā took over some of al-Rabī''s administrative functions on his death and later worked for al-Amīn (see below 598, Jāḥiẓ, 266, 289, 292.)

284. Both Sulaymān and 'Īsā reached maturity and played a part in political life in Hārūn's reign and after.

285. Bdellium. See Groom, Frankincense and Myrrh, 124–26.

286. Sticks for cleaning teeth, used by the bedouin; see EI[1], s.v. miswāk.

287. A kind of lute or guitar with a long neck.

good description of it. How do you know what a ṭunbūr is?" and I replied that I had seen one in Khurāsān. He said, "Yes, there," and then asked me to bring him his sandals, so I brought them and he got up and walked slowly until he looked down on them and saw them. When they caught sight of him, they scattered. He said, "Seize him!" so he was taken and he went on, "Beat him over the head with it!" and I went on striking him on the head with it until I broke it. Then he said, "Take him out of my palace and go to Ḥamrān in al-Karkh[288] and tell him to sell him."

According to al-'Abbās b. al-Faḍl—Sallām al-Abrash:[289] When I was a young servant, I and another page used to wait on al-Manṣūr inside in his residence. There he had an enclosure with a tent and pavilion with bedding and covers for him to be alone in. He was the best-natured of people whenever he did not appear in public, and the most tolerant of boys' games, but when he put on his official robes his complexion changed and his face became gloomy, his eyes reddened, and he went out and did as he was used to doing. When he got up from his audience, he returned in that state. When we received him in the hallway, he sometimes used to face us with blame. He said to me one day, "O my son, when you see me dressed in my official robes or returning from my audience, do not any of you approach me for fear that I should abuse him for something."

According to Abū al-Haytham Khālid b. Yazīd b. Wahb b. Jarīr b. Ḥāzim[290]—'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad, called Minqār, of the people of Khurāsān, who was one of al-Rashīd's agents[291]—Ma'n b. Zā'idah: We were seven hundred men in the ṣaḥābah who used to [394] go in to al-Manṣūr every day. I asked al-Rabī' to put me among the last of those who were going in but he said to me, "You are not one of the most noble of them to be put first of them nor the

288. A slave dealer. Al-Karkh was the commercial quarter of Baghdad, south of the Round City.

289. A palace servant, who was later in charge of the maẓālim (complaints) for al-Mahdī. Abrash means speckled or marked with various colors.

290. Great-grandson of Jarīr b. Ḥāzim, an important source for the earlier sections of al-Ṭabarī's work; he himself contributes only two short narratives.

291. He may be identified with 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad al-Munaqqirī, who appears as a source in al-Ṭabarī, III, 565, neither name is recorded elsewhere. Minqār means "the beak of a bird."

most humble in descent to be put among the last of them. Your rank corresponds to your genealogy."[292] I went into al-Manṣūr that day wearing a loose, flowing outer garment, a Ḥanafī sword[293] the point of whose scabbard touched the ground, and a turban that I let hang down behind and in front of me. I greeted him and went out and, when I reached the curtain, he shouted to me, "O Ma'n" with a shout I did not like. I said, "Your servant, O Commander of the Faithful," and he ordered me to come to him. When I came near him, he had gotten down from his throne to the ground and he was kneeling and pulling out a rod from between the two cushions. His color changed, and his neck veins swelled out. He said to me, "You were my parallel combatant on the day of Wāsiṭ?[294] May I not escape death if you escape from me," and I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, that was my support for their false one; what about my support for your truth?" He said, "What are you saying?" I repeated my words to him and he went on asking me to repeat until he returned the rod to its resting place and sat down on his throne. His complexion turned pale and he said to me, "O Ma'n, I have some trifles in Yemen," and I replied, "A man who is denied secrets cannot have an opinion about them," and he said, "You are the man I need, so sit down," so I sat down and he ordered al-Rabī' to send out all those who were in the palace, and they were sent out. Then al-Manṣūr said, "The lord of Yemen[295] is considering rebelling against me and I want to take him prisoner and not to let any of his wealth escape me. What is your opinion?" and I replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, appoint me governor of Yemen but say in public that you have attached me to him. Order al-Rabī' to prepare whatever equipment I need and to send me off this very day so that the news does not get out." He took out a diploma of appointment [395] from between the two cushions, inscribed my name on it, and

292. That is, the order of precedence was established by descent, but Ma'n, wanting to attract attention to himself, asked for a more conspicuous position.

293. It is not clear what a Ḥanafī sword was. The point was to wear unconventional garb to attract the caliph's attention.

294. Ma'n b. Zā'idah had been one of the leading defenders of the Umayyad base at Wāsiṭ when it was besieged by Abū Ja'far at the beginning of al-Saffāḥ's caliphate.

295. Ṣāḥib al-Yaman means the governor.

handed it over to me. Then he called al-Rabīʿ and said, "We have attached Maʿn to the lord of Yemen so prepare the equipment he needs, horses and arms, and do not delay for he is going now." Then he said, "Take your leave of me," so I took my leave of him and went out into the vestibule, where the father of the governor met me and said, "O Maʿn, I am not very pleased that you have been attached to your brother's son," and I replied to him, "It is no disgrace for a man that his Sulṭān attaches him to his brother's son."[296] I left for the Yemen and I came to the man and took him prisoner, read the diploma of appointment to him, and sat in his place.

According to Ḥammād b. Aḥmad al-Yamānī—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Yamānī—Abū al-Rudaynī:[297] Maʿn b. Zāʾidah wanted to send a delegation to al-Manṣūr to assuage his ill will and soften his heart toward him, and he said, "I have consumed my life in his service, worn myself out and exhausted my men in war in Yemen, and then he is angry with me because I have spent money in his service." He chose a group of his tribe of the small lineages of Rabīʿah,[298] and among those he selected was Mujjāʿah b. al-Azhar,[299] and he began to call the men one after the other and asked them what they would say to the Commander of the Faithful if he sent them to him, and they replied that they would say this and that until Mujjāʿah b. al-Azhar came to him and said, "May God glorify the Amīr. You are asking me what I would say in Iraq when I am in Yemen. I shall pursue your business until I complete it as is possible and appropriate." Maʿn said, "You are the man for me." Then he turned to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAtīq al-Muzanī[300] and said to him, "Be strong in support of your paternal

296. It is unusual for sulṭān to be used of a person at this date, it is more commonly an abstract word meaning "authority." As the governor is not named, it is not clear what the relationship between him and Maʿn was. The story relates to Maʿn's appointment as governor of Yemen in 142/759–60.

297. This is the only time al-Ṭabarī uses this isnād, and the transmitters cannot be identified. The anecdote dates from Maʿn's governorate of Yemen, 142–51/759–69.

298. Maʿn's tribe, Shaybān, was part of Bakr b. Wāʾil, which was a section of the larger Rabīʿah tribal group.

299. Not known elsewhere.

300. Not known elsewhere.

uncle's son,[301] give him precedence over you, and, if he overlooks anything, put him right." He chose eight people from his companions with them so that the total number was ten, and then he said farewell to them.

[396] They traveled until they reached Abū Ja'far and, when they were in his presence, they came forward and Mujjā'ah b. al-Azhar began by praising God and extolling him and thanking him so that the people thought that he intended to do no more than that. Then he turned to mention the Prophet and how God had chosen him from the midst of the Arabs and expanded on his virtue, so that people were surprised. Next he turned to the description of the Commander of the Faithful al-Manṣūr and how God had exalted him and to what he had appointed him. Finally, he turned to the business of mentioning his lord. When he had finished his speech, al-Manṣūr said, "As for the praise you gave God, God is more glorious and greater than description can say, and, as for your mention of the Prophet, God has given him more virtue than you said, and, as for your description of the Commander of the Faithful, God has favored him with that and He will support him in obeying Him, if God wills. As for your description of your lord, you lied and behaved disgracefully. Get out! What you said is not acceptable."

Mujjā'ah replied, "The Commander of the Faithful has spoken the truth but, by God, I did not lie about my master." They were sent out and, when they reached the end of the īwān,[302] al-Manṣūr ordered that he return with his companions and he asked, "What did you say?" and he repeated his speech as if it were on a page and he were reading it, and al-Manṣūr replied as he had done the first time, and they were sent out until they had all emerged and he ordered them to stop. Then he turned to those of Muḍar[303] who were present and asked, "Do you know among you anyone like this man? By God he spoke until I was envious (of his eloquence) and nothing prevented me from completely agreeing to his request except that it might be said that I was prejudiced for him because he was a Rabā'ī. I have never seen a man more self-

301. That is, Mujjā'ah.
302. The arched structure in which the audience was held.
303. Rivals of Rabī'ah.

possessed or clearer in eloquence than he was today. Bring him back, page." When he came before him, he returned his greeting and that of his companions and al-Manṣūr said to him, "Mention your request and the request of your lord."

He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, Ma'n b. Zā'idah is your slave, your sword and your arrow that you shot at your [397] enemy, and he struck and thrusted and shot so that what was rough became smooth and what was difficult became easy and what was stirred up in Yemen was settled and they became the chattels of the Commander of the Faithful, may God prolong his life. If the Commander of the Faithful did have in his mind a criticism from a slanderer, or a calumniator, or an envious person, the Commander of the Faithful has now shown his favor to his slave, the man who has spent his life in his service."

He accepted their representations and accepted the excuses of Ma'n and ordered them to return to him. when they reached Ma'n and he read the letter restoring him to favor, he kissed him (Mujjā'ah) between the eyes and thanked his companions, gave them robes of honor, and rewarded them according to their rank and the part they had played in the journey to al-Manṣūr. Mujjā'ah said,

I swore in the assembly of Wā'il[304] an oath that I would not sell you, O Ma'n, for greed.
O Ma'n, you have brought me prosperity.
It has become general for Lujaym and special for the family of Mujjā'ah.[305]
I shall remain attached to you until the time when the voice of the herald of death announces my passing.

The prosperity that Ma'n gave to Mujjā'ah was that he asked him for three wishes. One of these was that he was courting a noble woman from his household called Zahrā', whom nobody had yet married. This was told to her and she said, "With what

304. See note 298, above.

305. That is, Mujjā'ah's tribe. For the relationships of Bakr b. Wā'il, Shaybān, and Lujaym, see Caskel, table 141.

will he marry me? With his woollen jubbah and garments?" When he returned to Ma'n, the first thing he asked him was that he should marry him to her. Her father was in Ma'n's army. He said, "I want Zahrā' and her father is in your army, O Amīr." He married him to her for ten thousand dirhams, which he gave her as a dowry. Then Ma'n said, "What is your second wish?" and he replied, "The palm grove in which my house is in Ḥajar.[306] Its owner is in the army of the Amīr." Ma'n bought it from him and [398] handed it over to Mujjā'ah and said, "What is your third wish?" "Give me money," he replied. Ma'n ordered that he be given thirty thousand, one hundred thousand dirhams in total, and he sent him away to his house.

According to Muḥammad b. Sālim al-Khwārazmī, whose father was one of the commanders of Khurāsān,—Abū al-Faraj, the maternal uncle of 'Abdallāh b. Jabalah al-Ṭāliqānī:[307] I heard Abū Ja'far saying, "How much I need four people at my door and they should be the most decent people there." He was asked, "O Commander of the Faithful, who are they?" and he replied, "They are the pillars of the state and the state would not be safe without them as a couch would not be safe without four legs and, if one of them is missing, it is weakened. The first of these is a judge whom no reproach can deviate from what pleases God. The second is a chief of police who defends the rights of the weak from the strong. The third is a chief of taxation who investigates and does not oppress the peasants because I can dispense with their oppression. The fourth...." Then he bit on his index finger three times, saying each time "Ah, ah," and he was asked, "Who is that, O Commander of the Faithful?" and he replied, "A head of the post who writes reliable information about these men."

It is said: Al-Manṣūr summoned one of his agents who had defaulted on his taxes and said to him, "Pay what you owe," and he replied, "By God, I do not owe a single thing." The muezzin called, "I bear witness that there is no god but God," and he said, "O Commander of the Faithful, give what I owe to God and to the call that there is no god but God," and he let him go.

306. The capital of al-Yamāmah province of east central Arabia; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 221.

307. None of these individuals is known elsewhere.

He said: Al-Manṣūr appointed a Syrian to an office in the tax administration, and he approached him with his advice and said, "How well do I know what is in your mind at the moment, O brother of the people of Syria. You will go out from my presence now and you will say, 'Keep upright in your work and your work sticks to you.'" He also appointed an Iraqi to something in the taxation of the Sawād and approached him with his advice and [399] said, "How well do I know what is in your mind. You will go out now and say, 'If you become poor after that may you not thrive again.' Leave me and go to your work and, by God, If you become open to that, I will surely inflict on you the punishment you deserve!" They were both appointed to it and put things right and were sincere in their intentions.[308]

According to al-Ṣabbāḥ b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Shaybānī—Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā:[309] Al-Manṣūr appointed a man of the Arabs as governor of Ḥaḍramawt and the chief of the post wrote to al-Manṣūr that the governor often went out in pursuit of game with falcons and dogs that he had prepared. He dismissed him and wrote to him, "May your mother lose you, and may your tribe miss you. What is this equipment you prepared to slaughter wild animals? We put you in charge only of the affairs of the Muslims, not the affairs of the wild animals. Hand over the office you have been entrusted with by us to so-and-so, son of so-and-so, and go to your family, censured and banished."

According to al-Rabī':[310] Suhayl b. Sālim al-Baṣrī[311] was brought in to al-Manṣūr after he had been appointed to an office and dismissed. He ordered that he be put in prison and that money be demanded of him. Suhayl said, "Your slave, O Commander of the Faithful." "What an evil slave you are," he said, "But you are a kind master, O Commander of the Faithful," he replied. "Not to you, I'm not," said the caliph.

According to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'—his father: When I was standing

308. Freytag, Proverbia, II, 576, 584, and II, 687, 329.

309. Neither of these can be securely identified. Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā may have been the grandson of 'Īsā b. Mūsā, who was briefly governor of Yemen in al-Ma'mūn's reign ('Uyūn, 348).

310. B. Yūnus, ḥājib to al-Manṣūr; see note 16, above.

311. He is not mentioned elsewhere, nor is it known what office he held.

before al-Manṣūr, or by his head, a Khārijī who had defeated his armies was brought to him. He was preparing him for execution when his eye lighted on him in disdain, and he said, "You son of a whore! Does someone like you put armies to flight?" and the Khārijī replied to him, "Woe to you and evil to you! Between me and you yesterday there was the sword and killing and today there [400] is abuse and insult. What makes you so sure that I will respond, for I have despaired of life and you will never rescind my punishment even if asked?" Al-Manṣūr spared his life and released him and he never saw his face again.

According to 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr al-Mulaḥī—Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Ismā'īl b. Mūsā al-Hādī[312]—'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Abī Ayyūb al-Makkī—his father[313]—'Umārah b. Ḥamzah: I was with al-Manṣūr and I left him at midday after the people had taken the oath of allegiance to al-Mahdī. Al-Mahdī came to me at the time when I left and said to me, "I have heard that my father intends that the oath of allegiance should be given to my brother Ja'far,[314] and I swear by God that, if he does, I will kill him." I went immediately to the Commander of the Faithful and I said, "This matter will not wait," and the chamberlain said, "You have only just left," but I replied, "The matter is new." He gave me permission and I went in to al-Manṣūr and he said, "Hey, 'Umārah, what has brought you?" and I replied, "A new matter, O Commander of the Faithful, that I wish to tell you about." He said, "I will tell you about it before you tell me: Al-Mahdī came to you and said such-and-such," and I said, "By God, O Commander of the Faithful, it is as if you were present as the third of us." He continued, "Tell him that we are too solicitous of him (Ja'far) to expose him to you."

According to Aḥmad b. Yūsuf b. al-Qāsim—Ibrāhīm b. Ṣāliḥ:[315] We were in the audience waiting for permission to go in to al-Manṣūr and we were reminiscing about al-Ḥajjāj.[316] There were 312. A great-grandson of the caliph.

313. Muḥammad b. Abī Ayyūb, along with other notables, was arrested on a charge of zandaqah (see note 199 above) in 166/782–83 (see p. 234, below).

314. That is, Ja'far the Elder (see above, note 94).

315. B. 'Alī al-'Abbāsī, son of Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī (see note 92, above) and himself governor of Palestine and Egypt in al-Mahdī's reign.

316. B. Yūsuf al-Thaqafī, the famous governor of Iraq and the east for the Umayyad caliphs.

those among us who praised him and those who condemned him; among those who praised him was Ma'n b. Zā'idah and among those who condemned him was al-Ḥasan b. Zayd. Then we were given permission to go in to al-Manṣūr, and al-Ḥasan b. Zayd let fly and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I did not think that I would live to see the day when al-Ḥajjāj would be discussed in your house and on your carpet and given praise." Abū Ja'far replied [401] to him, "Why do you disapprove of that? He was a man whom a people (i.e., the Umayyads) entrusted with power, and he served them well. I would be happy, by God, if I could find a man like al-Ḥajjāj so that I could hand over my reponsibilities to him and settle him in one of the two Ḥarams (Mecca or Medina)." Then Ma'n said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, you have a number of men who would serve you well if you entrusted them with power," and he asked, "Who are they? It is as if you were referring to yourself." He said, "If I wanted to, I would be close to that." "You are not at all like that," the caliph replied, "A people (the Umayyads) had trust in al-Ḥajjāj, and he repaid them with trustworthiness. We had trust in you, and you betrayed us."

According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī[317]—Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī:[318] I went with the Commander of the Faithful al-Manṣūr to Mecca. I was traveling with him one day when there appeared a man on a red-colored camel riding in the open country, wearing a silk jubbah[319] and an Adenī turban. He had a whip in his hand that almost touched the ground and a notable appearance. When al-Manṣūr saw him, he ordered me to call him. He came, and the caliph asked him about his genealogy, his country, the desert his people lived in, and about the officials in charge of the ṣadaqah.[320]

317. Al-Ṭā'ī, ca. 120–206/738–821, a historian who attended the court of Hārūn and a source intermittently used by al-Ṭabarī throughout his history. In the 'Abbāsid period, he mostly contributes anecdotal material in the sections following the deaths of al-Manṣūr and al-Mahdī, from court sources including al-Rabī'. The traditionists accused him of falsehood, but al-Mas'ūdī had a good opinion of his material on the history of the Arabs; see *EI*², s.v., "al-Haytham b. 'Adī."

318. Salama b. 'Abdallāh, another occasional source of anecdote.

319. Long outer garment with open front and wide sleeves (Ahsan, Social Life, p 40).

320. The alms Muslims are enjoined to pay. At this time it was a compulsory tax, rather than a voluntary contribution, and probably the only tax a bedouin would pay.

He gave the best of answers and al-Manṣūr was amazed at what he saw in him. Then he said, "Recite to me." He recited to him a poem of Aws b. Ḥajar[321] and of other poets of the Banū 'Amr b. Tamīm. He continued to recite until he came to the poem of Ṭarīf b. Tamīm al-'Anbarī[322] which goes:

My lance is a strong wood (nab'), which neither the pinching and pressing of the straightening instrument nor grease nor fire can soften.
When I take a fearful man under my protection, his grazing places are safe, and, when I make a safe man fearful for his safety, the house looks not spacious enough for him.
When I initiate matters, they are brought to fruition; matters have a beginning and a completion.

Al-Manṣūr said, "Woe to you! What was Ṭarīf's reputation among you when he spoke this poem?" He replied, "He was the most severe of the Arabs in trampling on his enemies and the most [402] determined in retaliation, the most fortunate in character, the hardest of them with spears on those who tried his patience, the most hospitable to his guests, and the most protective to those who were in his charge. When the Arabs gathered at 'Ukāẓ,[323] all of them acknowledged that he had these qualities except one man who wanted to belittle him and he said, 'By God, you do not search far for food and do not pursue game.' He called upon him to take it upon himself not to eat anything except the meat of game he had hunted and not to avoid going every year on a raid to distant parts." Al-Manṣūr said, "O brother of the Banū Tamīm, you have done very well in describing your friend, but I myself am more truthfully described in his two verses, not he."

According to Aḥmad b. Khālid al-Fuqaymī:[324] A number of the 321. A well-known Tamīmī poet of the pre-Islamic period; Aghānī, Būlāq, X, 6; Beirut, XI, 64.

322. This poet is not quoted elsewhere by al-Ṭabarī, nor does he appear in the Aghānī.

323. The site of the famous fairs outside Mecca, where poets are said to have gathered in pre-Islamic times.

324. A source used several times in this section of the History but otherwise unknown.

Banū Hāshim related that al-Manṣūr worked at daybreak, ordering and forbidding, appointing and dismissing, policing the frontiers and borders, safeguarding the roads and supervising the taxes and the expenses and protecting the livelihood of the subjects, to drive away their poverty and to find the best means to keep them quiet and comfortable. When he had prayed the afternoon prayer, he sat down with the people of his household except those he wished to be his nighttime companions. When he had prayed the last evening prayer, he looked at the letters that had arrived from the frontiers, the borders, and outlying districts and sought the advice of his nighttime companions about whatever he needed. When a third of the night had passed, he went to his bed and his companions left. When the second third of the night had passed, he got up from his bed, performed his ablutions, and prayed before his mihrab until dawn broke, when he went out and prayed with the people. Then he went in and sat down in his audience hall (īwān).

According to Isḥāq[325]—'Abdallāh b. al-Rabī':[326] Abū Ja'far said to Ismā'īl b. 'Abdallāh,[327] "Describe the people to me," and he replied, "The people of the Ḥijāz are the beginning of Islam and the most excellent of the Arabs; the people of Iraq are the pillar of [403] Islam and the militia of the Faith; the people of Syria are the fortress of the Muslim community and the spearheads of the Imāms; the people of Khurāsān are the the horsemen of battle and the bridles of the men; the Turks are the people of the rocks and the sons of raids. The people of India are wise men who are satisfied with their country and content with it and do not aspire to what lies beyond it. The Byzantines are people of the book and of piety and whom God had removed from near to far, and the Nabaṭ[328] had an ancient kingdom but now are slaves to every nation."

325. Presumably Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā, mentioned above (see note 309).

326. Probably 'Abdallāh b. al-Rabī' al-Ḥārithī (see note 34), who is described as one of the night companions (summār) of al-Manṣūr (Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 468).

327. Al-Qasrī, a firm supporter of Marwān, the last Umayyad caliph, who was reconciled to Abū Ja'far and was briefly appointed governor of Mosul. Thus this story belongs to a genre in which Abū Ja'far looks for advice and example to the Umayyads and their supporters.

328. A term cognate with Nabataeans but generally used of the indigenous

The caliph asked, "Which governors are the best?" and he replied, "The one who gives freely and avoids evil." He asked, "Which of them is the most evil?" and he replied, "The one who is hardest on the subjects and who inflicts most violations and punishments on them." He asked, "Is obedience through fear more useful to the interests of the state or obedience through love?" and he replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, obedience through fear engulfs treachery, and it is exaggerated when it is exposed, while obedience through love engulfs diligence and goes to exaggeration when it is not examined." He asked, "Which man is most worthy of obedience?" and he replied, "The most capable in need and useful service." He asked, "What is the sign of that?" and he replied, "Quickness to answer and self-sacrifice." He asked, "Who must be appointed as wazīr to the king?" and he replied, "The soundest of heart and the farthest from passion."

According to Abū 'Ubaydallāh the secretary, I heard al-Manṣūr saying to al-Mahdī when he made him heir apparent, "O Abū 'Abdallāh, make prosperity last by giving thanks, power by forgiveness, obedience by affection, and victory by humility. Do not forget, because of your fortune in this world, your fortune from the mercy of God."

According to al-Zubayr b. Bakkār—Mubārak al-Ṭabarī[329]—Abū 'Ubaydallāh: I heard al-Manṣūr say to al-Mahdī, "Do not settle a matter without thinking about it, for the thought of the intelligent man is his mirror in which he sees his good and his evil."

According to al-Zubayr again—Muṣ'ab b. 'Abdallāh[330]—his father: I heard Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr say to al-Mahdī, "O Abū [404] 'Abdallāh, the Sulṭān is not safe except with piety, and its subjects are not safe except with obedience. The country will not thrive without justice, the prosperity of the Sulṭān and obedience to him will not last without money. You will not achieve security with-inhabitants of Iraq.

---

329. Probably to be identified with Mubārak al-Turkī (see note 227, above). Al-Ṭabarī means that he came from Ṭabaristān in northern Iran on the Caspian coast, as, of course, did the great historian himself.

330. B. Muṣ'ab al-Zubayrī, d. 233/847–84, a descendant of the Prophet's companion al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām and a source used occasionally throughout the History.

out the movement of information. The most powerful of men in forgiveness is the most powerful in punishment, and the weakest of men is he who oppresses those beneath him. Consider the work of your friend and his knowledge by putting him to the test."

According to Mubārak al-Ṭabarī—Abū 'Ubaydallāh: I heard al-Manṣūr say to al-Mahdī, "O Abū 'Abdallāh, do not hold an audience without people of knowledge to talk to you, for Muḥammad b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī[331] said, 'Conversation is male; only masculine men like it, and only effeminate men hate it.' The brother of Zuhra spoke the truth."

According to 'Alī b. Mujāhid b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī:[332] Al-Manṣūr said to al-Mahdī, "O Abū 'Abdallāh, he who loves praise has the best conduct, and he who hates praise has the worst. No one hates praise except he who seeks to be derogated, and nobody is derogated without being hated."

According to Mubārak al-Ṭabarī—Abū 'Ubaydallāh: Al-Manṣūr said to al-Mahdī, "O Abū 'Abdallāh, the intelligent man is not the one who makes efforts when disaster befalls him until he escapes from it but he who makes efforts when disaster threatens so that it does not befall him."

According to al-Fuqaymī—'Utbah b. Hārūn:[333] Abū Ja'far said to al-Mahdī one day, "How many banners do you have?"[334] and he replied, "I do not know," and Abū Ja'far said, "This, by God, is utter heedlessness, which denotes that in the caliphate you will be more heedless. But I have gathered for you what will not be affected by loss, no matter how negligent you are. Fear God in what He has bestowed on you."

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad[335]—Ḥafṣ b. 'Umar b. Ḥammād[336]—Khālişah:[337] I went in to al-Manṣūr and he was com- [405]

331. Al-Zuhrī, d. 119/737, was one of the great early authorities on the Traditions of the Prophet; see EI[1], s.v. "al-Zuhrī."

332. A source used fairly commonly in sections I and II of his history but only twice for the 'Abbāsid period (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 51 above).

333. Unknown elsewhere.

334. Meaning "How many offices are at your disposal?"

335. Probably al-Nawfalī; see note 23, above.

336. Not known elsewhere.

337. One of only three examples of a female narrator in this volume. For the others, see Afrīk, above, p. 60, and Jamrah al-'Aṭṭārah, below, p. 152.

plaining of a toothache and, when he heard my noise, he said, "Come in," so I went in and there he was resting his hand on his temples. He was silent for a while and then he said to me, "O Khālişah, how much money do you have?" and I replied that I had a thousand *dirham*s. He said, "Put your hand on my head and swear," so I said that I had ten thousand *dīnār*s. He then said, "Bring them to me," so I returned and went in to al-Mahdī and al-Khayzurān[338] and told them. Al-Mahdī kicked me with his foot and said to me, "Why did you go to him? He has no illness, but I asked him yesterday for money and he pretended to be ill. Take him the sum you mentioned." I did that and when al-Mahdī came to him he said, "O Abū 'Abdallāh, you were complaining of need, while Khālişah had all this!!"

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—Wāḍiḥ, freedman of Abū Ja'far: Abū Ja'far said one day, "See what worn-out clothes you have and collect them together and, when you know of the approach of Abū 'Abdallāh, bring them to me before he enters and bring rags with them." I did this and, when al-Mahdī came to him, he was assessing the value of the rags and al-Mahdī laughed and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, people say about this, 'They look after the dīnār and the dirham and what is less than that,'" but he did not say the dāniq.[339] Al-Manṣūr replied, "There are not new clothes for him who does not mend his worn garment. This winter has arrived, and we need clothes for the family and children." Al-Mahdī said, "I will pay for the clothing of the Commander of the Faithful and his family and children." He said, "Fine, get on with it."

According to 'Alī b. Marthad[340] Abū Di'āmah the poet—
[406] Ashja' b. 'Amr al-Sulamī[341]—al-Mu'ammil b. Umayl:[342] This

338. Mother of al-Hādī and Hārūn al-Rashīd. Al-Mahdī married her in 159/775–76, and she died in 173/789–90.

339. Small copper coin of very little value. This refers to the nickname al-Manṣūr was given by the people because of stinginess, i.e., Abū al-Dawānīq.

340. The addendum suggests this name should read Yazīd. He is also recorded as a transmitter of poetry. See Ṭabarī, III, 593.

341. See Aghānī, Būlāq, XVII, 30; Beirut, XVIII, 143.

342. B. Usayd al-Muḥāribi. For this poet, see Aghānī, Būlāq, XIX, 147; Beirut, XXII, 255, where the narrative and the poem are given with minor variations. He had been a poet in Umayyad times but was attached to al-Mahdī, and it was for him that his best-known work was done.

is also according to 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥasan al-Khwārazmī[343]—Abū Qudāmah[344]—al-Mu'ammil b. Umayl: I came to al-Mahdī, says Ibn Marthad in his narrative, when he was heir apparent (al-Khwārazmī says: I came to him in al-Rayy when he was heir apparent), and he ordered that I be given twenty thousand dirhams for some verses in which I praised him. The head of the post wrote about this to al-Manṣūr, who was in the City of Peace, telling him that al-Mahdī had ordered that twenty thousand dirhams be paid to a poet. Al-Manṣūr wrote to him reproving and criticizing him, saying that he needed to give the poet, after he had remained at his gate for a year, only four thousand dirhams.

According to Abū Qudāmah: Al-Mahdī's secretary wrote to me asking me to send him the poet; he was sought but could not be found, so he wrote saying that he had set out for the City of Peace. Al-Manṣūr sent one of his commanders to wait at the bridge of Nahrawān and ordered him to scrutinize the people who were crossing one by one until he came across al-Mu'ammil. When he saw him he said, "Who are you?" and he replied, "I am al-Mu'ammil b. Umayl, one of the guests of the Prince al-Mahdī." He said, "You are the one I am looking for," and al-Mu'ammil said that his heart almost burst for fear of Abū Ja'far. "He seized me and brought me to the gate of al-Maqṣūrah and handed me over to al-Rabī'. Al-Rabī' went in to al-Manṣūr and said, 'This is the poet whom we have arrested,' and he said, 'Bring him in to me,' so I was brought in to him. I greeted him and he returned the greeting, and I said to myself, 'There is nothing but good in this.' He said, 'You are al-Mu'ammil b. Umayl?' and I said, 'Yes, may God preserve the Commander of the Faithful.' He said, 'You came to an inexperienced youth and cheated him,' and I replied, 'Yes, may God preserve the Commander of the Faithful, I came to an [407] inexperienced and generous young man and cheated him and he allowed himself to be cheated.' That seemed to please him, and he asked me to recite to him what I said about al-Mahdī. I recited:

He is al-Mahdī, except that in him is the similarity to the appearance of the shining moon.

343. Called al-Ḥarrānī in the Aghānī narrative.

344. Possibly 'Uthmān b. Muḥammad, who is recorded twice before in al-Ṭabarī's History.

The one and the other are similar when they both shine;
they are confusing to the discerning.
One in the dark is the lamp of night;
the other in the day is the lamp of light.
But the Merciful One has preferred one to the other by giving him pulpits and the throne
And a glorious kingdom. For that one is the Prince;
but the other is neither a prince nor a wazīr.
The decline of the month darkens one,
but the other shines at the decline of months.
O pure son of the caliph of God!
In him the boasting of the boastful overtops.
If you have outstripped the kings, and they come to you from flat lands and rugged places,
Your father (before you) preceded the kings also, so that they are left one stumbling and one lagging behind.
You come after him, running swiftly.
There is no weariness in you when you run.
The people say, 'What are these two if not perfectly suited and competent for the rank?
If the elder comes first he is worthy of his precedence;
he has the virtue of the elder over the younger.
If the younger covers the same distance as the elder had,
the younger was created from the elder.'

Al-Manṣūr said, 'You have done well, but this is not worth twenty thousand dirhams,' and he continued, 'Where is the money?' and I said, 'Here it is.' He said, 'Rabī', go down with him and and give him four thousand dirhams and take the rest.' Al-Rabī' went out and he put down my load, weighed out four thousand dirhams for me and took the rest. When the caliphate passed [408] to al-Mahdī he appointed Ibn Thawbān[345] to the maẓālim. He used to hold audience for the people in al-Ruṣāfah and, when his robe was full of notes, he would take them up to al-Mahdī. One day I took him in a note in which I told my story. When Ibn Thawbān brought them in, al-Mahdī began to look through the notes until, when he saw mine, he laughed and Ibn Thawbān said to him, 'God preserve the Commander of the Faithful, I did not see you laugh at any of these notes except this one.' He replied, 'I know the reason behind it; give him back the twenty thousand dirhams,' so they were returned to me and I left."

345. Not known elsewhere.

According to Wāḍiḥ, freedman of al-Manṣūr: One day I was standing at the head of Abū Ja'far when al-Mahdī came in to him, wearing a new, black cloak. He gave a greeting, sat down and then got up to go. Abū Ja'far followed him with his eyes because of his love for and delight in him. When he was in the middle of the portico, he stumbled on his sword and tore his black cloak. He got up and continued on his way unperturbed and unconcerned with what had happened. Abū Ja'far said, "Bring back Abū 'Abdallāh," so we brought him back to him and he said, "O Abū 'Abdallāh, is it disparaging of gifts or arrogance in prosperity or lack of knowledge of the occasion of misfortune, as if you were ignorant of what you have and of your responsibilities?! The position you are in is a gift from God; if you give thanks to Him for it, He will increase it for you, and, if you acknowledge that the time of misfortune in it is from Him, He will forgive you." Al-Mahdī replied, "May God not shorten your life, O Commander of the Faithful, or your guidance. Praise be to God for His beneficence and I give God thanks for His gifts and the glorious compensation by His mercy." Then he left.

According to al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd b. Mazyad[346]—Nā'im b. Mazyad—al-Waḍīn b. 'Aṭā': Abū Ja'far wanted me to visit him, as there had been friendship between him and me before the ('Abbāsid) caliphate. I went to the City of Peace, and one day when we were alone together he said to me, "O Abū 'Abdallāh, [409] what is your wealth?" and I replied, "The wealth the Commander of the Faithful knows of," and then he asked, "What is your household?" and I replied, "Three daughters, my wife, and a maidservant for them." He said, "That is four in your house?" and I said, "Yes," and, by God, he repeated that to me, so that I thought that he was going to make me rich. Then he raised his head and said, "You are the most prosperous of the Arabs with the four spindles they are turning in your house."

346. Al-Āmulī al-Bayrūtī contributes a number of narratives to the first section of the History but nothing else in the Umayyad or 'Abbāsid period. The other two names in the isnād are unknown.

According to Bishr al-Munajjim:[347] Abū Ja'far called me one day at sunset and sent me off on some errand, and when I returned he lifted the corner of his prayer mat and there was a dīnār, and he said to me, "Take this and keep it," and I have it to this hour.

According to Abū al-Jahm b. 'Aṭiyyah[348]—Abū Muqātil al-Khurāsānī: One of his pages let Abū Ja'far know that he had ten thousand dirhams, and Abū Ja'far took it from him, saying, "This is my money." The man asked, "How can it be your money? By God, I was never appointed in any office by you, and there is no kinship or relationship between you and me." Abū Ja'far said, "Yes, you were married to a freedwoman of 'Uyaynah b. Mūsā b. Ka'b,[349] and she bequeathed you some wealth. That man was disobedient, and he took my money when he was governor of Sind, and this is part of that money."

According to Muṣ'ab—Sallām—Abū Ḥārithah al-Nahdī, the master of the treasury:[350] Abū Ja'far appointed a man to Bārūsamā,[351] and when his governorship was over the caliph wanted an excuse for not giving him anything, so he said, "I took you into my confidence and appointed you to part of the fay'[352] of the Muslims and you have betrayed it," and he replied, "I ask God's protection against you, O Commander of the Faithful; I kept nothing from that office except a little bit of a dirham which I slipped into my sleeve so as to use it when I go out from you, to hire a mule to go to my family, and I shall enter my house without any of the wealth of God or of your wealth," and al-Manṣūr said,

---

347. Al-Munajjim means "the astrologer." Not known elsewhere.

348. This isnād poses problems. Abū al-Jahm b. 'Aṭiyyah played an important role in the proclamation of al-Saffāḥ as caliph and is described as his wazīr. He disappears from the record after 137/755, but the narrative must date from after 'Uyaynah's rebellion in 142/759–60.

349. He was governor of Sind and rebelled in 142/759–60 but was captured and executed [see al-Ṭabarī, III, 138–39; Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 448].

350. Ṣāḥib Bayt al-Māl. Nothing seems to be known of this individual or of the office he held. Nahd were a Yemeni clan, many of whom settled in al-Kūfah.

351. In the sawād of Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 320; Le Strange, Lands, 70, 81.

352. The booty taken in the Islamic conquests, which, it was argued, should be treated as the common propoerty of the Muslim community as a whole.

"I do not doubt that you are telling the truth. Give us our dirham!" and he took it from him and put it under his skullcap and said, "You and I are like the protector of Umm ʿĀmir," to which the man said, "What is the protector of Umm ʿĀmir?" and he told him the story of the hyena and its protector.[353] Al-Manṣūr only treated him harshly in order not to give him anything. [410]

According to Muṣʿab—Hishām b. Muḥammad:[354] Qutham b. al-ʿAbbās went in to Abū Jaʿfar and made a request and Abū Jaʿfar said to him, "Do not bother me with this request of yours. Tell me why you are called Qutham," and he replied, "By God, O Commander of the Faithful, I do not know," and he said, "Qutham is someone who eats and carries away food. Have you not heard the words of the poet?

The great ones eat how they wish.
The eating of the little ones is gulping down and carrying away."

According to Muṣʿab—Ibrāhīm b. ʿĪsā: Al-Manṣūr gave twenty thousand dirhams to Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and ten thousand to his brother Jaʿfar. Jaʿfar said, "O Commander of the Faithful, you preferred him to me, and I am older than he." He replied, "Do you think you are similar to him? Wherever we turn we find some trace of Muḥammad in it and some part of his gifts in our house, whereas you do not do any of this."

According to Muṣʿab—Sawādah b. ʿAmr al-Sulamī—ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAṭāʾ, one of the courtiers[355] of al-Manṣūr: I heard Ibn Hubayrah[356] saying, when he was giving audience, "I never saw in battle or heard of in peace a man more crafty, more amazing, or more alert than al-Manṣūr. He besieged me in my city for nine months. I had with me the horsemen of the Arabs,[357] and we

353. Freytag, Proverbia, II, 333, explains the reference. The hunted hyena (Umm ʿĀmir) had been protected and fed by an Arab, whom he had subsequently killed.

354. See above, note 272.

355. Ṣaḥābah; see above, note 143. Neither Sawādah nor ʿAbd al-Malik is recorded elsewhere.

356. Yazīd b. ʿUmar b. Hubayrah, the last Umayyad governor of Iraq, was besieged in Wāsiṭ by Abū Jaʿfar and executed after his surrender.

357. Fursān al-ʿArab, in contrast to the ʿAbbāsid troops, many of whom were Persians.

strove with all our might to take advantage of his army and defeat
[411] it, but there was no opportunity. When he began the siege there was not a white hair on my head; when I surrendered to him there was not a black one. As the poet al-A'shā says:[358]

He stands out in spite of his people.
He forgives, if he wishes, or takes revenge,
The brother of war, with no enfeebling weakness, who does not wear worn-out sandals."

According to Ibrāhīm b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān:[359] Abū Ja'far was staying with a man called Azhar al-Sammān, not the traditionist.[360] This was before his caliphate, and, when he succeeded to the caliphate, Azhar went to him in the City of Peace, and, when he was admitted, the caliph asked him what he wanted. He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, I have a debt of 4,000 dirhams and my house is falling down, and my son Muḥammad wants to marry." He ordered that he be given 12,000 dirhams and said, "O Azhar, do not come to us making requests," and he agreed. After a little he returned, and the caliph asked him what had brought him. He replied, "I came to greet you, O Commander of the Faithful" and he said, "It occurs to me that you have come to us for the things for which you came to us the first time," and he ordered him to be given twelve thousand dirhams and said, "O Azhar, do not come to us making requests or greeting us," and he agreed. He did not wait long before he returned, and the caliph asked him what had brought him and he said, "A prayer I heard from you that I wanted to learn." The caliph replied, "You should not want it, for it has not been granted because I called on God in it to spare me from your foolishness, and he has not done so." He sent him away and did not give him anything.

According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī—Ibn 'Ayyāsh: Ibn Hubayrah sent to al-Manṣūr when he was besieged in Wāsiṭ, and al-Manṣūr was confronting him saying, "I will be coming out on such-and-such a day and meet you in single combat, for I have heard that you call me coward." Al-Manṣūr wrote to him:

358. Maymūn b. Qays, ca. 570–625, a well-known blind poet of the pre-Islamic period from central Arabia; see Aghānī, Būlāq, VIII, 77; Beirut, IX, 104; *EI*², s.v. "al-A'shā."

359. Not recorded elsewhere.

360. Probably to distinguish him from Azhar b. Sa'īd b. Nāfi', used by al-Ṭabarī as a source earlier in section III. Sammān means "butter merchant."

> O Ibn Hubayrah, you are a man without self-control and running in the reins of your sin. God threatens you with what He tells the truth about, and Satan raises your hopes with what he lies about and allows the approach of what God keeps away and gradually things will run their course. I have found a fable for you and me. I have heard that a lion met a pig, and the pig said to him, "Fight me," and the lion replied, "But you are only a pig and you are not a match or equal for me. When I do what you are asking me to and I kill you, it will be said to me, 'You killed a pig,' and I will not gain any reputation or mention from that, and if I obtain something from you it will be a disgrace to me," and the pig replied, "If you do not do this, I shall go back to the other lions and tell them that you have flinched from me and were too cowardly to fight me," and the lion said, "Bearing the dishonor of your lies is easier for me than the shame of staining my mustache with your blood." [412]

According to Muḥammad b. Riyāḥ al-Jawharī:[361] Abū Ja'far was told about the planning of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik[362] in one of his wars, so he sent for a man who was with him and settled in Ruṣāfah Hishām[363] to ask him about that war. When he arrived he said to him, "You were a companion of Hishām?" and he replied, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful." Al-Manṣūr went on, "Tell me about his war, which he handled in the year so-and-so." The man said, "He, may God have mercy on him, did such-and-such," and then he went on "he did such-and-such, may God be pleased with him." Abū Ja'far became annoyed at this and said, "May God's wrath come upon you. You tread on my carpet and ask blessings for my enemy," and the old man stood up and said, "Your enemy put a necklace on my neck and favor on my head that no one will remove except the man who washes my body when I am dead." Al-Manṣūr ordered him to return and said, "Stay. Look, what did you say?" "I said that he saved me from begging people and protected my face from asking favors. Since I saw him, I have not stopped at the gate of an Arab or a non-Arab. Should I not feel obliged to mention him favorably and bestow [413] my praise on him?" He said, "Yes, what a mother that gave birth to you and what a night that was disclosed on you! I bear witness that you are the son of a freeborn mother and of a noble father." Then he listened to him and ordered that he be given gifts. He said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I do not take it out of need but only so that I may be honored by your generosity and boast of your gift." Then he took his gift and went out, and al-Manṣūr said, "Where in our army is there a man like that? To such a man favor is recommended, kindness finds its proper place, and the protected valuables can be given."

361. Not recorded elsewhere. Jawharī means "a jeweler."

362. Umayyad caliph, 105–25/724–43.

363. Ancient Sergiopolis, the ruins now called al-Ruṣāfah, south of al-Raqqah in the Syrian desert, a favorite residence of Hishām. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 47; Le Strange, Lands, 106.

According to Ḥafṣ b. Ghiyāth[364]—Ibn 'Ayyāsh: A number of the people of al-Kūfah continued to speak evil of their administrator ('āmil) and complain about their governor (amīr)[365] and verbally attack their Sulṭān. This was told to al-Manṣūr in a report, and he said to al-Rabī', "Go out to those of the people of al-Kūfah who are at the gate and tell them that the Commander of the Faithful says to them, 'If two of you gather together in a place, I will shave their heads and their beards and strike their backs so go to your houses and take care of yourselves.'" Al-Rabī' went out to them with this message, and Ibn 'Ayyāsh[366] said to him, "O you who look like 'Īsā b. Maryam,[367] tell the Commander of

364. Al-Nakha'ī: qāḍī of the Sharqiyyah of Baghdad and later of al-Kūfah and an important traditionist of Hārūn's reign. He is also an occasional source for section I of the History; see al-Khaṭīb, VIII, 188.

365. It is not clear whether the 'āmil and the amīr are two different officials or whether this duplication is simply for rhetorical effect. For the language of appointments, see above, note 28.

366. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ayyāsh al-Ḥamdānī, d. 158/774–75. He was a member of the saḥābah of al-Manṣūr and famous for his wit: see al-Khaṭīb, X, 14–16. He also appears as a source for both Umayyad and 'Abbāsid material and was used by al-Haytham b. 'Adī.

367. Possibly a reference to Qur'ān, XLIII: 61: "And (Īsā) shall be a Sign for the the Faithful from us what you told us from him and say to him, 'By God, O Commander of the Faithful, we cannot tolerate beating, but if you want beards shaved....'" Ibn 'Ayyāsh was cleanshaven. When al-Manṣūr was informed, he laughed and said, "What a really crafty and wicked man!"

According to Mūsā b. Ṣāliḥ[368]—Muḥammad b. 'Uqbah al-Ṣaydāwī[369]—Naṣr b. Ḥarb, who was in the guard of al-Manṣūr: There was brought to me a man from a distant part who had plotted to undermine the state, so I brought him in to Abū Ja'far and when he saw him he said, "Are you Aṣbagh?"[370] and he said, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful," so the caliph continued, "Woe to you. Did I not free you and do good to you?" and he said, "Yes." "And you have striven to destroy my state and undermine [414] my rule," and he said, "I have done wrong, and forgiveness is more becoming for the Commander of the Faithful." Abū Ja'far called 'Umārah,[371] who was present, and said to him, "O 'Umārah, this is Aṣbagh." 'Umarah started to gaze intently into my face because he had evil in his eyes and said, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful," and al-Manṣūr said, "Bring me the purse that contains my ('aṭā')," and so the purse was brought and there were five hundred *dirham*s in it, and he said, "Take it. It is pure silver, woe to you! Go to your work," and he pointed with his hand and moved it. 'Umārah said, "I asked Aṣbagh what the Commander of the Faithful meant and he replied, 'When I was a young man, I made ropes and he used to eat from my earnings.'"[372]

Naṣr said: Then he was brought again, and I took him in as I had before and, when he stood before him, he stared at him and said, "Aṣbagh!" and he replied, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful," and he told him what he did to him and reminded him of it, coming of the Hour of Judgment; therefore have no doubt about the Hour but follow ye Me; this is a Straight Way," but it may be that Ibn 'Ayyāsh is insinuating that al-Rabī'—like 'Īsā—had no father.

---

368. Probably the traditionist Mūsā b. Ṣāliḥ b. Shaykh, d. 257/871 (al-Khaṭīb, XIII, 42–43). He appears again as a narrator; see al-Ṭabarī, III, 589

369. Ṣaydāwī means from Sidon (Saydā) in Lebanon Not known elsewhere.

370. No further information seems to be known about him.

371. B. Ḥamzah; see note 214, above.

372. That is, during Abū Ja'far's wanderings before the 'Abbāsids came to power.

and he admitted it and said, "Stupidity, O Commander of the Faithful," so he brought him forward and cut off his head.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Nawfalī—his father: The dye used by al-Manṣūr was saffron, and that was because his hair was soft and would not take dye. His beard was thin and I saw him in the pulpit, preaching and weeping, and the tears hastened down his beard and dripped because of its softness and thinness.

Ibrāhīm b. 'Abd al-Salām, son of the brother of al-Sindī b. Shāhik —al-Sindī:[373] Al-Manṣūr captured one of the great men of the Banū Umayyah and said, "I will ask you something and, if you tell me the truth, you will be safe." The man agreed and al-Manṣūr asked, "What happened to the Banū Umayyah that their affairs fell into disorder?" He said, "Neglecting information." Then he asked, "What sort of wealth did they find most useful?" and he said, "Jewels." He asked, "Among what people did they find most loyalty?" and he replied, "Their freedmen." Al-Manṣūr wanted to ask for help from members of his family in gathering information, but then he said, "I would diminish their status," and he sought help from his freedmen.

[415] According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Hāshimī—his father, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān: I was told that al-Manṣūr took medicine on a very cold winter day and I went to him to ask him about the effect of the medicine on him. I was admitted by an entrance to the palace I had never been in before. Then I went into a little enclosure with one room in it and a portico in front of it, at the edge of the house and the courtyard, supported on teak columns. Over the front of the portico, curtains (bawārī) were hanging, as they do in mosques.[374] I went in and in the room was a coarse carpet and nothing else except his mattress, his pillows, and his blankets, and I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, this room is not worthy of you," and he replied, "O my uncle, this is the room

373. A mawlā (freedman) of al-Manṣūr, who became a powerful figure in the reigns of Hārūn and al-Amīn. He died in 204/819 (Crone, Slaves, 194–95). Ibrāhīm b. 'Abd al-Salām is recorded (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 580) as transmitter of another story from al-Sindī, this time about the caliph al-Hādī.

374. The architectural vocabulary is interesting here. Hujayrah is the word I have translated as "little enclosure," bayt as "room," rīwāq as "portico."

I sleep in," and I asked if there was anything more than what I saw, and he said, "There is only what you see."

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Hāshimī: I heard him say on the authority of someone who spoke on the authority of Ja'far b. Muḥammad who said that it was said that Abū Ja'far was accustomed to wear a ragged Harawī jubbah[375] and that he patched his shirt, and Ja'far said, "Thanks be to God, Who favored him by afflicting him with poverty on his person," or he said, "With poverty in his power."

He said that his father told him: Al-Manṣūr never appointed someone to an official post and then dismissed him without throwing him in the house of Khālid al-Baṭīn (the fat), which was on the bank of the Tigris adjoining the house of Ṣāliḥ al-Miskīn,[376] to extract money from the dismissed man. He ordered that everything that was taken should be inscribed with the name of the man from whom it had been taken and deposited in a treasury that he called the treasury of the maẓālim.[377] The quantity of money and goods in that treasury became enormous. Then he said to al-Mahdī, "I have given you something with which you can please the people and not spend any of your own money. When I am dead, summon those from whom I have taken this [416] wealth that I have called the maẓālim and return it to them just as it was taken from them, and you will earn their praise and that of the people," and al-Mahdī did that when he succeeded.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad: Al-Manṣūr appointed 'Abdallāh b. Sulaymān b. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. Rabī'ah b. al-Ḥārith as governor of Balqā'[378] and then dismissed him and 375. For jubbah, see note 319, above. Harawī means that it was made in Herat, Afghanistan.

376. Khālid is otherwise unknown. Ṣāliḥ al-Miskīn ("the poor," apparently because of his ascetic life style) was a son of al-Manṣūr. For this palace, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 108.

377. Maẓālim means "complaints" and was the name given to the court where people could complain about government injustice.

378. I have accepted the reading of this name proposed by Houtsma, editor of the Leiden edition. The two manuscripts on which this portion of the text is based—Koprulü 1040 and Berlin—give different versions, but the editor has retrieved the correct form from Ya'qūbī and Ibn al-Athīr; see p. 416 n. a. This may be another version of the incidents related below, pp 207 and 218, where 'Abdallāh is appointed to Yemen and dismissed and arrested by al-Mahdī. Balqā' is in modern Jordan near 'Ammān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, 489; Le Strange, Palestine, 34–35.

ordered that he should be brought to him with the wealth that was found on him. He was taken by the postal service along with two thousand *dīnār*s, which were carried by the post with his luggage, which consisted of a Sūsanjird prayer rug,[379] a quilt, bedding, two cushions, a bowl and an ewer, and an alkali holder[380] made of copper. He found it all together with his equipment, but the baggage was worn out, so he took the two thousand *dīnār*s but was ashamed to take the baggage and said, "I do not recognize it," and left it. Later al-Mahdī appointed him governor of the Yemen and al-Rashīd appointed his son, called Rabrā,[381] to Medina.

According to Aḥmad b. al-Haytham b. Ja'far b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī[382]—Ṣabbāḥ b. Khāqān: I was with Abū Ja'far when the head of Ibrāhīm b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan was brought.[383] It was put in front of him on a shield. One of the executioners leaned over it and spat in its face, and Abū Ja'far stared at him hard and said to [417] me, "Strike his nose." I struck his nose with a staff such a blow that you could not find his nose for a thousand *dīnār*s. Then the staffs of the guard began on him, and he was pounded by them until he became unconscious and he was dragged out by the feet.

According to al-Aṣma'ī[384]—Ja'far b. Sulaymān: Ash'ab[385] came to Baghdad in the days of Abū Ja'far and he was surrounded by the young men of Banū Hāshim and he sang to them and, when his songs were moving and his voice was (as good) as ever, Ja'far said to him, "Who composed this poem?

---

379. Sūsanjird textiles were produced at Qurqub in Khūzistān. See Le Strange, Lands, 241.

380. Ushnāndānah, for holding the ashes of glasswort used for cleaning the hands.

381. Houtsma, citing Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 147, establishes that his true name was Muḥammad. The reading of Rabrā is uncertain, and the editor (Addendum, DCLIV) suggests Zirā as a possible alternative. The significance of the name, which is described as a laqab, or title, is quite unclear to me.

382. A grandson of al-Manṣūr's cousin Ja'far b. Sulaymān (see note 35, above). He contributes one other anecdote, below, p. 000.

383. The 'Alid rebel killed in 145/763.

384. 'Abd al-Malik b. Qarīb al-Nahwī, d. 210/825–86, a well-known grammarian and historian who was originally from al-Baṣrah but came to Baghdad in Hārūn's reign. He contributes occasional information on the Umayyads and 'Abbāsids to al-Ṭabarī's History; see EI[2], s.v. "al-Aṣma'ī."

385. Ash'ab b. Jubayr, d. after 154/771, a famous singer of the early 'Abbāsid court. See Aghānī, Būlāq, XVII, 83; Beirut, XIX, 69.

Whose are the traces of the camp at Dhāt al-Jaysh, which became obliterated and worn out?
They (the women on the riding camels) were out in the open desert, and the grief-stricken passed a sleepless night."

He replied, "I took the song from Ma'bad.[386] I used to take melodies from him and if he was asked for it he would say, 'Go to Ash'ab, for he has a better rendering of it than I.'"

According to al-Aṣma'ī—Ja'far b. Sulaymān: Ash'ab said to his son 'Ubaydah "I think that I will expel you from my house and banish you," and he asked, "Why, O Father?" and his father replied, "I am the best of God's creatures in earning a loaf of bread, and you are my son and you have reached this age of maturity and you are still in my household and have not earned anything." His son said, "I do earn, but I am like the banana tree that does not bear fruit until its mother dies."

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Hāshimī—his father Muḥammad: The Sasanians used to cover the roofs of their houses with clay in the summer every day and the king had his siesta there. Stems of canes and willows, long and thick, were brought and put together closely around the house. Large pieces of ice were brought and put in the spaces between them. The Umayyads did the same, and al-Manṣūr was the first to use sackcloth. [418]

Some people say that at the beginning of his caliphate al-Manṣūr made a clay house for himself in which to take his siesta in the summer. Abū Ayyūb al-Khūzī brought heavy cloths for him, which were dampened and placed on a wooden framework, and he enjoyed its cold and said, "I reckon that if you took thicker cloths than these, they would hold more water and would be colder." So he took sackcloth, and it was made into a dome for him. Then the caliphs after him took woven palm leaves, and the people did likewise.[387]

386. Two famous singers of this name are known: Ma'bad b. Wahb, who was well known in the Umayyad court of Damascus in the reign of al-Walīd b. Yazīd, d. 126/744, and Ma'bad al-Yaqṭīnī, who appeared at court in Hārūn's reign and was attached to the Barmakids; it is difficult to link either of these chronologically to Ash'ab. See Aghānī, Būlāq, I, 19 XII, 168; Beirut, I, 47, XIV, 110.

387. For a discussion of these methods of cooling, see Ahsan, Social Life, 182–83.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—his father: There was a man of the Rāwandiyyah called al-Ablaq (piebald), who was a leper, and he preached extremism[388] and called men to the Rāwandiyyah, alleging that the spirit that was in Jesus, son of Mary, passed to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and then to the Imāms, one after the other, to Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad,[389] and that they were gods. These Rāwandiyyah made the forbidden lawful to the extent that a man of them summoned a group of them to his house, fed them, gave them drink, and offered them his wife. News of this reached Asad b. ʿAbdallāh,[390] and he killed them and crucified them, but this still continues among them to the present day. They worshiped Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr, and they climbed up to the Khaḍrāʾ[391] and threw themselves off as if they could fly. A group of them attacked [419] the people with arms and began shouting for Abū Jaʿfar, "You, you!" He went out against them in person to fight them, and they continued to say, "You, you!" while they were fighting.

He said: It was told to us on the authority of one of our shaykhs that he watched the group of the Rāwandiyyah throwing themselves off the Khaḍrāʾ as if they were flying, and none of them reached the ground without being broken in pieces and his soul going out.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit,[392] the freedman of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī—his father: When ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī was hiding from al-Manṣūr in al-Baṣrah with Sulaymān b. ʿAlī,[393] he looked out one day, and there were with him a number of his freedmen and a freedman of Sulaymān b. ʿAlī, and he saw a man of beauty and perfection walking haughtily[394] and dragging his

388. Ghuluww, meaning extremely heterodox ideas that often included, as here, ideas of the transmigration of souls.

389. Brother of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, killed by the Umayyads immediately before the ʿAbbāsid Revolution and often referred to as Ibrāhīm al-Imām.

390. Al-Qasrī, Umayyad governor of Khurāsān, 116–19/734–37. See Crone, Slaves, 102; and *EI*², s.v. "Asad b. ʿAbdallāh."

391. The name given to al-Manṣūr's palace in the Round City in Baghdad because of its green dome. Le Strange, Baghdad, 31–33.

392. Not known elsewhere.

393. After his abortive rebellion against al-Manṣūr, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī took refuge with his brother Sulaymān, who was at that time governor of al-Baṣrah.

394. Khaja'a is a kind of walk in which a man pushes his buttocks backward and goes on slowly and haughtily.

long clothes as a sign of pride. He turned to the freedman of Sulaymān b. 'Alī and asked him who it was, and he replied that it was so-and-so, son of so-and-so the Umayyad. 'Abdallāh flew into a rage and clapped his hands in amazement and said, "There is still a hillock in our road," and he ordered one of his freedmen to go down and bring him his head. He found a simile in the words of Sudayf:[395]

Why and wherefore do we neglect 'Abd Shams,[396] having a bleat in every flock?
It would not redeem the tomb in Ḥarrān,[397]
even if it were killed in its entirety.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī: After the defeat of 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī and his capture by al-Manṣūr and his imprisonment in Baghdad, a delegation of the people of Syria[398] came to Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, among them al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān. A number of them stood up and made their speeches, and then al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān[399] stood up and said, "May God protect the Commander of the Faithful. We are not a delegation of boasting but a delegation of repentance. We were put to the test in the revolt that stirred up our noble and carried away our prudent. We confess what we have done and seek pardon for our previous deeds. If you punish us, it is for the crimes we have committed, and, if you forgive us, it is because of your generosity to us. [420] Forgive us since you have the power; give us an amnesty since you are able. Do good when you have been victorious and you have always been doing good." Abū Ja'far said, "It is done."

395. Sudayf b. Maymūn; see Aghānī, Būlāq, XIV, 162; Beirut, XVI, 86. A Ḥijāzī poet of Umayyad times who was a partisan of the Banū Hāshim and forced into hiding. He survived into the 'Abbāsid period. This is the only citation of this poet in al-Ṭabarī's History.

396. The ancestor of the Umayyads and brother to Hāshim, ancestor of the 'Abbāsids and 'Alids.

397. Near Edessa (modern Urfa) just north of the Turkish-Syrian frontier. Marwān, the last Umayyad caliph, had made it his capital. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 235, quotes a parallel verse that makes it clear that the tomb referred to is that of the 'Abbāsid Ibrāhīm al-Imām.

398. 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī had received most of his support from the people of Syria; see Kennedy, 'Abbasid Caliphate, 58–61.

399. Al-Ḥarashī, nothing more is known of him.

According to al-Haytham b. ʿAdī—Zayd, freedman of ʿĪsā b. Nahīk:[400] Al-Manṣūr called me after the death of my master and said, "O Zayd," and I said, "Your servant, O Commander of the Faithful," and he continued, "How much money did Abū Zayd leave?" and I replied that it was about a thousand *dīnār*s, and then he asked, "Where is it?" and I said that his widow had spent it on his funeral, and he was surprised at that and said, "The widow spent a thousand *dīnār*s on his funeral. I am amazed at this." Then he asked, "How many daughters did he leave?" and I said that there were six, and he bowed his head in silence for a long time. Then he looked up and said, "Go in the morning to al-Mahdī's gate." I went and I was asked if I had a mule with me and I replied that I had not been provided with that or with anything else and that I did not know why I had been summoned. I was given one hundred and eighty thousand *dīnār*s and ordered to give each of ʿĪsa's daughters thirty thousand *dīnār*s. Al-Manṣūr summoned me and asked me, "Have you collected what we ordered for the daughters of Abū Zayd?" and I replied, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful," and he said, "In the morning bring to me those who are of suitable rank so that I can marry them to those men." I brought him three of the children of al-ʿAkkī and three of the family of Nahīk, their paternal cousins, and he married each of them off with a dowry of thirty thousand *dirham*s and ordered that their dowries should be brought to them from his own money. He told me to use the money he had ordered to buy estates for them to provide an income for them, so I did that.

According to al-Haytham: In one day Abū Jaʿfar distributed to a group of his family ten million *dirham*s, and he ordered that a single one of his paternal uncles be given one million. We do not know of any caliph before him or any caliph after him who con-[421] ferred that on a single person.

According to al-ʿAbbās b. al-Faḍl: Al-Manṣūr ordered that his 400. Al-ʿAkkī. His brother ʿUthmān had been an early supporter of the ʿAbbāsids in Khurāsān and was one of Abū Muslim's assassins. He had become head of al-Manṣūr's guard, but the Rāwandiyyah, who held him to be the spirit of Adam incarnate, had killed him in their revolt. ʿĪsā succeeded him in command of the guard until his death, probably in the 140s. The point of the story is to show Abū Jaʿfar's concern for a family that had served him well (see Crone, Slaves, 189).

paternal uncles Sulaymān, ʿĪsā, Ṣāliḥ, and Ismāʿīl, sons of ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās, should each be given a million as their salary from the treasury. He was the first caliph to give a million from the treasury and it was put into effect in the dīwāns.[401]

According to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī[402]—al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ—his father: Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr held a public audience for the people of Medina in Baghdad, a number of whom had come on a delegation to him. He said, "Let every one of you who come into me give his genealogy." One of those who came in was a young man of the descendants of ʿAmr b. Ḥazm, who gave his genealogy[403] and then said, "O Commander of the Faithful, al-Aḥwaṣ recited a poem about us and we were deprived of our wealth sixty years ago because of it." Abū Jaʿfar told him to recite it so he recited:

Do not be moved with pity for a Ḥazmī if you see poverty in him or even if the Ḥazmī has been thrown into the fire, Those who pricked the mule of Marwān, at Dhū Khushub[404]
the invaders of ʿUthmān's house.[405]

He continued, "The poem is in praise of al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik,[406] and he had him recite the qaṣīdah and, when he reached this point, al-Walīd said, 'You have reminded me of the sin of the family of Ḥazm,' and he ordered the confiscation of their wealth." Abū Jaʿfar asked him to recite the poem to him again, and he repeated it three times, and Abū Jaʿfar said, "Certainly you will

401. That is to say that it was registered in the dīwāns, where official salaries were listed; the implication is that these were regular payments, not one-time gifts.

402. Perhaps the most famous of the singers of the early ʿAbbāsid court. He succeeded his father, who died in 188/804, at the cultural center of the ʿAbbāsid court. See Aghānī, Būlāq, V, 52; Beirut, V, 242; EI[2], s.v. "Isḥāḳ b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī."

403. He was a descendant of ʿAmr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī, a companion of the Prophet. The family supported ʿAlī's claim to the caliphate, hence its members' attacks on the Umayyads Marwān and ʿUthmān, their punishment by the Umayyad caliph al-Walīd, and the restoration of their properties by Abū Jaʿfar.

404. A valley one night's journey from Medina (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 372).

405. The assailants who attacked the caliph ʿUthmān in his house in Medina and killed him in 35/656.

406. Umayyad caliph, 86–96/705–15.

be made fortunate by this poem as you were deprived by it." Then he said to Abū Ayyūb,[407] "Bring ten thousand dirhams and give them to him because of his singing it to us." Then he ordered him to write to his officials instructing them to return the estates of the family of Ḥazm to them and to give them their rents every year from the estates of the Umayyad family and that their wealth be divided up between them according to the Book of God in succession and, whenever any of them died, his heirs would be [422] safeguarded. The young man left with what no one had left with before.

According to Ja'far b. Aḥmad b. Yaḥyā—Aḥmad b. Asad:[408] Al-Manṣūr delayed going out to the people and riding, and people said that he was ill and they made much of that. Al-Rabī' went in to him and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, may the Commander of the Faithful live long, the people are talking," and he asked what they were saying and al-Rabī' replied that they were saying that he was ill. He bowed his head in silence for a bit and then he said, "O al-Rabī', what do the common people want with me? The common people only need three things. If they are done for them, what more do they need? If I appoint someone for them to supervise their administration, do justice among them, make their roads safe so that they have no fear by night or day, and defend their frontiers and borders so that their enemies do not attack them, I have done that for them." He stayed for some days and then he said, "O Rabī', beat the drum," and he rode out so that the people saw him.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his father: Abū Ja'far sent Muḥammad b. Abī al-'Abbās with the Manichaeans and the dissolutes,[409] among them Ḥammād 'Ajrad.[410] They stayed with him in al-Baṣrah, and the dissolutes' profligacy became obvious. He wished to do that only to make him hateful to the people. Muḥammad revealed that he loved Zaynab, the daughter of Sulaymān b. 'Alī, and he used to ride each day to the Mirbad, preoccupied

---

407. Al-Mūryānī, his wazīr; see above, note 169. This story can be dated before Abū Ayyūb's fall in 153/770.

408. Neither of these is recorded elsewhere.

409. Al-zanādiqah wa-al-mujjān (plural of mājin). Ḥammād 'Ajrad was of the second group.

410. Aghānī, Būlāq, XIII, 73; Beirut, XIV, 304.

with her and hoping that she would be in some vantage point looking at him. He asked Ḥammād to compose a poem about her, and he made some verses in which he said about her:

O dweller in the Mirbad, you have stirred up in me a longing so that I am not separated from the Mirbad.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—his father: Al-Manṣūr was staying with my father for two years, and I knew al-Khaṣīb the doctor because of the number of times he came to him. Al-Khaṣīb pretended to be a Christian, but he was an atheist Manichaean[411] who had no scruples about killing. Al-Manṣūr sent a messenger to him ordering him to put his mind to the killing of Muḥammad b. [423]
Abī al-ʿAbbās.[412] He prepared a deadly poison and waited for an illness to afflict Muḥammad. He discovered a fever, and al-Khaṣīb said to him, "Take this drink of medicine," and he replied, "Prepare it for me," so he prepared it for him and put the poison in it and gave it to him to drink and he died from it. Muḥammad b. Abī al-ʿAbbās' mother wrote to al-Manṣūr about it and informed him that al-Khaṣīb had killed her son. Al-Manṣūr wrote ordering that he should be brought to him and, when he arrived, he gave him thirty light strokes of the whip and imprisoned him for some days. Then he gave him three hundred *dirham*s and released him.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—his father: Al-Manṣūr promised to Umm Mūsā al-Ḥimyariyyah[413] that he would not marry anyone in addition to her or take a concubine, and she obtained that in writing from him and had him confirm it and had it witnessed. He remained faithful to her alone for ten years of his rule, and he wrote to faqīh[414] after faqīh of the people of al-Ḥijāz seeking a legal opinion on it. A faqīh from the people of al-Ḥijāz and from the people of Iraq was brought to him, and he showed him the document so that he could give a legal opinion on annulling it. When Umm Mūsā knew about his position. she hastened 411. Zindiq mu'aṭṭil. Al-Khaṣīb is not mentioned elsewhere.

412. He died in 147/764–5 (see above, p. 39). It is not clear why al-Manṣūr should have sought his death, but he may have feared him because Muḥammad was the son of al-Saffāḥ, the previous caliph and al-Manṣūr's brother.

413. Arwā bt. Manṣūr. He married her before becoming caliph. It is not known when she died.

414. Authority on religious law.

to him and sent him a large sum of money. When Abū Ja'far showed the document to him, he gave the opinion that it could not be annulled until she died after ten years of his rule in Baghdad. He heard of her death in Ḥulwān,[415] and that night he was given a hundred virgins. Umm Mūsā bore him Ja'far and al-Mahdī.

It was said on the authority of 'Alī b. Ja'd:[416] When Bukhtīshū' the Elder[417] came to al-Manṣūr from Sūs,[418] he came in to his palace by the Golden Gate in Baghdad. He ordered food for him to have lunch and, when the table was put in front of him, he asked for wine and he was told that wine was not drunk at the table of [424] the Commander of the Faithful, and he replied that he would not eat food without wine. Al-Manṣūr was told about this and ordered that it be called for. When it was dinner time he did the same thing and asked for wine, and he was told that wine was not drunk at the table of the Commander of the Faithful. He ate dinner and drank the water of Tigris. The next morning he looked at his water and said, "I did not think that anything would compensate for wine, but this Tigris water does compensate for wine."

He mentioned on the authority of Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan[419]—his father: Al-Manṣūr wrote to his governor in Medina, "Sell the fruits of the estates and do not sell them to anyone except those whom we can get the better of and not to those who get the better of us. Only the bankrupt with no money, who does not fear our punishment, gets the better of us and takes what we have for himself. Even if he offers you a good price, perhaps you should sell it below that to he who is able to deal justly with you and pay you in full."

According to Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī: Abū Ja'far used to say, "It is not man who is done a favor and who forgets it before death."

According to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī': I heard al-Manṣūr say that the 415. On the road from Baghdad to the Iranian plateau, at the foot of the Zagros mountains. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 290–91; Le Strange, Lands, 191.

---

416. Al-Jawharī, d. 230/845, a traditionist who contributed just three reports to the 'Abbāsid section of al-Ṭabarī's History. See al-Khaṭīb, XI, 360–66.

417. Famous physician, father of Jibra'īl b. Bukhtīshū' and grandfather of Bukhtīshū' the Younger.

418. Ancient Susa, in Khūzistān, southwestern Iran. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 280–81; Le Strange, Lands, 240.

419. Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Abd al-Khāliq, maternal uncle of al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'.

Arabs say, "Oppressive thirst is better than shameful quenching of thirst."

He mentioned on the authority of Abān b. Yazīd al-'Anbarī—al-Haytham al-Qārī' al-Baṣrī:[420] He read in the presence of al-Manṣūr, "Squander not in the manner of a spendthrift,"[421] to the end of the verse, and al-Manṣūr said to him and started praying, "God preserve me and my son from squandering the gifts that You have bestowed on us!" Al-Haytham read to him, "Those who are niggardly or enjoin niggardliness on others."[422] He said to the people, "If it were not that wealth is the fortress of authority and the pillar of the Faith and of this world and the glory and ornament [425] of them, I would not pass a night retaining a dīnār of it nor a dirham because of the pleasure I find in expending wealth and because of the reward I know lies in giving it away."

A learned man entered to al-Manṣūr, and he thought little of him and he fixed him with his eyes disdainfully, but he did not ask him any questions he did not know the answer to. He said to him, "Where did you get all this knowledge?" and he replied, "I am not stingy with the knowledge I have learned, and I am not ashamed to learn," and he said, "From there." He said: Al-Manṣūr often used to say, "Whoever acts without organization," or he said, "Whoever acts from lack of organization will not lack mockery or scorn from the people."

According to Qaḥṭabah:[423] I heard al-Manṣūr say that kings will put up with anything from their intimates except three things, giving away of secrets, interfering in what is inviolate, and slandering the king.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad: Al-Manṣūr used to say, "Your secret is of your life blood, so take care whom you entrust it to."[424]

According to al-Zubayr b. Bakkār—'Umar: When 'Abd al-

420. Neither of these sources is known elsewhere. Al-Qārī means "the (Qur'ān) reader."

421. Qur'ān, XVII: 26.

422. Qur'ān, IV: 37.

423. B. Ghadānah al-Jushamī. These are the only two occasions al-Ṭabarī uses him as a source.

424. Or "Do not pour it out"; Freytag, Proverbia, III, 222.

Jabbār b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Azdī[425] was brought before al-Manṣūr after his rebellion against him he said, "O Commander of the Faithful, a generous execution," and he replied, "You are too late for that, O son of fornication."

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—Qaḥṭabah b. Ghudānah al-Jushamī, who was one of the caliph's courtiers (ṣaḥābah): I heard Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr give the sermon in the City of Peace in the year 152/769, and he said, "O servants of God, do not do each other wrong, for that will be counted as a sin on the day of Resurrection. By God, were it not for the sinning hand and the wrongdoing injustice of the criminal, I would walk among you in your markets and, if I knew where there was a man more worthy of this authority than I, I would bring him so that I could hand it over to him."

According to Isḥāq al-Mawṣilī—al-Naḍr b. Ḥadīd:[426] One of the [426] courtiers told me that al-Manṣūr used to say, "The punishment of the intelligent man is a hint, and the punishment of the fool is a declaration."

According to Aḥmad b. Khālid—Yaḥyā b. Abī Naṣr al-Qurashī:[427] Abān al-Qārī' (the Qur'ān reader) read in the presence of al-Manṣūr the verse, "Make not thy hand tied (like a niggard's) to thy neck, nor stretch it forth to its utmost reach (so that thou become blameworthy and destitute),"[428] and al-Manṣūr said, "What is better than the teachings of our Lord?"

He said: Al-Manṣūr said, "He who does a favor the like of which has been done to him has paid his due, and he who does double has thanked and he who thanks is noble. He who knew that he did something only for himself does not consider the people slow in gratitude and does not ask for an increase in their friendship toward him. So do not ask from others thanks for that which you have done for yourself and by which you protected your honor. Know that the man who asks you to fulfill a need for him does not 425. Governor of Khurāsān, who rebelled in 140/757–85. Kennedy, 'Abbasid Caliphate, 180; Daniel, Khurāsān, 159–62; Crone, Slaves, 173–74.

426. Not recorded elsewhere.

427. Not recorded elsewhere.

428. Qur'ān, XVII: 29.

honor his own face to the exclusion of your face, so honor your own face rather than rejecting him."

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Muhallabī:[429] I heard Isḥāq b. 'Īsā saying, "There was none of the Banū al-'Abbās who could speak and be spontaneously eloquent except Abū Ja'far, Dāwūd b. 'Alī,[430] and al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad."

According to Aḥmad b. Khālid—Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm al-Fihrī:[431] Al-Manṣūr preached in Baghdad on the Day of 'Arafat, though some said he preached on the Day of Minā,[432] and said in his sermon, "I am only the authority of God in His earth, and I govern you through His guidance and His direction to what is right. I am His treasurer in charge of the fay',[433] and I work according to His will and divide it according to His wish and give it with His permission. God has appointed me over it as a lock; if He wants to open me for your salaries and divide your fay' and allowances, He will do so and if He wants to close me up, He will close me up. So make your requests to God, O people, and ask Him on this noble day on which He has given you His favor as He has made known to you in His book when He, Blessed and Exalted, says, 'This day [427] have I perfected your religion for you, completed My favor upon you, and have chosen for you Islam as your religion,'[434] so that He can make me successful in good conduct and direct me to the right way and inspire me with mercy and goodness toward you and open me up to giving your salaries and distributing your allowances with justice to you, for He is all-hearing and near."

According to Dāwūd b. Rashīd[435]—his father: Al-Manṣūr preached and he said, "Praise be to God. I praise Him and ask His

429. Not known elsewhere.

430. Eldest of the surviving Banū 'Alī, paternal uncles of al-Manṣūr, at the time of the 'Abbāsid revolution. He delivered the main speech at the inauguration of al-Saffāḥ as caliph and was the first 'Abbāsid governor of al-Kūfah. He died in 133/751 as governor of Mecca (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 30–33, 37, 72).

431. Not recorded elsewhere.

432. During the Ḥajj, or pilgrimage month.

433. For fay', see above, note 352.

434. Qur'ān, V: 3.

435. Not recorded elsewhere, this is the first of a small group of stories in which Abū Ja'far confronts hecklers in the mosque.

help; I have faith in Him and put my trust in Him. I bear witness that there is no God but Him alone without any partner." Then a man on his right hand interrupted and said, "O man, let me remind you Whom you are reminding us about." Al-Manṣūr stopped the sermon and said, "All listening, all listening to the one who keeps God's instructions and reminds of Him. God save me from being a stubborn tyrant or getting proud by sins. In that case I have gone astray, and I am not one of the rightly guided. And you, O speaker, by God, you do not seek the way of God but rather you want it to be said, 'He stood up and spoke and was punished and he bore it bravely.' How easy it would have been, woe to you! if I wanted to. Take his opportunity for forgiveness. Beware both you and you all, O gathering of the people, of a similar attempt. Indeed wisdom has descended on us and goes out from us, so return authority to its people, sent it back to its place of origin, and despatch it to its sources." Then he returned to his sermon as if he were reading it from the palm of his hand and said, "I bear witness that Muḥammad is His servant and His Prophet."

It was reported on the authority of Abū Tawbah al-Rabī' b. Nāfi'—Ibn Abī al-Jawzā':[436] I stood up before Abū Ja'far when he was preaching in Baghdad in the city mosque on the pulpit, and I recited, "O ye who believe! Why say ye that which ye do not?"[437] I was brought in to him, and he said, "Who are you, woe to you? You wanted only that I should kill you. Go away from me so that [428] I do not see you." So I went out from his presence safely.

According to 'Īsā b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥumayd—Ibrāhīm b. 'Īsā:[438] Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr was preaching in this mosque, referring to the city mosque in Baghdad, and, when he reached "Fear God as he should be feared,"[439] a man stood up before him and said, "And you, 'Abdallāh, fear God as he should be feared." Abū Ja'far broke off his sermon and said, "All listening, all listening to one who calls attention to God. Come on, O 'Abdallāh (Slave of God), what is the fear of God?" The man was silenced and did not say a 436. Neither of these two is recorded elsewhere.

437. Qur'ān, LXI: 2.
438. Ibrāhīm b. 'Īsā b. al-Manṣūr, who is used by al-Ṭabarī on several occasions. 'Īsā b. 'Abdallāh is not known elsewhere.
439. Qur'ān, III: 102.

thing, and Abū Ja'far went on, "God, God! Oh people, do not impose on us those of your affairs that you are unable to undertake. A man does not stand up in this way without my injuring his back and giving him a long term of imprisonment." Then he ordered Rabī' to arrest him. We were confident that he would escape, for it was a sign that he intended to harm a man if he said, "Arrest him, Musayyab."[440]

Then he resumed his sermon at the place he had stopped it, and the people approved of what he had done. When he had finished the prayers, he entered the palace, and 'Īsā b. Mūsā began to walk behind him as was his custom. Abū Ja'far heard him and said, "Abū Mūsā," and he said, "Yes O Commander of the Faithful?" and the caliph continued, "I think you are afraid what I will do to this man," and he replied, "Something like that was in my mind, but the the Commander of the Faithful is too learned and has too lofty an opinion to do anything unjust about his case," and he said, "Do not be afraid for him." When the caliph had sat down, he ordered that the man should be brought to him and when he arrived he said, "O you, when you saw me on the pulpit you said, 'This is the tyrant. I cannot refrain from arguing with him.' It would be better for you if you occupied yourself with something else, so occupy yourself with the thirst of the heat of the day, with staying up all night, and with getting your feet dusty in the path of God. Give him, O Rabī', four hundred dirhams. Go away and do not come back."

According to 'Abdallāh b. Ṣā'id,[441] freedman of the Commander of the Faithful: Al-Manṣūr went on the pilgrimage after [429]
he had built Baghdad,[442] and he stood up to preach in Mecca and among his words that were preserved were, "'Before this We wrote in the Psalms after the message (given to Moses): "My servants, the righteous shall inherit the earth." '[443] This is a firmly established matter, a just word, and a decisive judgment. Praise be to God who makes His authority effective and away with the op-

440. Referring to al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr, chief of police; see above, note 24.
441. Freedman of al-Manṣūr, see al-Khatīb, IX, 482
442. In the year 147/764–65.
443. Qur'ān, XXI: 105.

pressors[444] who treated the Ka'bah with contempt and took the fay' as an inheritance[445] and who have made the Qur'ān into shreds.[446] He has afflicted them with what they scorned. How many blocked-up wells and lofty castles do you see? God has cast them into oblivion because they changed the Sunna and oppressed the Family (of the Prophet). They turned aside and acted outrageously and became overbearing. He has frustated the hopes of every obdurate tyrant. Then He took them and said, 'Canst thou find a single one of them or hear a whisper of them?'"[447]

According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī—Ibn 'Ayyāsh: When the incidents[448] followed one another before Abū Ja'far, he quoted the verse,[449]

The gazelles were too many for Khidāsh, and Khidāsh did not know what he was hunting.

Then he ordered that the commanders, the freedmen, his companions, and the people of his house be summoned to his presence, and he ordered Ḥammād al-Turkī to saddle up the horses, Sulaymān b. Mujālid to take the lead, and al-Musayyab b. Zubayr to guard the gates. Then he went out one day and climbed the pulpit.
[430] He was silent for a long time, saying nothing, and a man said to Shabīb b. Shabbah,[450] "What is the matter with the Commander of the Faithful that he does not speak? For he is one of those for whom the most difficult speech is easy. What is the matter with him?" Then he began the sermon:

"Why am I repelling others from Sa'd[451] when he abuses me?
If I were to abuse the Banū Sa'd, they would be silent
Out of rashness against us and cowardice toward their enemy.
How evil are the two characteristics: rashness and cowardice."

---

444. That is, the Umayyads.
445. The Umayyads are accused here of taking the fay', which should belong to all the Muslims communally, as their personal property.
446. Qur'ān, XV: 91.
447. Qur'ān, XIX: 98.
448. See above, note 206.
449. Aghānī, XI, 74.
450. Possibly a brother of 'Umar b. Shabbah, the historian; nothing else is known of him.
451. He is using this poem for an oblique attack on the 'Alids.

Then he sat down and said,

"I threw the covering from my head, and I am not the sort of man to uncover it except because of a great calamity.

By God, they[452] were incapable of the matter we have undertaken, and they were not grateful to the one who did it. It was made smooth for them and they sought to make it rough and they refused to recognize the truth and held it in contempt. What have they sought? That I would drink muddy water that chokes or accept injustice and agony? By God, I do not honor anyone by insulting myself. By God, if they do not accept the truth, they will seek it, but they will not find it with me. The happy man is he who is warned by others. Lead on, page!" Then he rode off.

According to al-Fuqaymī—'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān,[453] freedman of Muḥammad b. 'Alī:[454] When al-Manṣūr had arrested 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan[455] and his brothers and those of his family who were with him, he went up on the pulpit and gave thanks to God and praised Him and prayed for the Prophet. Then he said, "O people of Khurāsān, you are our party (shī'ah) and our helpers (anṣār) and the people of our state and, if you give the oath of allegiance to someone else, you will not take a better oath to him than to us. As for these members of my family from the children of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, we have left them, by the one and only God, with the caliphate. We did not oppose them in the caliphate in any way.[456] 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib undertook it and he was [431] stained, and the two judges passed judgment on him and the Community split from him and opinions were divided about him. Then his own party, helpers, companions, retinue, and trusted 452. The 'Alids.

453. Not recorded elsewhere.
454. The father of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr.
455. The father of Muḥammad the Pure Soul and Ibrāhīm, the 'Alid rebels of 145/762. Al-Manṣūr had taken him into custody before the rebellion, as a way of putting pressure on his sons.
456. To rally the support of the Khurāsānīs, al-Manṣūr gives an account of 'Alid attempts to secure the caliphate and explains how they failed because they were unworthy.

men rose against him and killed him.[457] Then al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī rose up after him and, by God, he was a man who, when he was offered money for it (the caliphate), took it, and Muʿāwiyah intrigued with him, saying that he would make him his heir apparent after him and then misled him so that he abandoned and surrendered it to him. He took to women, marrying one every day and divorcing her the next, and he continued that way until he died in his bed.[458] After him al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī rose up. He was betrayed by the people of Iraq and the people of al-Kūfah, the people of divisions and hypocrisy and plunging into continuous civil wars, the people of this black town," indicating al-Kūfah, "By God, I would not make war with them or make peace with them but may God keep me away from it. They forsook him and handed him over so that he was killed.[459] Then Zayd b. ʿAlī rose up and the people of al-Kūfah betrayed him and deceived him and when they made him rebel they exposed him and handed him over.[460] Muḥammad b. ʿAlī[461] had come to him and implored him not to rebel and asked him not to believe the words of the people of al-Kūfah and said to him, "We have found out that one of our family will be crucified in al-Kūfah, and I am afraid that the crucified one will be you." My paternal uncle Dāwūd b. ʿAlī implored him and warned him of the treachery of the people of al-Kūfah, but he did not believe this and went on with his rebellion and was killed and crucified in al-Kunāsah. Then the Umayyads pounced on us and destroyed our honor and banished our glory, and they had no grudge to pursue against us at all, except on account of them (the ʿAlids) and their rebellion. We were driven out of the country and went sometimes to al-Ṭāʾif, sometimes to 457. ʿAlī was caliph in 35–40/656–61. After the Battle of Ṣiffīn he agreed to accept the verdict of the two judges ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ and Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī as to whether he was worthy of the caliphate. This in turn led to the defection of many of his supporters, notably the first Khārijites.

458. ʿAlī's son al-Ḥasan surrendered his rights to the caliphate to Muʿāwiyah in exchange for a large sum of money and went to live a life of luxury in Medina.

459. At Karbalāʾ, near al-Kūfah, in 61/680.

460. He rebelled in al-Kūfah in 122/740 but was captured and executed.

461. Al-Manṣūr's father.

Syria, and sometimes to al-Sharāt[462] until God sent you[463] to us as a party and as helpers. The revival of our honor and glory is because of you people of Khurāsān. Your truth refutes the people of falsehood. It makes our right clear and gives us the inheritance of our Prophet. It establishes the right in its place and makes its light clear. It gives glory to its helpers and cuts off the roots of the people of oppression. Praise be to God, Lord of the two worlds. When authority was established with us by the grace of God and His just judgment for us, they rose up against us in evil and envy toward us, coveting what God has bestowed on us in preference to them and given us generously of His caliphate and the inheritance of His Prophet. [432]

(They act) out of rashness against us and cowardice toward their enemy.
How evil are the two characteristics, rashness and cowardice.

I did not act the way I did in this affair, by God, O people of Khurāsān, due to rashness. I was informed of some disaffection and disturbance among them, and I had secretly sent men to them and I said, 'Off you go, so-and-so, off you go, so-and-so, and take so much money with you.' I proposed an example for them to follow. They set out until they came to them in Medina and secretly passed on this money to them. By God there was not a single old man or young, big or small, who did not take the oath of allegiance to them; because of that, I regard their blood and their wealth as lawful. It became lawful to me because of their breach of the oath of allegiance to me and their seeking of civil war and their intention to rebel against me. Do not think that I reached this point without being certain.''[464]

Then he went down and he recited this verse of the Qur'ān on

462. Ancient Edom, the southern part of modern Jordan. Al-Ḥumaymah, where the 'Abbāsids lived before they came to power, is situated there. Al-Manṣūr claims that the 'Abbāsids suffered greatly because of their association with the 'Alids, but he is certainly being economical with the truth here.

463. I.e., the Khurāsānīs, who are repeatedly described as the anṣār (helpers) of the 'Abbāsids, just as the people of Media were the anṣār of the Prophet.

464. He justifies making war on the 'Alids and their supporters in Medina by claiming that his agents provocateurs had persuaded them to break their oaths of allegiance.

the steps of the pulpit, "And between them and their desires is placed a barrier as was done in the past with their partisans, for they were indeed in suspicious doubt."[465]

[433] He said: Al-Manṣūr preached in Madā'in when Abū Muslim[466] was killed and he said, "O people, do not leave the intimacy of obedience for the loneliness of rebellion. Do not conceal deceit for the Imāms. No one ever concealed a forbidden thing without its becoming visible in the works of his hand or the slips of his tongue. God will manifest it to His Imām[467] by the glory of His faith and the exaltation of His justice. We will not diminish your rights and we will not diminish the faith He has imposed on you. He who disputes with us so much as the unbuttoning of this shirt, we will consider him a sacrifice for the contents of this scabbard. Abū Muslim took the oath of allegiance to us and the people took the oath to us with the condition that, whoever betrayed us, (the shedding of) his blood was lawful. Then he betrayed us and we passed judgment on him as he had on others for us. Our gratitude in acknowledging his role for us did not prevent us from doing justice to him."

According to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī—al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'—his father; I heard al-Manṣūr say that he had heard his father say that his father, 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh, had said, "The lords of this world are the most generous, and the lords of the next world are the Prophets."

According to Ibrāhīm b. 'Īsā: Al-Manṣūr was angry with Muḥammad b. Jumayl al-Kātib,[468] who came from al-Rabadhah,[469] and he ordered him to be thrown to the ground. He proved his innocence, and he ordered him to be raised up. He looked at his drawers and saw that they were made of linen. He ordered him to

---

465. Qur'ān, XXXIV: 54.

466. Al-Manṣūr had Abū Muslim, architect of the 'Abbāsid revolution in Khurāsān, executed in 137/755 in al-Madā'in. Here he is concerned to justify his action.

467. I.e., al-Manṣūr.

468. He was in charge of the kharāj (land tax) of al-Kūfah in 155/772 and later served al-Hādī before and during his caliphate (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 519; al-Jāhshiyārī, 124–25, 167).

469. A small town in the Ḥijāz; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 24. The site has recently been excavated with interesting results by the Saudi Department of Antiquities.

be thrown down and given fifteen blows with a stick, saying, "Do not dress in linen drawers, for that is extravagant."

According to Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl al-Hāshimī—al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm[470]—his shaykhs: When Abū Jaʿfar had killed Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh in Medina and his brother Ibrāhīm at Bākhamrā[471] and Ibrāhīm b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan[472] rebelled in Egypt and was brought to him, he wrote a letter to the descendants of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib in [434] Medina telling them about Ibrāhīm b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan and his rebellion in Egypt and saying that Ibrāhīm would not have acted without their consent and that they were conspiring to seek power and seeking the breaking of relations and disobedience; they had failed in their opposition to the Banū Umayyah when they challenged them for power and they were feeble in seeking revenge so that the sons of his father had risen up in anger on their behalf against the Banū Umayyah, sought revenge for them, and shed their blood and wrested power from their hands, and he quoted in the letter the poem of Subayʿ b. Rabīʿah b. Muʿāwiyah al-Yarbūʿī:[473]

Were it not for my protection of you when you were incapable, for I protected and defended you through God's help,
Your affairs were lost, and I knew no reliable people for them, and everything that God does not protect is wasted.
Name those who scattered the people from around you and those at the mention of whom fingers are bent (i.e., the best).
We never ceased to confer on you all the time the favors whose usefulness is apparent.
There never ceased to exist among you people of treachery and dissension,

---

470. Probably the son of the ʿAlid leader Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh. He was arrested after the defeat of the rebellion. He later played an important part in the rise to power of al-Mahdī's wazīr, Yaqūb b. Dāwūd. See below pp. 461–64.

471. The village between al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah where Ibrāhīm's army was defeated by the ʿAbbāsids; see al-Ṭabarī, III, pp. 301–14.

472. As Houtsma notes, his leadership of a revolt in Egypt is not found in al-Ṭabarī or other sources, it is probable that he was a supporter of ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, who led an unsuccessful uprising in Egypt at the same time as the rebellions of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm in 145/762.

473. I can find nothing more about this poet.

a traitor to God and a cutter-off of kinship.
When we have been absent from you and you witnessed great deeds, there were good satisfactory witnesses.[474]
We looked after you and you looked after your own affairs, and things are abasing and exalting.[475]
Do the feet of men come high to their chests?
Do the hoofs go high above the hump (of the camel)?
Men among you are conspiring for headship, as frogs move under the pond.

According to Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbd al-Khāliq: The salaries of the secretaries and tax collectors in the days of Abū Jaʿfar were three hundred dirhams, and this continued to be the case until the days of al-Maʾmūn. The first man who allowed an increase in [435] salaries was al-Faḍl b. Sahl.[476] As for the time of the Umayyads and ʿAbbāsids, the salaries remained at three hundred or below. Al-Ḥajjāj used to pay Yazīd b. Abī Muslim three hundred dirhams each month.

According to Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā: The postmasters in all outlying districts used to write to al-Manṣūr during his caliphate every day about the price of wheat and corn and seasoning and the price of all foods and all the decisions the qāḍī had made in their district, and what the governor had done and what wealth was returned to the treasury and items of news. After they had said the sunset prayer, they used to write to him about what happened each day and they used to write to him about what happened each night when they said the morning prayer. When their letters arrived, he looked at them and, if he saw that the prices were as usual, he did nothing but, if he saw that something had changed, he wrote to the governor and the tax collector there and asked about the reasons for the price change, and when the reply came about the reason he was gently concerned about it until prices returned to normal. If he had doubts about a judgment

474. This verse appears to be corrupt and against the spirit of the poem.

475. Possibly a reference to Qurʾān, LVI: 3. "Many will it bring low, many will it exalt."

476. Al-Faḍl b. Sahl was wazīr and chief adviser to al-Maʾmūn in the early years of his caliphate. Yazīd b. Abī Muslim was a freedman and the foster brother of al-Ḥajjāj, who became governor of Ifrīqiyah.

the qāḍī had made, he wrote to him about that and asked those who were in his presence about his conduct and, if he disapproved of anything that was done, he wrote to him, rebuking him and criticizing him.

According to Isḥāq al-Mawṣilī—al-Sabbāḥ b. Khāqān al-Tamīmī—a man of his family—his father: Al-Walīd was mentioned to al-Manṣūr when he was settling in Baghdad and leaving Medina and finishing with Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm, the sons of ʿAbdallāh, and they said, "God curse the apostate unbeliever." In the assembly were Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī, Ibn ʿAyyāsh al-Mantūf, and al-Sharqī b. al-Quṭāmī,[477] all of them members of his ṣaḥābah, and Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī said that he was told by a paternal cousin of [436] al-Farazdaq[478] that al-Farazdaq said, "I came into the presence of al-Walīd b. Yazīd,[479] and his boon companions were with him and he had had a morning drink and he said to Ibn ʿĀ'ishah,[480] 'Sing the song of Ibn al-Ziba'rā:[481]

Would that my shaykhs at Badr had witnessed the fear of al-Khazraj[482] of falling spears.
We killed a double number of their lords.
We put right on the bend of Badr (i.e., the defeat), and it became straight.'

Ibn ʿĀ'ishah said, 'I will not sing this, O Commander of the Faithful,' but he replied, 'Sing it, or I will cut out your tonsils,' so he sang it and al-Walīd said, 'Well done,' and by God he was of 477. Occasionally used as a source by al-Ṭabarī (once in section I, twice in section II). He is recorded in the Fihrist, 195, among the traditionists.

478. Tammām b. Ghālib al-Tamīmī, d. ca. 110/728, one of the most famous poets of the Umayyad period and a rival of Jarīr. See Aghānī, Būlāq, II, 19; Beirut, XXI, 299; and EI^{2}, s.v. "al-Farazdaq."

479. Umayyad caliph, 125–26/743–44.

480. Muḥammad b. ʿA'ishah, d. ca. 125/744, famous singer at the court of the Umayyad caliph al-Walīd b. Yazīd. See Aghānī, Būlāq, II, 62; Beirut, II, 170.

481. ʿAbdallāh b. Ziba'rā al-Sahmī, Qurashī poet who abused the Muslims. He was converted to Islam at the conquest of Mecca and was received by the Prophet; see Aghānī, Būlāq, XIV, 11; Beirut, XV, 138. The poem is also quoted by Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, 616.

482. One of the tribes of Medina that supported the Prophet Muḥammad. This is an anti-Islamic poem, attacking the military prowess of the Prophet's supporters at the battle of Badr, hence Ibn ʿA'ishah's reluctance to sing it and al-Manṣūr's comment.

the faith of Ibn al-Ziba'rā the day he recited this poem. Al-Manṣūr cursed him and his companions cursed him, and he said, 'Praise be to God for his generosity and his unity.'"

According to Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī: The governor of Armenia[483] wrote to al-Manṣūr that the army had mutinied against him and broken the locks of the treasury and taken what was in it, and al-Manṣūr said in his letter, "Leave our office in disgrace, for if you were intelligent they would not have mutinied and if you were strong they would not have plundered."

According to Isḥāq al-Mawṣilī—his father: A joker rebelled against Abū Ja'far in Palestine and he wrote to his governor there, "His blood will be on your blood if you do not send him to me," so he made great efforts to find him, captured him, and sent him off. He was ordered to be brought into the caliph's presence and when he stood before him Abū Ja'far said to him, "You have preyed on our governors. I will scatter about more of your flesh than remains on your bone," and he replied, and he was an old man with a weak, thin, unimpressive voice:

Do you train your wife after she has become decrepit?
The training of the decrepit man is wearisome.[484]

[437] His words were not clear to al-Manṣūr so he asked Rabī' what he was saying, and he replied that he had said:

The slave is your slave and the wealth is your wealth, and is your punishment deflected from me?

He said, "O Rabī', I have forgiven him so let him go, take care of him, and give him good care."

He said: A man complained to al-Manṣūr about his tax gatherer ('āmil), saying that he had taken a part of his estate and added it to his property, so he wrote to his official in the note of the complainer, "If you prefer justice, peace will be your companion. Do justice to this complainer for his wrong."

He said: A man of the common people wrote a note to him requesting the building of a mosque in his area, and he wrote on his note, "One of the portents of the Day of Judgment is the proliferation of mosques, so increase your paces (toward a distant masjid), and your reward will be increased."

483. Ṣāḥib Armaniyyah, used here of the governor.
484. Freytag, Proverbia, II, 666, n. 277.

He said: A man of the Sawād complained about one of the tax collectors in a note that was sent up to al-Manṣūr, who replied, "If you are telling the truth, bring him held up by the upper front of his shirt. We give you permission to do that."

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Hudhayl al-'Allāf:[485] Abū Ja'far said, I was told that al-Sayyid Ibn Muḥammad [al-Ḥimyarī][486] died in al-Karkh or in Wāsiṭ and they did not bury him and, if that story is true, indeed I would burn it down. It is said that the true story was that he died in the time of al-Mahdī in al-Karkh of Baghdad and that they avoided burying him and that al-Rabī' was sent to take charge of his affair, and he ordered that, if they were obstructive, their houses should be burned, but Rabī' was diverted from them.

According to al-Madā'inī: When al-Manṣūr had finished with Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm and 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī and 'Abd al-Jabbār b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān and went to Baghdad and things became calm for him, he quoted this verse:

You often spend the night on a sword edge of tribulation, [438]
but God will suffice against that which you feared.

He said: 'Abdallāh b. al-Rabī' recited to me that al-Manṣūr had recited after the killing of these:

There is many an affair that will not harm you, but the heart still palpitates for fear of them.

According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī: When al-Manṣūr heard of the scattering of the sons of 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan[487] through the lands, fleeing from his punishment, he quoted:

My lance is a strong wood (nab'), which neither the pinching and pressing

485. D. 226/840–41, a Mu'tazilī scholar from al-Baṣrah; see Fihrist, 386–87.
486. Ismā'īl b. Muḥammad, a poet well known for his pro-'Alid sympathies. The date of his death is not known; see Aghānī, Būlāq, VII, 2; Beirut, VII, 224.
487. The 'Alid rebels of 145/762 Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm.

of the straightening instrument, nor grease, nor fire can soften.
When I take a fearful man under my protection, his grazing places are safe.
And when I make a safe man fearful for his safety, the house looks not spacious enough for him.
Come to me and lower some of your eyes, for I am to every man the protector from his neighbor.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Wāḍiḥ, freedman of Abū Jaʿfar: Abū Jaʿfar ordered me to buy him two soft pieces of cloth, so I bought them for a hundred and twenty dirhams and brought them to him. He asked me how much they were and I said, "Eighty dirhams." He replied, "Good! Ask for a reduction, for, if the goods arrive to us and then are returned to their owner, that breaks him down!" So I took the two pieces from their owner, and on the next day I brought the two of them with me to him, and he asked me what I had done and I said that I had returned them to him and that he had given me a reduction of twenty dirhams. He said, "You have done well; cut up one of them as a shirt, and make the other into a gown for me." I did that and he wore the shirt for fifteen days and did not wear anything else.

According to a freedman of ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī: Al-Manṣūr used to order his family to dress well to show their prosperity by wearing brocade and perfume. If he saw that any of them had failed to do that or had not done enough, he [439] would say, "O so-and-so, I do not see the gleam of musk in your beard,[488] and I see it shining in the beard of so-and-so," and in this way he used to urge them to use more perfume so that he might be enhanced with the common people by their appearance and the sweetness of their breath and that he might enhance them (his family) among them (the people). If he saw any of them in plain cloth, he abused him.[489]

According to Aḥmad b. Khālid: Al-Manṣūr used to ask Mālik b. Adham[490] much about the story of ʿAjlān b. Suhayl, brother of 488. The perfuming of beards was a luxury of the ʿAbbāsid court.

489. The text seems to be corrupt here.
490. Al-Bāhilī; he was one of the Umayyad generals in Iran defeated by the Ḥawtharah b. Suhayl.[491] We were sitting with 'Ajlān when Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik passed and someone said, "The cross-eyed man has passed," and he asked, "Whom do you mean?" "Hishām," he answered. "You are calling the Commander of the Faithful with a derisive nickname, and, by God, were it not for your kinship, I would cut off your head," and al-Manṣūr said, "That is a man with the likes of whom life and death have a use [a meaning]."

According to Aḥmad b. Khālid—Ibrāhīm b. 'Īsā: Al-Manṣūr had a servant with pale, brownish skin, acceptably skillful, and al-Manṣūr said to him one day, "What race are you?" and he replied, "Arab, O Commander of the Faithful," and he asked, "Which Arabs?" and he replied, "From Khawlān. I was captured from Yemen by one of our enemies, who castrated me, and I became a slave and passed to a member of the Umayyad family and then to you." The caliph replied, "You are certainly an excellent page, but no Arab ever enters my palace to serve my harem. Go out, may God forgive you, and go wherever you wish."

According to Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm b. Ismā'īl b. Dāwūd b. Mu'āwiyah b. Bakr,[492] who was one of the courtiers (ṣaḥābah): Al-Manṣūr attached a man from al-Kūfah called al-Fuḍayl b. 'Imrān[493] to his son Ja'far and appointed him as his secretary and put him in charge of his affairs. He had the same position with regard to him as Abū 'Ubaydallāh had to al-Mahdī. Abū Ja'far had wished [440] that the oath of allegiance should be taken to Ja'far after al-Mahdī. Umm 'Ubaydallāh, Ja'far's nurse, plotted against al-Fuḍayl b. 'Imrān and told stories against him to al-Manṣūr and hinted that al-Fuḍayl had homosexual inclinations forward Ja'far. Al-Manṣūr sent his freedman al-Rayyān and Hārūn b. Ghazwān, the freedman of 'Uthmān b. Nahīk,[494] to al-Fuḍayl, who was with Ja'far

---

'Abbāsid armies under Qaḥṭabah. In 'Abbāsid times he fought on the Byzantine frontier. See Crone, Slaves, 168–69.

491. Al-Bāhilī as well. He was sent by Marwān to reinforce Ibn Hubayrah in Iraq against the 'Abbāsid armies and repeatedly urged Ibn Hubayrah to adopt a more active strategy; he was executed after the fall of Wāsiṭ (Crone, Slaves, 143). The story again shows Abū Ja'far's admiration for the Umayyads and their supporters.

492. A secretary and poet of the reigns of al-Manṣūr and al-Mahdī; see Fihrist, 176.

493. Otherwise unknown.

494. For 'Uthmān, see note 400, above, on his brother 'Īsā.

in Ḥadīthah of Mosul[495] and said, "When you see al-Fuḍayl, kill him wherever you meet him." He wrote an edict for them and he wrote to Ja'far, telling him what he had ordered them to do and he told them not to hand the letter over to Ja'far until they had carried out the execution. They left and, when they reached Ja'far, they sat at his gate waiting for permission to go in, and al-Fuḍayl came out to them. They seized him and took out al-Manṣūr's letter. Nobody opposed them and they cut off his head on the spot, and Ja'far did not know until they had finished. Al-Fuḍayl was an upright and God-fearing man and, when al-Manṣūr was told that he was completely innocent of what he was accused of and that he had been hasty with him, he sent a messenger and promised him ten thousand dirhams if he reached him before he was killed, and the messenger arrived before his blood was dry.

According to Mu'āwiyah b. Bakr—Suwayd, freedman of Ja'far: Ja'far sent for him and said, "Woe to you. What does the Commander of the Faithful say about the killing of a pious and God-fearing Muslim who has committed no crime or offense?" to which Suwayd replied, "He is the Commander of the Faithful and he does what he wishes and he knows best what he is doing." Ja'far said, "O sucker of your mother's clitoris! I am speaking to you in the language of the elite, and you reply in the language of the common people. Take him by the legs and throw him into the Tigris." He said, "I was seized and said, 'I want to talk to you,' so he said, 'Leave him!' and I said, 'Do you think your father will be answerable for Fuḍayl only? When does he answer for him when he had already killed his paternal uncle 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī and 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥasan and other descendants of the Prophet [441] wrongly, and he had killed countless men of this world, before he was responsible for the death of Fuḍayl, (who was only) a rat who nipped Pharaoh's balls.'[496] He laughed and said, 'Leave him to the curse of God!'"

According to Qa'nab b. Muḥriz[497] Abū Muḥammad b. 'Ā'idh,

---

495. About thirty miles southeast of Mosul, on the east bank of the Tigris just above its junction with the Upper Zāb; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 230; Le Strange, Lands, 90–91.

496. See Glossary, CCXXIV.

497. Al-Bāhilī. Al-Ṭabarī cites him on one other occasion.

freedman of 'Uthmān b. 'Affān: Ḥafṣ al-Umawī the poet was known as Ḥafṣ b. Abī Jum'ah,[498] freedman of 'Abbād b. Ziyād, whom al-Manṣūr had appointed literary instructor (mu'adib) to al-Mahdī in his audiences. He was a panegyrist of the Umayyads in Umayyad times and in the time of al-Manṣūr, and he did not hold it against him and he remained with al-Mahdī all the time that al-Mahdī was heir apparent but died before al-Mahdī succeeded to the caliphate. Among his poems in praise of the Umayyads was the following:

Where are the two chiefs of 'Abd Shams,[499] where are they?
Where are their men of ability and nobility?
You did not compensate them for their kindness to you with what you have done, you the family of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.[500]
O inquirer about them,
they were shoots of palm trees, shining above the wood.
If you foolishly cut off their roots,
what a time that is turned upside down.
Pour what milk you like into your basin.
You will drink that milk as sour residue.

It is said that Ḥafṣ al-Umawī came in to al-Manṣūr and he spoke to him and asked information about him. He asked him who he was and he replied, "Your freedman, O Commander of the Faithful," and he said, "A freedman of mine like you I do not know." He answered, "The freedman of a servant of yours, 'Abd Manāf, O Commander of the Faithful." The caliph approved of his reply and knew that he was a freedman of the Umayyads and attached him to al-Mahdī and said to him, "Take him for yourself."

Among the elegies for al-Manṣūr was the poem of Salm al-Khāsir:[501]

---

498. There is no section on him in the Kitāb al-Aghānī

499. Progenitor of the Umayyads.

500. Father of al-'Abbās and grandfather of the Prophet Muḥammad and 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

501. Salm b. 'Amr, a poet of the 'Abbāsid court, prominent in the reign of Hārūn; see Aghānī, Beirut, XIX, 214.

I wonder how the two announcers could announce his death.
How could the two lips speak of his departure?
A king who, if one day he faced time,
time would fall down dead.
[442] Would that a hand that had scattered dust on him came back without any one finger on it.
When the countries acknowledged his absolute rule and both man and jinn[502] cast down their eyes from fear of it, Where is the lord of al-Zawrā'[503] to whom it (the country) has entrusted sovereignty for twenty-two years?[504]
The man is like a kindling stick when it is surrounded by sparks of fire.
Prohibition does not divert his will,
and intelligent people cannot weaken his rope.
The reins of power have been handed over to him, so that he can lead his enemies without reins.
Eyes are lowered before him, and you see hands on chins for fear of him.
He gathered together the borders of his kingdom and then became beyond their farthest edge and this side of the nearest part.
A Hāshimī in readiness who does not carry the burden on the back of a runaway foolish camel,
A man of moderation who makes the fearful forget his fear and determination that causes every heart to fly.
Souls have left scared from him.
What remained in the bodies were only the spirits.

The names of his children and wives: Among his children were al-Mahdī, whose name was Muḥammad, and Ja'far the Elder, and their mother was Arwā, daughter of Manṣūr and sister of Yazīd b. Manṣūr al-Ḥimyarī. Her kunyah was Umm Mūsā. This Ja'far died before al-Manṣūr. There were also Sulaymān, 'Īsā and Ya'qūb, whose mother was Fāṭimah, daughter of Muḥammad, 502. Lit. "the two heavy ones", see Lane, s.v., thql.

503. A name of Baghdad, allegedly because the qiblah was bent or crooked and did not face Mecca. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 11.
504. The number of years of Abū Ja'far's caliphate.

one of the descendants of Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh,[505] and Ja'far the Younger,[506] whose mother was a Kurdish slave whom al-Manṣūr had purchased and taken as a concubine, and her son was known as Ibn al-Kurdiyyah (son of the Kurdish woman). There was Ṣāliḥ al-Miskīn, whose mother was a Greek slave girl called Qālī al-Farrāshah. Al-Qāsim died before al-Manṣūr, aged ten, and his mother was a slave girl known as Umm al-Qāsim, who had a garden by the Syrian Gate that is known as the Garden of Umm al-Qāsim to the present day.[507] There was 'Āliyah,[508] whose mother was an Umayyad woman; al-Manṣūr gave her in marriage to Isḥāq b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās.[509] [443]

According to Isḥāq b. Sulaymān—his father: My father said to me, "I am marrying you, O my son, to the most noble of people, 'Āliyah, daughter of the Commander of the Faithful," and I asked who were our equals, and he answered, "Our enemies, the Umayyads."

Information about His Wills[510]

According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī: Al-Manṣūr made a will for al-Mahdī when he set out for Mecca in Shawwāl of this year (4 August–1 September, 775). He had stopped at Qaṣr 'Abdawayh and stayed some days in the castle there. Al-Mahdī was with him, and he gave him his testament. While he was staying in Qaṣr 505. One of the companions of the Prophet, killed at the Battle of the Camel in 36/656.

506. Little is known of Ja'far the Younger, and he seems to have played no part in politics He died in 186/802.

507. Not noticed in Le Strange.

508. Not known elsewhere.

509. Brother of Muḥammad (note 29) and Ja'far (note 35). He was probably younger than his brothers and only became prominent in the reign of Hārūn, when he held a number of governorates, including Sind, Egypt, al-Baṣrah, and Armenia. He disappears from the record after 194/810. As a governor he seems to have been rather ineffectual but is recorded in the Fihrist as an early patron of translators. Daughters of the 'Abbāsid caliphs in this period were usually married within the family.

510. The various versions of al-Manṣūr's wills and their interpretation are discussed in detail in Dietrich, "Das politische Testament." He also provides a German translation on which I have drawn.

'Abdawayh, a shooting star fell on 28 Shawwāl (31 August, 775) after it began to get light, and its track remained clear until sunrise. He bequeathed him his wealth and authority (sulṭān), and he did that every day of his stay there, morning and evening, and he did not let up from that, and the two of them parted with emotion. When the day came when he wanted to leave, he called al-Mahdī and said to him, "There is nothing that I have not handed over to you. I will pass on to you some good rules of conduct but, by God, I do not think you will continue with a single one of them." He had a container in which he kept the notebooks (dafātīr) of his knowledge, and it was locked and he trusted no one to open it and he kept its keys in the sleeve of his shirt. Ḥammād al-Turkī used to bring him that container when he called for it, and if Ḥammād was away or had gone out it was entrusted to Salamah al-Khādim. He said to al-Mahdī, "Look after this bag and keep it, for in it is the knowledge of your forebears of the past and future until the Day of Resurrection. If things start going badly, look in the larger notebook and, if you find what you want there, (well and good) [444] but, if not, look in the second and the third until you reach the seventh. If it weighs heavily on you, look in the small notebook, and you will find in it what you need; but I do not think you will do it.

"Look after this city[511] and be careful not to exchange it for another, for it is your house and your glory. For you I have gathered in it such wealth that, if the kharāj[512] were to be interrupted for ten years, you would have enough for the salaries of the army and the expenses and allowances of the children and the needs of the frontiers. So keep it and you will not cease to be powerful as long as your treasury remains full, but I do not think you will do this.

"I am commending to you the members of your family (ahl al-bayt). Show them honor, give them precedence, give them great benefits, increase their status, submit the people to their authority, and put them in charge of pulpits. Their glory and renown will glorify you, but I do not think you will do this.

"Look after your freedmen and do good to them, bring them

511. Baghdad.
512. Meaning tax receipts in general.

near you, and cherish them for they are your support in adversity if it befalls you, but I do not think you will do this.

"I commend to you generous treatment to the people of Khurāsān, for they are your helpers (anṣār) and your party (shī'ah) and have spent their wealth in the service of your state and shed their blood for you. You will not drive out love for you from their hearts if you are good to them and forgive whoever among them commits a blunder, rewarding them for what they do and providing for the families and children of those of them who die, but I do not think you will do this.

"Take care over the building of the eastern city (of Baghdad) in case you do not complete it, but I do not think you will do this.

"Be careful not to ask for help from a man of the Banū Sulaym,[513] and I think you will do this.

"Be careful not to bring women to advise you in your affairs,[514] and I think you will do this."

According to sources other than al-Haytham: Al-Manṣūr summoned al-Mahdi when he left for Mecca and said to him, "O Abū 'Abdallāh,[515] I am setting out and I will not return, for we are [445] God's and return to him. I am asking for a blessing on what I am going to do. This sealed book contains my testament. If you hear that I have died and power has passed to you, look into it. I have a debt and I would like you to pay it and be responsible for it." He replied, "I will do it, O Commander of the Faithful." He said, "It is three hundred thousand dirhams and some more, and I do not consider it lawful to pay it from the treasury of the Muslims, so take responsibility for it and for any more like it," and he replied, "I will do it."

He said, "This palace is not yours; it is mine and I built my palace with my money and I would like you to give your share in it to your younger brothers," and he replied, "Yes."

He said, "My personal slaves are yours, so assign them to them

513. A reference to Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd, future vizier of al-Mahdī, who was a mawlā of Sulaym. According to the account, p. 225, below, he was at this time an unknown prisoner, an indication that this part of the testament is a later addition.

514. Probably a reference to the influence later wielded by al-Khayzurān, wife of al-Mahdī and mother to al-Hādī and Hārūn al-Rashīd.

515. Al-Mahdī.

(your brothers), for you will be in a position where you can spare them and your brothers' needs are greater."

He said, "As for the estates (ḍiyā'), I am not enjoining this (i.e., division with his brothers) on you, but, if you were to do that, I would like it," and he said, "I will do it."

He said, "Hand over to them what I have asked you of this, and you will have a share with them in the estates."

He said, "Hand over the baggage and clothes to them," and he replied, "I will do it."

He said, "May God make the caliphate good for you and the benefit will be yours. Fear God in what he has conferred on you and in what I have given you charge over."

He went to al-Kūfah and stayed in al-Ruṣāfah and then left joyfully for the greater and lesser pilgrimages. He drove camels for sacrifice and marked them and distinguished them on their necks. This was in the last days of Dhū al-Qa'dah (September 2–October 1, 775).

According to Abū Ya'qūb b. Sulaymān—Jamrah al-'Aṭṭārah, perfumer to Abū Ja'far:[516] When al-Manṣūr decided to go on the pilgrimage, he summoned Rayṭah,[517] daughter of Abū al-'Abbās and wife of al-Mahdī, who was at that time in al-Rayy, before he set out and bequeathed her what he wished and gave her his instructions and handed over the keys of the treasuries to her. He instructed her and made her swear and confirm the oath that she [446] would not open one of those treasuries or show it to anyone except al-Mahdī and that not until she was sure of his death, and when that was certain she and al-Mahdī should go together without a third party being present and open the treasury.

When al-Mahdī came from al-Rayy to the City of Peace, she handed over the keys to him and informed him how al-Manṣūr had enjoined her not to open it or show it to anyone until she was certain of his death. When al-Mahdī heard of the death of al-Manṣūr and that the caliphate had passed to him he opened the door, and Rayṭah was with him, and there was a big, long chamber in which there was a collection of corpses of the Ṭālibids, and in their ears were pieces of paper on which were written their genealogies. Among them were children and young men and old men in large numbers. When al-Mahdī saw that, he ordered that a grave be dug for them, and they were buried in it and a tombstone was put over them.

---

516. Abū Ya'qūb is otherwise unknown. 'Aṭṭārah means "a female perfumer," the third example of a female narrator; see above, note 337.

517. Rayṭah was the daughter of al-Saffāḥ who married her cousin, the future caliph al-Mahdī, in 144/761–62. She is described as Umm 'Alī and was still alive in 170/786 at the accession of Hārūn, but otherwise little is known of her.

According to ʿĪsā b. Isḥāq b. ʿAlī—his father: I heard al-Manṣūr as he was setting off to Mecca in the year 158, saying to al-Mahdī that he was saying adieu to him, "O Abū ʿAbdallāh, I was born in the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah and succeeded in the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, and it occurs to me that I may die in Dhū al-Ḥijjah of this year and that has persuaded me to make the pilgrimage. Fear God in the affairs of the Muslims that I have entrusted you with, for He will give you relief from the things that will distress you and sadden you (or he said, a relief and refuge) and will provide you with peace and a good outcome when you do not anticipate it. Remember, O my son, the Prophet Muḥammad in His community (ummah), that God may look after your affairs. Beware of shedding [447] blood unlawfully, for it is a grave offense to God and an unavoidable and lasting disgrace in this world. Keep to the permitted things, for in that is your reward in the future and your safety in the present.

"Apply the established penalties (ḥudūd) and do not go beyond them or you will perish. God knows if something benefits His religion and restrains us from disobeying Him better than the penalties He would have stipulated in His book. Know that for the powerful defense of His Sulṭān, God, in His book, has ordered double the punishment and retribution on those who stir up corruption (fasād) on the earth with the severe punishment He reserves for him when He says, 'The punishment of those who wage war against God and His Prophet and strive with might and main for mischief through the land (is execution or crucifixion).'[518]

"Authority, my son, is the strong rope of God and a firm bond and the unshakable religion of God. Preserve it and protect it and strengthen it and defend it. Strike down the heretics in it and those who would apostasize from it. Kill those who leave it, by applying penalties and punishments. Do not exceed what God laid down about it in the perfect and accurate Qur'ān. Give judgment justly and do not be unfair, for that is the best means to prevent discord, to settle enmity, and to get the best remedy.

518. Qur'ān, V. 33.

"Refrain from taking the fay', for you have no need of it on top of what I have left you. Inaugurate your work with a grant to the family and generosity to the kinsmen. Beware of self-indulgence and wasting your subjects' wealth, fortify the frontiers and establish the borders; make the roads safe. Extend your favor to the best people, improve the livelihood of the common people, and keep them calm by bringing them benefits and defending them from disaster. Keep account of your wealth and put it in the treasury and beware of waste. Nobody is secure from misfortunes, [448] and (future) events cannot be relied on, for that is the nature of time.

"Prepare men and horses and soldiers as far as you are able. Take care not to put off today's work until tomorrow, lest matters pile up on you and they are lost. Be diligent in settling matters that come up at the proper time, first come, first served. Make an effort to get ready for them and prepare men at night to know what will happen in the day and prepare men in the day to know what will happen at night. Take matters in hand yourself; do not get impatient, do not be idle, and do not be faint-hearted. Think the best of your Lord but the worst of your tax collectors and secretaries. Hold yourself in wakefulness. Investigate those who spend the night at your gate and grant permission to the people (to see you) readily. Investigate those strangers who come to you and entrust them to a sleepless eye and undallying soul. Do not sleep, as your father has not slept since he succeeded to the caliphate, and sleep has not entered his eyes without his heart being awake. This is my testament to you and God is my Successor in charge of you."

Then he said farewell to him, and each of them wept in front of the other.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—Sa'īd b. Huraym: When al-Manṣūr went on the pilgrimage in the year in which he died, al-Mahdī bade him farewell and he said, "O my son, I have gathered for you more wealth than any caliph before me and I have gathered for you more freedmen than any caliph before me and I have built for you a city the likes of which there has not been in Islam. I am only afraid for you of two men, 'Īsā b. Mūsā and 'Īsā b. Zayd.[519] As for 'Īsā b. Mūsā, he has given me assurances and guarantees that I have accepted from him and, by God, even if he only spoke empty words, I am not afraid for you of him, so put him out of your mind. As for 'Īsā b. Zayd, if you spend this money, kill these freedmen, and destroy this city so that you can gain control of him, I would not criticize you." [449]

According to 'Īsā b. Muḥammad—Mūsā b. Hārūn: When al-Manṣūr reached the last halt on the road to Mecca, he looked inside the house he was staying in and there was written in it:

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate.
Abū Ja'far, your death is drawing near, and your years
Are coming to a close. There is no escape from the decree of God.
Abū Ja'far, is there a wizard[520] or astrologer
With you today who can hold back the pain of death?

He summoned the man in charge of maintaining the halting places and said to him, "Did I not give you orders that no vandal should enter the building?" and he replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, no one has entered it since it was finished." He said, "Read what is written inside the house!" and the man replied, "I do not see anything, O Commander of the Faithful." He summoned the chief chamberlain and said, "Read what is written inside the house!" and he replied, "I do not see anything inside the house." Al-Manṣūr then dictated the two verses and they were written down. Then he turned to his chamberlain and said, "Recite me a verse from the Book of God that will make me long for God," and he recited, "In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. And soon will the unjust assailants know to what vicissitudes

519. Son of Zayd b. 'Alī who rebelled against the Umayyads in al-Kūfah in 122/740. He played an active role in the 'Alid rebellions of 145/762 and subequently went into hiding, becoming leader of the small clandestine group of the Zaydiyyah (see above, note 137) and refusing the blandishments of al-Mahdī and Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd. He died of natural causes toward the end of al-Mahdī's reign (see Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, especially pp. 405, 411, 416–19).

520. A soothsayer or pre-Islamic holy man among the Arabs; see *EI*², s.v. "Kāhin."

their affairs will take them."[521] He ordered that his jaws be pinched and said to him, "Could you not think of anything other than this verse to recite?" and he replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, the Qur'ān has been erased from my mind except for this verse." He gave orders to move from that lodging, seeing what had occurred as an evil omen, and he rode off on horseback. When he was in the wādī called Saqar, which was the last lodging on the road to Mecca, his horse stumbled and crushed his back. He died and was buried at Bi'r Maymūn.

[450] According to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh, freedman of the Banū Hāshim[522]—one of the 'ulamā' and people of adab: A voice called to Abū Ja'far from his palace in the city and he heard it say:

By the Lord of Stillness and Movement, death has different nets.
Remember, O myself, that if you do evil and if you have good intentions, everything will be yours.
The night and day do not take turns, nor do the stars of the sky revolve in the heavens Except to transfer authority from one king, when his power ceases, to another
Until they bring it to a King
Who shares the glory of His authority with no one,
Who is the Creator of the sky and earth,
the establisher of the mountains, the Controller of the heavens.

Abū Ja'far said, "By God, it is close to the time of my death."

According to 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh[523]—'Abd al-'Azīz b. Muslim:[524] I came in to al-Manṣūr one day and greeted him, and he was lost for words and confused in his answer. I got up when I

---

521. Qur'ān, XXVI: 227.

522. Not known elsewhere.

523. B. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī. An 'Abbāsid, grandson of al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad, al-Manṣūr's brother; see note 58, above. He led the pilgrimage four times in al-Ma'mūn's reign and is last recorded as governor of Yemen in 217/833.

524. Al-'Uqaylī, brother of Isḥāq and Bakkār (see note 114, above). His family had been staunch supporters of Marwān, the last Umayyad caliph, and he himself appears below, p. 197, showing his loyalty to Marwān's son. He died in 167/783–84.

saw him like that, intending to leave him, but he said to me after a while, "I saw as a dreamer sees a man reciting these verses to me:

O little brother, be modest in your wishes.
    It is as if your day has come to you
And time has visited you with the vicissitudes it has visited you with.
And, if you wish to be a base and humble slave, you are that;
    you were made sovereign of what you were made sovereign of,
But command has passed to others.

The cause of my worry and grief, which you see, is what I heard and saw," and I said, "It was a good thing you saw, O Commander of the Faithful," but it was not long after that he set out on the pilgrimage and died on the way there. [451]

In this year the oath of allegiance was taken to al-Mahdī as caliph, and he was Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās, in the early dawn of the night when Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr died, which was Saturday, 6 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 159 (October 7, 775, a Sunday), as it is reported by Hishām b. Muḥammad and Muḥammad b. ʿUmar. According to al-Wāqidī, the oath was taken to him in Baghdad on Thursday, 18 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (October 19), of this year. Al-Mahdī's mother was Umm Mūsā, daughter of Manṣūr b. ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. Shammar al-Ḥimyarī.

The Events of the Year 158 (cont'd)

(NOVEMBER 11, 774–OCTOBER 30, 775)

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās: A description of the oath of allegiance that was taken to al-Mahdī as caliph when his father al-Manṣūr died at Mecca.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Nawfalī—his father: In the year that Abū Jaʿfar died I left (on the Pilgrimage) by the Baṣrah road and Abū Jaʿfar had left by the Kūfah road, and I met him at Dhāt ʿIrq[525] and accompanied him. Whenever he rode, I put myself in his way and greeted him. He was seriously ill and on the brink of death. When he reached Bi'r Maymūn, he stayed there and we entered Mecca and I completed the lesser pilgrimage. I used to visit Abū Jaʿfar frequently in his camp and stay there until shortly after midday, and then I left and the Hāshimites did likewise. His illness began to worsen and become acute. On the night that he died, none of us knew and I performed the morning prayer in the Masjid al-Ḥarām (in Mecca) at daybreak and then [452] rode out in my two robes,[526] with my sword belted on top of them. I went with Muḥammad b. ʿAwn b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith[527] who was one of the lords and shaykhs of the Banū Hāshim. At the time, he was wearing two rose-colored garments that he had donned for iḥrām with his sword belted on them.

525. Modern Ḍarība, the point where pilgrims coming overland from Iraq don the iḥrām. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 107.

He said: The shaykhs of the Banū Hāshim used to like rose-colored garments for the iḥrām because of a tradition of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar and the words of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭalib about it.[528] When we reached the bottom of the wādī, we met al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad and Muḥammad b. Sulaymān with horses and men on their way into Mecca. We went over to them and greeted them and went on, and Muḥammad b. ʿAwn said to me, "What do you think about the role of those two men and of their entering Mecca?" "I reckon that the man has died," I replied, "and that they want to secure Mecca." And so it proved to be.

While we were going along we came across a man of unclear form in two ragged garments (for iḥrām), and we were still in the half-light of early dawn. He came between our two beasts and addressed us saying, "The man, by God, has died," and then he disappeared.[529] For our part, we went on until we came to the camp. When we entered the large tent we used to sit in every day, there was Mūsā b. al-Mahdī sitting in the place of honor by the tent pole, whereas al-Qāsim b. al-Manṣūr was at the side of the tent. Previously, when we met al-Manṣūr at Dhāt ʿIrq, whenever he mounted his camel, al-Qāsim would come and ride in front of him, between him and the Chief of Police, and the people would [453] be ordered to bring their petitions to him. When I saw him at the side of the tent and Mūsā in the place of honor, I knew that al-Manṣūr had died. While I was sitting there, al-Ḥasan b. Zayd came up and sat down beside me so that his thigh rested against mine, and people came until they filled the tent, among them Ibn ʿAyyāsh al-Mantūf. While we were like that I heard a faint sound of weeping and al-Ḥasan said to me, "Do you think that the man

526. The iḥrām, the ritual dress for the pilgrimage; see *EI*², s.v. "Iḥrām."

527. Despite al-Nawfalī's comment on his seniority, he is not recorded elsewhere. He was a descendant of al-Ḥārith b. al-ʿAbbās, hence a distant cousin of the ruling branch of the ʿAbbāsid family.

528. See Hinds and Crone, God's Caliph, 84.

529. Presumably an apparition or ghost.

had died?" and I replied, "I do not think that, but perhaps he is very weak or has lost consciousness." The next thing we knew was that suddenly, Abū al-'Anbar, the black servant of al-Manṣūr, came to us with his outer garments torn in front and behind and dust on his head, crying, "Alas for the Commander of the Faithful!" Every single person who was in the tent stood up and rushed for the tents of Abū Ja'far, wanting to go in, but the servants prevented them, pushing them in the chest, and Ibn 'Ayyāsh al-Mantūf said, "Glory be to God! Have you never witnessed the death of a caliph? Sit down, may God have mercy on you!" The people sat down and al-Qāsim stood up and rent his clothes and put dust on his head, but Mūsā, who was a young lad, remained seated in his place, not budging.

Then al-Rabī' came out with a scroll in his hand. He let the end of it fall to the ground and took the top of it and read:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate.
> From 'Abdallāh al-Manṣūr, Commander of the Faithful, > to the Banū Hāshim, his supporters, the people of Khurāsān, > and the generality of the Muslims who survive him.

Then he dropped the scroll from his hand and wept and the people wept, and then he picked up the scroll and said, "It is easy for you to weep but this is a covenant that the Commander of the Faithful has made and we must read it to you, may God have mercy on you, so listen!"

The people fell silent and he carried on with the reading: [454]

> I hereby write this document of mine while I am alive in the last day of this world and the first of the next. I give you greeting and ask God not to make strife among you after me or "cover you in confusion in party strife, giving you a taste of mutual vengeance—each from the other."[530] and then he began commending al-Mahdī to them and reminding them of the oath of allegiance to him and exhorting them to uphold his state and remain faithful to his covenant to the end of the document.
> Oh Banū Hāshim! Oh people of Khurāsān!

---

530. Qur'ān, VI: 65.

According to al-Nawfalī—his father: This was something that al-Rabīʿ had concocted. Then he looked at the faces of those present and approached the Hāshimites and took the hand of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd,[531] saying, "Stand up, Abū Muḥammad, and take the oath of allegiance!" Al-Ḥasan stood up with him, and al-Rabīʿ took him to Mūsā and sat him down before him. Al-Ḥasan took Mūsā's hand and turned to the people and said, "O people, the Commander of the Faithful al-Manṣūr had beaten me and confiscated my wealth and al-Mahdī interceded on my behalf, and he (al-Manṣūr) restored me to favor and he asked that my wealth be returned but he refused that, so al-Mahdī gave it back out of his own money and doubled it, giving two items for every one. Who could be more likely than I to take the oath of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful, without reservation, with good spirit and a sincere heart?" Then he gave Mūsā the oath of allegiance to al-Mahdī and shook his hand. Next al-Rabīʿ came to Muḥammad b. ʿAwn, giving him precedence on account of his age, and he took the oath. Then he came to me and raised me up, and I was the third (to take the oath).[532] Then the rest of the people took the oath, and, when he had completed that, he entered the tent and remained there a little while. Then he came out to us, the body of the Hāshimites, and ordered us to stand, so we all stood up with him, and we were a great gathering of people from Iraq, Mecca, and Medina, who had come on the pilgrimage. We went in and there was al-Manṣūr on his bier in his shroud with his face uncovered, and we carried him three miles to Mecca. It is as if I could see him now, looking at him from near the leg of the bier as [455] we carried him, and the wind was blowing and ruffling the hair on his temples because he had let his hair grow long in order to shave it off,[533] and the dye had faded from his beard. So we brought him to his grave and lowered him into it.

He said: I heard my father say that the first thing that earned

531. Al-Ḥasan was a leading member of the ʿAlid family; hence his pledge of loyalty was very important.

532. The narrator, Muḥammad al-Nawfalī, came from a branch of Quraysh, Nawfal, having been a brother of Hāshim and ʿAbd Shams, and this accounts for his position of honor.

533. Shaving the hair is part of iḥrām; he would have grown his hair to make the subsequent shaving more noticeable.

ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān a high position was that, on the night when Abū Jaʿfar died, they tried to make ʿĪsā b. Mūsā take a renewed oath of allegiance to al-Mahdī; it was al-Rabīʿ who undertook that, but ʿĪsā b. Mūsā refused. The military commanders who were present began to push forward and backward, and ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān rose up, drew his sword, and came to him and said, "By God, you will take the oath or I will cut your head off!" When ʿIsa saw that, he took the oath and the people took it after him.

According to ʿĪsā b. Muḥammad—Mūsā b. Hārūn: Mūsā b. al-Mahdī and al-Rabīʿ, the freedman of al-Manṣūr, despatched Manārah,[534] the freedman of al-Manṣūr, with news of the death of al-Manṣūr and with the oath of allegiance to al-Mahdī, and afterward they sent al-Ḥasan al-Sharawī[535] with the staff of the Prophet and his mantle,[536] which the caliphs had inherited. Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Ṭūsī[537] sent the seal of the caliphate with Manārah. Then they left Mecca. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr[538] carried the ḥarbah (ceremonial spear) in front of Ṣāliḥ b. al-Manṣūr, as he used to do in the lifetime of al-Manṣūr, and al-Qāsim b. Naṣr b. Mālik,[539] who was in charge of the shurṭah of Mūsā al-Mahdī at that time, broke it. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān interfered because of the grievance he had against ʿĪsā b. Mūsā and what had been done by him to the Rāwandiyyah[540] and openly accused them and 534. He is also described as being one of al-Manṣūr's agents (ʿummāl), but little else is known of him; see Crone, Slaves, 192.

535. He was a freedman of Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, al-Manṣūr's father, and later became governor of Mosul.

536. The staff (qaḍīb) and the mantle (burdah) were among the insignia of the caliphate. The qaḍīb was lost in the later Middle Ages, but it is believed that the burdah passed eventually to the Ottomans and is now kept in the Topkapı Palace in Istanbul.

537. He was keeper of the seal at this time; see above, note 21.

538. Son of al-Manṣūr's long-serving ṣāḥib al-shurṭah (above, note 24). He was later governor of Egypt for a year in Hārūn's reign and ṣāḥib al-shurṭah for al-Maʿmūn (Crone, Slaves, 187).

539. There seems to have been a continuing rivalry between the family of al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr al-Ḍabbī and Mālik b. al-Haytham al-Khuzāʿī for command of the shurṭah. Al-Qāsim himself was later ṣāḥib al-shurṭah to Hārūn for a short time but was overshadowed by his powerful uncle ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik. For the family, see Kennedy, ʿAbbasid Caliphate, 80–81.

540. It is not clear why ʿĪsā was so unpopular with sections of the Khurāsāniyyah, but the ruthless repression of the Rāwandiyyah, who were Khurāsānīs, in 141/758–59 seems to have been a contributory factor.

talked about their journey, one of the leaders being Abū Khālid al-Marwarrūdhī. The matter was on the point of becoming serious [456] and reaching alarming proportions so that they put on arms. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān took action about that and dealt with the matter with other members of his family, but Muḥammad was the best of them at it; the disturbance died down and became calm. He wrote to al-Mahdī about it, and he wrote back removing ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā from command of Mūsā b. al-Mahdī's guard and putting Abū Ḥanīfah Ḥarb b. Qays[541] in his place, and the state of the army quieted down. Al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad and Muḥammad b. Sulaymān came to al-Mahdī, al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad arriving first. Manārah reached al-Mahdī on Tuesday, 15 Dhu al-Ḥijjah (16 October, 775, a Monday), greeted him as caliph, offered his condolences, and handed the letters over to him. The people of the City of Peace took the oath of allegiance to him.

According to al-Haytham b. ʿAdī—al-Rabīʿ: When al-Manṣūr was on the pilgrimage during which he died, at al-ʿUdhayb[542] or one of the other halts on the road to Mecca, he had a dream. Al-Rabīʿ was in the other side of his litter. He was frightened by it and he said, "O al-Rabīʿ, I think I will die on this trip of mine and that you must secure the oath of allegiance to Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Mahdī."

Al-Rabīʿ continued: I said to him, "God will preserve you, O Commander of the Faithful, and Abū ʿAbdallāh will reach what you love in your lifetime, if God wills." His illness increased at that, and he said, "Hasten me to the Ḥaram and safety of my Lord, and I will escape from my sins and self-indulgences." He continued to feel like this until he reached Bi'r Maymūn, and I said to him, "This is Bi'r Maymūn, so you have entered the Ḥaram," and he said, "Thanks be to God," and he died the very same day.

Al-Rabīʿ continued: I ordered the tents to be pitched and the pavilions[543] to be prepared, and I attended to the Commander of 541. He had been one of the assassins of Abū Muslim (al-Ṭabarī, III, 110, 114). He never became a prominent figure and is last recorded escorting a prisoner at the beginning of Hārūn's reign in 171/787–88.

---

542. An oasis that was the stage after Qādisiyyah on the pilgrimage road from al-Kūfah to Mecca; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 92; Morony, Iraq, 153.

543. I have translated khiyam as tents and fasāṭīṭ as pavilions, but there is no clear distinction, except that fasāṭīṭ were probably the larger tents for general gatherings.

the Faithful and dressed him in the ṭawīlah and the durrā'ah,[544] and I propped him up. Over his face I put a thin veil so that you could see his form but not perceive his condition. I brought his family close to the veil so that it was not obvious what had happened to him, but his form could be seen. Then I went in and stood in a place from which I could pretend to them that he was talking to me. After that I came out and said, "The Commander of the Faithful is recovering, by the Grace of God, and sends you his greeting and says, 'I desire that God may safeguard your affairs, crush your enemies, and delight your friends, and I desire that you should renew the oath of allegiance to Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mahdī so that no enemy or oppressor can make trouble among you,'" and all the people said, "May God give success to the Commander of the Faithful; we will hasten to do that." He[545] went in and stayed for a bit and then came out and said, "Come on with the oath!" so all of them swore, and there was not a single one among the courtiers (khāṣṣah), principal men (awliyā'),[546] and chiefs present who did not swear to al-Mahdī. He went in again and came out weeping with his chest rent and slapping his face, and one of those present said, "Our curses on you, O son of a sheep!" meaning al-Rabī', for when his mother who used to suckle him died, he was suckled by a sheep. A hundred graves were dug for al-Manṣūr, and they were all filled in so that the position of his tomb, which was obvious to the people, was not known, and he was buried in a different one because of fear for him.[547] This was done with the tombs of the caliphs of the 'Abbāsid family, and no one knew the whereabouts of their tombs. When al-Rabī' reached him, al-Mahdī exclaimed, "O slave, did not the majesty of the Commander of the Faithful restrain you from doing what you did to him?" People said that he had beaten him, but this was not true. [457]

One of those who was present on al-Manṣūr's pilgrimage said: I

544. Al-Rabī' tried to show that Abū Ja'far was in a normal condition. Thus he dressed him in ṭawīlah (qalansūwah) and durrā'ah (a coat of mail).

545. The narrative changes to the third person here.

546. Khāṣṣah means the elite, or inner circle, and was a more loosely used term than ṣaḥābah, which can also be translated as "courtiers," who were a defined and salaried group. Awliyā' is also a general term for prominent people.

547. The 'Abbāsids had exhumed the bodies of the Umayyad caliphs and desecrated their graves; Abū Ja'far must have been anxious that the same would not happen to him.

saw Ṣāliḥ b. al-Manṣūr with his father. The people were with him and Mūsā b. al-Mahdī was among his followers, but when the [458] people returned they were following Mūsā, and Ṣāliḥ was with them.[548]

It was mentioned on the authority of al-Aṣma'ī: The first person to announce the death of Abū Ja'far in al-Baṣrah was Khalaf al-Aḥmar,[549] and that was when we were sitting in the circle[550] of Yūnus,[551] and he passed us and greeted us and said:

"Calamity has prepared to bring forth her first born."

Yūnus said, "What did he say?[552]

You have certainly caused her to bring forth, a huge-necked she-camel.
The death of the Imām is one of the great disasters."

Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī led the pilgrimage in this year. It is said that al-Manṣūr had arranged that.

The governor of Mecca and al-Ṭā'if in this year was Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās and of Medina 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī; 'Amr b. Zuhayr al-Ḍabbī, brother of al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr, was in charge of al-Kūfah, and it is said that the governor ('āmil) of it was Ismā'īl b. Abī Ismā'īl al-Thaqafī,[553] who was said to be a freedman of the Banū Naṣr of Qays; Sharīk b. 'Abdallāh al-Nakha'ī was in charge of the judiciary there, and Thābit b. Mūsā[554] was in charge of the taxation (kharāj). Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabāh was in charge of Khurāsān and

548. This reflects Mūsā's changed status and position in the order of precedence when his father became caliph and he became heir apparent. Such matters of protocol were taken very seriously in the 'Abbāsid court.

549. Abū Muḥriz Khalaf b. Ḥayyān, 115–80/733–96. His parents were brought from Farghānah as slaves. He was freed and lived in al-Baṣrah, becoming a great expert on ancient Arab poetry; see *EI*², s.v. "Khalaf."

550. Ḥalqah, the circle of students and friends gathered round a teacher.

551. Abū Isḥāq Yūnus b. 'Amr al-Sabī'ī, a Baṣran traditionist who was an important source for sections I and II of the History but who contributed no material on the 'Abbāsid period.

552. Meaning "How does the poem continue?"

553. Al-Ṭabarī quotes him twice as a source for the last days of Umayyad rule in Iraq, but nothing else is known of his career.

554. A tax specialist who was later in charge of the taxation of Iraq, Syria, and the Maghrib in Hārūn's reign; see Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 252; al-Jahshiyārī, 124, 177.

Sharīk b. 'Abdallāh of the judiciary of Baghdad, along with the judiciary of al-Kūfah. It is said that the qāḍī of Baghdad on the day al-Manṣūr died was 'Ubaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ṣafwān al-Jumaḥī[555] and that Sharīk b. 'Abdallāh was in charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah specifically. It is also said that Sharīk was in charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah and of leading its people in prayer. In charge of police in Baghdad on the day al-Manṣūr died is said to have been 'Umar b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān,[556] the brother of [459]
'Abd al-Jabbār b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, but some said it was Mūsā b. Ka'b.[557] 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah was in charge of the taxation office of al-Baṣrah and its district, and 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥasan al-'Anbarī was in charge of the judiciary and prayers there with Sa'īd b. Da'laj over the incidents (aḥdāth). In this year, according to Muḥammad b. 'Umar, the people were afflicted by a severe plague (wabā').

555. 'Ubaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Safwān. He had been in Medina at the time of the rebellion of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh in 145/762 but remained in contact with the 'Abbāsids (see al-Tabarī, III, 226). He was later governor of Medina, where he remained until his death in 160/776–77.

556. Al-Azdī. His brother had been executed by al-Manṣūr for rebellion, so it is a bit surprising to find him in this position. See Crone, Slaves, 173–74.

557. For the problems this raises, see note 193, above.

The Events of the Year 159

(OCTOBER 31, 775–OCTOBER 18, 776)

Al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad led the summer raid on Byzantium, reaching Ankara.[558] Al-Ḥasan b. al-Waṣīf[559] was in charge of the vanguard of al-ʿAbbās's army with the freedmen. Al-Mahdī had assigned a number of commanders from Khurāsān and others to him. Al-Mahdī himself went out and camped at Baradān and remained there until he had despatched al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad and those he sent with him. Al-ʿAbbās did not give al-Ḥasan b. al-Waṣīf, or anyone else, a separate command. In his raids he conquered a city of the Byzantines and a maṭmūrah[560] with it and returned safely, not a single one of the Muslims being injured.

Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah, al-Mahdī's governor of Khurāsān, died in 558. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 735. It will be seen that my understanding of the passage is somewhat different.

559. This seems to have been his only public role. He appears in al-Ṭabarī, III, as al-Mahdī's personal servant. Waṣīf means a slave, a servant, or a page.

560. Brooks takes this to be a subterranean granary, but it could refer more generally to any underground structure, like the rock-cut churches and dwellings still found in Cappadocia.

this year, and al-Mahdī appointed Abū 'Awn 'Abd al-Malik b. Yazīd in his place.

In this year Ḥamzah b. Mālik[561] was appointed governor of Sijistān and Jibra'īl b. Yaḥyā of Samarqand.

In this year al-Mahdī built the mosque of al-Ruṣāfah and built its wall and dug its moat. [460]

In this year al-Mahdī deposed 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī from Medina, the city of the Prophet, because he was angry with him, and appointed Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh al-Kathīrī[562] in his place. Then he deposed him and appointed 'Ubaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣafwān al-Jumaḥī.

In this year al-Mahdī sent 'Abd al-Malik b. Shihāb al-Misma'ī[563] by sea to the land of Hind and assigned to him 2,000 people of al-Baṣrah from all the troops (ajnād) and sent them with him. He sent 1,500 of the volunteers[564] who were settled in frontier garrisons[565] with a commander from the people of Syria called Ibn al-Ḥubāb al-Madḥijī with 700 Syrians. He was accompanied by 1,000 volunteers from the people of al-Baṣrah with their wealth, among them, it is said, al-Rabī' b. Ṣubayḥ,[566] and 4,000 of the Uswāriyyīn[567] and the Sabābijah.[568] 'Abd al-Malik b. Shihāb ap- [461]

561. Son of Mālik b. al-Haytham, brother of 'Abdallāh b. Mālik and uncle of al-Qāsim b. Naṣr; see note 539, above. Ḥamzah was later governor of Khurāsān in 177/793–94 and died in 181/797–98; see Crone, Slaves, 181–83.

562. He was again interim governor in the next year but is otherwise unknown.

563. He was briefly governor of Sind two years later. None of the other commanders is known elsewhere.

564. The distinction seems to be between the salaried ajnād and the voluntary muṭawwi'ah, who fought because they wished to make a contribution to the jihād, or Holy War.

565. Murābiṭāṭ means the men who form such a garrison (see Lane, s.v. rabaṭa). From the same root comes the better-known ribāṭ, meaning a frontier fortress or simply a religious house.

566. According to Ibn al-Athīr, this name should read Ṣubīḥ (see editor's note).

567. So voweled by the editor in the text; the manuscript versions are obviously corrupt. They were Persian cavalrymen who deserted to the Muslims after the conquest of Iraq and settled in al-Baṣrah, where they became like a small tribe and retained their own identity. See Morony, Iraq, 198, 207, 213.

568. Again this is reconstructed by the editor from corrupt readings. He relates it to Persian shabānah, meaning "night watchmen." The Addenda, s.v. sbj, suggests the reading siyābijah and that it derives from a name given to soldiers originally from Sumatra who emigrated to Iraq in pre-Islamic times; see EI[1], s.v. "Sayābidjah."

pointed al-Mundhir b. Muḥammad al-Jārūdī as leader of the 1,000 volunteers from al-Baṣrah and his own son Ghassān b. 'Abd al-Malik as leader of the 2,000 men assigned to him from al-Baṣrah. He appointed his son 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. 'Abd al-Malik as leader of the 1,500 volunteers from the frontier garrisons. He kept Yazīd b. al-Ḥubāb and his men as a separate unit, and they set out. Al-Mahdī sent Abū al-Qāsim Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm to supervise their equipment before they left. They set out on their expedition and reached the city of Bārbad[569] in the land of al-Hind in the year 160 (776–77).

In this year Ma'bad b. al-Khalīl died in Sind. He was al-Mahdī's governor there, and he appointed Rawḥ b. Ḥātim in his place[570] on the advice of his wazīr, Abū 'Ubaydallāh.

In this year al-Mahdī ordered the release of all those who were in al-Manṣūr's prison, except those who were accused of shedding blood or killing or those who were known for spreading corruption or against whom anyone had a complaint or just claim. They were released, and among those who were released from the dungeon was Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd,[571] freedman of the Banū Sulaym. Imprisoned with him in that prison was al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.[572]

In this year al-Mahdī transferred al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm from the dungeon he was in to the custody of Nuṣayr al-Waṣīf.[573]

[462] The reasons why al-Mahdī transferred al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm from the dungeon to Nuṣayr:

---

569. The editor suggests that this should read Nārbudda. I have not been able to locate this place.

570. Al-Muhallabī, elder brother of Yazīd; see note 90, above. At the time of the 'Abbāsid Revolution, he had joined Abū Ja'far at the siege of Wāsiṭ, and he served the 'Abbāsids continuously until his death in Ifrīqiyah in 174/791, becoming, as Ibn Khallikān says, the only man, apart from Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī, to hold office under five caliphs. He returned in 165/781–82 to become governor of his family's home town, al-Baṣrah. He had another spell in al-Kūfah (see pp. 237, 239, below) before his final appointmant to Ifrīqiyah in 171/787–88, see also Ibn Idhārī, Bayān, 84.

571. His origins and rise and fall are fully dealt with in the following pages. Al-Ṭabarī's version is corroborated with some more detail in al-Jahshiyārī, 155–63.

572. An 'Alid, son of Ibrāhīm, who led the 145/762 rebellion in al-Baṣrah.

573. For the term Waṣīf, see note 559, above. He later took the news of al-Mahdī's death to al-Hādī in Jurjān (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 545) and is last recorded in 202/817–18, when he took the oath of allegiance to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī.

It is said that the reason for this was that, when al-Mahdī ordered the release of the prisoners as I have mentioned, Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd was imprisoned with al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm in one place and Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd was released but al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm was not. He was disturbed by this and feared for his life, so he searched for a way of escape for himself and release. He secretly communicated with one of his reliable helpers, who dug a tunnel from a place opposite to the place where he was in prison. After Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd had been released, he used to visit Ibn ʿUlāthah,[574] who was al-Mahdī's qāḍī in the City of Peace, and stay with him until he became friendly with him. Yaʿqūb heard how al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm intended to escape, so he approached Ibn ʿUlāthah and told him that he had some advice for al-Mahdī and asked to be sent to Abū ʿUbaydallāh. Ibn ʿUlāthah asked him what the advice was, but he refused to tell him and kept it to himself. Ibn ʿUlāthah went to Abū ʿUbaydallāh and told him about Yaʿqūb and what he said to him. He ordered him to be fetched and, when he entered, he asked to be taken to al-Mahdī to tell him the advice he had, so he was taken to him. When he came in to al-Mahdī, he thanked him for his favor in releasing him and his generosity to him and said that he had some advice for him. Al-Mahdī asked him for it in the presence of Abū ʿUbaydallāh and Ibn ʿUlāthah, but he asked that they leave. Al-Mahdī told him that he had trust in them, but he refused to reveal anything to him until they got up and he was alone with him. Then he told him the information about al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm and his plan and that it would take place that very [463] night. Al-Mahdī sent a trustworthy man to bring him information, and he told him that Yaʿqūb's information was correct. Al-Mahdī ordered that al-Ḥasan be transferred to Nuṣayr. He remained in his custody until he schemed and schemes were made for him and he escaped and could not be found. News about him became public, and he was sought but could not be captured. Al-Mahdī remembered Yaʿqūb's guidance to him, and he hoped for guidance from him like that he had been given (before) in his affair.

574. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUlāthah; he is said (see below, p. 203) to have been one of the two qāḍīs of al-Ruṣāfah. His brother Sulaymān was governor of al-Jazīrah for Marwān b. Muḥammad, the last Umayyad caliph; see Crone, Slaves, 171.

He asked Abū 'Ubaydallāh about him, and he replied that he was present, as he had stayed with Abū 'Ubaydallāh. Al-Mahdī summoned him privately and spoke of what he had done with regard to al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm the first time and of his advice to him, and he informed him of what had occurred in his affair. Ya'qūb replied that he did not know where he was but that, if he gave him a safe-conduct he could trust, he would guarantee to bring him so that he could fulfill his safe-conduct and be generous to him and favor him. Al-Mahdī gave him this in his council (majlis) and guaranteed it. Ya'qūb said to him, "Refrain, O Commander of the Faithful, from mentioning him and give up searching for him because that frightens him. Leave me and him so that I can entice him and bring him to you." Al-Mahdī agreed to this.

Ya'qūb said, "O Commander of the Faithful, you have extended your justice to your people, treated them fairly, and spread your goodness and favor among them. Their hopes have grown and their expectations have increased. However, there remain some things that, if I drew them to your attention, you would not fail to look into as you do in other affairs. Furthermore, there are things done behind your door without your knowing. If you give me a [464] way of coming in to you and give me permission to bring them to your notice, I shall do that." Al-Mahdī granted him that and entrusted him with it. He appointed Sulaym, the black eunuch of al-Manṣūr,[575] as his channel of communication with al-Mahdī whenever he wished to enter. Ya'qūb used to go in to al-Mahdī by night and offer him advice on good and fine matters concerning the frontiers, the building of fortresses, the strengthening of raids, and the marrying of single people, the liberating of prisoners and captives, the redemption of debtors, and the distribution of alms to the virtuous. He enjoyed his favor because of that and because he hoped he would secure for him the capture of al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm. He took him as a brother in God and issued a decree (tawqī') to that effect and established him in the dīwān,[576] and he was assigned 100,000 dirhams, which was the first grant he had ever received from it. His status continued to increase and climb upward until he placed al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm in the hands of al-Mahdī, after which his status fell and al-Mahdī ordered that he be imprisoned. ʿAlī b. al-Khalīl[577] said about that:

575. I have translated khādim as eunuch, possibly wrongly. At this date it may well just mean "servant"; cf. waṣīf.

576. That is, he was given a regular salary, recorded in the official list, or dīwān.

What a wonder is the changing of affairs pleasing and unpleasing.
Time plays with men
and has running occurrences.
Because of Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd, the ropes of Muʿāwiyah[578] are fraying.
The disasters from ʿĀfiyah[579] have infringed upon Ibn ʿUlāthah the qāḍī.
Say to the wazīr Abū ʿUbaydallāh, [465]
"Do you have a future?"
Yaʿqūb is looking into affairs, and you are looking sideways.
You introduced him, and he rose above you.
That is the real inauspiciousnes.

In this year al-Mahdī dismissed Ismāʿīl b. Abī Ismāʿīl from al-Kūfah and its aḥdāth (supervision of daily affairs). Opinions differ as to who succeeded him; some say it was Isḥāq b. al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Kindī, then al-Ashʿathī,[580] on the advice of Sharīk b. ʿAbdallāh, the qāḍī of al-Kūfah. ʿUmar b. Shabbah says that al-Mahdī appointed ʿĪsā b. Luqmān b. Muḥammad b. Ḥātib b. al-Ḥārith b. Muʿammar b. Ḥabīb b. Wahb b. Hudhāfah b. Jumaḥ[581] and ap-577. Mawlā of Shaybān from al-Kūfah and a poet at the court of Hārūn; Ibn al-Nadīm numbers him among the Zindīq poets (Fihrist, 804). See Aghānī, Būlāq, XIII, 14; Beirut, XIV, 166. He is not quoted elsewhere by al-Ṭabarī.

578. Abū ʿUbaydallāh, al-Mahdī's vizier, whose position was being threatened by Yaʿqūb.

579. Ibn Yazīd al-Azdī. He is described as joint qāḍī of ʿAskar al-Mahdī with Ibn ʿUlāthah. The sense of the poem is that he was supplanting Ibn ʿUlāthah, just as Yaʿqūb was supplanting Abū ʿUbaydallāh.

580. I.e., a member of the tribe of Kindah, descended from the great Ashʿath b. Qays al-Kindī, companion of the Prophet and a leading figure in the politics of early Muslim Iraq. The family was still very influential in al-Kūfah in early ʿAbbāsid times. Isḥāq was the father of Yaʿqūb al-Kindī, known as the "philosopher of the Arabs"; see Crone, Slaves, 110–12.

581. A Qurashī, Jumaḥ being a branch of Quraysh. He was later governor of Egypt, 161–62/778–79. It is not clear why al-Ṭabarī gives so complete a genealogy pointed his brother's son 'Uthmān b. Sa'īd b. Luqmān over the police. It is also said that Sharīk b. 'Abdallāh was in charge of the prayers and the judiciary and 'Īsā of the aḥdāth, and then Sharīk was appointed alone as governor and put Isḥāq b. al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Kindī in charge of the police. A poet said:

You would not be more than a puppet raised up by Sharīk even if your hand were to stretch so high as to catch Canopus.[582]

They say that Isḥāq did not thank Sharīk and that Sharīk said to him:

He prays and fasts for the things of this world he hopes for;
he attains them and prays and fasts no more.

According to 'Umar[583]—Ja'far b. Muḥammad, the qāḍī of al-Kūfah:[584] Al-Mahdī put Sharīk in charge of the prayers as well as the judiciary and Isḥāq b. al-Ṣabbāḥ in charge of the police. Then he later appointed Isḥāq b. al-Ṣabbāḥ over the prayers and the aḥdāth; then he appointed Isḥāq b. al-Ṣabbāḥ b. 'Imrān b. Ismā'īl b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath as governor of al-Kūfah. He appointed [466] al-Nu'mān b. Ja'far al-Kindī[585] over the police, but al-Nu'mān died and he appointed his brother Yazīd b. Ja'far over the police.

In this year al-Mahdī deposed Sa'īd b. Da'laj from the aḥdāth of al-Baṣrah and 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥasan from the prayers and the judiciary of its people, and he appointed 'Abd al-Malik b. Ayyūb b. Ẓubyān al-Numayrī in place of both of them. He wrote to 'Abd al-Malik, ordering him to do justice to those people of al-Baṣrah who had been oppressed by Sa'īd b. Da'laj. Then in this year the aḥdāth were removed from the control of 'Abd al-Malik b. Ayyūb and given to 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah. 'Umārah put a man from al-Baṣrah called al-Miswar b. 'Abdallāh b. Muslim al-Bāhilī[586] in and none of his forebears seems to have distinguished himself; the identical genealogy is recorded by Ibn al-Kalbī (Caskel, table 24).

---

582. The poem may be a comment on the different social status of Sharīk and Isḥāq, humble Sharīk appointing the aristocratic Isḥāq as his deputy.

583. B. Shabbah.

584. Not recorded elsewhere.

585. Presumably a relative of his.

586. Probably a cousin of Salm b. Qutaybah b. Muslim al-Bāhilī, whose family was prominent in al-Baṣrah; see above, note 27.

charge of it, and 'Abd al-Malik was confirmed in charge of the prayers.

In this year Qutham b. al-'Abbās was deposed from al-Yamāmah because of (the caliph's) anger, but, when the letter of his deposition arrived in al-Yamāmah, he had died. Bishr b. al-Mundhir al-Bajalī[587] was appointed governor in his place.

In this year Yazīd b. Manṣūr was deposed from Yemen and Rajā' b. Rawḥ was appointed in his place.

In this year al-Haytham b. Sa'īd[588] was deposed from al-Jazīrah and al-Faḍl b. Ṣāliḥ was appointed as governor.

In this year al-Mahdī manumitted his slave girl (umm walad) al-Khayzurān and married her.[589]

In this year al-Mahdī also married Umm 'Abdallāh, daughter of Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī and sister of al-Faḍl and 'Abdallāh b. Ṣālih by the same mother. In this year in Dhu al-Ḥijjah (20 September–18 October, 776) fire broke out among the boats in Baghdad by the palace of 'Īsā b. 'Alī.[590] Many people were burned, and the boats there with their contents were destroyed by fire.

In this year Maṭar, freedman of al-Manṣūr, was deposed from [467]
Egypt and Abū Ḍamrah Muḥammad b. Sulaymān[591] was made governor in his place.

In this year there was agitation among the Banū Hāshim and their party of the people of Khurāsān, demanding the removal of 'Īsā b. Mūsā from his position as heir apparent and its transfer to Mūsā b. al-Mahdī. When that became apparent to al-Mahdī, he wrote, it is said, to 'Īsā b. Mūsā, who was in al-Kūfah, ordering 587. Nothing more is known about him.

588. He is probably to be identified with al-Haytham b. Sa'īd b. Zuhayr, mawlā of al-Manṣūr, who had a suwayqah (small market) in west Baghdad by the Round City (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 288). It is not clear when he was appointed to al-Jazīrah, and no further information is known about him.

589. Mother of the future caliphs al-Hādī and Hārūn and the princess al-Banūqah. A former slave of Yemeni origin, she became very powerful because of her influence with al-Mahdī. Her position declined in al-Hādī's reign, but she regained much of her influence upon the accession of Hārūn. She died in 173/789.

590. This lay on the west bank of the Tigris, where the 'Īsā Canal flowed into it, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 146. There was a harbor there mostly used by boats coming from al-Baṣrah.

591. Not to be confused with Muḥammad b. Sulaymān the 'Abbāsid (see note 29, above). He remained governor until 161/778, according to al-Ṭabarī, but is not recorded by al-Kindī (see note 167, above).

him to come to him, but ʿĪsā was suspicious of his intentions and refused to come to him.

According to ʿUmar:[592] When power passed to al-Mahdī, he asked ʿĪsā to resign his position but he refused, so he wanted to coerce him. He appointed Rawḥ b. Ḥātim b. Qabīṣah b. al-Muhallab as governor of al-Kūfah and Khālid b. Yazīd b. Ḥātim in charge of the police. Al-Mahdī was wanting Rawḥ to attack ʿĪsā in a way that nothing could be held against Rawḥ, but he could not find any means of achieving this.

ʿĪsā had left for an estate of his at al-Raḥbah[593] and only used to come into al-Kūfah during two months in the year, in Ramaḍān, when he joined the Friday prayers, and the ʿĪd,[594] after which he returned to his estate, and at the beginning of Dhū al-Ḥijjah to attend the ʿĪd[595] and return immediately to his estate. When he attended the Friday prayers, he used to ride from his house to the doors of the mosque, dismount on the threshold of the door, and pray on the spot, Rawḥ wrote to al-Mahdī saying that ʿĪsā b. Mūsā did not attend Friday prayers or enter al-Kūfah except for two months of the year and, when he did come, he rode until he reached the square by the mosque, which was the praying place of [468] the people, and then he crossed it to the gates of the mosque and his animals dropped dung in the praying place of the people. No one else did this. Al-Mahdī wrote to Rawḥ, ordering him to block the ends of the lanes that led to the mosque with planks of wood so that the people would dismount there. Rawḥ put the planks at the ends of the lanes, so that the place became known as "the Planks." ʿĪsā b. Mūsā heard about this before Friday, and he wrote to the heirs of Mukhtār b. Abī ʿUbayd,[596] the house of Mukhtār being on the edge of the mosque, and bought it for a high price, refurbished it, and had a bath installed. On Thursday he went there and stayed in it and, when he wanted to go to Friday prayers, he mounted a donkey and rode slowly to the gate of the mosque,

592. B. Shabbah.

593. It is probable that ʿĪsā's secluded residence was the great palace now known as Ukhaydir, in the desert west of al-Kūfah.

594. The ʿĪd al-Fiṭr, or Feast of the Breaking of the Ramaḍān Fast on 1 Shawwāl.

595. The ʿĪd al-Adha, or Feast of Sacrifice, on 10 Dhū al-Ḥijjah.

596. Mukhtār had led a famous rebellion against the Umayyads in al-Kūfah in 65–67/685–87.

prayed in a corner, and returned to his house. He made al-Kūfah his home and stayed there. Al-Mahdī became insistent with ʿĪsā and said, "If you do not agree to renounce your rights so that I can have the oath of allegiance taken to Mūsā and Hārūn, I will feel justified in treating you as a rebel, but, if you accept, I will compensate you with what will be more advantageous to you and more immediately useful." He agreed and took the oath of allegiance to the two of them, and al-Mahdī ordered ten million *dirham*s for him, or, it is said, twenty million *dirham*s, and numerous estates (qaṭāʾiʿ).

According to someone other than ʿUmar: Al-Mahdī wrote to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā when he was intending to depose him, ordering him to come to him, but he was suspicious of his intentions and refused to come so that it was feared that he would rebel. Al-Mahdī sent his uncle al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad to him and wrote a letter and informed him what he wanted him to say to ʿĪsā. Al-ʿAbbās reached ʿĪsā with al-Mahdī's letter and his message to him, and he returned to al-Mahdī with his reply to that. After al-ʿAbbās had [469] come to him, he sent Muḥammad b. Farrūkh Abū Hurayrah,[597] the commander, with a thousand of his companions who were enthusiastic in their support (for al-Mahdī). He gave each man a drum and ordered them to beat them in unison as they reached al-Kūfah. He entered the city one night in the early dawn, and his companions beat their drums. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā was extremely frightened by that. Abū Hurayrah came to him and ordered him to set out. ʿĪsā complained that he was ill, but Abū Hurayrah did not accept this and brought him immediately to the City of Peace.

The leader of the pilgrims in this year was Yazīd b. Manṣūr, the maternal uncle of al-Mahdī, on his arrival from Yemen.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—anon.—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar: Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidī and others also say this: Yazīd b. Manṣūr came from Yemen because of a letter from al-Mahdī ordering him to come to him and appointing him in charge of the Pilgrimage and telling him of his longing to see him and have him near.

597. Al-Azdī. He had been one of the small group of Khurāsānī soldiers who had discovered al-Saffāḥ in al-Kūfah and first proclaimed him caliph (al-Ṭabarī, History, III, 36). Immediately before his death, al-Hādī sent him to arrest his brother Hārūn, and, when Hārūn became caliph, he had Muḥammad executed in 171/787–88.

The governor of Medina in this year was 'Ubaydallāh b. Ṣafwān al-Jumaḥī, Isḥāq b. al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Kindī was in charge of the prayers and the aḥdāth at al-Kūfah, Thābit b. Mūsā was in charge of the taxation there, and Sharīk b. 'Abdallāh of the judiciary. 'Abd al-Malik b. Ayyūb b. Ẓubyān al-Numayrī was in charge of [470] the prayers at al-Baṣrah. 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah was over the aḥdāth there, with al-Miswar b. 'Abdallāh b. Muslim al-Bāhili as his deputy and 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥasan over the judiciary. 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah was over the districts (kuwar) of the Tigris, al-Ahwāz, and Fārs. Bisṭām b. 'Amr was in charge of Sind,[598] Rajā' b. Rawḥ of Yemen, and Bishr b. al-Mundhir of al-Yamāmah. Abū 'Awn 'Abd al-Malik b. Yazīd was in charge of Khurāsān, al-Faḍl b. Ṣāliḥ of al-Jazīrah, Yazīd b. Ḥātim of Ifrīqiyah, and Muḥammad b. Sulaymān Abū Ḍamrah of Egypt.

---

598. His brother Hishām had been governor of Sind in 156–57/772–74, and he himself was appointed to Azerbaijān in 161/777–78. See Crone, Slaves, 167–68.

The Events of the Year

160

(October 19, 776–October 8, 777)

The events of this year:

Among the events of this year was the rebellion of Yūsuf b. Ibrāhīm, he was the one who was called Yūsuf al-Barm,[599] in Khurāsān. He and those who followed him and shared his opinions repudiated al-Mahdī because of the position he was alleged to be in and his conduct in that position. It is said that many people joined him and Yazīd b. Mazyad was sent against him and met him in battle until they fought hand to hand and Yazīd took him prisoner and sent him to al-Mahdī with a number of his principal supporters. When they were brought to al-Nahrawān, Yūsuf al-Barm was carried on a camel with his face toward the tail of his camel, and his supporters were also on camels. They were taken into al-Ruṣāfah in this position and brought to al-Mahdī. He ordered Harthamah b. A'yan to cut off Yūsuf's hands and legs and then to behead him and his supporters, and they were crucified on the Upper Bridge over the Tigris at the 'Askar al-Mahdī end. [471]

599. For this rebellion, see Daniel, Khurāsān, 166–67.

He only ordered Harthamah to kill him because he had killed a brother of Harthamah's in Khurāsān.[600]

In this year ʿĪsā b. Mūsā arrived with Abū Hurayrah on Thursday, 6 Muḥarram (Thursday, October 24, 776), according to al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān. He stayed in a house belonging to Muḥammad b. Sulaymān on the banks of the Tigris in ʿAskar al-Mahdī. For some days he stayed visiting al-Mahdī, frequently going in by the entrance he was used to using and not meeting with any opposition, hostility, or indifference, and some of the courtiers became friendly with him. Then one day he came to the palace before al-Mahdī's audience and came into an audience being held by al-Rabīʿ in a small room (maqṣūrah) with a door. The chiefs of the (ʿAbbāsid) party had gathered that day to depose him and attack him, and they did that when he was in the room where al-Rabīʿ held his audience. The door of the room was locked in front of them, so they beat on the door with their maces and their staffs until they smashed it and almost broke it down. They cursed him with the worst of curses and besieged him there. Al-Mahdī appeared to disapprove of what they were doing, but this did not deter them from what they were doing but rather they intensified their attack on him. He and they remained in this position for some days until senior men from his family made it public in the presence of al-Mahdī and they insisted on deposing him and cursed him to his face, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān being the most hostile of them toward him. When al-Mahdī saw their opinion of ʿĪsā and their hatred of him and his position as heir apparent, he called on them to accept Mūsā as heir. He went along with their opinion and agreement and urged ʿĪsā to respond to him and them by giving up the oath to himself that was on the necks of the people and releasing them from it. He refused, saying that he was restrained [472] by an oath on his money and his family.[601] Al-Mahdī sent him a number of legal scholars (fuqahā) and judges, among them Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUlāthah, al-Zanjī b. Khālid al-Makkī,[602]

600. Daniel regards this as the "ostensible reason," but there seems to me no cause to doubt al-Ṭabarī's account.

601. I.e., an oath with provision that he would give away his money and divorce his wives if he broke it; see p. 186, below, where ʿĪsā's letter of resignation contains such penalty clauses.

602. Nothing more seems to be known of him.

and others, and they gave him a legal opinion as they saw it. (He agreed to his deposition).[603] Eventually al-Mahdī decided to buy the oath that he had on the necks of the people for what would be a satisfaction and compensation to him for what he was paying out for the breaking of his oath. This was ten million dirhams and the estates of the Upper Zāb and Kaskar, and ʿĪsā accepted this. Since al-Mahdī had begun negotiations about deposing him until he had agreed to it, ʿĪsā had remained confined with him in the House of the Dīwān[604] in al-Ruṣāfah until he accepted the deposition and the surrender on Wednesday, 26 Muḥarram (Wednesday, 13 November, 776), after the afternoon prayer. He took the oath of allegiance to al-Mahdī and to Mūsā after him on the morning of Thursday, 27 Muḥarram (Thursday, 14 November, 776), toward midday. Then al-Mahdī received the members of his family in a pavilion that Muḥammad b. Sulaymān had given him that was pitched in the Courtyard of the Gates.[605] He received their oaths of allegiance to himself and to Mūsā b. al-Mahdī after him one by one until the last of them, and then he went out to the Friday Mosque in al-Ruṣāfah and sat on the pulpit. Mūsā climbed up so that he was below him and ʿĪsā stood on the first step of the pulpit. Al-Mahdī thanked God and praised him and prayed for the Prophet. Then he explained why he had called together the people of his House and his Party, his commanders, his helpers (anṣār) and others of the people of Khurāsān. He told them about the deposition of ʿĪsā b. Mūsā and the transfer of the rights he had over the people to Mūsā, son of the Commander of the Faithful, about their choice of him and their pleasure in him and how he saw their response to that, what he hoped from their interest and [473] friendship and what he feared from their differences in intention and disagreements in their words. ʿĪsā had resigned his precedence and released them from the oath to him that was on their necks. His rights in this had passed to Mūsā, son of the Commander of the Faithful, with the agreement of the Commander of the Faith-

603. The editor suggests that these words from Ibn al-Athīr's version should be inserted; al-Ṭabarī, III, 472, n. b.

604. Dār al-Dīwan, presumably the building where the dīwān records (see note 401, above) were kept, but it is not recorded by the geographers.

605. Saḥn al-Abwāb, it seems that this was in the caliph's palace in al-Ruṣāfah.

ful and the members of his family and his party. Mūsā was the agent of the Book of Allāh and the sunna of His Prophet among them with the best and most just conduct.

(He continued,) "So take the oath of allegiance, you who are present and make haste to do what others have made haste to do before. All goodness lies in consensus and all evil in division. I ask Allāh for us, and for you, good fortune through His mercy and action in obedience to Him and what is pleasing to Him, and I ask the forgiveness of Allāh for me and for you."

Mūsā sat down below him separately on the pulpit so as not to leave a gap between him and those who came up to take the oath of allegiance to him and shake his hand and so that his face should not be hidden. ʿĪsā remained standing in his place and a letter was read to him detailing his resignation, his withdrawal from his position as heir apparent, and his releasing of the people from the oath of allegiance to him that was on their necks. That was his own doing, and he was doing it obediently without force, willingly without anger, lovingly without duress. ʿĪsā agreed to that and went up to swear allegiance to al-Mahdī and shook his hand and then retired. The family of al-Mahdī took the oath in order of age, swearing allegiance to al-Mahdī and then to Mūsā, shaking both their hands until the last of them had finished. Those of the courtiers (aṣḥāb) and the leading military commanders and men of the (ʿAbbāsid) party who were present did likewise. Then al-Mahdī came down and went to his house, leaving his maternal uncle Yazīd b. Manṣūr in charge of taking the oath from those who were left of the upper and lower classes (khāṣṣah wa-ʿāmmah). He administered it until all the people had finished. Al-Mahdī handed over to ʿĪsā what he had given him and satisfied him with for the resignation of the position of heir apparent. For him he [474] wrote a letter of resignation witnessed by all the people of his house, his courtiers and his party, his secretaries and the soldiers in his *dīwān*s, as a proof against ʿĪsā and a block to any claims or pretensions he might have to what he had given up.

This is a copy of the conditions that ʿĪsā wrote for himself:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. This is a letter to the servant of Allāh al-Mahdī Muḥammad, Commander of the Faithful, and to the heir apparent of the Muslims, Mūsā, son of al-Mahdī, to the members of his family, to all his commanders and troops of the people of Khurāsān, and to all the Muslims in eastern and western parts of the earth wherever they may be. I wrote it for al-Mahdī Muḥammad, Commander of the Faithful, and for the heir apparent of the Muslims, Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī concerning the assigning to him of the covenant that belonged to me until the words of the Muslims came together, their affair was harmonized, and their desires were united to accept appointing Mūsā, son of al-Mahdī Muḥammad, Commander of the Faithful, as heir apparent. I have acknowledged that the writing of that is binding on me and that the writing in it is mine. I have entered into what the Muslims have entered into concerning the choice of Mūsā, son of the Commander of the Faithful, and the oath of allegiance to him and have abandoned the oath of allegiance to me that was on their necks, and given you freedom from that, in fullness without embarrassment on your behalf, or any of your number or the generality of the Muslims. There is nothing either old or new of that which gives me any claims, demands, proofs, arguments, or obedience from anyone of you or from the generality of the Muslims. There is no oath of allegiance (due to me) in the lifetime of Muḥammad, Commander of the Faithful, or after him, or after the heir apparent of the Muslims, Mūsā, as long as I live until my death. I have sworn allegiance to Muḥammad al-Mahdī, Commander of the Faithful, and to Mūsā son of the Commander of the Faithful after him, and I [475] have granted to them and to the mass of the Muslims of the people of Khurāsān and others absolution from the conditions that applied to me in this matter that I have abandoned. I have made a pact with Allāh to persist in this. I will not release any of His creatures from any pact or agreement or oath or assurance (they have made) to hear and obey and support al-Mahdī Muḥammad, Commander of the Faithful, and his heir apparent, Mūsā, son of the Commander of the Faithful, either secretly or openly, by word or by deed, by intention, by force, by urgent request, for better or for worse. (I shall act) in friendship to the two of them and those they appoint to office and hostility to those who are hostile to them, whoever it might be, as if we were still in this position that I have abandoned.

If I deviate from or change or alter or interfere with or act contrary to anything I have promised in this agreement or if I call on others to disobey anything I have made incumbent on myself in this letter to al-Mahdī Muḥammad, Commander of the Faithful, and his heir apparent, Mūsā, son of the Commander of the Faithful, and to the mass of the Muslims, or do not fulfill it, every wife I have married at the time I wrote this letter or will marry in the next thirty years is divorced three times, finally and completely, every slave I have now or will own in the next thirty years is free before Allāh, and all my wealth, coin or goods or loans or land, whether great or small, long held or newly acquired, or that I shall acquire in the next thirty years from today, will be alms (ṣadaqah) for the wretched and the governor will distribute it as he sees fit. I will walk barefoot from the City of Peace to the old house of Allāh[606] that is in Mecca, dedicated and obliged, for thirty years. There will be no expiation for me and no escape for me except fulfillment of it, and God will ensure the fulfillment of it as the responsible witness, and God is a [476] sufficient witness. The witness to ʿĪsā b. Mūsā of his acceptance of what is in these conditions is four hundred and thirty members of the Banū Hāshim, of the freedmen, of the courtiers (ṣaḥābah) of Quraysh, the ministers, secretaries, and judges. This was written in Ṣafar, 160 (18 November—16 December, 776), and sealed by ʿĪsā b. Mūsā.

A poet said:

Abū Mūsā hated death,
but in death was escape and honor.

606. The Kaʿbah.

He cast off power and appeared dressed in a very long garment of blame that goes down till his feet are not seen.

In the year 160 'Abd al-Malik b. Shihāb al-Misma'ī reached the city of Bārbad with those volunteers and others who had set out with him. They attacked the city the day after their arrival and besieged it for two days. They then prepared a mangonel and attacked it with all their equipment. Then the people gathered together and spurred each other on with the Qur'ān and praising Allāh, and Allāh allowed them to take it by force. Their horsemen entered it from all sides and forced them to take refuge in their stronghold. They lit fires with oil, and some of them were burned while others attacked the Muslims but Allāh killed them all. More than twenty Muslims were martyred and Allāh gave (the city) as booty (fay') to them.

The sea became rough so that they could not sail away on it, so they stayed until it improved and they were afflicted with a disease in their mouths called scurvy (ḥumām qurr), and about a thousand of them died, including al-Rabī' b. Ṣubayḥ. Then they left when it was possible and reached the shore of Fārs at a place called Baḥr Ḥamrān.[607] The wind rose up on them there during the night, and most of their ships were wrecked. Some of them [477] were drowned and some escaped. They brought with them some of their prisoners, among them the daughter of the king of Bārbad, to Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, who was at that time governor of al-Baṣrah.

In this year Abān b. Ṣadaqah was appointed secretary and minister (wazīr) to Hārūn b. al-Mahdī.

In this year Abū 'Awn was deposed from Khurāsān on account of (the caliph's)[608] anger and Mu'ādh b. Muslim was put in his place.

In this year the summer expedition (against the Byzantines)

607. Not known to the geographers.

608. According to Ibn al-Athīr, this was because he failed to defeat the rebel al-Muqanna'. That the caliph still retained a high opinion of him is shown by the anecdote, pp. 256–57, below.

was led by Thumāmah b. al-Walīd al-'Absī.[609]

In this year al-Ghamr b. al-'Abbās al-Khath'amī[610] led a raid on the Syrian (Mediterranean) sea.

In this year al-Mahdī returned the family of Abū Bakrah from their genealogy in Thaqīf to their position as clients of the Prophet of God.[611] The reason for this was that a man of Abū Bakrah complained of injustice to al-Mahdī and claimed to be related to him because of his position as a freedmen of the Prophet of God. Al-Mahdī replied, "You have established this genealogy and traced back this descent only when you felt you needed to and you required to become close to us." Al-Ḥakam said, "O Commander of the Faithful, if anybody has denied that, we will acknowledge it. I am asking you to return me and the clan of Abū Bakrah to our descent from the freedman of the Prophet of God and to order that the family of Ziyād b. 'Ubayd be expelled from the genealogy to which Mu'āwiyah had attached them, contrary to the judgment of the Prophet: 'The child belongs to the bed and to the adulterer the stone.' They should be returned to their descent from 'Ubayd among the freedmen of Thaqīf."[612]

Al-Mahdī ordered that all the branches of the family of Abū [478] Bakrah and the family of Ziyād should be returned to their genealogy. He wrote to Muḥammad b. Sulaymān a letter that he ordered should be read out in the Great Mosque (in al-Baṣrah) to

609. He was to lead the expedition for the next two years. For his background, see Crone, Slaves, 105–6.

610. Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 253, says that he had a property in Baghdad and calls him ṣāḥib al-baḥr, "the lord of the sea."

611. Abū Bakrah Nufay' (or Nafī') b. Masrūḥ was a slave man of Thaqīf by origin, but he became a mawlā (client here, rather than freedman) of the Prophet. His mother, Sumayyah, later married 'Ubayd, so he and Ziyād were half-brothers (see note 612). His descendant is claiming that this bond entitles him to be considered as a member of the Prophet's kin. The issue was important because genealogy decided the level of pension paid by the dīwān.

612. Ziyād was Mu'āwiyah's right-hand man in Iraq. At first he was accepted as the son of 'Ubayd, a mawlā of Thaqīf and his wife Sumayyah, but it was widely believed that Sumayyah had been unfaithful and that Ziyād's true father was Abū Sufyān, Mu'āwiyah's father. As a sign of his gratitude, Mu'āwiyah acknowledged the link and had Ziyād accepted as an Umayyad. Al-Mahdī removed his descendants to the humbler position of mawālī of Thaqīf. The descendant of Abū Bakrah is arguing that this is a precedent and that the caliph can alter people's genealogical status if he believes that to be right.

the effect that the family of Abū Bakrah should be returned to their status as freedmen of the Prophet and their descent from Nufay' b. Masrūḥ.[613] There should be returned to those who acknowledged that genealogy their wealth in al-Baṣrah, which he ordered should be restored to them the same as those in a similar position whose wealth had been restored to them. It should not be returned to those who denied that. He appointed as investigator and examiner of them al-Ḥakam b. Samarqand.[614]

Muḥammad put into effect the orders that had come about the family of Abū Bakrah, except those of them who were not present. As for the family of Ziyād, what strengthened the opinion of al-Mahdī about them was what 'Alī b. Sulaymān reported that his father told him: "I was in the presence of al-Mahdī when he was investigating complaints (maẓālim), when a man from the family of Ziyād called al-Ṣughdī b. Salm b. Ḥarb came to him and he asked, 'Who are you?' and he replied, 'Your cousin (ibn 'amm),' so he asked, 'Which cousin?' and he traced his genealogy back to Ziyād.[615] Al-Mahdī said, 'O son of Sumayyah the adulteress, since when are you my cousin?' and he was very angry with him, and he was squeezed in the neck and thrown out and the people rose."

He said: When I went out, 'Īsā b. Mūsā or Mūsā b. 'Īsā followed me and said, "By God, I wanted to send after you because the Commander of the Faithful turned to us after you had gone out and said, 'Who knows anything about the family of Ziyād?' and, by God, none of us knew a thing about it. Do you have any information, O Abū 'Abdallāh?" I continued to tell him about Ziyād and the family of Ziyād until we reached his house by the Muḥawwal Gate, where he asked me by God and kinship to write all of it down so that he could go to the Commander of the Faithful and tell him about it on my authority. So I wrote it down and sent it to him, and he went to al-Mahdī and informed him about it. Al-Mahdī ordered that a letter be written to Hārūn al-Rashīd, [479] who was his governor of al-Baṣrah,[616] ordering him to write to

613. See note 611, above.

614. He is not recorded elsewhere.

615. If Ziyād had been accepted as an Umayyad, his descendant would have been a (very distant) cousin of the caliph.

616. The situation seems to have been that the young Hārūn had some theoretthe governor to remove the family of Ziyād from the dīwān of Quraysh and the Arabs[617] and to examine the descendants of Abū Bakrah about their position as clients of the Prophet. Those who accepted it were to retain their wealth, but, if they traced their descent to Thaqīf, it should be confiscated. They were examined and all of them accepted their status as freedmen except three, and their wealth was confiscated. After that the family of Ziyād bribed the chief of the dīwān to restore them to their previous position. Khālid al-Najjār[618] said about this:

To me :(the brothers) Ziyād, Nāfiʿ, and Abū
Bakrah are one of the most amazing wonders.
One is a Qurashī, he says, the next a client and the third, as he alleges, an Arab.

A copy of the letter sent by al-Mahdī to his governor of al-Baṣrah ordering that the family of Ziyād be returned to their genealogy:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. The most just thing that the governors of the Muslims themselves, their courtiers, and their general public undertake in their affairs and their judgments is acting among them (the Muslims) in accordance with the Book of God and in surrendering to the desires other than it leads to with it. They should persevere with it and take pleasure in it in their likes and dislikes because of what is in it about the establishment of the legal punishments of God, the knowledge of His law, the following of His wishes, and the obtaining of His rewards, and His good recompense. Whatever goes in conflict with it, in rejecting it > [480] and in surrendering to the desires other than it, leads to all sorts of going astray and depravity in this world and the next.
>
> It was the decision of Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān to adopt Ziyād b. ʿUbayd, the slave of the family of ʿAllāj of Thaqīf ical authority over al-Basrah but appointed an executive governor to administer the city.

617. Following Ibn al-Athīr here, see al-Ṭabarī, III, 479, n. b.

618. Nothing more is known of him.

and to accord him what the mass of the Muslims after him and many in his own time refused him[619] because of their knowledge of Ziyād and his father and his mother. (Those who refused him were) persons of good will, virtue, law (fiqh), piety, and knowledge. Muʿāwiyah did not follow that because of piety, or good guidance, or observing the guiding Sunnah, or the example of the past imāms of truth, but because of his desire for the destruction of his faith and his afterlife and his determination to contradict the Book and the Sunnah. He admired Ziyād for his determination and effectiveness and what he hoped from his assistance and his support to strengthen him in his resorting to the falsehood in his conduct, ways, and wicked works. The Prophet of God said, "The child belongs to the bed and to the adulterer the stone,"[620] and he said, "He who claims descent from someone other than his father, or to be related to someone other than his master, upon him is the curse of God and His angels and of all the people. God will not accept either repentance or ransom from him." By my life, Ziyād was not born in the lap of Abū Sufyān, nor in his bed, nor was ʿUbayd a slave of Abū Sufyān, nor was Sumayyah his slave girl. They were not his property, and he did not own them by any means.

All those who know traditions and anecdotes remember what Muʿāwiyah said to Naṣr b. Ḥajjāj b. ʿĪlāṭ al-Sulamī[621] and those freedmen of the Banū'l-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī who were with him,[622] and how they wanted to adopt him and accept his claim. Muʿāwiyah prepared a stone under one of his cushions and threw it at them, and they said to him, "Should we regard as permissible what you have done for Ziyād while you do not make permissible to us what we have done to our relative (Naṣr)?"

619. I.e., the status of a member of Quraysh.

620. Crone and Hinds, God's Caliph, 88, claim that this is the first time a caliph ever quoted a prophetic tradition in a public statement.

621. Naṣr was the beautiful lad of Medina with whom a certain woman was infatuated. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb drove him out of Medina.

622. No further information is available about them.

Upon that Muʿāwiyah said to them "The judgment of the Prophet of God is better for you than the judgment of [481] Muʿāwiyah." Thus in his judgment about Ziyād and his adopting him, and what he did for him and how he promoted him, Muʿāwiyah contradicted the order of God, Great and Glorious, and pursued in this matter his own desire, forsaking truth and avoiding it. God, Great and Glorious, says, "Who is more led astray than he who follows his own desires without the guidance of God, for God does not give guidance to a wrong-doing people."[623]

And He said to David, to whom he had given judgment and Prophecy and wealth and the caliphate, "O David, we did indeed make you a vicegerent (khalīfah) on the earth," to the end of the verse.[624]

The Commander of the Faithful asks God to safeguard his soul and his faith and protect him from pursuing his own desires and to grant him success in all his affairs as He wishes and accepts, for He is listening and close.

The Commander of the Faithful has decided that he will return Ziyād and those who are descended from him to their mother and their well-known genealogy; he assigns them to their father, ʿUbayd, and their mother, Sumayyah. He is following the words of the Prophet of God and what truthful people and rightly guided Imāms have agreed upon. He does not hold permissible what Muʿāwiyah has ventured that contradicts the Book of God and the Sunnah of his Prophet. The Commander of the Faithful is the person most entitled to do that and to apply it because of his kinship with the Prophet of God and his following in his tracks, his keeping alive of his Sunnah and his rejection of the customs (sunan) of others that deviate and outrage truth and good guidance.

God, Great and Glorious, has said, "Apart from Truth, what remains but error? How then are ye turned away?"[625]

---

623. Qur'ān, XXV: 50.
624. Qur'ān, XXXVIII: 26.
625. Qur'ān, X: 32.

> Know that this is the decision of the Commander of the Faithful about Ziyād and the matter of the children of Ziyād, so attach them to their father, Ziyād b. 'Ubayd, and their mother, Sumayyah. Force them about that and make it known to those of the Muslims in your area, so that they may know it and it may be accepted among them. The Commander of the Faithful has written to the qāḍī of al-Baṣrah and the master of their dīwān about that. Peace be upon you and the mercy of God and His blessings.

Mu'āwiyah b. 'Ubaydallāh wrote this in the year 159 (31 October, 775–18 October, 776). When the letter reached Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, he set about putting it into effect, but then representations were made on their behalf and he did not proceed. 'Abd al-Malik b. Ayyūb b. Ẓubyān al-Numayrī had been sent a letter like the one to Muḥammad, but he did not put it into effect because of his relationship to Qays and his dislike of any of his people, leaving it for another group.[626] [482]

In this year the death of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ṣafwān al-Jumaḥī occurred. He was governor of Medina, and Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh al-Kathīrī was appointed in his place, but he remained there only a short time before he was removed and Zufar b. 'Āṣim al-Hilālī was appointed in his place. Al-Mahdī appointed 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Imrān al-Ṭalḥī[627] in charge of the judiciary in Medina in this year.

In this year 'Abd al-Salām al-Khārijī[628] rebelled and was killed.

In this year Bisṭām b. 'Amr was deposed from Sind and Rawḥ b. Ḥātim was made governor.

Al-Mahdī led the pilgrims in this year. When he left his city, he

---

626. Numayr and Quraysh were of the Qays group, thinly represented in al-Baṣrah, and 'Abd al-Malik did not want to lose the family of Ziyād.

627. B. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, a descendant of Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, the Prophet's companion and one of the first Muslims. This may be why al-Ṭabarī singles him out for notice, for he does not seem to have been famous for any other reason (see Caskel, Table 21, for the full genealogy).

628. B. Hāshim al-Yashkūrī. Ibn al-Athīr adds that he was killed near Mosul, and al-Khalīfah, Tārīkh, 702, quotes al-Mahdī's letter refuting his claims. For further details, see text, p. 492.

appointed his son Mūsā as his deputy and with him left Yazīd b. Manṣūr, the maternal uncle of al-Mahdī, as his vizier and administrator of his affairs. In this year his son Hārūn and a group of people of his household set out with al-Mahdī. Among those who accompanied him was Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd because of the position he had with him. When he reached Mecca, al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥasan, for whom Ya'qūb had asked al-Mahdī for a safe-conduct, came to him with his safe-conduct. Al-Mahdī gave him the best of gifts and rewards and assigned him wealth from the state lands (ṣawāfī) in the Ḥijāz.

[483] In this year, al-Mahdī took off the cover (kiswah) of the Ka'bah and replaced it with a new one. This was because the keepers of the Ka'bah, it is said, told him that they were afraid that it would be destroyed by the weight of the covers that were on it. He ordered that the covers that were on it should be stripped off so that it was completely bare. Then he ordered that the whole house be covered with perfume (khālūq). It is said that, when they reached Hishām's cover, they found it was made of very thick brocade and they found that the covers of those before him were mostly of textiles from Yemen.

This year it is said that al-Mahdī distributed a great deal of money to the inhabitants of Mecca and that he did the same to the people of Medina. It is said that the amount he distributed on this journey was investigated and it was found to be thirty million dirhams, which he brought with him. Three hundred thousand dīnārs came to him from Egypt and 200,000 from Yemen, and it was all distributed. One hundred and fifty thousand garments were also distributed. He extended the mosque of the Prophet of God and ordered the removal of the enclosure (maqṣūrah) that was in the mosque of the Prophet, so it was removed.[629] He wanted to reduce the height of the pulpit of the Prophet of God and return it to its original state, removing from it what Mu'āwiyah had added. It is said on the authority of Mālik b. Anas[630] that he took advice about this and he was told that there were nails that joined the wood that Mu'āwiyah had added to the original ancient wood and that it was not safe to take out these nails because the vibration would break it, so he abandoned the idea.

629. The enclosure for prominent people (maqṣūrah) was disapproved of by the pious because all Muslims should be considered equal before God.

630. D. 179/796. The great traditionist and legal scholar, author of the Muwaṭṭā and founder of the Mālikī legal school; see EI^{2}, s.v. "Mālik b. Anas."

During the days he was staying in Medina he ordered that five hundred of the men of the Anṣār[631] should be recruited and that they should be a guard and helpers (anṣār) to him in Iraq. They were to be given their food in addition to their salaries and, on their arrival with him at Baghdad, they were given a property (qaṭī'ah),[632] which was known after them.

During his stay there, he married Ruqayyah the 'Uthmānī, daughter of 'Amr.[633]

In this year Muḥammad b. Sulaymān brought ice to al-Mahdī, [484] which reached him in Mecca. Al-Mahdī was the first of the caliphs to have ice brought to him in Mecca.

In this year, al-Mahdī returned to his family and others the plots (qatā'i') that had been confiscated from them.

Isḥāq b. al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Kindī was in charge of the prayers and the aḥdāth in al-Kūfah in this year, and Sharīk was in charge of the judiciary there. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān was in sole charge of al-Baṣrah and its aḥdāth and its separate offices, the districts (kuwar) of the Tigris, Baḥrayn, and 'Umān and the districts of Ahwāz and Fārs. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥasan was in charge of the judiciary of al-Baṣrah in this year. Mu'ādh b. Muslim was in charge of Khurāsān, al-Faḍl b. Ṣāliḥ of al-Jazīrah, Rawḥ b. Ḥātim of Sind, Yazīd b. Ḥātim of Ifrīqiyah, and Muḥammad b. Sulaymān Abū Ḍamrah of Egypt.

---

631. In this case, descendants of the original anṣār of Medina, the helpers of the Prophet are meant, not the Khurāsāniyyah, who are often referred to as the anṣār of the 'Abbāsids; see note 63, above.

632. Le Strange, Baghdad, 222, notes a Bridge of the Anṣār on the East Bank of the Tigris in Baghdad.

633. Probably daughter of 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr, a grandson of the caliph 'Uthmān. After al-Mahdī's death, Ruqayyah became the wife of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, the unsuccessful 'Alid rebel of 169/785–86.

The Events of the Year 161

(OCTOBER 9, 777–SEPTEMBER 27, 778)

The events of this year:

Among the events of this year was the rebellion of Ḥakīm al-Muqanna'[634] in Khurāsān, from one of the villages of Marw. It is said that he used to teach the transmigration of souls and applied it to himself. He led many people astray and became powerful and moved to Transoxania. Al-Mahdī sent a number of commanders to fight him, among them Mu'ādh b. Muslim, who was at that time in charge of Khurāsān. With him were 'Uqbah b. Muslim,[635] Jibra'īl b. Yaḥyā, and Layth, freedman of al-Mahdī.[636] Then al-Mahdī put Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī[637] in sole command of the war against 634. For the most recent discussion of al-Muqanna', with full references, see Daniel, Khurāsān, 137–47.

635. This name should probably read 'Uqbah b. Salm, on whom see note 72, above.

636. He was later appointed governor of Sind (see below, p. 505; Ya'qūbī, Tā'rīkh, II, 465; Crone, Slaves, 192.

637. Not to be confused with Sa'īd b. 'Amr b. Aswad al-Ḥarashī, who was governor of Khurāsān for the Umayyads 103–4/721–22 (cf. Crone, Slaves, 144–45, who attempts to link the two). Al-Kindī, Governors, 122, reveals that the family at him and attached the commanders to him. Al-Muqanna' began to gather food in preparation for a siege in a castle in Kishsh.[638]

In this year Naṣr b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath al-Khuzā'ī[639] [485] apprehended 'Abdallāh b. Marwān[640] in Syria and brought him to al-Mahdī, before he was appointed governor of Sind, and al-Mahdī imprisoned him in the Muṭbaq.[641]

Abū al-Khaṭṭāb mentioned: 'Abdallāh b. Marwān b. Muḥammad, whose kunyah was Abū al-Ḥakam, was brought to al-Mahdī when he was holding a public audience in al-Ruṣāfah, and he said, "Who knows this man?" and 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Muslim al-'Uqaylī stood by him and said to him, "Abū al-Ḥakam?" and he replied, "Yes, the son of the Commander of the Faithful," and he said, "How have you been since I saw you?" Then 'Abd al-'Azīz turned to al-Mahdī and said, "Yes, Commander of the Faithful, this is 'Abdallāh b. Marwān." The people were amazed at his boldness, but al-Mahdī did not take any action against him.

When al-Mahdī imprisoned 'Abdallāh b. Marwān he laid a trap for him. 'Amr b. Sahlah al-Ash'arī[642] came and claimed that 'Abdallāh b. Marwān had killed his father and he was brought before 'Āfiyah the Qāḍī, who gave judgment that he should be killed for 'Amr's father, and proof was established against him. When the judgment was about to be carried out, 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Muslim al-'Uqaylī came to 'Āfiyah the Qāḍī, passing through the people until he reached him, and said, "'Amr b. Sahlah alleges that 'Abdallāh b. Marwān killed his father. By God he is lying, for I alone killed him, on the orders of Marwān, and 'Abdallāh is one time consisted of slaves of Ziyād b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Qushayrī (Naṣr b. Sayyār's governor of Nīshāpūr). His father, Dāwūd, was a Turk, while his mother was maternal aunt of the king of Ṭabaristān. He later campaigned in Ṭabaristān and is last recorded in 189/805, when he came to meet Hārūn al-Rashīd on his visit to al-Rayy. He was given extensive properties in eastern Baghdad by al- Mahdī, including a market and a square, perhaps as a reward for defeating al-Muqanna'.

---

638. In Transoxania between Samarqand and the Oxus, known since AD the fifteenth century as Shahr-i Sabz. See Le Strange, Lands, 469–70.

639. Son of the Khurāsānī commander Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath al-Khuzā'ī. He was later governor of Sind and died there in 164/780–81 (Crone, Slaves, 185).

640. Son and heir apparent of Marwān b. Muḥammad, the last Umayyad caliph. He died in prison in 170/786–87.

641. The state prison within the walls of the Round City in Baghdad; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 27.

642. Nothing is known of this man or his father.

innocent of his blood." The case against 'Abdallāh b. Marwān was dropped, and al-Mahdī did not take any action against 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Muslim because he killed him on the orders of Marwān.

In this year Thumāmah b. al-Walīd led the summer expedition[643] and camped in Dābiq, and the Byzantines assembled an army while he was heedless. When his scouts and spies came and told him, he did not pay any attention to what they said. He went out against the Byzantines, who were commanded by Michael, with [486] the advance guard, and a number of the Muslims were killed. 'Īsā b. 'Alī was posted (murābiṭ) at the fortress of Mar'ash[644] at that time. The Muslims did not make a summer raid this year because of that.

In this year al-Mahdī ordered the building of castles (quṣūr) on the road to Mecca[645] more extensive than the castles that Abū al-'Abbās had built from Qādisiyyah to Zubālah, and he ordered that Abū al-'Abbās's castles should be enlarged, and he left the staging posts that Abū Ja'far had built as they were. He ordered the building of reservoirs (maṣāni') at each watering place and the renewal of the milestones and cisterns (birak) and the building of watering troughs with the reservoirs. He put Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā in charge of this, and he continued with it until the year 171 (June 22, 787–June 10, 788). Yaqṭīn's successor in this was his brother Abū Mūsā.

In this year al-Mahdī ordered the enlargement of the great mosque in al-Baṣrah, and it was extended in front in the direction of the qiblah and on the right in the direction of the square of the Banū Sulaym. He put Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, who was at that time governor of al-Baṣrah, in charge of the work.

In this year al-Mahdī ordered the demolition of the enclosures (maqṣūrah) in all the mosques and the shortening of the pulpits

643. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 735.

644. Modern Maraş, in southeastern Turkey. It was one of the main Muslim bases on the south side of the Taurus mountains; see Le Strange, Palestine, 502–3.

645. With the establishment of 'Abbāsid power in Iraq, the pilgrimage road from al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah to Mecca became increasingly important, and water supply was a constant problem; see below, p. 501. This was aggravated by the fact that the pilgrimage fell in high summer during the reigns of al-Mahdī and Hārūn. This was one of a series of measures to improve the position that culminated in the work of Zubaydah in the reign of Hārūn.

and their reduction to the size of the pulpit of the Prophet of God. He wrote about that to the provinces and it was done.

In this year al-Mahdī ordered Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd to send trusted agents to all the regions, and this was done. No letter was allowed to be sent on behalf of al-Mahdī to a governor until Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd had written to his trusted agent to send it.

In this year the status of Abū 'Ubaydallāh, the vizier of al-Mahdī, was humbled. Ya'qūb attached to himself a large number of the legal experts of al-Baṣrah and of the people of al-Kūfah and Syria. He appointed as chief of the Baṣrans and organizer of their business Ismā'īl b. 'Ulayyah al-Asadī[646] and Muḥammad b. Maymūn [487] al-'Anbarī.[647] He appointed 'Abd al-A'lā b. Mūsā al-Ḥalabī[648] as chief of the people of al-Kūfah and the people of Syria.

The reason why the position of Abū 'Ubaydallāh with al-Mahdī changed:

We have already mentioned the reasons for his appointment in the days of al-Manṣūr and how al-Mansūr attached him to al-Mahdī when he sent him to al-Rayy at the time when 'Abd al-Jabbār b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān rebelled against al-Manṣūr.[649]

According to Abū Zayd 'Umar b. Shabbah—Sa'īd b. Ibrāhīm—Ja'far b. Yaḥyā—al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī': The freedmen used to denounce Abū 'Ubaydallāh to al-Mahdī and attack him in his presence. The letters of Abū 'Ubaydallāh used to convey to al-Manṣūr whatever business he wished, and the freedmen were closeted with al-Mahdī and used to inform him about Abū 'Ubaydallāh and incite him against him.

Al-Faḍl said: The letters of Abū 'Ubaydallāh used to come to my father one after the other complaining about the freedmen and what he suffered from them. He continued to mention it to al-Manṣūr and tell him about his position, and he extracted letters from him to al-Mahdī ordering him to stop listening to slander about him.

---

646. 116–93/734–809. An important authority for Section I of al-Ṭabarī's history. Ibn al-Nadīm numbers him among the traditionists (Fihrist, 549).

647. Not known elsewhere.

648. Not known elsewhere; his name al-Ḥalabī suggests that he came from Aleppo.

649. In 141/758–59. For the fall of Abū 'Ubaydallāh, see also al-Jāḥiẓ, 150–57, and Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 99–103.

He said: When Abū 'Ubaydallāh saw the influence of the freedmen over al-Mahdī and how they were alone with him, he approached four educated and knowledgeable men from different tribes and attached them to al-Mahdī so that they were among his courtiers, so as not to let the freedmen be alone with him. Then when Abū 'Ubaydallāh spoke to al-Mahdī on some business of his, one of these four men raised objections concerning the busi-[488] ness that he was speaking about. Abū 'Ubaydallāh passed over it in silence and did not argue with him and left. He ordered that the man be kept from seeing al-Mahdī, so he was kept from him. News of this reached my father.

He said: My father went on the pilgrimage with al-Manṣūr in the year in which he died, and my father undertook what he undertook on behalf of al-Mahdī with regard to the oath of allegiance and its renewal from the household of al-Manṣūr and his commanders and freedmen. When he arrived, I met him after sunset and accompanied him while he went past his dwelling place and left the house of al-Mahdī and went to Abū 'Ubaydallāh and he said, "O my little son, he is friend (ṣāḥib) of the man,[650] and it is necessary that we should not deal with him as we used to deal with him about it, nor should we call him to account for the help we gave him in his business."

We went on until we reached Abū 'Ubaydallāh's gate, and he remained standing while I prayed the evening prayer. The chamberlain came out and said, "Enter," so he stretched his legs and I stretched mine. (The chamberlain) said, "I only gave you permission to enter, O Abū al-Faḍl," and my father replied, "Go and tell him that al-Faḍl is with me," and turning to me he said, "This is also related to that."

He said: The chamberlain came out and gave permission for us to enter together so we went in, my father and I. Abū 'Ubaydallāh was in the front of the reception room, on a prayer mat leaning with his elbow on a cushion and I said (to myself), "He (usually) stands up for my father when he comes in," but he did not stand up for him. And I said, "He will sit erect when he approaches him," but he did not do it. And I said, "He will summon a prayer rug for him," but he did not do it. My father sat down before him on the carpet while he was leaning. He began to ask him about his journey, his travel, and his conditions, and my father waited for him to ask about what he had done in the business of al-Mahdī and the renewal of the oath of allegiance, but he avoided it and, when my father began to mention it, he said, "News of you has reached me." Then my father began to get up and he said, "I see that the gates are closed so you may stay," and my father replied, "The gates cannot be closed to me." But he answered, "Yes, they have been closed."

650. I.e., al-Mahdī; now that Abū 'Ubaydallāh's master is caliph, he must be treated with respect.

My father thought that he was wanting to detain him so that he could rest after his journey and to ask him so he said, "I will stay." Abū 'Ubaydallāh said, "O so-and-so, go and prepare a place for Abū al-Faḍl to spend the night in the house of Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh." When my father saw that he was wanting him to leave the house he said, "The gates cannot be closed in front of me." Then he made up his mind and rose. [489]

When we left the house, my father turned to me and said, "O my little son, you are most stupid," and I said, "What is my stupidity?" and he replied, "You should have said to me, 'You should not have come and, when you did come and we were not admitted, you should not have gotten up until you had prayed the evening prayer and you should have gone away and not entered. When you entered and he did not stand up for you, you should have returned and not stayed with him.' The right course of action was entirely what I did. But, by the one and only God, Whose oaths are binding, I will use my rank and spend my wealth to satisfy myself from Abū 'Ubaydallāh."

He said: He began to make strenuous efforts but he could not find any way of getting at the object of his hate, despite using great stratagems. Then he remembered al-Qushayrī,[651] whom Abū 'Ubaydallāh debarred (from entering the caliph's presence). He sent to him and when he came he said, "You already know what Abū 'Ubaydallāh has done to you, and he has done the most evil sorts of things to me. I have conspired against him with all my power, but I have not found any way to get at him. Do you have any ideas about his business?" He replied, "Abū 'Ubaydallāh can only be got at in one way, which I will tell you. It is said that Abū 'Ubaydallāh is the most ignorant of men in his trade, but Abū 'Ubaydallāh is the most skillful of people, or it is said that [490] he is suspect in his adoption of the Faith, but Abū 'Ubaydallāh is the most upright of men; if the daughters of al-Mahdī were in his lap, that would be their safe place. Or it is said that he is inclined to contradict the Sulṭān, but Abū 'Ubaydallāh cannot be attacked through that; yet he is only showing some inclinations toward Qadar. He cannot be attacked through that to the extent of drawing an accusation against him, but he can be attacked for all this through his son."

651. I cannot identify him further.

Al-Rabī' took him in his arms and kissed him between the eyes. Then he began to conspire against the son of Abū 'Ubaydallāh and, by God, he continued to scheme and make insinuations to al-Mahdī and accused him with regard to one of al-Mahdī's harem until suspicion of Muḥammad b. Abū 'Ubaydallāh was established in al-Mahdī's mind. He ordered that he should be summoned and Abū 'Ubaydallāh was brought out, and he said, "Muḥammad, recite!" and he began to recite, but he was unable to speak the Qur'ān. The caliph said, "Mu'āwiyah, did you not tell me that your son has learned all the Qur'ān?" He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, I did tell you, but he left me years ago and in that period when he kept his distance from me, he has forgotten the Qur'ān." He said, "Get up and come near to God by killing him!" and he began to stand up and collapsed. Al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad said, "I think, Commander of the Faithful, that you should excuse the old man."

He said: He did so and he ordered that he (the son) be taken out and beheaded.

He said: Al-Mahdī was suspicious of him in his heart and al-Rabī' said to him, "You have killed his son, so it is not desirable that he should be with you or that you should trust him," and he filled al-Mahdī with anxiety and his affair turned out as it turned out and al-Rabī' achieved what he wanted; he was avenged and his power increased.

According to Muḥammad, son of Abū 'Abdallāh Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd—his father: Al-Mahdī beat a man of the al-Ash'arīs and caused him pain. Abū 'Ubaydallāh felt solidarity with the man because he was a freedman of theirs and he said, "Death would be better than that, O Commander of the Faithful," and al-Mahdī said to him, "O Jew, get out of my camp ('askar),[652] God curse you!" and he said, "I do not know where I shall go if not to the fire (of hell)," and my father said, "O Commander of the Faithful, how fitting that such a thing should be prepared," and he said to me, [491] "Glory be to God, O Abū 'Abdallāh."

In this year, al-Ghamr b. al-'Abbās made a naval raid (on the Byzantine Empire).

In this year Naṣr b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath was appointed to Sind in place of Rawḥ b. Ḥātim and he set out there until he reached it, when he was deposed and replaced by Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, who sent 'Abd al-Malik b. Shihāb al-Misma'ī. He arrived there and came upon Naṣr unawares. He gave him permission to set out, so he set out until he stopped on the shore about six *farsakh*s from al-Manṣūrah. Naṣr b. Muḥammad then received his diploma of appointment to Sind and returned to his post. 'Abd al-Malik had been there for eighteen days and he did not block his way, and so he returned to al-Baṣrah.

In this year al-Mahdī appointed 'Āfiyyah b. Yazīd al-Azdī as qāḍī. He and Ibn 'Ulāthah were both *qāḍī*s in 'Askar al-Mahdī in al-Ruṣafah. The qāḍī in the eastern city (madīnat al-sharqiyyah) was 'Umar b. Ḥabīb al-'Adawī.[653]

In this year al-Faḍl b. Ṣāliḥ was deposed from al-Jazīrah and 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī was appointed in his place.

In this year 'Īsā b. Luqmān was made governor ('āmil) of Egypt.[654]

In this year Yazīd b. Manṣūr was appointed governor (wālī) of the Sawād of al-Kūfah, Ḥassān al-Sharawī of Mosul, and Bisṭām b. 'Amr al-Taghlibī of Azerbaijān.

---

652. Al-Ruṣāfah in Baghdad was sometimes called 'Askar al-Mahdī, the Camp of al-Mahdī, and it may be what is meant here.

653. It is not clear what is meant here. The Sharqiyyah quarter lay on the west bank of the Tigris to the east of the Round City. According to Le Strange (Baghdad, 90–91), it originally had its own Friday mosque and qāḍī, so it could have been referred to as a madīnah. The other possibility is that this should read, madīnat al-gharbiyyah ("the western city"), meaning the Round City and its suburbs on the west bank, as opposed to al-Ruṣāfah on the east.

654. Al-Kindī, Governors, 128.

In this year he deposed Abū Ayyūb, who was called Sulaymān al-Makkī, from the dīwān of taxes (kharāj), and Abū al-Wazīr 'Umar b. al-Muṭarrif was appointed in his place.[655]

In this year Naṣr b. Mālik died of hemiplegia, which afflicted him. He was buried in the cemetery of the Banū Hāshim and al-[492] Mahdī prayed over him. In this year Abān b. Ṣadaqah was transferred from Hārūn b. al-Mahdī to Mūsā b. al-Mahdī and appointed as his wazīr and secretary. Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak was appointed to his position with Hārūn b. al-Mahdī. In this year al-Mahdī deposed Muḥammad b. Sulaymān Abū Ḍamrah from Egypt in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (August 30–September 27, 778) and appointed as governor (wālī) Salamah b. Rajā'.[656]

Mūsa b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh al-Hādī led the pilgrimage this year, and he was heir apparent to his father.

The governor of al-Ṭā'if, Mecca, and al-Yamāmah in this year was Ja'far b. Sulaymān. Isḥāq b. al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Kindī was in charge of the prayers and the aḥdāth at al-Kūfah and Yazīd b. Manṣūr of the Sawād there.

---

655. Nothing is known of either of these: 'Umar's appointment is confirmed by al-Jahshiyārī (166). He married Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd's brother's daughter and is last recorded on the pilgrimage of 169/786.

656. His appointment is not noted by al-Kindī, and nothing more is known of him.

The Events of the Year

162

(September 28, 778–September 16, 779)

The events of this year:

Among these was the killing of 'Abd al-Salām al-Khāriji at Qinnasrīn. It was said: This 'Abd al-Salām b. Hāshim al-Yashkūrī rebelled in al-Jazīrah, and his following there became numerous and his power became intense. He was met by a number of al-Mahdī's commanders, among them 'Īsā b. Mūsā al-Qā'id (the Commander).[657] He killed him with a number of those who were with him, and he routed a number of the commanders. Al-Mahdī sent troops against him, and he afflicted disaster on more than one commander, among them Shabīb b. Wāj al-Marwarrūdhī.[658] Then he assigned to Shabīb a thousand horsemen and gave each one of them a thousand dirhams for supplies. Then he sent them to meet Shabīb, and they came to him and Shabīb set out on the 657. B. 'Ajlān al-Khurāsānī, not to be confused with 'Īsā b. Mūsā the 'Abbāsid. He had taken part in the mutiny of Khurāsānī troops in Ifrīqiyah in 148/765 (Ibn Idhārī, Bayān, 73), but little more is known of him.

658. He had been present at the proclamation of al-Saffāḥ as caliph in 132/750 and was one of the four assassins of Abū Muslim. His name implies that he originally came from Marw al-Rūdh in Khurāsān.

tracks of 'Abd al-Salām. He fled from them until he reached Qinnasrīn,[659] where Shabīb met him and killed him.

[493] In this year al-Mahdī established the registry departments[660] and appointed his freedman 'Umar b. Bazī'[661] in charge of them. 'Umar b. Bazī' appointed al-Nu'mān b. 'Uthmān Abū Ḥāzim[662] in charge of the registry of the taxation of Iraq.

In this year al-Mahdī ordered that payments be made to the lepers and people of the prisons in all districts.[663]

In this year Thumāmah b. al-Walīd al-'Absī was appointed to command the summer expedition, but he did not carry it out.

In this year the Byzantines attacked Ḥadath and destroyed its walls.[664] Al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah led the summer expedition with thirty thousand regular troops, beside volunteers. He reached Ḥammah al-Adhrūliyyah[665] and wrought great destruction and damage in Byzantine lands, without capturing a fortress or meeting an army. The Byzantines called him "the sea monster." It is said that al-Ḥasan only came to this al-Ḥammah (hot spring) to soak in it because of the skin complaint (waḍaḥ) he had. Then he withdrew with the people safely. Ḥafṣ b. 'Āmir al-Sulamī[666] was qāḍī in his army and in charge of the booty (fay') that was collected.

He said: In this year Yazīd b. Usayd al-Sulamī raided through

---

659. Ancient Chalcis, south of Aleppo in northern Syria, an important center at the time of the Muslim conquests; it was at this time in full decline, Aleppo becoming the regional center; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, VI, 403–4; Le Strange, Palestine, 486–87.

660. Dawāwin al-azimmah. Morony, Iraq, 66–68, 512, explains that these dīwāns were registries where records of all decisions were stored. According to him, Ziyād b. Abīhi was said to have been the first Muslim official to use them, in the reign of Mu'āwiyah, which seems to conflict with the statement here that they were established by al-Mahdī.

661. Nothing is known of his origins, but he seems to have been a freedman. In 168/784–85 he was replaced by 'Alī b. Yaqṭīn, but a year later he succeeded al-Rabī' as vizier to the caliph Mūsā al-Hādī, which is probably why he does not seem to have held office under Hārūn; see al-Ṭabarī, III, 582–83, 598; al-Jahshiyārī, 144, 146, 160, 166, 173.

662. Nothing more is known of him.

663. Presumably this relates to the payment of alms, though why the people of the prisons (ahl al-sujūn) were so favored is not clear.

664. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 735–36. My interpretation differs somewhat from his.

665. Dorylaion, modern Eskişehir, on the main road across Asia Minor, between the frontier and Constantinople.

666. Nothing more is known about him.

the pass of Qālīqalā,[667] took booty, and conquered three fortresses and took many prisoners and captives.

In this year 'Alī b. Sulaymān[668] was deposed from Yemen and 'Abdallāh b. Sulaymān[669] was appointed in his place.

In this year Salamah b. Rajā' was deposed from Egypt and 'Īsā b. Luqmān was appointed governor (wālī) in Muḥarram (September 28–October 27, 778),[670] and was then deposed in Jumādā II (February 23–March 23, 779). Wāḍiḥ, freedman of al-Mahdī, was appointed governor but was deposed in Dhū al-Qa'dah (July 20–August 18, 779) when Yaḥyā al-Ḥarashī[671] was appointed.

In this year the Muḥammirah[672] appeared in Jurjān, led by a man called 'Abd al-Qahhār. He conquered Jurjān and killed many people. 'Umar b. al-'Alā'[673] launched a raid against him from Ṭabaristān and killed 'Abd al-Qahhār and his companions.

Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far b. al-Manṣūr[674] led the people on the pilgrim- [494]

667. Byzantine Theodosopolis, modern Erzurum, in the extreme eastern part of Anatolia.

668. Al-'Abbāsī, son of Sulaymān b. 'Alī and brother of Muḥammad (note 29, above) and Ja'far (note 35) He became governor of northern Syria and al-Jazīrah soon after this and seems to have remained in that area until removed from office by al-Hādī in 169/786. He was also briefly governor of Egypt 169–70/786, after which he disappears from the record; see al-Kindī, Governors, 131.

669. Al-Rabā'ī, no relation of his predecessor, 'Alī; he is known only for his appointment to Yemen.

670. Al-Ṭabarī's account differs here from that of al-Kindī, Governors, 121–22, who has 'Īsā arriving in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 161, that is, a month before al-Ṭabarī says he was appointed. They agree on the year of his dismissal and on the appointment of Wāḍiḥ, but al-Kindī has him deposed in Ramaḍān, a month later than al-Ṭabarī. They both agree that Yaḥyā al-Ḥarashī was the next governor.

671. Brother of Sa'īd (see note 637, above). He had a reputation for determined administration of justice and ruthless establishment of law and order. He subsequently had a varied career as governor of Rūyān and Ṭabaristān, Armenia (twice), and Mosul; he is last heard of as governor of al-Jibāl in 184/800 (al-Ṭabarī, III, 500, 503, 517, 520, 649; Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 517; al-Kindī, Governors, 122).

672. So called because they wore red; they were part of a popular revolutionary movement in Jurjān, devoted to the memory of Abū Muslim. Despite this defeat, they were to reappear in Hārūn's reign; see Daniel, Khurāsān, 147.

673. He was by origin a butcher in Qazvīn, in northern Iran, who distinguished himself by raising a troop to oppose the rebellion of Sunbādh (al-Ṭabarī, History, III, 119–20). He subsequently became an expert on the affairs of Ṭabaristān and led numerous campaigns there. He is said to have forced the local ruler to surrender, but he was killed in the province at the end of al-Mahdī's reign (al-Ṭabarī, 136, 137, 500, 520, 521, 'Uyūn, 229; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, II, 46).

674. Son of Ja'far the Elder (see note 49).

age in this year. Al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad had asked al-Mahdī for permission to go on the pilgrimage after that, and al-Mahdī reproved him for not asking permission before he had appointed anyone for the pilgrimage, so that he could appoint him to it, and he said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I delayed that on purpose because I did not want the appointment."

The governors of the amṣār were the same as in the previous year, with ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī in al-Jazīrah, Saʿīd b. Daʿlaj in Ṭabaristan and al-Rūyān and Muhalhil b. Ṣafwān[675] in Jurjān.

675. Freedman of al-Manṣūr. He is recorded in 137/754–55 fighting Khārijites in al-Jazīrah and disappears from the record after he was dismissed from Ṭabaristān (p. 216, below).

The Events of the Year 163

(SEPTEMBER 17, 779–SEPTEMBER 5, 780)

The events of this year:

Among the events of this year was the destruction of al-Muqanna'. This was because Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī besieged him in Kishsh and the siege tightened and, when he felt near death, he drank poison, and his women and family drank it too and, it is said, they all died. The Muslims entered his castle and cut off his head and sent it to al-Mahdī while he was in Aleppo.

In this year al-Mahdī ordered all the armies of the people of Khurāsān and others to furnish troops for the summer expedition. He set out and camped at al-Baradān for about two months, drawing up his army and making preparations and paying the troops. He gave gifts there to the members of his family who had set out with him.

'Īsā b. 'Alī died on the last day of Jumādā II (March 11, 780) in Baghdad. The next day al-Mahdī left for al-Baradān, setting out on the summer expedition. He left Mūsā b. al-Mahdī as his deputy in Baghdad, and his secretary at that time was Abān b. Ṣadaqah; 'Abdallāh b. 'Ulāthah was the keeper of his seal; 'Alī b. 'Īsā was [495] the commander of his guard; and ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim[676] was his chief of police.

According to al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad: When al-Mahdī sent al-Rashīd on the summer expedition in the year 163, he set out to escort him, and I was with him. When he was opposite Qaṣr Maslamah,[677] I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, we owe Maslamah a debt of gratitude, for when Muḥammad b. ʿAlī[678] went to him, he gave him four thousand dīnārs, saying, 'O my cousin, here are two thousand for your debt and two thousand for your subsistence and, when you have exhausted it, do not be inhibited with us (in asking for more).'" When I told him the story, he ordered that those of the children of Maslamah who were there and his freedmen be brought into his presence and he ordered that they be given twenty thousand dīnārs and that salaries (rizq) be paid to them. Then he said, "O Abu al-Faḍl, we have recompensed Maslamah and done justice to him." I replied, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful, you have done more."

According to Ibrāhīm b. Ziyād—al-Haytham b. ʿAdī: Al-Mahdī sent Hārūn al-Rashīd on the raid against the Byzantines, and attached al-Rabīʿ the Chamberlain and al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah to him.

According to Muḥammad b. al-ʿAbbās:[679] I was sitting in my father's audience in the house of the Commander of the Faithful when he was in command of the guard when al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah greeted me and sat on the cushion (firāsh) that my father used to sit on and asked me about him. I told him that he was riding and then he said to me, "O my dear one, tell him that I have come and

676. B. Khuzaymah al-Tamīmī. The text reads Ḥāzim, but this is corrected in the Addenda. Son of Khāzim (note 111, above), he was ṣāḥib al-shurṭah to al-Hādī for many years and was consequently out of office under Hārūn but emerged after his death as one of al-Amīn's chief supporters; see Crone, Slaves, 181.

677. Castle of Maslamah, more commonly called Ḥiṣn ("fortress") Maslamah. It lay to the north of the Euphrates in al-Jazīrah, between Ḥarrān and al-Raqqah. Maslamah was a son of the Umayyad caliph ʿAbd al-Malik who never became caliph himself but established a great reputation as a soldier on the Byzantine frontier. He built a formidable fortress there and developed irrigation systems, much admired by the geographers (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 265, Le Strange, Lands, 105).

678. The ʿAbbāsid, father of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr.

679. Probably a mistake for al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad (see above and note 58).

give him greetings from me and tell him that I would like him to say to the Commander of the Faithful, 'Al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah says, O Commander of the Faithful, may God make me a sacrifice for you. You have sent Hārūn on a raid and attached me and al-Rabīʿ to him. I am the foremost of your military commanders and al-Rabīʿ is the foremost of your freedmen, and it does not seem good to me that we should both leave your gate together; either you send me on on the raid with Hārūn and al-Rabīʿ stays behind or you send al-Rabīʿ and I remain at your gate.'"

He said: My father came and I gave him the message and he went into al-Mahdī and told him. He replied, "By God, he has made [496] a good excuse, not like the cupper, son of the cupper" (meaning ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl,[680] who had excused himself from setting out with Ibrāhīm and he was angry with him and confiscated his wealth).

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad b. al-Waḍḍāḥ—his grandfather Abū Budayl:[681] Al-Mahdī sent al-Rashīd on a raid and he sent with him Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī, and two of his father's freedmen, al-Rabīʿ the Chamberlain and al-Ḥasan the Chamberlain.[682] Two or three days after he set out, I came in to him (al-Mahdī), and he said, "Why were you kept back from going with the heir apparent and especially with your two brothers (meaning al-Rabīʿ the Chamberlain and al-Ḥasan the Chamberlain)?" and I replied, "The Commander of the Faithful gave me orders and my place is in the City of Peace until he gives me permission," and he said, "Go and catch up with him and the two of them and say what you require." I said, "I do not need any equipment, if the Commander of the Faithful decides to give me permission to leave." He asked, "When do you intend to leave?" I replied, "Tomorrow morning." So I took leave of him and set out and caught up with the people.

680. Probably ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl al-Muslī. There seems to be no information about the incident in question, but the Ibrāhīm referred to may have been Ibrāhīm b. Ṣāliḥ al-ʿAbbāsī, who was governor of Syria for some years (see note 351, above). A cupper is one who draws blood by application of a hot cup to the surface of the skin, an ancient medical technique, the term is used here as an insult, a cupper being of dubious social status.

681. Al-Waḍḍāḥ b. Ḥabīb, quoted by al-Ṭabarī four times in all. His father had governed al-Rayy for the Umayyads (Crone, Slaves, 167).

682. Possibly to be identified with al-Ḥasan al-Waṣīf, who had been on a previous raid on Byzantium in 159/779; see note 559, above.

He said, I began to observe al-Rashīd when he was going out to play polo, and I observed Mūsā b. ʿĪsā and ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ and they were laughing at him, so I went to al-Rabīʿ and al-Ḥasan—we were never apart—and I said, "May God not reward you two well on behalf of him who sent you or him whom you were sent with!" They said, "Now then, what is the news?" I replied, "Mūsā b. ʿĪsā and ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ were laughing at the son of the Commander of the Faithful. Could you not prepare an audience for those two so that they can visit him in it, and for the military commanders who were with him, on Friday, and not on other days as he wishes?"

While we were on this journey, the two of them sent for me in the night, and when I came to them there was a man with them, [497] and they said to me, "This is the page of al-Ghamr b. Yazīd,[683] and we have found him with the Book of the State (Kitāb al-Dawlah).[684] I opened the book and I looked in it for the years of al-Mahdī, and it said ten years. I said, "There is nothing on earth more amazing than you two! Do you think that this page's information will remain hidden and that this book will be concealed?" and they replied, "Certainly not!" and I continued, "If the Commander of the Faithful's years are cut short, as it says, are you not the first to announce his own death to him?"

He said: They looked stupid, by God, and were covered with confusion and said, "What ought to be done?" and I said, "O young man, fetch ʿAnbasah," meaning the bedouin (ʿaʿrābī) copyist, freedman of the family of Abū Budayl. When he was brought, I said, "With writing like this writing and a page like this page, instead of ten years, insert forty years and insert it on the page."

He said: By God, if I had not seen ten in this and forty in that, I would have had no doubt that the writing was that writing and the page was that page.

He said: Al-Mahdī sent Khālid b. Barmak with Hārūn al-Rashīd, who was at that time heir apparent, when he sent him to raid 683. B. ʿAbd al-Malik, an Umayyad prince.

684. There seems to be no more information about what was clearly a work of prophecy.

Byzantium. He sent with him al-Ḥasan and Sulaymān, sons of Barmak, and he sent Yaḥyā b. Khālid with him in charge of the administration of the army, his expenses, his secretariat, and the managing of his affairs, and all Hārūn's business was in his hands. Al-Rabīʿ the Chamberlain was appointed with Hārūn to go on the raid on behalf of al-Mahdī, and (the differences) between al-Rabīʿ and Yaḥyā were on account of that. He used to ask their advice and act accordingly. God enabled them to make many conquests and bestowed great favor on them in that expedition; Khālid achieved in Samālū what no one had achieved before.

Their astrologer was called the Barmakid, giving a blessing for and out of respect for him. [498]

When al-Mahdī sent Hārūn on the summer expedition he sent him on, he ordered that the secretaries of the abnāʾ al-daʿwah should be sent in to him so that he could inspect them and choose one of them for him.

Yaḥyā said: They sent me in to him with them, and they stood in front of him and I stood the last of them. He said to me, "Yaḥyā, come near!" so I came near. Then he told me to sit down, so I sat down and knelt before him. He said to me, "I have scrutinized the sons of my party (abnā shīʿatī) and the people of my state (dawlatī), and I have chosen from them a man for Hārūn my son whom I can attach to him to supervise the organization of his army and take charge of his secretariat, and my choice has fallen on you and I think you are the best person for that because you have been his tutor and his special adviser, and I have appointed you in charge of his secretariat and the organization of his army."

He said: I thanked him for that and kissed his hand and he ordered that I be given a hundred thousand dirhams as subsistence for my journey, and I was sent to that army when I was sent to him.

He said: Al-Rabīʿ sent Sulaymān b. Barmak on a mission to al-Mahdī and sent a delegation with him. Al-Mahdī was generous to his mission and favored him and was good to the delegation who were with him. Then they went on their way.

In this year was the journey of al-Mahdī with his son Hārūn. Al-Mahdī deposed ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī from al-Jazīrah and appointed Zufar b. ʿĀṣim al-Hilālī in his place.

The reasons for his deposition:

It was said: On this journey of his, al-Mahdī traveled along the Mosul road. 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī was in charge of al-Jazīrah and, when al-Mahdī left Mosul and went in to the land of al-Jazīrah, 'Abd al-Ṣamad did not meet him or prepare victuals for him, or [499] repair the bridges. Al-Mahdī resented him for that and, when he met him, he scowled at him and made his displeasure plain. 'Abd al-Ṣamad sent delicacies to him, but he was not pleased with them and returned them and became more angry with him. He ordered him to be punished because of the organization of the victuals for him, but 'Abd al-Ṣamad made light of it and did not worry. He continued to do more things al-Mahdī hated until they stopped at Ḥiṣn Maslamah. He summoned him and there was an argument between them; al-Mahdī spoke angrily to him about it and 'Abd al-Ṣamad answered back. He could not bear it and ordered that he be imprisoned and deposed him from al-Jazīrah, and he remained in prison during that journey and after he returned until he was restored to favor. Al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad organized the victualing until he reached Aleppo and the good news came to him of the killing of al-Muqanna'.

When he was there, he sent 'Abd al-Jabbār the Muḥtasib[685] to collect those Zindīqs[686] who were in that district, so he did that and brought them to him when he was in Dābiq. He killed a number of them and crucified them. Some of their books were brought to him and they were cut up with knives.

He reviewed his army there and gave orders for the journey. He despatched all those of his family who had joined him with his son Hārūn to Byzantium. Al-Mahdī escorted his son Hārūn until he had gone through the Pass and reached the Jayḥān,[687] and there he chose the site of the city that was called al-Mahdiyyah.[688] He bade farewell to Hārūn by the Jayḥān.

---

685. Not known elsewhere.

686. See note 199, above, whether the Zindīqs of Aleppo were the same as the Zindīqs of Iraq is not clear, and it is possible that they were pagan Sabians from nearby Ḥarrān.

687. Ancient Pyramus, modern Ceyhan. It flows into the Mediterranean in Cilicia, southern Turkey; see Le Strange, Palestine, 62.

688. The first foundation of the city later known as Hārūniyyah (modern Harunıye) in southern Turkey on the eastern edge of the Cilician plain; see Le Strange, Palestine, 449–50.

Hārūn traveled until he stopped in one of the Byzantine districts[689] in which there was a castle called Samālū.[690] He besieged it for thirty-eight days. He set up mangonels against it, so that God conquered it after ruining it and after thirst and hunger had afflicted its inhabitants and after killing and wounds among the Muslims. Its conquest was according to the conditions that they [500] laid down for themselves that they would not be killed or deported or split up. They were granted that and they came out, and he fulfilled [the conditions] for them. Hārūn returned safely with the Muslims, except those who had been killed or wounded there.[691]

In this year and on this journey, al-Mahdī went to Jerusalem and prayed there. With him were al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad, al-Faḍl b. Ṣāliḥ, ʿAlī b. Sulaymān, and his maternal uncle Yazīd b. Manṣūr.

In this year al-Mahdī deposed Ibrāhīm b. Ṣāliḥ from Palestine, and Yazīd b. Manṣūr interceded for him until he was reinstated over it.

In this year al-Mahdī gave his son Hārūn charge of all the west and Azerbaijān and Armenia.[692] He appointed as his secretary in charge of taxation Thābit b. Mūsā and in charge of his correspondence Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak.

In this year Zufar b. ʿĀṣim was deposed from al-Jazīrah and ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī was appointed in his place. Al-Mahdī had stayed with him on his journey to Jerusalem and admired his house, which he saw in Salamiyah.[693]

In this year he deposed Muʿādh b. Muslim from Khurāsān and appointed al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr to it.

In this year he deposed Yaḥyā al-Ḥarashī from al-Iṣfahān and appointed al-Ḥakam b. Saʿīd[694] in his place.

---

689. Rusṭāq, from Middle Persian rostak, an administrative district of the Sasanian Empire. The term continued in use in Muslim Iraq, but it is somewhat strange to find it in a Byzantine context.

690. A Byzantine fortress above Ṭarsūs near the Cilician Gates; see Le Strange, Palestine, 530.

691. For this expedition, see Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 436–37.

692. This is the first example of the division of the caliphate between two ʿAbbāsid princes, which was to be a recurrent feature of the politics of the dynasty.

693. In central Syria, to the east of Ḥamāh. His house is commented on by the geographers, and his descendants continued to live there for many years. See Le Strange, Palestine, 528.

694. He is not recorded elsewhere.

In this year he deposed Sa'īd b. Da'laj from Ṭabaristān and Rūyān and appointed 'Umar b. al-'Alā' as governor.

[501] In this year he deposed Muhalhil b. Ṣafwān from Jurjān and appointed Hishām b. Sa'īd[695] as governor.

In this year 'Alī b. al-Mahdī led the people on the pilgrimage. Ja'far b. Sulaymān was in charge of al-Yamāmah, Medina, Mecca, and al-Ṭā'if in this year. Isḥāq b. al-Ṣabbāḥ was in charge of the prayers and the aḥdāth in al-Kūfah, and Sharīk was in charge of the judiciary. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān was in charge of al-Baṣrah and its dependencies, the provinces of the Tigris, al-Baḥrayn, 'Umān, al-Furaḍ (the seaports),[696] and the districts of Ahwāz and the districts of Fārs. Al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr was in charge of Khurāsān and Naṣr b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath of Sind.

---

695. B. Manṣūr. Not recorded elsewhere, but possibly a brother of the al-Ḥakam above and nephew of Yazīd b. Manṣūr, maternal uncle of al-Mahdī.

696. Presumably on the Gulf somewhere; only mentioned twice in al-Ṭabarī (p. 503, below) and not recorded by the geographers.

The Events of the Year 164

(SEPTEMBER 6, 780–AUGUST 25, 781)

Among the events of this year was the raid[697] by ʿAbd al-Kabīr b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb[698] by the pass of al-Ḥadath. Michael the Patrician met him, it is said, with about ninety thousand men, among them Ṭāzādh the Armenian the Patrician.[699] ʿAbd al-Kabīr lost heart before him and prevented the Muslims from fighting and returned. Al-Mahdī wanted to execute him, but intercession was made for him and he was imprisoned in the Muṭbaq.

In this year, al-Mahdī deposed Muḥammad b. Sulaymān from his offices.[700] He sent Ṣāliḥ b. Dāwūd[701] over what Muḥammad b. Sulaymān had had and sent with him ʿĀṣim b. Mūsā al-Khurāsānī 697. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 737.

698. A descendant of Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb, brother of the caliph ʿUmar, which may have been why he was given the honor of leading the expedition.

699. Theophanes gives the names Tazates. Armenians formed a large and increasing proportion of the Byzantine armies of the period.

700. The governorates of al-Baṣrah, Fārs, and the Gulf shores.

701. B. ʿAlī the ʿAbbāsid, son of Dāwūd b. ʿAlī, not to be confused with Ṣāliḥ, brother of Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd the vizier.

the secretary, in charge of the taxation. He ordered him to arrest [502] Ḥammād b. Mūsā, the secretary of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, and 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar,[702] his deputy, and his agents, and that they should be investigated.

In this year al-Mahdī built at Greater 'Īsābādh[703] a palace of mud brick before he laid the foundations of his palace of baked brick, which he called Qaṣr al-Salāmah.[704] It was founded on Wednesday at the end of Dhū al-Qa'dah (the month ended on Friday, July 27, 781).

In this year, when he founded this palace, he set out for al-Kūfah on the pilgrimage. He stayed at al-Ruṣāfah of al-Kūfah for some days, and then he set out in the direction of the pilgrimage until he reached 'Aqabah.[705] Water became scarce for him and those with him, and he was afraid that what they carried would not sustain him and those with him. On top of that, he developed a fever so he returned from 'Aqabah. He was angry with Yaqṭīn[706] about the water because he was in charge of the cisterns. During their journey, and on their return, the people were severely afflicted by thirst until they were on the verge of perishing.

In this year Naṣr b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath died in Sind.

In this year he deposed 'Abdallāh b. Sulaymān from Yemen because of his anger. He sent people to meet him and examine his baggage and account for what he had with him. Then he ordered that he should be imprisoned with al-Rabī' when he returned until he gave up the money and jewels and ambergris that he confessed to. He returned it to him and released him and appointed as governor ('āmil) in his place Manṣūr b. Yazīd b. Manṣūr.[707]

In this year al-Mahdī sent Ṣāliḥ, son of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, [503] from 'Aqabah when he left it to Mecca to lead the pilgrimage

---

702. Nothing more is known about these three.

703. To the east of Baghdad (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 142–43). It is said to have been named after al-Mahdī's son 'Īsā. Its exact location is unknown.

704. Palace of Well-Being: Yāqūt calls it Qaṣr al-Salām, Palace of Peace.

705. One of the stages on the desert road from al-Kūfah to Mecca, on the modern Iraq-Saudi Arabian border (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 134).

706. B. Mūsā.

707. Son of Yazīd b. Manṣūr, maternal uncle of al-Mahdī (note 163, above). He was later briefly governor of Khurāsān, 179–80/796.

with the people, and Ṣāliḥ performed the pilgrimage for the people in this year.

The governor ('āmil) of Medina, Mecca, al-Ṭā'if and al-Yamāmah in this year was Ja'far b. Sulaymān, of Yemen Manṣūr b. Yazīd b. Manṣūr. Hāshim b. Sa'īd b. Manṣūr was in charge of the prayers and aḥdāth of al-Kūfah and Sharīk b. 'Abdallāh of the judiciary. Ṣāliḥ b. Dāwūd b. 'Alī was in charge of al-Baṣrah and its aḥdāth, of the districts of the Tigris, al-Baḥrayn, 'Umān, al-Furaḍ and the districts of Ahwāz and Fārs. Saṭīḥ b. 'Umar[708] was in charge of Sind, al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr of Khurāsān, Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl of Mosul, 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥasan of the judiciary of al-Baṣrah, Ibrāhīm b. Ṣāliḥ of Egypt, Yazīd b. Ḥātim of Ifrīqiyah, Yaḥyā al-Ḥarashī of Ṭabaristān, Rūyān and Jurjān, Farāshah, freedman of the Commander of the Faithful, of Dunbāwand and Qūmis,[709] Khalaf b. 'Abdallāh of al-Rayy[710] and Sa'īd b. Da'laj of Sijistān.

---

708. Not known elsewhere

709. Farāshah subsequently became governor of Jurjān and was captured and executed by the Ispahbādh of Ṭabaristān at the end of al-Mahdī's reign; see Crone, Slaves, 191. Dunbāwand is the earlier form of Damavand, the great peak of the Elburz chain north of Tehran, but it was also the name of a small town at its foot and the surrounding province. Qūmis was the small province to the east, with its capital at Damghān See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 275–77, IV, 414–15; Le Strange, Lands, 364–68, 371, and map V.

710. Not known elsewhere

The Events of the Year 165

(AUGUST 26, 781–AUGUST 14, 782)

Among the events of this year was the summer raid of Hārūn, son of Muḥammad al-Mahdī.[711] It is said that his father sent him on Saturday, 18 Jumādā II (February 7, 782, a Thursday), to raid the lands of Byzantium. He attached al-Rabīʿ his freedman to him. Hārūn penetrated deeply into Byzantine territory and conquered Mājidah.[712] The horsemen of Nicetas, Count of Counts,[713] met him. Yazīd b. Mazyad went out to meet him in single combat. Yazīd was forced to dismount,[714] and then Nicetas fell off and [504] Yazīd struck him so that he was defeated. The Byzantines were put to flight, and Yazīd took posession of their camp and went to the Domesticos, head of the armed forces (masāliḥ) in Nicomedia.[715] Hārūn set out with 95,793 men and took 194,450

711. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 737–38; my interpretation differs somewhat from that of Brooks.

712. In Cappadocia (Honigmann, Ostgrenze, 46, 47).

713. Count of the Opsikion Theme.

714. It is not clear whether Nicetas fell off or dismounted intentionally.

715. For conflicting Byzantine versions of these events, see Brooks, op. cit., 738.

*dīnār*s in gold and 21,414,800 *dirham*s in silver for them. He traveled until he reached the Sea of Marmara. The ruler of Byzantium at that time was Augusta, the wife of Leo.[716] This was because her son was a minor, whose father had died when he was in her charge. Messages and ambassadors passed between her and Hārūn, son of al-Mahdī, seeking peace and reconciliation and the paying of ransoms. Hārūn accepted that from her on condition that she fulfill what she promised and that she provide guides and markets on his route. This was because he had come by a way that was difficult and dangerous for the Muslims. She responded to his requests.

The terms of the peace were ninety or seventy thousand *dīnār*s, which she was to pay at the beginning of April[717] and in June every year, and he accepted that from her and she established markets on his route and sent an ambassador with him to al-Mahdī with what she had agreed should be paid as she could in gold and silver and goods.

They wrote an agreement of truce for three years, and the prisoners were handed over. Those whom God gave as booty to Hārūn before the Byzantines would pay the jizyah were 5,643 people. Fifty-four thousand Byzantines were killed in battle and 2,090 prisoners were killed in captivity. Among the beasts and trained animals that God gave him as booty with their equipment were twenty thousand riding animals, and he slaughtered a hundred thousand head of cattle and sheep. The salaried troops, beside the volunteers and the traders, numbered one hundred thousand. A work horse was sold for a dirham and a mule for less than ten *dirham*s, a coat of mail for less than a dirham, and twenty swords for a dirham. Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah[718] said about that: [505]

You have gone around Constantinople of the Byzantines, resting the spear on it so that its walls were covered with ignominy.

716. The Empress Irene.

717. Unusually al-Ṭabarī uses the Christian months Nīsān and Ḥazīrān here. As Brooks and the Addenda point out, Nīsān should probably read Kānūn I, being December and making the payments due every half year.

718. Sometimes called al-Akbar, to distinguish him from Abū al-Samṭ Marwān b. Abī al-Janūb, who is also called Ibn Abī Ḥafṣah. See Aghānī, Būlāq, IX, 36; Beirut, X, 74.

You just went toward it and lo, its kings came to you with its jizyah, while the pots of war were boiling.

In this year he deposed Khalaf b. ʿAbdallāh from al-Rayy and appointed ʿĪsā, freedman of Jaʿfar,[719] to it.

In this year Ṣāliḥ b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr led the pilgrims.

The governors of the amṣār were the same this year as in the previous year, except that Rawḥ b. Ḥātim was the governor of the aḥdāth and the public prayers at al-Baṣrah. Al-Muʿallā,[720] freedman of the Commander of the Faithful al-Mahdī, was in charge of the districts of the Tigris, al-Baḥrayn, ʿUmān, Kaskar, and the districts of Ahwāz, Fārs, and Kirmān. Al-Layth, freedman of al-Mahdī, was in charge of Sind.

---

719. Nothing more is known of him; see Crone, Slaves, 192.

720. Brother of Layth; see text, p. 484. According to Aghānī, Beirut, VI, 239–40, he and his brother were bought in al-Kūfah by ʿAlī b. Sulaymān, who gave them to al-Manṣūr, who in turn gave them to al-Mahdī, who freed them. Al-Muʿallā was first given charge of the ṭirāz (state textile industry) and post in Khurāsān before being appointed to this vast governorate; see Crone, Slaves, 193. The reign of al-Mahdī was the high point of the influence of the freedmen, and this is exemplified in the careers of al-Muʿallā and Layth.

The Events of the Year

166

(AUGUST 15, 782–AUGUST 4, 783)

The events of this year:

Among these was the return of Hārūn, son of al-Mahdī, and those who were with him from the Sea of Marmara on 17 Muḥarram (August 31, 782). The Byzantines came bringing the jizyah with them, and it was said that this was 64,000 *dīnār*s by Byzantine accounting, 2,500 Arab *dīnār*s, and 30,000 *raṭl*s[721] of goat's wool. [506]

In this year al-Mahdī took the oath of allegiance from his military commanders to Hārūn after Mūsā, son of al-Mahdī, and named him al-Rashīd.

In this year he deposed 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥasan from the judiciary of al-Baṣrah and appointed Khālid b. Ṭalīq b. 'Imrān b. Ḥuṣayn al-Khuzā'ī[722] in his place, but his appointment was not approved of, and the people of al-Baṣrah asked to be free from him.

In this year he deposed Ja'far b. Sulaymān from Mecca and Medina and the offices he held.

---

721. A dry weight that varied from place to place, probably between 2 and 4 kg.
722. Nothing more is known of him.

In this year al-Mahdī was angry with Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd. The account of al-Mahdī's anger with Ya'qūb:

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Nawfalī—his father: Dāwūd b. Ṭahmān, that is, Abū Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd, and his brothers were secretaries to Naṣr b. Sayyār,[723] and before him he was secretary to one of the governors of Khurāsān. At the time of Yaḥyā b. Zayd,[724] he was passing information to him and his companions and warning them about what he heard from Naṣr. When Abū Muslim rose in rebellion to avenge the blood of Yaḥyā b. Zayd and to kill his killers and those who spied on him among the companions of Naṣr, Dāwūd b. Ṭahmān came to him confident in what he knew about what occurred between him and Yaḥyā. So [507] Abū Muslim gave him a safe-conduct and did not molest him in person, but took the money he had acquired in the time of Naṣr and left the houses and estates in Marw that were his inheritance.

When Dāwūd died, his sons emerged as people of culture and knowledge of the Days[725] of people and their histories and their poetry. They looked and found that they had no status with the Banū al-'Abbās, and they did not aspire to their service because of the position of their father in the secretariat of Naṣr. When they saw that, they adopted the faith of the Zaydiyyah[726] and approached the family of al-Ḥusayn[727] and wanted there to be a state (dawlah) for them so that they might live in it. Dāwūd used to roam through the land on his own and sometimes with Ibrāhīm b. 'Abdallāh, seeking oaths of allegiance to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh. When Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm b. 'Abdallāh came out in rebellion,[728] 'Alī b. Dāwūd, who was older than Ya'qūb, wrote to Ibrāhīm b. 'Abdallāh, and Ya'qūb with a number of his brothers rebelled with Ibrāhīm.

---

723. The last Umayyad governor of Khurāsān.

724. 'Alid, whose father, Zayd b. 'Alī, rebelled unsuccessfully in al-Kūfah in 122/740. Yaḥyā subsequently fled to Khurāsān, where he was arrested and executed.

725. Ayyām al-nās, the "Days," were the battles of the pre-Islamic Arabs and the poetry connected with them, essential knowledge for anyone hoping to be considered educated.

726. See above, note 137.

727. That is, the family of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, in this case Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh and his brother Ibrāhīm, the rebels of 145/762.

728. In 145/762.

When Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm were killed, they hid from al-Manṣūr, and he searched for them and captured Ya'qūb and 'Alī and imprisoned them in the Muṭbaq for as long as he lived. When al-Manṣūr died, al-Mahdī favored them, along with others, by releasing them, and he let both of them go. Isḥāq b. al-Faḍl b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān[729] was with them in the dungeon, and they were not separated from him and his brothers who were in prison with him, and because of that there developed a friendship between them. Isḥāq b. al-Faḍl b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was of the opinion that the caliphate had passed to the righteous ones of the Banū Hāshim[730] together, and he used to say that after the Prophet the imāmate had not been secure except with the Banū Hāshim and it was not secure at this time except with them. He used to talk continually of the eldest of the Banū 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib,[731] and he and Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd used to have discussions about that.

When al-Mahdī released Ya'qūb, al-Mahdī continued for some time searching for 'Īsā b. Zayd[732] and al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm b. [508]
'Abdallāh[733] after al-Ḥasan had escaped from prison. One day al-Mahdī said, "If I found a man of the Zaydiyyah with knowledge of the family of Ḥasan and of 'Īsā b. Zayd and understanding, I would bring him to me on the way of knowledge, so that he could serve as an intermediary between me and the family of Ḥasan and 'Īsā b. Zayd." Ya'qūb was suggested to him, and he was brought and taken into his presence. That day he was wearing furs and sheepskin top boots,[734] a turban of karābīs,[735] and a coarse white kisā'.[736] He spoke and conversed with him and found him to be a

729. B. al-'Abbās b. Rabī' b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. Hāshim. He was thus related to both 'Alids and 'Abbāsids, since his ancestor al-Ḥārith was a brother of al-'Abbās and Abū Ṭālib.

730. That is, both 'Alids and 'Abbāsids.

731. Abū Ṭālib, father of 'Alī, who was older than his brother al-'Abbās, ancestor of the 'Abbāsids. He is arguing that the 'Alids had precedence over the 'Abbāsids because of the relative positions of their ancestors among the Banū Hāshim.

732. See note 159, above.

733. See note 470, above.

734. For a fuller description, see Ahsan, Social Life, 47.

735. A fine white cotton or linen fabric.

736. An outer cloak, see Ahsan, Social Life, 44. The point of this description is that he was wearing white, traditionally associated with the 'Alids, not the 'Abbāsid black.

sterling man. He asked him about ʿĪsā b. Zayd, and people said that he promised him that he would be his intermediary with him. Yaʿqūb used to deny that, but people accused him of owing his position with al-Mahdī to the fact that he led him to the family of ʿAlī. His status with al-Mahdī continued to increase and rise until he made him his wazīr and entrusted him with the affairs of the caliphate. He sent for the Zaydiyyah, and they were brought to him from all sides and he gave them charge of the affairs of the caliphate in east and west and every great matter and precious work, and the whole world was in his hands. Bashshār b. Burd[737] said about that:

Sons of Umayyah wake up! Your sleep has gone on too long.
Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd is caliph.
Your caliphate has been ruined, O people! Search for the caliph of Allāh among the tambourines and lutes.

He said: The freedmen of al-Mahdī were jealous of him and intrigued against him. One thing by which Yaʿqūb gained al-Mahdī's favor was that he asked for a safe-conduct for al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh, and he negotiated between al-Mahdī and al-Ḥasan so that he brought them together in Mecca.

When the family of al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī[738] knew what he had done, they stayed away from him, and Yaʿqūb knew that if they es-[509] tablished a state he would not survive in it and that al-Mahdī did not put him on an equal footing because of the greatness of the slander brought to him about Yaʿqūb. Yaʿqūb became close to Isḥāq b. al-Faḍl,[739] and he took to discussing affairs with him. Scandal was reported to al-Mahdī about Isḥāq, and it was said to him that the east and west were in the hands of Yaʿqūb and his friends and he had written to them. It was only enough for him to write to them and they would rise in rebellion on one day at the appointed time and hand over the world to Isḥāq b. al-Faḍl. This hardened the heart of al-Mahdī against him.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Nawfalī: One of the servants

737. Celebrated poet. Aghānī, Būlāq, III, 19; Beirut, III, 129.
738. This should probably be the family of al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī.
739. The sense would seem to be that he turned to Isḥāq because he was not completely accepted by either the Ḥusaynid ʿAlids or al-Mahdī.

of al-Mahdī mentioned to me that, when he was standing at his head one day to whisk away the flies, Ya'qūb came in and knelt before him and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, you know about the disturbed state of Egypt and that you ordered me to search for a man for it to settle its affairs. I continued to investigate until I decided on a man who will put it right." Al-Mahdī asked him who it was and he replied, "Your paternal cousin, Isḥāq b. al-Faḍl." Ya'qūb saw the change in his face, and he rose and left and al-Mahdī followed him with his eyes and then said, "May God strike me dead if I do not kill you!" Then he raised his head to me and said, "Keep quiet about this, damn you!" The freedmen continued to stir him up against Ya'qūb and turn him against him until he decided to withdraw his favor from him.

According to Mūsā b. Ibrāhīm al-Mas'ūdī[740]—al-Mahdī: Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd appeared to me in a dream and it was said to me that I should take him as wazīr and when he saw him he said, "This, by God, is the person I saw in my dream," so he appointed him as wazīr and he enjoyed the greatest favor with him. He stayed for some time until he built 'Īsābādh and one of his servants, who was a favorite of his, came to him and said to him, "Aḥmad b. Ismā'īl b. 'Alī[741] said to me, 'He has built a park on which he has spent 50 million dirhams of the Muslims' money.'" He remembered what the servant had said but forgot that it was [510] Aḥmad b. Ismā'īl and imagined that it was Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd. When Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd was before him, he took him by the throat and struck him to the ground and he said, "What is your quarrel with me, O Commander of the Faithful?" and he replied, "Were you not the one who said that I spent fifty million dirhams on a pleasure park for myself?" and Ya'qūb said, "By God, my ears did not hear it, and the two angels did not write it." This was the first reason for his affair (i.e., his fall from power).

According to my father: Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd had known from al-Mahdī dissoluteness and licentiousness in the mention of women and sexual intercourse. Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd used to describe many things from his own experience in that, and al-Mahdī did likewise. They[742] used to leave al-Mahdī alone at night and say that he would be furious with Ya'qūb in the morning. When it was morning, Ya'qūb went to visit him, and he had heard about this, and, when al-Mahdī saw him, he smiled and said to him, "Have you had a good time?" and he replied, "Yes," and al-Mahdī used to say, "Sit down, by my life, and tell me," and he used to say, "I was alone with my slave girl yesterday and she said and I said . . .," and he made a story about that and al-Mahdī did the same and they shared the pleasure. News of this reached those who were plotting against Ya'qūb and they were amazed at it.

740. Not known elsewhere.

741. An 'Abbāsid, son of al-Manṣūr's uncle, Ismā'īl b. 'Alī. He was governor of Mosul, 165–68/781–85 (al-Azdī, 246, 252).

According to al-Mawṣilī: Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd said to al-Mahdī about some matter he wished, "This, by God, is extravagance," and al-Mahdī answered, "Damn you! Do only people of nobility think extravagance is good? Damn you Ya'qūb, were it not for extravagance you could not tell the generous from the miserly."

According to 'Alī b. Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd—his father: Al-Mahdī sent for me one day and I came in to him, and there he was in a [511] majlis furnished with exquisite rose-colored fabrics, most lofty in fashion, overlooking a garden in which there were trees, and the tops of the trees were level with the floor of the majlis. These trees had burst into leaf with roses and peach and apple blossoms, and all these were pink like the furnishing of the majlis that he was in. I have not seen anything more beautiful than it. He had with him a slave girl, than whom I have never seen one more beautiful nor more erect in bearing nor more elegant in proportion, wearing clothes of the same color. I have never seen anything better than this ensemble. He said to me, "O Ya'qūb, what do you think of this majlis of ours?" and I replied, "Extremely beautiful; may God grant the Commander of the Faithful enjoyment of it and delight in it." He said, "It is yours. Take it with what is in it and this slave girl so that your pleasure in it may be complete," so I prayed God for him, as it should be.

Then he said, "O Ya'qūb, I have a request from you," and so I jumped up and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, is this some grievance you have? I take refuge in God from the anger of the Commander of the Faithful." He said, "No, but I would like you to guarantee to me the fulfilling of this request. I did not ask it for the reason you suspect, and I meant only what I said. I would like you to guarantee to me that you will fulfill this request for me." I replied, "It is the order of the Commander of the Faithful, and it is my duty to hear and obey." He said, "[Do you swear] by God?" and I said "by God" three times, and then he said, "by the life of my head?" and I said, "by the life of your head," and he said, "Put out your hand and swear to it," so I put my hand on him and swore to him by it that I would do what he said and fulfill his request.

742. Ibn al-Athīr explains: Intriguers used to make attacks on Ya'qūb at night (when they were talking with the caliph) and when they dispersed they were of the belief that he (al-Mahdī) would arrest him the next morning.

When he had made certain of me in his mind, he said, "This so-and-so, son of so-and-so of the descendants of ʿAlī: I would like you to save me from trouble with him and make me free of him and do that quickly." I said that I would do it and he said, "Take him to you," and I transferred him to me and I transferred the slave girl and all the furnishings and everything that was in the house, and he ordered 100,000 *dirham*s for me with it. [512]

I took all of it and went with it and, because of my great pleasure in the slave girl, I put her in the majlis with a veil between me and her. I sent for the ʿAlawī and brought him in to me and asked him about his position, and he told me about it and, in short, I found him the most intelligent of men and the clearest of them in speech. Among the things he said to me was, "Damn you, Yaʿqūb! You are accountable to God for my blood, and I am one of the descendants of Fāṭimah, daughter of Muḥammad." I said, "No by God; are you the grateful type if you receive a favor?" And he said, "If you do a favor, I will thank you and invoke God's blessing on you and ask forgiveness for you." I said to him, "Which road would you like best?" and he replied "Such-and-such a road." I asked, "Who is there there with whom you are friendly and whose position you trust?" and he said, "So-and-so and so-and-so." I said, "Go to them and take this money and travel with them in safety under the veil of God. Your meeting with them to go out of my house to such-and-such a place that they have agreed on is at such-and-such a time of night."

Now the slave girl had remembered my words against me and sent them with a servant of hers to al-Mahdī and said, "This is your reward from the one whom you preferred over yourself, and he has acted and done this and this...," until she had passed on the whole story.

Al-Mahdī immediately sent men to police those roads and places that Ya'qūb and the 'Alawī had described, and it was not long before they brought this very 'Alawī to him with his two friends and his money, exactly as the slave girl had told. He said, I got up the next day and there was a messenger from al-Mahdī summoning me to his presence. I was free of anxiety and the affair [513] of the 'Alawī was not weighing on me until I entered to al-Mahdī and I found him on a chair with a mace in his hand, and he said to me, "O Ya'qūb, what is the position of the man?" and I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, God has relieved you of him." He asked if he had died and I replied, "Yes," and he said, "[Do you swear] by God?" and I said, "by God." Then he said, "Stand up and put your hand on my head," so I put my hand on his head and took the oath with it.

He then said, "Page! Bring out to us what is in this chamber," and he opened the door on the very same 'Alawī and his two friends and the money. I remained at a loss and was filled with regret. I was unable to speak and did not know what to say. Al-Mahdī said, "You have made your blood legal for me if I choose to shed it, but imprison him in the Muṭbaq and let him be forgotten." So I was imprisoned in the Muṭbaq, and I was taken to a well in it and lowered into it. I remained there for a very long time and I do not know the number of days. My sight was afflicted and my hair grew long, so that it was flowing like the hair of beasts.

I was in that condition when I was called and I was taken and brought I knew not where and I was told no more than "Greet the Commander of the Faithful!" so I made my greeting and he said, "Which Commander of the Faithful am I?" and I said "al-Mahdī," and he said, "May God have mercy on al-Mahdī," and so I said, "al-Hādī," but he said, "May God have mercy on al-Hādī," and then I said, "al-Rashīd," and he said, "Yes." I said, "I do not doubt that the Commander of the Faithful understands my story and what has befallen me and that my position has been explained to him." He said, "Certainly, I am aware of that and the Commander of the Faithful knew. Ask for what you need." I said, "To settle in Mecca," and he said, "We will grant that; do you have any other requests?" and I replied, "I have no longer enjoyment in anything and no power of communication," and he said, "Go rightly guided." I left and set my face for Mecca.

His son said, "He stayed in Mecca and he was not long there before he died."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh—his father—Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd: Al-Mahdī did not drink wine, not because he was avoiding sin, but because he did not like it. His companions 'Umar b. Bazī'; al-Mu'alla, his freedman; and al-Mufaḍḍal[743] and his freedmen used to drink in his presence under his eyes. I used to warn him of their drinking and listening to singing,[744] and I used to say, "It was not for this that you made me wazīr and not because of this that I became your companion. After the five prayers in the cathedral mosque, should wine be drunk in your presence and should you listen to singing?" He used to say, "'Abdallāh b. Ja'far listened,"[745] and I said, "This was not part of his virtues. If a man listened to singing every day, would he increase in nearness or in distance to God?" [514]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh—his father: My father, Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd, besought al-Mahdī to stop listening to singing and pouring wine until it got on his nerves. Ya'qūb had grown uneasy about his position and repented to God for what he was doing and looked to the future and advanced the intention of leaving his position. He said, "I used to say to al-Mahdī, 'O Commander of the Faithful, by God, drinking wine myself and repenting to God for it would be more pleasing to me than what I am doing. I am riding to you and wish that a sinful hand would strike me down on the way, so excuse me and appoint another, whomever you wish. I wish to get safe with you, I and my children, and, by God, I am afraid in my sleep. You have put me in charge of the affairs of the Muslims and the payment of the army, but this world of yours is not a fair exchange for my hereafter.'" He used to say, "O God, forgiveness, O God purify his heart," and the poet said to him:

743. Called al-Waṣīf. He is later recorded among the 'Abbāsid party on the pilgrimage of 169/786 when the 'Alid al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī rebelled.

744. The Arabic simply has al-asmā' "listening," specifically to singing.

745. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib: al-Mahdī is citing the example of 'Alī's nephew to prove that righteous men could listen to singing.

Leave Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd on one side, and take to the good wine that has a good smell.

[515] According to 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar[746]—Ja'far b. Aḥmad b. Zayd al-'Alawī[747]—Ibn Sallām[748]: Al-Mahdī gave a slave girl to one of the sons of Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd, who was feebleminded. After some days he asked him about her and he said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I never saw the likes of her. I have never had such an easy riding steed between me and the ground. . . present company excepted!"[749] Al-Mahdī turned to Ya'qūb and said to him, "Whom do you think he means? Does he mean me or does he mean you?" and Ya'qūb said to him, "You can protect a foolish man against anything except himself."

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Nawfalī—his father: Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd used to go into al-Mahdī and spend the night alone with him chatting and conversing. One night when he was with him when most of the night had passed he came out wearing a dyed Hāshimī ṭaylasān[750] that was blue and light, and the ṭaylasān had been strongly starched and ironed and it rattled. A page took the reins of his riding beast, a gray beast of his. The page had slept and Ya'qūb went smoothing his ṭaylasān, and it rattled. The palfrey shied and Ya'qūb approached it, and it turned its back on him and kicked him on his leg and broke it. Al-Mahdī heard the noise and came out barefooted and, when he saw what had happened, he made clear his anxiety and solicitude. Then he ordered that he be carried in a chair to his house. The next day al-Mahdī visited him at dawn, and the people heard about that and they came to him in the morning. He returned to him on the next three days and then he ceased his visits and began to send to him asking him how he was. When he was not present, intriguers were able to influence al-Mahdī, and within ten days (nights) his 746. B. Abū al-Ḥayy al-'Absī. He contributes one other report (see 539, below).

747. Probably a grandson of Zayd b. 'Alī, the unsuccessful rebel of 122/740.
748. Muḥammad b. Sallām al-Jumaḥī 139–231/756–845, author of the surviving Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā', contributes six reports on the Umayyads and 'Abbāsids to the History; see *EI*², s.v. "Ibn Sallām."
749. He clearly did not know how to express himself properly.
750. A piece of material worn over the shoulders and hanging down the back, a bit like an academic hood; see Ahsan, Social Life, 42–43.

anger against him became apparent, and he left him in his house [516] to be treated and he announced to his companions that no one should have a Ya'qūbī ṭaylasān on him or a Ya'qūbī qalansūwah or his clothes would be taken from him. Then he ordered that Ya'qūb should be confined in the prison of Naṣr.

According to al-Nawfalī: Al-Mahdī ordered that Ya'qūb's men be deposed from offices in east and west and ordered that his family be arrested and imprisoned and that was done to them.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad: When Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd and his family were imprisoned, his agents dispersed and went into hiding and lived as vagabonds; his story and the story of Isḥāq b. al-Faḍl were told to al-Mahdī, and he sent for Isḥāq by night and for Ya'qūb. He was brought from prison, and he said to him, "Didn't you tell me that this man and the people of his family claimed that they had a better right to the caliphate than we, people of the family,[751] and that they had contempt for us?" and Ya'qūb said to him, "I never told you that," and he said, "You are accusing me of lying and contradicting my words!" Then he called for a whip and struck him twelve violent blows and ordered that he be returned to prison.

Isḥāq came and swore that he had never said that and that it was not his business. Among the things he said was, "How would I say that, O Commander of the Faithful, when my ancestor died in the Jāhiliyyah and your ancestor (lit: grandfather) survived after the Prophet of God and was his heir?"[752] He said, "Send him away." The next morning he summoned Ya'qūb and repeated to him the words that he had spoken, and he replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, do not punish me until I remind you and you remember when you were in a pavilion[753] overlooking the river. You were in the garden and I was with you when Abū al-Wazīr[754] came in."

'Alī said: Abū al-Wazīr was the son-in-law of Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd by the daughter of Ṣāliḥ b. Dāwūd. "Abū al-Wazīr told you this 751. I.e., the 'Abbāsid family.

752. Isḥāq's ancestor was al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, brother of al-'Abbās; see note 729, above.

753. Ṭāramah, a wooden building of circular form with an arched roof.

754. 'Umar b. al-Muṭarrif; see note 655, above.

story on the authority of Isḥāq. He (al-Mahdī) said, "You have told the truth, Ya'qūb, I remember that," and al-Mahdī was ashamed and apologized to him for the beating. Then he returned him to the prison, and he remained a prisoner in the reign of al-[517] Mahdī and the whole of the reign of Mūsā until Hārūn released him because of the regard he had for him in the life of his father.

In this year Mūsā al-Hādī left for Jurjān. He appointed Abū Yūsuf Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm[755] over his judiciary.

In this year al-Mahdī moved to 'Īsābādh and settled there. It was known as Qaṣr al-Salāmah, and the people settled there with him and dīnārs and dirhams were struck there.[756]

In this year al-Mahdī ordered the establishment of the post between the City of the Prophet[757] and Mecca and Yemen by mule and camel, and the post had not been established there before.

In this year Khurāsān was agitated against al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr, and al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān al-Ṭūsī Abū al-'Abbās was appointed as governor there.[758] Sijistān was attached to him as well, and he appointed Tamīm b. Sa'īd b. Da'laj as his deputy in Sijistān on the orders of al-Mahdī.

In this year Dāwūd b. Rawḥ b. Ḥātim, Ismā'īl b. Sulaymān b. Mujālid, Muḥammad b. Abī Ayyūb al-Makkī and Muḥammad b. Ṭayfūr were arrested for Zandaqah.[759] They confessed and al-Mahdī called on them to repent and released them. He sent Dāwūd 755. The famous qāḍī and author of the surviving Kitāb al-Kharāj. He remained qāḍī in Baghdad until his death in 182/799.

---

756. Most early Islamic coins had the names of the places they were minted on them. 'Īsābādh briefly became a center of habitation and government, but it seems to have been abandoned after al-Mahdī's death.

757. Medina.

758. Barthold, Turkestan, 205, mentions that Musayyab introduced a new coinage that may have provoked discontent. For further sources and discussion, see Daniel, Khurasan, 168, 184 n. 46.

759. All these were sons of prominent members of the regime, which is probably why they were treated so leniently. Rawḥ b. Ḥātim was the celebrated Muhallabī (see note 570, above); Sulaymān b. Mujālid was a member of al-Manṣūr's ṣaḥābah who played an important part in the development of Baghdad; Abū Ayyūb al-Makkī was in charge of the dīwān al-khārāj at the beginning of al-Mahdī's reign; and Ṭayfūr was probably the Ṭayfūr, freedman of al-Hādī, who was al-Mahdī's half-brother and is recorded as governor of Iṣfahān in 169/785–86; see Crone, Slaves, 195.

b. Rawḥ to his father, Rawḥ, who was at that time governor of al-Baṣrah. He was gracious to him and ordered him to educate him.

In this year al-Waḍḍāḥ al-Sharawī brought ʿAbdallāh b. Abū ʿUbaydallāh the wazīr, that is Muʿāwiyah b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ashʿarī of the people of Syria. He was the one whom Ibn Shabābah conspired against and who was accused of Zandaqah. We have already described his affair and his execution.[760]

In this year Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad was appointed governor of Medina, the City of the Prophet of God; ʿUbaydallāh b. Qutham[761] was in charge of al-Ṭāʾif and Mecca. [518]

In this year Manṣūr b. Yazīd b. Manṣūr was deposed from Yemen and ʿAbdallāh b. Sulaymān al-Rabaʿī was appointed in his place.

In this year al-Mahdī released ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī from the prison he was in.

Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad led the pilgrimage in this year.

In this year the governor (ʿāmil) of al-Kūfah, in charge of the prayers and the aḥdāth, was Hāshim b. Saʿīd. Rawḥ b. Ḥātim was in charge of the prayers and aḥdāth in al-Baṣrah, and Khālid b. Ṭalīq was in charge of the judiciary there. Al-Muʿallā, freedman of the Commander of the Faithful, was in charge of the districts of the Tigris; Kaskar; the governorates of al-Baṣrah and al-Baḥrayn; and the districts of Ahwāz, Fārs and Kirmān. Al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān al-Ṭūsī was in charge of Khurāsān and Sijistān; Ibrāhīm b. Ṣāliḥ of Egypt; Yazīd b. Ḥātim of Ifrīqiyah; Yaḥyā al-Ḥarashī of Ṭabaristān, Rūyān, and Jurjān; Farāshah, freedman of al-Mahdi, of Dunbāwand and Qūmis; and Saʿd, freedman of the Commander of the Faithful, of al-Rayy.

In this year there was no summer expedition against the Byzantines because of the truce in it.

---

760. The passage raises a problem. On p. 490 of the text al-Ṭabarī relates how Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh was executed, and there is mention of ʿAbdallāh. It is not clear whether this is the same incident with a mistake in the name or a separate event that has been lost from the text. Neither al-Waḍḍāḥ nor Ibn Shabābah can be identified further.

761. B. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās, an ʿAbbāsid; for his father, see note 149, above. He remained governor until Hārūn's reign.

The Events of the Year

167

(AUGUST 5, 783–JULY 23, 784)

The events of this year:

Among these was the sending by al-Mahdī of his son Mūsā with a huge number of soldiers and equipment the likes of which, it was said, no one had ever been equipped with before to Jurjān for [519] the war against Wandāhurmuz[762] and Sharvīn,[763] the two lords of Ṭabaristān. When al-Mahdī organized it for Mūsā, he placed Abān b. Ṣadaqah in charge of his correspondence, Muḥammad b. Jumayl of his army, and Nufay', freedman of al-Manṣūr, as his chamberlain. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān was in command of his guard and 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim of his police. Mūsā despatched the troops against Wandāhurmuz and Sharvīn under the command of Yazīd b. Mazyad and he laid siege to them.

In this year 'Īsā b. Mūsā died in al-Kūfah. The governor of al-

762. One of the native princes of Ṭabaristān. He resisted this Muslim assault in his mountain stronghold and is last recorded visiting Hārūn on his trip to al-Rayy in 189/805. He was the grandfather of Māzyār, the famous opponent of the Muslims during the reign of al-Mu'taṣim.

763. Neighbor and ally of Wandāhurmuz.

Kūfah at that time was Rawḥ b. Ḥātim, and Rawḥ b. Ḥātim called on the qāḍī and a body of the principal people to witness that he had died of natural causes, and then he was buried. It is said that ʿĪsā b. Mūsā died when Rawḥ b. Ḥātim was in charge of al-Kūfah on Tuesday, 26 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (Tuesday, July 20), and Rawḥ was present at his bier. It was said to him, "Go first, you are the governor (amīr)." He said, "God will certainly not see Rawḥ praying over ʿĪsā b. Mūsā. Let his eldest child have precedence." They refused to do that and he insisted, and al-ʿAbbās b. ʿĪsā took precedence and prayed over his father. News of this reached al-Mahdī and he was angry with Rawḥ and wrote to him, "News has reached me of your refusal to pray over ʿĪsā. Did you pray for him for yourself or your father or your grandfather?[764] If I had been present that would have been my position, but since I was absent you should have been the first because of your position of authority," and he ordered that he be called to account. He had been in charge of the taxation along with the prayers and the aḥdāth. When ʿĪsā died al-Mahdī still held a grudge against him and his children, yet he used to hate having precedence over him because of his seniority.

In this year al-Mahdī stepped up the hunt and search for Zindīqs in all areas and executed them. He put ʿUmar al-Kalwādhī[765] in [520] charge of dealing with them. Yazīd b. al-Fayḍ,[766] secretary to al-Manṣūr, was arrested and, it is said, he confessed and was put in prison but escaped and could not be recaptured.

In this year al-Mahdī deposed Abū ʿUbaydallāh Muʿāwiyah b. ʿUbaydallāh from the Dīwān al-Rasā'il and appointed his chamberlain al-Rabīʿ to it. He made Saʿīd b. Wāqid his deputy.[767] Abū

764. This is probably a reference to the fact that the Muhallabīs had opposed the later Umayyads and worked for their overthrow and that Rawḥ should have paid his respects to ʿĪsā for his part in the cause to which his father and grandfather had contributed, whatever his personal feelings.

765. From Kalwādhā, a small town on the eastern bank of the Tigris just south of Baghdad. Nothing more is known of him.

766. He seems to have remained in hiding and was one of the Zindīqs specifically excluded from an amnesty granted at the beginning of Hārūn's reign (see al-Ṭabarī, III, 604).

767. Al-Rabīʿ as ḥājib would not have the necessary expertise to run the dīwān al-rasā'il (chancery, responsible for sending out letters) himself. Nothing more is known of Saʿīd b. Wāqid.

'Ubaydallāh continued to enter (into the presence of the caliph) according to his usual grade.

In this year there spread death and coughing and severe plague in Baghdad and al-Baṣrah.

In this year Abān b. Ṣadaqah died in Jurjān. He was secretary to Mūsā in charge of his correspondence (rasā'il). Al-Mahdī sent in his place Abū Khālid al-Aḥwal Yazīd,[768] the deputy of Abū 'Ubaydallāh.

In this year al-Mahdī ordered the expansion of the Ḥarām mosque,[769] and many houses were incorporated into it. He appointed Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā to oversee the building of the extension and he was occupied with the building of it until the death of al-Mahdī.

In this year Yaḥyā al-Ḥarashī was deposed from Ṭabaristān and Rūyān and what he had in that area, and 'Umar b. al-'Alā' was appointed to it. Farāshah, freedman of al-Mahdī, was appointed to Jurjān and Yaḥyā al-Ḥarashī was deposed.

In this year the earth darkened in the last nights of Dhū al-Ḥijjah until the day was well advanced.

In this year there was no summer expedition because of the truce there was between the Muslims and the Byzantines.

Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad led the pilgrimage in this year. He was governor of Medina and, after he had finished the pilgrimage and returned to Medina for a few days, he died, and Isḥāq b. 'Īsā b. 'Alī was appointed in his place.

In this year 'Uqbah b. Salm al-Hunā'ī was stabbed in 'Īsābādh.
[521] He was in the house of 'Umar b. Bazī' and a man took him by surprise and stabbed him with a dagger and he died there.[770]

The governor of Mecca and al-Ṭā'if in this year was 'Ubaydallāh b. Qutham. Sulaymān b. Yazīd al-Ḥārithī was in charge of 768. A friend of Yaḥyā the Barmakid. When he died the next year, Yaḥyā looked after his son. His son Aḥmad played a central part in the appointment of Ṭāhir as governor of Khurāsān in 205/820.

769. In Mecca.

770. According to al-Ya'qūbī, Tārīkh, II, 478, he was killed in revenge by a youth whose father he had killed when governor of al-Yamāmah (see note 72, above). Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb has him killed in al-Baḥrayn in al-Mahdī's reign (p. 196).

Yemen;[771] 'Abdallāh b. Muṣ'ab al-Zubayrī[772] of al-Yamāmah; Rawḥ b. Ḥātim was in charge of the prayers of al-Kūfah and the aḥdāth there; Muḥammad b. Sulaymān was in charge of the prayers and aḥdāth of al-Baṣrah, with 'Umar b. 'Uthmān al-Taymī[773] in charge of the judiciary there. Al-Mu'allā, freedman of al-Mahdī, was in charge of the districts of the Tigris; Kaskar; the governorates (a'māl) of al-Baṣrah, al-Baḥrayn, and 'Umān; and the districts (kuwar) of Ahwāz, Fārs, and Kirmān. Al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān al-Ṭūsī was in charge of Khurāsān and Sijistān; Mūsā b. Muṣ'ab[774] of Egypt; Yazīd b. Ḥātim of Ifrīqiyah; 'Umar b. al-'Alā' of Ṭabaristān and Rūyān; Farāshah, freedman of al-Mahdī, of Jurjān, Dunbāwand, and Qūmis; and Sa'd, freedman of the Commander of the Faithful, of al-Rayy.

771. He may have been the brother of Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Ḥārithī who was governor of Yemen 133–34/750–52. Al-Saffāḥ's mother was a Ḥārithī, and several of them were influential in the early 'Abbāsid state, especially in Yemen, where the family originated (Crone, Slaves, 149; Kennedy, 'Abbasid Caliphate, 52–53).

772. A descendant of the Prophet's companion al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām. Beside his political role, he was a significant source for al-Ṭabarī's History.

773. Not known elsewhere.

774. See note 193, above.

The Events of the Year

168

(JULY 24, 784–JULY 13, 785)

The events of this year:

Among these was the breaking by the Byzantines of the peace that had been made between them and Hārūn b. al-Mahdī as we described above and their treachery.[775] This was in the month of Ramaḍān (March 17–April 15, 785). Between the beginning of the peace and the Byzantines' treachery and their breaking of it were thirty-two months. ʿAlī b. Sulaymān, who was at that time governor of al-Jazīrah and Qinnasrīn, sent Yazīd b. Badr b. al-Baṭṭāl[776] with a cavalry force against the Byzantines, and they took booty and were victorious.

In this year al-Mahdī sent Saʿīd al-Ḥarashī to Ṭabaristān with forty thousand men.

[522] In this year ʿUmar al-Kalwādhī, master of the Zindīqs, died, and in his place was appointed Ḥamdawayh, who was Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā of the people of Maysān.[777]

775. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs," 739–40.

776. Grandson of the Muslim hero, al-Baṭṭāl, n. 223. He is not known elsewhere.

777. Maysān was in southern Iraq north of al-Baṣrah and to the east of the Great

In this year al-Mahdī executed the *Zindīq*s in Baghdad.

In this year al-Mahdī returned his dīwān and the dīwān of his family to Medina, and he transferred it from Damascus there.[778]

In this year al-Mahdī went out to Nahr al-Ṣilah, below Wāsiṭ. It was only known as Nahr al-Ṣilah (the canal of the grant), it is said, because he wished to assign to his family and others the rents of it and grant them that.[779]

In this year al-Mahdī appointed ʿAlī b. Yaqṭīn[780] to the Dīwān Zimam al-Azimmah[781] over ʿUmar b. Bazīʿ.

According to Aḥmad b. Mūsā b. Ḥamzah—his father:[782] The first person to work the Registry Department was ʿUmar b. Bazīʿ in the caliphate of al-Mahdī. This was because, when the *dīwān*s were gathered to him, he thought that he could organize them only by setting up a zimam (registry) on every dīwān, so he set up the registry departments and appointed a man to every department. To the registry department of the kharāj, he appointed Ismāʿīl b. Ṣubayḥ.[783] The Banū Umayyah did not have registry departments.

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Mahdī, who was called Ibn Rayṭah, led the pilgrimage in this year.

Swamp (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 242–43; Le Strange, 43). For his efforts against the *Zindīq*s, see al-Nahrawānī, al-Jalīs al-Sāliḥ (Beirut, 1987), III, 203–7.

778. The dīwān of the family was the list of its members and the salaries they were entitled to. It is surprising that it had remained in the old Umayyad capital: its return to Medina (not Baghdad) was intended to emphasize the connection between the ʿAbbāsids and the Family of the Prophet.

779. Yāqūt (Muʿjam, V, 321) says that the canal was dug by al-Mahdī and the land brought into cultivation by him but that the revenue was assigned to the people of the Ḥaramayn (Mecca and Medina).

780. Son of Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā (note 271, above). According to al-Ṭabarī, 549, he was executed for Zandaqah in 169/786, but Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 224, says he died in 182/798.

781. For dīwān al-azimmah (registry departments), see note 660, above. This new dīwān seems to have been an attempt to centralize the registries of different departments.

782. Not known elsewhere.

783. Al-Ḥarrānī. He was subsequently to have a long career as secretary for Hārūn and later for al-Amīn and is last heard of in 195/810–11.

The Events of the Year

169

(JULY 14, 785–JULY 2, 786)

The events of this year:

Among these was al-Mahdī's departure in al-Muḥarram (July 14–August 12, 785) to Māsabadhān.[784]

[523] The story of his departure:

It is said that at the end of his reign al-Mahdī had intended to give his son Hārūn precedence over his son Mūsā al-Hādī. He sent a member of his family to him when he was in Jurjān in order to decide finally on the oath of allegiance and give al-Rashīd precedence. Mūsā did not comply. Al-Mahdī then sent one of his freedmen to him, but Mūsā refused to come back and beat the messenger. Al-Mahdī departed because of Mūsā, intending to go to Jurjān, but there befell him what befell him.

According to al-Bāhilī[785]—Abū Shākir,[786] one of the secretaries of al-Mahdī in charge of one of the dīwāns: 'Alī b. Yaqṭīn asked 784. A district to the east of Baghdad, on the modern Iraq-Iran border (see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 41; Le Strange, Lands, 202).

785. Abū Bakr: nothing more is known of him.

786. Nothing more is known of this man.

al-Mahdī to have breakfast with him, and he promised that he would and then he decided to come to Māsabadhān and, by God, he gave orders for the journey as if he were driven to it, and 'Alī said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, you promised to me that you would have breakfast with me," and he replied, "Bring your breakfast to Nahrawān!" so he brought it and had breakfast in Nahrawān, and then he departed.

In this year al-Mahdī died. The account of the circumstances of his death:

There are different accounts of his death: According to Wāḍiḥ, qahramān[787] to al-Mahdī: Al-Mahdī went out to hunt in a village called al-Radhdh in Māsabadhān, and I remained with him until after the afternoon prayer and then I went to my tent, which was far from his. Just before daybreak I rode to do my duties, and I was traveling through the desert and I had separated from the pages who were with me and from my companions when I met a naked black man traveling on a camel. He came near to me and then said to me, "Abū Sahl, may God give you great recompense for [524] your master, the Commander of the Faithful."[788] I contemplated whipping him, but he vanished from in front of me and, when I came to the portico (of the tent), Masrūr[789] met me and said to me, "Abū Sahl, may God grant you great recompense for your master, the Commander of the Faithful." I went in and there I saw him covered with a shroud in a tent (qubbah). I said, "I left you after the afternoon prayer and no one was more cheerful in mood or more healthy in body, so what happened?" He replied, "The hounds chased a gazelle and he continued to follow them and the gazelle rushed through the door of a ruined building and the hounds rushed after it and the horse rushed after the hounds, and his back was smashed against the door of the ruin and he died instantly."

According to 'Alī b. Abī Nu'aym al-Marwazī:[790] One of al-

787. A qahramān was a member of the domestic staff of the court, rather than a political figure; Wāḍiḥ is not otherwise known.

788. A formula meaning that the caliph has died. Compare the specter who announces the death of al-Manṣūr; see above, p. 162.

789. Abū Hāshim Masrūr al-Khādim, a palace servant who became an important figure at the court of Hārūn; see Crone, Slaves, 192–93.

790. Marwazī means coming from Marw; this is the only report he contributes.

Mahdī's slave girls sent beastings with poison in it to a rival of hers. He was sitting in the garden after he had left ʿĪsābādh. He called for it (the beastings) and ate from it, and the slave girl was afraid to say that it was poisoned.

According to Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Rāzī:[791] Al-Mahdī was sitting in an upstairs room in the palace at Māsabadhān looking down from his vantage point on those below him. A slave girl of his, called Ḥasanah,[792] had picked up two large pears and put them in a ṣīnīyah[793] dish and poisoned one that was the best and ripest in its lowest part, and replaced the stem in it and put it in the upper part of the dish. Al-Mahdī used to like pears very much, and she sent it with a servant of hers to a slave girl of al-Mahdī's whom he favored, intending to kill her with that. The servant was taking the dish with that pear in it, intending to give it to the slave girl whom Ḥasanah had sent it to, when al-Mahdī saw her from the vantage point. When he saw her and saw the pear with her, he called her and stretched out his hand to the pear, which [525] was uppermost in the dish, the poisoned one, and ate it. When it reached his stomach, he screamed, "My stomach!" and Ḥasanah heard the voice and was told the news, and she began to strike her face in lamentation and weep and said, "I wanted to be alone with you and I have killed you, O my lord!" and he died that day.

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Ismāʿīl, master of the riding animals:[794] When we reached Māsabadhān, I came near to his bridle and took hold of it and he showed no sign of illness, by God, but in the morning he was dead, and I saw that Ḥasanah had returned with sackcloth on her collar and Abū al-ʿAtāhiyah[795] said about that:

In the afternoon, the women went in fine fabrics, but in the morning they had sackcloth on.
Every butter has a butting day against him by time.
You were not to remain, even if you were given life as long as

791. Rāzī means coming from al-Rayy; he contributes two other reports.
792. Not known elsewhere.
793. A metal tray used for serving food.
794. Ṣāḥib al-marākib, a palace servant not recorded elsewhere.
795. D. 210/825. The celebrated poet. See Aghānī, Būlāq, XIV, 56; Beirut, XV, 218; EI^{2}, s.v. "Abū'l-ʿAtāhiyah."

Noah was.
Lament for yourself for you have no alternative but to lament.

According to Ṣāliḥ al-Qārī'—'Alī b. Yaqṭīn: We were with al-Mahdī in Māsabadhān and he woke up one day and said, "I have woken up hungry," and he was brought loaves and cold, cooked meat in vinegar. He ate some of it and then said, "I am going into the hall to sleep in it. Do not wake me up until I wake up myself." He went into the hall and slept, and we slept in the house under the portico. We were awakened by his weeping and hurried to him and he said, "Did you not see what I saw?" and we replied that we had not seen anything and he said, "There stood at the door a man who would be easily recognized by me had he been among a thousand or a hundred thousand men and he recited, saying:

It is as if I were in this palace and its people have perished [526] and its residences and dwelling places are deserted.
The chief of the people has come after glory and power to a tomb covered with stones.
Nothing remains but his memory and story and the wailing of his wives cries out for him."

Ten days did not pass before he died. According to Abū Ma'shar and al-Wāqidī he died in the year 169 on the night of Thursday (i.e., Wednesday night by our reckoning) 22 Muḥarram (Thursday, August 4, 785). His caliphate lasted ten years and one and a half months. Someone said that his caliphate was ten years, forty-nine days and that he died at the age of forty-three.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad: Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mahdī Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh began to rule on 6 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 158 (October 7, 775), and reigned for ten years, one month, and twenty-two days and then died in 169, when he was forty-three years old.

A description of his burial place and those who prayed over him:

It is said that al-Mahdī died in one of the villages of Māsabadhān called al-Radhdh, and about that Bakkār b. Ribāḥ[796] said:

796. He is not noticed in Aghānī and not quoted elsewhere in al-Ṭabarī.

May the mercy of the Merciful One at all hours (come down) over a corpse that decayed at Māsabadhān.
The tomb covered a fault-free man and two palms that hasten to do kindness.

His son Hārūn prayed over him, and there was not a bier to be found to carry him on, so he was carried on a door and buried under a nut tree he used to sit under.

He was tall, of thin build, with curly hair. Opinions differ as to [527] his coloring; some said that he was brown, and others said that he was white. Some said that he had a white spot in his right eye, and others said that it was in his left eye, and he was born in Īdhaj.[797]

Some of the Doings of al-Mahdī and Stories about Him

According to Hārūn b. Abī 'Ubaydallāh: When al-Mahdī used to sit for the maẓālim, he said, "Bring in the judges to me! If I only settle the maẓālim with their approval, it is enough."

According to al-Ḥasan b. Abī Sa'īd—'Alī b. Ṣāliḥ:[798] Al-Mahdī sat down one day to give rewards, which were distributed in his presence to his intimates (khāṣṣah) among his family and his army commanders. The names were read to him and he ordered bonuses of ten thousand and twenty thousand and similar. There came before him one of the commanders, and he said, "This man is reduced by 500," and he asked, "Why have you brought me down, O Commander of the Faithful?" and he replied, "Because I sent you against an enemy of ours and you fled," and he said, "Would it have pleased you more if I had been killed?" Al-Mahdī said, "No," and the commander went on, "By Him Who has generously bestowed the caliphate on you, if I had stood firm, I would have been killed." Al-Mahdī was shamed by him and said, "Give him five thousand more."

797. On the border between the provinces of Iṣfahān and Khūzistān, in the Zagros mountains. He was born there because his father was involved in the unsuccessful rebellion of 'Abdallāh b. Mu'āwiyah against the Umayyads in 126–27/743–45 (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 266–69).

798. Nothing more is known of al-Ḥasan, who contributes a number of reports to the History, of which this is the first. 'Alī was the son of Ṣāliḥ, Ṣāḥib al-Muṣallā (note 153, above) and so a good source of court gossip.

According to al-Ḥasan—'Alī b. Ṣāliḥ: Al-Mahdī was angry with one of his army commanders and had reproved him several times and said to him, "For how long will you sin against me and I forgive you?" and he replied, "May it continue forever and may God spare you to forgive us," and he repeated it a number of [528] times, and al-Mahdī was ashamed about him and took him into favor.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar[799]—Ḥafṣ, mawlā of Muzaynah—his father: Hishām al-Kalbī[800] was a friend of mine, and we used to meet and tell stories and recite verses to each other. I had seen him in worn-out clothes and rags on a skinny mule, and he and his mule were obviously in need, so I was surprised when one day he met me on a light-colored mule that was one of the caliphal mules, with a saddle and bridle that belonged to the caliphate, and he was riding in fine clothes and good perfume. I showed my pleasure and then said to him, "I see obvious prosperity," and he replied, "Yes, I will tell you about it and keep it a secret. While I was in my house some days ago between the midday and afternoon prayers, al-Mahdī's messenger came to me, so I went to him and entered to him. He was sitting alone without anyone with him, and in his hands he held a letter. He said 'Come near, O Hishām,' so I came near and sat down in front of him, and he continued, 'Take this letter and read it and do not let the odious things in it prevent you from reading it.'

"I looked at the letter and, when I had read some of it, I found it odious and I threw it from my hand and cursed the author. He said, 'I told you that, if you found it odious, you should not throw it away. Read it on my orders until you reach the end.'

"I read it and it was a letter whose author had abused him savagely without sparing anything, and I said, 'O Commander of the Faithful, who is this cursed liar?' and he replied, 'The Lord of al-Andalus.'[801] I said, 'By God, O Commander of the Faithful,

799. Al-Wāqidī.

800. The famous historian. Nothing else is known of Ḥafṣ or his father.

801. The Umayyad ruler of Muslim Spain, at this time 'Abd al-Raḥmān b Mu'āwiyah b. Hishām (138–72/756–88).

the shame is on him and his fathers and mothers.' Then I began abusing them. He was pleased with that and said, 'I am asking you to dictate all abuse of them to a secretary.'

"He called one of the confidential secretaries and ordered him [529] to sit down nearby, and he ordered me to go to him, and the secretary began a reply from al-Mahdī, and I dictated abuse against them in great quantity and did not spare anything until I had finished the letter. I showed it to him, and his pleasure was obvious and he went on to order that the letter be sealed and put in a bag and given to the Master of the Post and he ordered that it be hastened to al-Andalus.

"Then he ordered a cloth in which there were ten of the best robes and ten thousand dirhams and this mule with its saddle and bridle, and he gave me that and said to me, 'Keep silent about what you have heard.'"

According to al-Ḥasan—Miswar b. Musāwir: Al-Mahdī's agent (wakīl) oppressed me and was angry with me on account of an estate I had, so I went to Sallām, ṣāḥib al-maẓālim,[802] and complained about the oppression to him and gave him a written note. He took the note to al-Mahdī, and there were with him his paternal uncle, al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad; Ibn ʿUlāthah; and ʿĀfiyah the Qāḍī. Al-Mahdī said to me, "Come near," so I came near, and he asked, "What are you saying?" and I replied, "You have oppressed me." He said, "Are you satisfied with one of these two (qāḍīs)?"

"Yes," I said and he told me to approach, and I did so until I was touching the cushion, and he said, "Speak!" I said, "May God give the judge peace, he oppressed me on account of this estate of mine." The qāḍī then asked, "What do you say, O Commander of the Faithful?" and he replied, "It is my estate and it is in my hands," and I said, "May God give the judge peace. Ask him whether the estate passed to him before he became caliph or after."

He asked, "What do you say, O Commander of the Faithful?" He answered that it came to him after he had become caliph. The judge said, "Hand it over to him," and he replied, "I have done it," and al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad said, "O Commander of the Faithful. Indeed this majlis is dearer to me than twenty million dirhams."

802. Sallām al-Abrash; see note 289, above.

According to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Rabīʿ[803]—Mujāhid, the poet:[804] Al-Mahdī went out for sport, and with him was ʿUmar b. Bazīʿ, [530] his freedman. We were cut off from the army and the people (courtiers) in the hunt, and al-Mahdī was struck by hunger and said, "Damn you! Do you have anything?" and he said, "No, nothing. I see a hut, and I think it has a vegetable patch." We went in its direction, and there was a Nabaṭī[805] in a cottage and a vegetable patch. We greeted him and he returned the greeting, and we asked if he had anything to eat. He replied, "Yes, I have rubaythā' (a kind of small fish) and barley bread," and al-Mahdī asked, "If you have oil you will have done everything," and he said "Yes." "And leeks?" "As you like, and dates." He hurried to the vegetable patch and brought them greens and leeks and onions, and they ate a large and satisfying meal. Al-Mahdī said to ʿUmar b. Bazīʿ, "Say a poem about this," and he said:

He who prepares a meal of rubaythā' in oil, barley bread, and leeks deserves a blow or two for the evil of his action, or three.

Al-Mahdī said, "It is a shame your poem did not go like this:

deserves a bidrah[806] or two for the excellence of his action, or three."

The escort and treasury and servants came by, and al-Mahdī ordered that the Nabaṭī be given three bidrahs (30,000 dirhams), and he went on his way.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh—Abū Ghānim: Zayd al-Hilālī[807] was a noble, generous, and famous man of the Banū Hilāl, and the inscription on his seal read, "He is successful, O 803. B. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥārithī, see note 34, above.

804. He is not noticed in Aghānī and does not appear again in the History.
805. One of the indigenous, non-Arab inhabitants of Iraq.
806. A large sum of money, 10,000 dirhams.
807. Despite the caliph's encomium, Zayd has left no other trace in the historical record.

Zayd, who causeth his work to grow,"[808] and news of this reached al-Mahdī, who said, "The inscription on Zayd al-Hilālī's seal reads, 'He is successful, O Zayd, whose work has a good reputation.'"

According to al-Ḥasan al-Waṣīf: In the reign of al-Mahdī we were struck by a wind so strong that we thought that we would be [531] swept away to the Last Judgment, so I went out to look for the Commander of the Faithful and I found him lying, his cheek on the ground, saying, "O God, preserve Muḥammad in his people! O God, do not let our enemies among the peoples rejoice! O God, if you have taken the world because of my sin, my forelock is in your hands!" We remained only a little time before the wind disappeared and what we were in vanished.

According to al-Mawṣilī—'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī: I said to al-Mahdī, "O Commander of the Faithful, we people of the family have been made to imbibe into our hearts the love of our freedmen and the giving of precedence to them. What you have in this respect has gone too far. You have given them charge of all your affairs and you have favored them by night and day, and I fear a change of heart among your soldiers and your commanders from the people of Khurāsān."

He replied, "O Abū Muḥammad, the freedmen deserve that. There is no one who combines these qualities except these freedmen. I can hold audience for the common people and summon a freedman of mine and raise him up so that his knee rubs against mine, and then he gets up from that audience and I can ask him to look after my mount and he does so and does not think himself to be above that. They are not proud with me about that, and if I wanted that from anyone else he would say, 'Where is the person whose job it is and the first to answer your call, and where is he who is first to respond to your summons?'[809] I would not shove him out of the way.'"

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī': Al-Mahdī said to 'Abdallāh b. Mālik, "Wrestle with this freedman of mine," so he wrestled with him and he took him by the neck, and al-

---

808. The inscription was taken from Qur'ān, XCI: 9. The sense of the anecdote is not clear.

809. The text here presents some problems: I have incorporated some of the suggestions made in Gloss., s.v. 'ain, CXXIV–CXXV, where the matter is discussed.

Mahdī said, "Press hard," and, when 'Abdallāh saw that, he took him by his leg and he fell on his head and he threw him on the ground. 'Abdallāh said to al-Mahdī, "O Commander of the Faithful, I left you while I was one of the most beloved of men to you, and yet you still side with your freedman against me." He said, "Have you not heard the words of the poet?

Your freedmen should not be oppressed while you behold, [532] for the oppression of a certain people's freedman is like the cutting off of the nose."

According to Abū al-Khaṭṭāb:[810] When death was approaching al-Qāsim b. Mujāshi' al-Tamīmī,[811] of the people of Marw of the village known as Bārān, he wrote a testament for al-Mahdī: "There is no god but He; that is the witness of God, His angels, and those endued with knowledge, standing firm on justice. There is no god but He, the Exalted in Power, the Wise. The religion before God is Islam..."[812] to the end of the verse. Then he wrote that al-Qāsim b. Mujāshi' bore witness to that and that Muḥammad was his slave and his messenger, that 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was the heir of the Prophet of God and the inheritor of the imāmate after him.[813] The testament was presented to al-Mahdī and, when he reached this point, he threw it away and did not look at it.

Abū al-Khaṭṭāb said: This remained in the heart of Abū 'Ubaydallāh, the wazīr, and, when his death approached, he wrote this Qur'ānic verse in his testament.

According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī: A man came in to al-Mahdī and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, al-Mahdī cursed me and called my mother a whore; either you should order me to exonerate him from his sin, or you should give me compensation and I shall ask God to forgive him." He asked why he had cursed him and the man replied, "I cursed an enemy of his in his presence and he was angry with me."

---

810. Ḥamzah b. 'Alī contributes a few scattered narratives to the History.

811. Al-Tamīmī. He had been one of the original agents (nuqabā') of the 'Abbāsids in Khurāsān and had fought in the 'Abbāsid armies beside Qaḥṭabah, so his disaffection was all the more striking.

812. Qur'ān, III: 18–19.

813. That is to say that the 'Alids, not the 'Abbāsids, were the rightful leaders of the Muslim community.

"Who was this enemy that he was angry with you for cursing him?" he asked. "Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan," the man replied. "Ibrāhīm is a very close relation and most worthy of al-Manṣūr's kinship rights. If your cursing was as you allege, he was protecting his kin and defending his honor. What is wrong with someone who comes to the aid of his own cousin (ibn ʿamm)?"[814] He said, "He was his enemy," but al-Mahdī replied, "He did not come to his aid out of hostility (to you) but because of his kinship." He silenced the man and, when he turned to go, al-Mahdī said, "Perhaps you wanted something and you were not able to find a better pretext for coming to me than this claim?" and he [533] replied, "Yes." Then he smiled and ordered that he be given five thousand dirhams.

A man was brought to al-Mahdī who claimed to be a prophet and when he saw him he said, "Are you a prophet?" and the man replied, "Yes," so he asked to whom he had been sent, and he replied, "Have you left me to go to those to whom I was sent? I was despatched in the morning, and you arrested me in the evening and put me in prison." Al-Mahdī laughed at him and let him go.

According to Abū al-Ashʿath al-Kindī[815]—Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh—al-Rabīʿ: I saw al-Mahdī praying in a hall on a moonlit night, and I do not know whether he was more beautiful or the hall or the moon or his clothes. He read this verse: "Then it is to be expected of you, if ye were put into authority, that ye will do mischief in the land, and break your ties of kith and kin?"[816] He completed his prayers and turned to me and said, "O Rabīʿ," and I said, "Your servant, O Commander of the Faithful," and he said, "Bring me Mūsā," and stood up to pray. I asked (myself), "Which Mūsā, his son Mūsā[817] or Mūsā b. Jaʿfar?"[818] (who was imprisoned at my house) and I began to think and came to the conclusion that it was Mūsā b. Jaʿfar, and I brought him. Then he broke off his 814. Stressing the unity of the Family of the Prophet, despite Ibrāhīm's rebellion in 145/768.

815. Presumably a member of the family of al-Ashʿath b. Qays; see above, note 580.

816. Qurʾān, XLVII: 22.

817. The future caliph al-Hādī.

818. Mūsā al-Kāẓim, son of Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq. Mūsā is held to have been killed by Hārūn in 186/802 and is venerated by twelver Shiʿīs as the seventh imām.

prayer and said, "O Mūsā I was reading this verse 'Then it is to be expected of you, if ye were put into authority, that ye will do mischief in the land and break your ties of kith and kin,' and I was afraid that I had broken the tie of kinship with you, so confirm that you will not rise in rebellion against me," and he said, "Yes," and confirmed it and he released him.

According to Ibrāhīm b. Abī 'Alī—Sulaymān b. Dāwūd: I heard al-Mahdī reciting quickly in the miḥrāb of the mosque in a unique chant "Hast thou not turned thy vision to those who were given a portion of the Book? They believe in sorcery and evil," in the chapter of the women.[819]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān—my father: I [534] came into the presence of al-Mahdī and he was sitting for the maẓālim. A man from the family of al-Zubayr[820] approached him and mentioned an estate that one of the kings of the Banū Umayyah—I do not know whether it was al-Walīd[821] or Sulaymān[822]—had confiscated from his father. He ordered Abū 'Ubaydallāh to extract its record from the old dīwān. He did that and read the record to al-Mahdī that said that it was included among a number of them that 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz[823] had not seen fit to return. Al-Mahdī said, "O Zubayrī, this 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, who was one of your tribe of Quraysh, do you know why he did not see fit to return it?" and he asked, "Do you approve of all the acts of 'Umar?" and al-Mahdī asked, "What acts of his do you not approve of?" "One of those was that he apportioned to the prematurely born baby of the Banū Umayyah, while in his infant clothes, a share of the most honorable 'aṭā'[824] and apportioned an old man of the Banū Hāshim sixty." Al-Mahdī said, "O Mu'āwiyah, did 'Umar do that?" and he replied, "Yes," so he said, "Restore his estate to the Zubayrī."

---

819. Qur'ān, IV: 51.

820. Ibn al-'Awwām, the Prophet's companion. The family's estates were confiscated after the unsuccessful rebellion of his son 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr against the Umayyad caliph 'Abd al-Malik.

821. B. 'Abd al-Malik, Umayyad caliph 86–96/705–15.

822. B. 'Abd al-Malik, Umayyad caliph 96–99/715–17.

823. Umayyad caliph, 99–101/717–20, respected by the 'Abbāsids as the only righteous Umayyad.

824. The highest level of salary.

'Umar b. Shabbah—Abū Salamah al-Ghifārī: Al-Mahdī wrote to Ja'far b. Sulaymān, who was governor of Medina, ordering him to bring a group of people who were suspected of Qadar.[825] Among them were 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Ubaydah b. Muḥammad b. 'Ammār b. Yāsir,[826] 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. Qays al-Hudhalī,[827] 'Īsā b. Yazīd b. Da'b al-Laythī,[828] and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr al-Usāmī.[829] They were brought in to al-Mahdī and 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Ubaydah among them exculpated himself to him and said, "This was the faith of your father and his belief," and he replied, "No, that of my paternal uncle Dāwūd,"[830] but 'Abdallāh said, "No, your father was of this belief of ours, and it was his faith," and he let them go.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Nawfalī—his father—Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b.
[535] 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib:[831] I saw as a sleeper sees at the end of the reign of the Banū Umayyah; it was as if I had entered the mosque of the Prophet of God and I raised my head and looked at the writing in mosaic that was in the mosque and there was what the Commander of the Faithful al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik had ordered.[832] There was a voice saying, "Wipe out this writing and write in its place the name of a man from the Banū Hāshim called Muḥammad."

I said, "I am Muḥammad and I am of the Banū Hāshim. Whose son is it?" and the voice replied, "Son of 'Abdallāh," and I said, "I am son of 'Abdallāh; son of whom?" and the voice said, "Son of Muḥammad," and I said, "I am the son of Muḥammad; son of whom?" and the voice said, "Son of 'Alī," and I said, "I am son

825. A belief in human free will, which came to be considered heretical; see *EI*², s.v. "Ḳadarıya."

826. A traditionist occasionally quoted in the History.

827. No more is known about him. It is suggested in the Addenda that the name should be Qanṭash.

828. A traditionist quoted by al-Ṭabarī who later became a valued companion of the caliph al-Hādī.

829. Not recorded elsewhere.

830. B. 'Alī al-'Abbāsī; see note 430, above.

831. A descendant of 'Alī's brother Ja'far; the Ja'farids were sometimes thought of as possible candidates for the caliphate. He and his forebears had identical names to those of the caliph al-Mahdī for five generations.

832. Umayyad caliph 86–96/705–15.

of 'Alī; son of whom?" and the voice said, "Son of 'Abdallāh," and I said, "I am son of 'Abdallāh; son of whom?" and the voice said, "Son of 'Abbās." If I had not reached 'Abbās, I would have had no doubts that I was the lord of the affair.

I told the story of this dream at the time, and we did not know al-Mahdī and people told it, so he entered the mosque of the Prophet and raised his eyes and looked and saw the name of al-Walīd and he said, "Indeed I still see the name of al-Walīd in the mosque of the Prophet of God." He called for a chair, and it was put before him in the court of the mosque and he said, "I will not leave until it is wiped out and my name is put in its place." He ordered that workmen and ladders and the necessary equipment be brought, and he did not leave until it was changed and his name was written.[833]

According to Aḥmad b. al-Haytham al-Qurashī—'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Aṭā': Al-Mahdī went out after the stillness of the night to walk around the house (the Ka'bah) and he heard a bedouin woman by the side of the mosque, and she was saying, "My people are poverty-stricken, eyes glance at them with repugnance, debts weigh on them, famines bite them hard, their men have passed away and their wealth has gone, and their dependents have grown numerous. They have become wanderers far [536] from home and emaciated phantoms of the road. They are God's and the Prophet's trust that he ordered to help. Is there one to order good for me? May God protect him in his journey and assist his people in his absence." He ordered Nuṣayr al-Khādim to pay her five hundred dirhams.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān—his father: The first person to use Ṭabarī furnishings[834] was al-Mahdī. This was when his father had ordered him to settle at al-Rayy and he was given the Ṭabarī from Ṭabaristān and put ice and reeds[835] around it until canvas was introduced to them (for cooling), and the Ṭabarī was pleasant for them in it.

According to Muḥammad b. Ziyād—al-Mufaḍḍal: Al-Mahdī

833. Cf. the surviving inscription in the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem, where 'Abd al-Malik's name has been replaced by that of al-Ma'mūn.

834. That is, textiles from Ṭabaristān in northern Iran.

835. See the description of al-Manṣūr's coolhouse, p. 121.

said to me, "Collect for me proverbs that you hear from the badw and that you consider authentic." I wrote proverbs for him and accounts of the wars of the Arabs that were mentioned in them, and he gave me grants and treated me very well.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad: One of the descendants of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah[836] sought to rebel in Syria and he was brought to al-Mahdī. He released him and was generous to him and brought him close in his audience, and he said to him one day, "Recite the qaṣīdah of Zuhayr with the rhyme in rā',[837] which goes:

Whose tents are those on the mountain top of al-Ḥajr?"

and he recited it. The Samurī said, "Gone are the people who deserve to be eulogized by such poetry." Al-Mahdī was angry with him and considered him ignorant and thrust him aside but did not punish him, and the people considered him stupid.

It was said that Abū 'Awn 'Abd al-Malik b. Yazīd was ill and al-Mahdī visited him and there was a shabby house, badly built, [537] and the arch of the ṣuffah was made of mud brick. There was a luxurious tent in his audience. Al-Mahdī sat down on a pillow and Abū 'Awn sat in front of him, and al-Mahdī treated him with respect and commiserated with him about his illness. Abū 'Awn said, "I hope for good health from God, O Commander of the Faithful, and that He will not cause me to die in my bed before I am killed in your service. I trust that I will not die before I show God in your service what He is entitled to, for indeed we have been succored and given succor."

Al-Mahdī expressed a very good opinion of him and said, "Request from me what you need and ask me for what you want, and I will provide for you in life and death. By God, if your wealth fails in any way, make a request and I will indeed fulfill it, whatever it is. Say and request."

Abū 'Awn thanked him and blessed him and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, my request is that you show favor to

836. B. Ḥabīb b. 'Abd Shams. Ḥabīb was a brother of that Umayyad after whom the dynasty was named.

837. In the classical Arabic ode (qaṣīdah) all the lines end with the same rhyme.

'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Awn and summon him, for your anger against him has lasted a long time."

Al-Mahdī replied, "O Abū 'Awn, he is on the wrong road and is against our belief and your belief. He defames the two shaykhs, Abū Bakr and 'Umar,[838] and uses evil language about them."

Abū 'Awn said, "He is, by God, O Commander of the Faithful, of the belief for which we rebelled and that we summoned people to.[839] If you have engendered any change, order us to do what you wish, so that we can obey you."

Al-Mahdī went away and, when he was on the road, he said to one of his children and family who were with him, "Would that you were like Abū 'Awn. By God, I did not expect that his house would be built of materials other than gold and silver. You, if you found a dirham, would build in teak and gold."

According to Abū 'Abdallāh—his father: Al-Mahdī preached the sermon one day and said, "Servants of God, fear God," and a man stood up and said "And you too fear God, for you are acting unjustly!" He was arrested and brought, and they set about goading him with the points of their scabbards. When he was brought into al-Mahdī, he said, "O son of a whore, you said to me when I was on the pulpit, 'Fear God!'" and he said, "How bad! If this insult [538] came from someone other than you, I would have been appealing for your assistance against him." He said, "I think you are only a Nabaṭī," and he replied, "It is the most positive form of proof against you if a Nabaṭī orders you to fear God." He saw the man after that, and he was talking about what happened between him and al-Mahdī. My father said, "I was present with him at the time, only I did not hear the words."

According to Hārūn b. Maymūn al-Khuzā'ī—Abū Khuzaymah al-Bādhghīsī:[840] Al-Mahdī said, "Nobody seeks my help with a petition or offers an excuse that is more pressing than he, reminding me of a favor I did him so that it would be followed by its

838. An indication of 'Alid sympathies since Abū Bakr and 'Umar, the first two caliphs, were held by some to have deprived 'Alī of his rightful inheritance, the caliphate.

839. This seems to mean that the original beliefs of the 'Abbāsid movement agreed with this but that the view had subsequently been modified.

840. Neither of these is recorded elsewhere.

sister (i.e., one like it) and so good would be done to its asker because withholding of later things removes gratitude for earlier ones."

According to Khālid b. Yazīd b. Wahb b. Jarīr—his father: Bashshār b. Burd b. Yarjūkh[841] had attacked Ṣāliḥ b. Dāwūd b. Ṭahmān, the brother of Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd, in a poem when he was appointed governor of al-Baṣrah saying:

They carried Ṣāliḥ your brother onto the pulpits, and the pulpits groaned because of your brother.[842]

Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd heard of this attack and came into al-Mahdī and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, this blind infidel has attacked the Commander of the Faithful," and he said, "Damn you, what did he say?" and he replied, "Let the Commander of the Faithful excuse me from reciting it," but he insisted on his reciting it so he said:

A caliph who fornicates with his paternal aunts and who plays with a child's toys and polo mallets,
May God give us another in his place.
And Mūsā thrusts into al-Khayzurān's cunt.

He sent for him to be brought, and Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd was afraid [539] that he would come to al-Mahdī and eulogize him and he would forgive him, so he sent someone to meet him in al-Baṭīḥa[843] at Kharrārah.

According to 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr—his grandfather, Abū al-Ḥayy al-'Absī: When Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah came in to al-Mahdī, he recited his poem in which he says: How can it be that the inheritance of the paternal uncles should pass to the sons of the daughter? This is something that does not happen.[844]

He rewarded him with seventy thousand *dirham*s, and Marwān said:

---

841. The celebrated poet; see Aghānī, Būlāq, III, 19; Beirut; III, 129.

842. The pulpit (minbar) is used here to symbolize the authority of the governor.

843. The great swamp of southern Iraq, between Baghdad and al-Baṣrah. Aghānī expands the text to add, "He met him and whipped him so that he killed him and threw him into the swamp at the place called Kharārah."

844. Al-'Abbās was the paternal uncle of the Prophet and, the 'Abbāsids argued, his true heir, rather than his daughter Fāṭimah, who married 'Alī.

With seventy thousand he has made me wealthy with his gifts, and no poet before me has ever acquired as much.

According to Aḥmad b. Sulaymān—Abū 'Adnān al-Sulamī: Al-Mahdī asked 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah, who was most sensitive of the people in poetry, and he replied that it was Wālibah b. al-Ḥubāb al-Asadī[845] and he was the one who said:

She is sinless, but she has love, which, like the points of spears, Strikes fire in the heart and the bowels,
for the heart is the wounded part.

He said, "You told the truth, by God," so 'Umārah asked, "What is stopping you from taking him as a boon companion, for he is a noble Arab and elegant poet?" and al-Mahdī replied, "What prevents me, by God, from making him a boon companion are his words:

I said to our cupbearer when we were alone
'Bring your head near mine like that.
And lie on your front for me for a while, for I am a man who has sex with my companion.'

Do you want to be his companion on this condition?"

According to Muḥammad b. Sallām: There was in the time of al-Mahdī a foolish person who used to recite poetry in order to praise al-Mahdī. He was brought in to him and asked to recite a poem in which he said "Wa jawārin zafarātin," and al-Mahdī said to him, "What is the meaning of zafarāt?" and he answered, "Do you not know that, O Commander of the Faithful?" and he said, "No, by God," and the poet said, "And you are the Commander of the Faithful and the lord of the Muslims and the son of the paternal uncle of the Prophet of God and you do not know it? Am I expected to know it? Not at all, by God." [540]

According to Ibn Sallām—more than one person: Ṭurayḥ b. Ismā'īl al-Thaqafī[846] came in to al-Mahdī, gave his genealogy to him, and asked if he would hear some of his poetry, and he said, "Are you not the one who said to al-Walīd b. Yazīd:

845. 'Abbāsid poet, noted for his wine drinking and pederasty, eventually forced to retire to his home town of al-Kūfah by the hostility of Abū al-'Atāhiyyah and Bashshār b. Burd; Aghānī, Būlāq, XVI, 148; Beirut, XVIII, 43.

846. A well-known poet at the court of al-Walīd b. Yazīd who died in the reign of al-Mahdī; see Aghānī, Būlāq, IV, 74, Beirut, IV, 304.

You are the son of the wide-open spaces, and the winding track and the path through the sands are not tramped upon to reach you?

And, by God, you will never say anything like that to me. I will not hear a poem from you, but if you wish I will make you a grant."

It is said that al-Mahdī ordered a fast in the year (1)66 to ask for rain for the people on Wednesday, and on Monday night (Tuesday night in the Arabic terminology) there was a snowfall, and Laqīṭ b. Bukayr al-Muḥāribī said about that:

O Imām of right guidance, you watered us with rain, and, because of you, hardship was removed from us.
You spent the night concerned with protecting them while the people were sleeping, covered by the darkness.
They slept when your night grew long among them;
yours are the fear, the humble prayers, and the weeping.
Their affairs gave you concern because of the foolishness of the crowd, who disobeyed and acted evilly.
We were watered and we had been smitten by drought, and we said,
"A severe (red) year that has become worse"
By a prayer that you sincerely offered in the blackness of the night to God, and the call was answered
By snows that give life to the ground, so that in the morning it was a green flower.

[541] It is said that the people in the days of al-Mahdī fasted for the month of Ramaḍān in the height of summer. Abū Dulāmah was seeking a reward for that, and al-Mahdī promised him one, so he wrote a note to al-Mahdī in which he complained of his sufferings from the heat and the fast, and in that he said:

I call on you in the name of the kinship that links us in closeness both near and far.

I implore you to hear, you the most generous man who walked, from a singer who hopes for the reward of a singer.
The fast has come, and I fasted it devotedly, hoping for the recompense of the devoted faster.
I bowed in prayer until my forehead cracked from what I imposed on myself of butting the mosque.

When al-Mahdī read the note, he summoned him and said, "What kinship is there between me and you, O son of fornication?" and he replied, "The kinship with Adam and Eve," and al-Mahdī laughed at him and ordered that he be given his reward.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—his father—Ibrāhīm b. Khālid al-Muʿayṭī:[847] I came in to al-Mahdī, and my singing had been described to him and he asked me about singing and about my knowledge of it and asked me if I sang the nawāqīs,[848] and I said, "Yes, and the ṣalīb[849] too, O Commander of the Faithful." Then he disregarded me, and I was told that he said, "Muʿayṭī, I have no need of him among those who are brought to me in my solitude and I do not like his company, and Maʿbad the singer has the nawāqīs in this poem: [542]

Ask the abode of Laylā. Does it answer and speak?
How can the desert plain reply?
Does an abode reply that looks like a blank paper because of its long decay and the length of its survival?"

According to Qaʿnab b. Muḥriz Abū ʿAmr al-Bāhilī—al-Aṣmaʿī: I saw Ḥakam al-Wādī[850] when al-Mahdī was traveling to Jerusalem, and he accosted him on the road. He had some little poems, and he took out his tambourine to play it and said, "I am the poet who said:

847. Not noticed in Aghānī.

848. A type of poetry but also the board on which the Christians strike to summon people to church.

849. The cross.

850. Al-Ḥakam b. Maymūn, mawlā of al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik. His father was al-Walīd's barber, and he began his career as a camel driver taking oil from Wādī al-Qurra to Medina. He sang for every caliph from al-Walīd b. Yazīd to Hārūn, in whose reign he died. See Aghānī, Būlāq, VI, 64, Beirut, VI, 264.

When will the bride come out?
Her confinement has lasted long.
Dawn has come near or has actually appeared,
and she has not completed her dressing."

The guard rushed to him, and he cried out and they desisted. He made inquiries about him, and it was said that he was Ḥakam al-Wādī, and he was brought in to him and he gave him a grant.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his father: Al-Mahdī went into one of his houses one day, and there was a Christian slave girl of his and her bosom was wide and the part between her breasts was uncovered and there was a cross of gold hanging there. He thought it was very beautiful and stretched out his hand toward it and pulled it out and took it. She wept for the cross, and al-Mahdī said about that:

One day I contended with her at pulling the cross from her, and she said,
"Woe to me, Do not you think the cross licit?"

He sent for one of the poets and gave him a gift and ordered him to sing it, and he was proud about this song.

He said: I heard my father say that al-Mahdī observed a slave girl who was wearing a crown in which there was a narcissus of gold and silver, and he thought it very beautiful and said:

[543] How beautiful is the narcissus in the crown!

He was unable to continue, and he asked who at court (could complete the line), and they said, 'Abdallāh b. Mālik,[851] so he summoned him and said, "I saw a slave girl of mine with a beautiful crown on her and I said:

How beautiful is the narcissus in the crown!

Are you able to add to it?" and he replied, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful, but let me go out to think about it," and al-Mahdī said, "Please yourself!" He went out and sent for the tutor of one of his children and asked him to complete it and gave him a gift, and he said:

851. A military man, for many years chief of police; poetry does not seem to have been his forte. For his ability as a wrestler, see above, pp. 250–51.

on (her) brow that shines like ivory.

And he completed it up to four verses, and 'Abdallāh sent it to al-Mahdī, and al-Mahdī sent him forty thousand and he gave the tutor four thousand and kept the rest for himself, and there is a well-known tune about it.

According to Aḥmad b. Mūsā b. Muḍar Abū 'Alī: Al-Tawwazī recited poetry to me by al-Mahdī about Ḥasanah, his slave girl:

I see water, and I am afflicted by severe thirst, but there is no path to reach it.
Is it enough for you that you enslave me while all people are my slaves?
If you were to cut off my hands and feet,
I would say from excess of pleasure "O, more!"

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his father: I saw al-Mahdī when he had entered al-Baṣrah by Sikkat Quraysh, and I saw him going along and in front of him was al-Banūqah between him and the chief of police. She was wearing a black cloak (qibā) and a sword, as pages do, and I could see some signs of her breasts on her chest.

According to 'Alī—his father: Al-Mahdī came to al-Baṣrah and passed along the Sikkat Quraysh, where our house was,[852] and the governors never used to go along there when they arrived. They used to think it an evil omen; scarcely a governor who passed along it remained in office except for a short time before he was deposed, and no caliph ever passed along it except al- [544]
Mahdī. They used to go along the Sikkat of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah, which ran parallel with the Sikkat Quraysh. I saw al-Mahdī going along and 'Abdallāh b. Mālik, who was in command of the police, was going in front of him with the ḥarbah in his hand, and his daughter al-Banūqah went before him, between him and the chief of police, dressed as a young man with a black cloak and belt and Shāshiyyah, wearing a sword, and I saw that her breasts had raised the cloak by their swelling.

852. 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Nawfalī was a Qurashī, which is why he lived in that street.

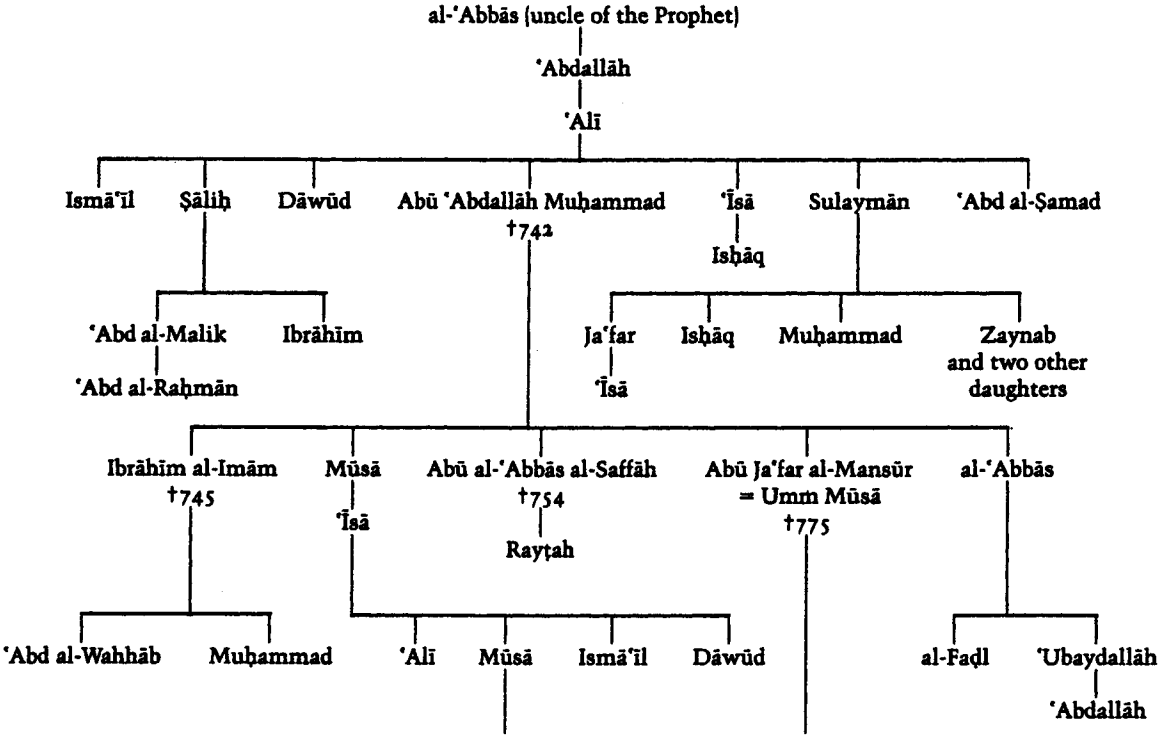
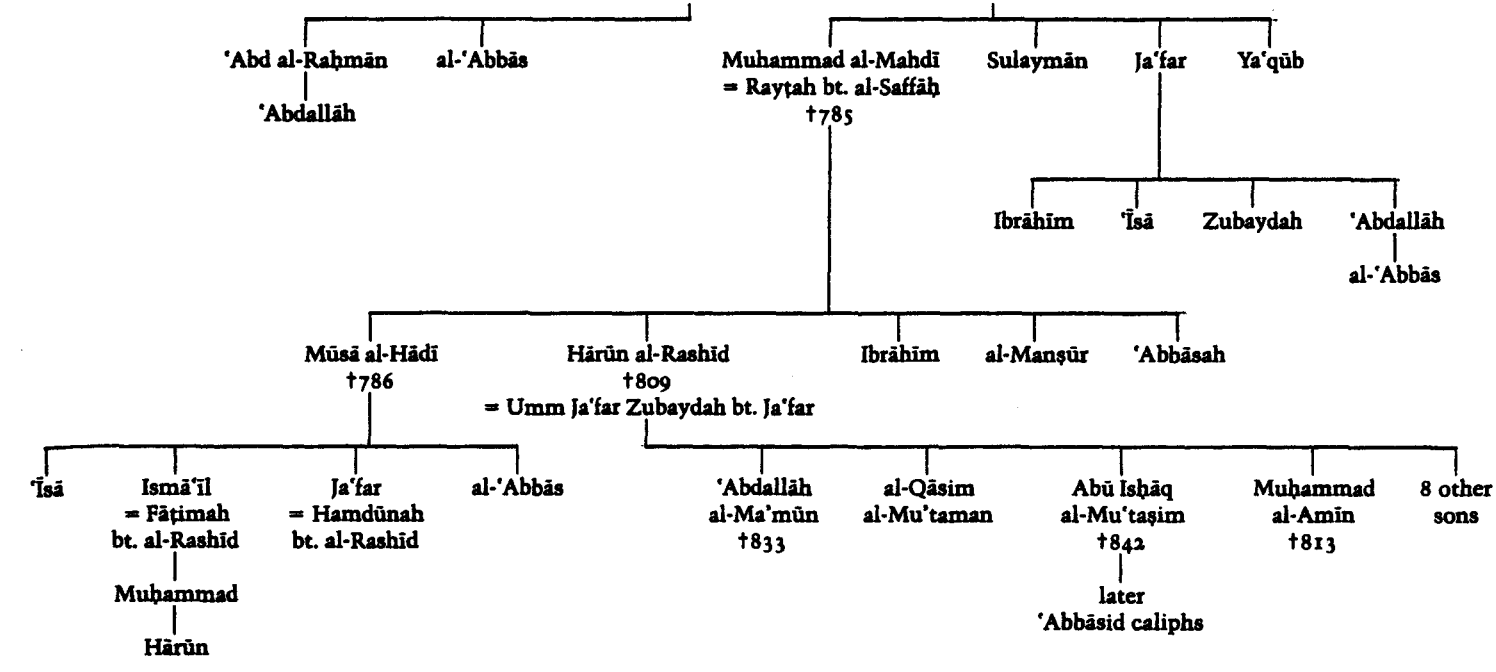
Al-Banūqah was brown, of beautiful stature, and charming and, when she died, in Baghdad, al-Mahdī showed grief the like of which has never been heard of. He sat for the people to offer their condolences, and he gave orders that no one should be kept away from him and large numbers of people came to offer their condolences and they made great efforts with their eloquence. Some of the people there were criticized by those with knowledge and literary education (adab), but they agreed that they had never heard of condolences more succinct or more eloquent than those of Shabīb b. Shaybah, who said, "O Commander of the Faithful, God is better for her than you, and the rewards of God are better for you than her, and I ask God not to make you sad and not to torment you."

According to Ṣabbāḥ b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—his father: When al-Banūqah, daughter of al-Mahdī, died, Shabīb b. Shaybah came in to him and said, "May God give you recompense, O Commander of the Faithful, for what you have been deprived of and follow you with fortitude. May He not wear out your courage by adversity or deprive you of the benefits of the reward of God, which is better for you than her, and the mercy of God, which is better for her than you. It is more worthy to be given patience for what cannot be returned."

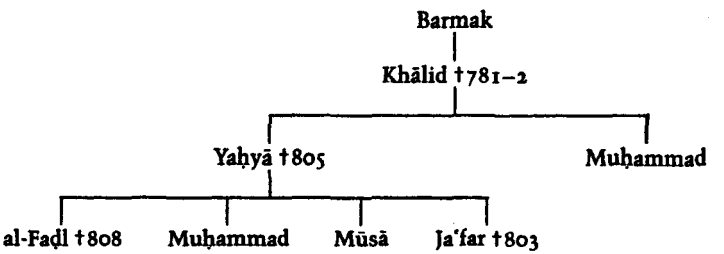
The History of al-Ṭabarī



VOLUME XXX



The ʿAbbāsid Caliphate in Equilibrium



TRANSLATED BY C. E. BOSWORTH

Genealogical Table of the ʿAbbāsids
(Special reference to those members of the family mentioned in this section of al-Ṭabarī's History)

'Abd al-Raḥmān
al-'Abbās
'Abdallāh
Muḥammad al-Mahdī
= Rayṭah bt. al-Saffāḥ
†785 Sulaymān
Ja'far
Ya'qūb
Ibrāhīm
'Īsā
Zubaydah
'Abdallāh
al-'Abbās
Mūsā al-Hādī
†786
Hārūn al-Rashīd
†809
= Umm Ja'far Zubaydah bt. Ja'far
Ibrāhīm
al-Manṣūr
'Abbāsah
'Īsā
Ismā'īl = Fāṭimah
bt. al-Rashīd
Muḥammad
Hārūn
Ja'far
= Hamdūnah
bt. al-Rashīd
al-'Abbās
'Abdallāh
al-Ma'mūn †833 al-Qāsim
al-Mu'taman
Abū Isḥāq
al-Mu'taṣim †842 later
'Abbāsid caliphs
Muḥammad
al-Amīn
†813
8 other sons

Genealogical Table of the Barmakī Family of Secretaries and Viziers (Special reference to those members of the family mentioned in this section of al-Ṭabarī's History)

Map 1
Egypt, Syria, Iraq, and the Eastern Provinces during the Reigns of al-Hadī and al-Rashid.

Map 2
The Arab–Byzantine Marches during This Period.

The Events of the Year

169 (cont'd)

(July 14, 785–July 2, 786)

The Succession of Mūsā al-Hādī as Caliph on His Father al-Mahdī's Death and His New Administrative Appointments [544]

In this year (169 [July 14, 785–July 2, 786]), allegiance was given to Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās as Caliph on the day of al-Mahdī's death[1] and when he was actually established in Jurjān making war on the [545] people of Ṭabaristān. Al-Mahdī died at Māsabadhān,[2] having present with him his son Hārūn and having left his mawlā al-Rabīʿ[3] behind in Baghdad as his deputy there.

---

1. I.e., on Thursday, the twenty-second of Muḥarram (August 4, 785). See S. Moscati, "Nuovi studi storici sul califatto di al-Mahdī," Orientalia, N.S. XV (1946), 171–2; EI[2] s.v. al-Mahdī (H. Kennedy). On al-Mahdī's arrangements for al-Hādī as his successor, see Moscati, op. cit., 158–61.

2. A district in the Zagros mountains on the borders of Luristān and Iraq. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam al-buldān, V, 41; G. Le Strange, The lands of the Eastern Caliphate, 202; P. Schwarz, Iran im Mittelalter, 464–70; EI[2] s.v. Luristān (V. Minorsky).

3. Al-Rabīʿ b. Yūnus b. Muḥammad, mawlā of al-Manṣūr and ḥājib or chamberlain under that Caliph and his two successors al-Mahdī and al-Hādī. See on him al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, VIII, 414, no. 4521; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-aʿyān, II, 294–9, tr. M. G. de Slane, I, 521–6; Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 17–18; D. Sourdel, Le vizirat ʿabbāside, I, 85–90, 118–21; P. Crone, Slaves on horses. The evolution of the Islamic polity, 193–4; EI[1] s.v. (A. S. Atiya).

It has been mentioned that, when al-Mahdī died, the mawlās[4] and army commanders rallied round his son Hārūn and told him, "If the army (at large) gets to know about al-Mahdī's death, we cannot guarantee[5] that a tumult will not occur. The wisest thing to do would be for his corpse to be borne away and for the return homewards to be proclaimed among the army, so that you may eventually bury him secretly in Baghdad." Hārūn replied, "Summon my father[6] Yaḥyā b. Khālid al-Barmakī to me." (Al-Mahdī had made Hārūn [nominal] governor of all the Western lands between al-Anbār and Ifrīqiyah and had ordered Yaḥyā b. Khālid to assume actual control over them. Hence all these administrative regions [a'māl] were under him, and he was in charge of all their government offices and was acting as Hārūn's deputy over the administrative duties in his charge until al-Mahdī's death.)[7]

He related: Yaḥyā b. Khālid went to Hārūn, and the latter said to Yaḥyā, "O my father, what is your opinion about what 'Umar b. Bazī',[8] Nuṣayr[9] and al-Mufaḍḍal[10] say?" He replied, "What in fact

---

4. The rise of the mawālī, a social group which included men of many races, is a feature of the early 'Abbāsid period, above all, of al-Manṣūr's reign, when we find a numerous and cohesive body of mawālī grouped around the Caliph's person, at the side of other groups such as the slaves [ghilmān, mamālīk, wuṣafā'], the eunuchs [khadam, etc.] and the Abnā' al-Dawla, i.e., the Arabs and Iranians of Khurāsān now largely settled in the capital Baghdad. Al-Manṣūr boasted to his son al-Mahdī at the end of his reign that he had gathered together round his person such a body of mawālī as had never been known before (Ṭabarī, III, 448). On this social and military role of the mawlās, see D. Ayalon, The military reforms of Caliph al-Mu'taṣim: their background and consequences, 1–3, 39–42; P. Forand, "The relation of the slave and the client to the master or patron in medieval Islam," IJMES, II (1971), 59–66; Ayalon, "Preliminary remarks on the Mamlūk military institution in Islam," War, technology and society in the Middle East, 48–50; Farouk Omar, "The composition of 'Abbāsid support in the early 'Abbāsid period 132/749–169/785," in 'Abbāsiyyāt. Studies in the history of the early 'Abbasids, 46–50; Crone, 66–8, 78; D. Pipes, Slave soldiers and Islam. The genesis of a military system, 107–9, 131 ff.

5. Following the preferred reading of n. b, lā na'manu.

6. The sources note that Hārūn was wont to call Yaḥyā his "father"; see, e.g., Jahshiyārī, K. al-Wuzarā' wa-al-kuttāb, 134; Abū al-Faḍl Bayhaqī, Ta'rīkh-i Mas'ūdī, 414; anon., K. al-'Uyūn wa-al-ḥadā'iq, 282, 285; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 88. As Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 490, and Ibn Khallikān, VI, 221, tr. IV, 104–5, explain, al-Mahdī had entrusted his son Hārūn to the suckling of Yaḥyā's womenfolk, so that the young prince and al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā were foster-brothers.

7. K. al-'Uyūn, 282; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 96.

8. Secretary and boon-companion of al-Mahdī, in charge of the office of account-have they said?" So Hārūn told him. Yaḥyā said, "I don't agree with that view." Hārūn replied, "Why?" Yaḥyā said, "Because this is an affair which cannot be concealed, and I do not feel confident that the army, when they get to know, will accompany his funeral bier and that they will not say, 'We won't let it go forward freely until we are given pay allotments for three years or more,' or that they will not make arbitrary claims [yataḥakkamū] and act wrongfully. My judgement is that his corpse—may God have mercy on him!—should be buried secretly here and that you should send Nuṣayr to the Commander of the Faithful al-Hādī[11] with the seal ring and the sceptre,[12] with congratulatory greetings (on his accession) and condolences (on his father's death). For Nuṣayr is in charge of the postal service [barīd]; hence no one will regard his departure with any suspicion, since he is head of the barīd for this district. I also consider that you should order the members of the army at present with you to be paid two hundred (dirhams) each and that you should proclaim among them the imminent return, because once they have got their hands on the money, their only thought will be of their families and their homeland, and nothing will deflect them from getting back to Baghdad."

He related: So Hārūn did this, and when the troops received their money, they all shouted, "To Baghdad, to Baghdad!" They [546] pressed forward in their haste to depart for Baghdad, urging the relinquishment of Māsabadhān. But when they reached Baghdad, and heard the news about the Caliph (i.e., of al-Mahdī's death and the succession of a new ruler), they went along to al-Rabī''s gate and set it on fire, demanding more pay allotments and raising a ing control [dīwān al-azimmah] for that Caliph and subsequently head of the chancery for al-Hādī. See Ṭabarī, III, 598; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 112–3, 121–3.

---

9. Eunuch slave [khādim, waṣīf] of al-Mahdī's. See Ṭabarī, III, 461, 536, 547.

10. Mawlā of al-Mahdī (Ṭabarī, III, 514, 558) and a eunuch (ibid., 562).

11. Bernard Lewis has noted that the honorific al-Hādī seems to mark the transition from titles with distinctly messianic connotations (al-Manṣūr, al-Mahdī) to purely regnal ones. See "The regnal titles of the first Abbasid caliphs," Dr. Zakir Husain presentation volume, 22 n. 30.

12. On the insignia of royalty, which included the Prophet's cloak [burdah], the sword [sayf], and the parasol [miẓallah], as well as the seal ring [khātam] and sceptre [qaḍīb], see Sourdel, "Questions de cérémoniale 'abbaside," REI, XXVIII (1960), 135; M. M. Ahsan, Social life under the Abbasids 170–289 AH, 786–902 AD, 52; EI[2] s.v. Marāsīm. 1. Under the Caliphate and the Fāṭimids (P. Sanders).

great clamor. Hārūn reached Baghdad. Al-Khayzurān then sent to al-Rabīʿ and Yaḥyā b. Khālid seeking their advice over this matter. Al-Rabīʿ did in fact go to her, but Yaḥyā would not go, knowing the intensity of Mūsā's resentment. He related: Money was gathered together until the army was paid two years' pay allotments, so that they then quietened down.[13] The news reached al-Hādī, and he then wrote a letter to al-Rabīʿ in which he threatened him with execution, but another one to Yaḥyā b. Khālid rewarding him with acts of beneficence and ordaining that he should retain his position as tutor and adviser of Hārūn just as he had always been and should retain charge of his affairs and administrative responsibilities exactly as previously.[14]

He related: Al-Rabīʿ, who used to have a great affection for Yaḥyā, used to trust him and used to rely on his judgement, then sent word to Yaḥyā b. Khālid, "O Abū ʿAlī, What do you think I should do, for I can't endure dragging iron fetters around (i.e., the prospect of prison)?" He replied, "I think that you should not move from where you are, but that you should send your son al-Faḍl[15] forward formally to meet his approaching party, bearing with him the most impressive amount of presents and precious objects that you can get together. I am very hopeful that he will not then come back without your being reassured against what you fear, if God so wills." He related: The mother of al-Faḍl, al-Rabīʿ's son, happened to be in a position to overhear their intimate conversation (i.e., of al-Rabīʿ and Yaḥyā), and she said to al-Rabīʿ, "By God, he has given you sound advice!" He said, "I would like to make my last testament to you (i.e., to Yaḥyā), for I don't know what might happen."

---

13. It is not explicit whether this payment (or eighteen months' pay, according to the next account, that from al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān) was in settlement of pay arrears or whether it was an extraordinary payment intended to secure a smooth succession for al-Hādī. If the latter, it became a dangerous precedent, for similar payments became common in the later third (ninth) and fourth (tenth) centuries. See *EI*² s.v. Māl al-bayʿa (Kennedy).

14. Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 386; Masʿūdī, Murūj al-dhahab, VI, 261–2 = ed. Pellat, § 2469; Ṭabarī, Persian tr. Balʿamī, tr. H. Zotenberg, IV, 446–7; K. al-ʿUyūn, 282–3; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 87–8; L. Bouvat, Les Barmécides d'après les historiens arabes et persans, 44–5; Nabia Abbott, Two queens of Baghdad, 72–9; Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 5–6.

15. Subsequently chief minister, if not actually with the title of vizier, to Hārūn and then al-Amīn, of whom he was a leading supporter. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 183–94; A. J. Chejne, "Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ—a politician of the early ʿAbbāsid period," IC, XXXVI (1962), 167–81; Crone, 194; *EI*² s.v. (Sourdel).

He[16] said, "I don't want to stand aside from you in anything, and I don't want to neglect anything which seems necessary, as long as you desire me to play some role in this or in any other matter; but associate with me in this design your son al-Faḍl and this woman, for she is indeed of sound judgment and worthy of being brought into this affair by you." Al-Rabī' accordingly did that and made his testament to (all three of) them.[17] [547]

Al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān[18] has related: When the army rose up against al-Rabī' in Baghdad, released the prisoners in his custody, and set on fire the gates of the houses belonging to him in the main square, al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad,[19] 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ[20] and Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm[21] witnessed all these events. Al-'Abbās realized that the troops would (only) be satisfied, their minds set at rest, and the dispersal of their tumultuous gathering brought about, if they were given their pay allotments. So he offered these to them, but they were still not satisfied and did not feel assured about the pay allotments which had been guaranteed to them, until Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm (personally) guaranteed them, and they were then content with his bond and dispersed. Muḥriz then fulfilled his promise to them over that, and they were given pay allotments for eighteen months, this being before Hārūn's arrival.[22]

---

16. I.e., Yaḥyā, following the reading fa-qāla envisaged in n. h and adopted in the Cairo text, VIII, 188, for the text's fa-qultu.

17. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 89.

18. Presumably the al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī also cited as a rāwī in Ṭabarī, III, 598 (below, 86).

19. I.e., the senior 'Abbāsid prince al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī (d. 186 [802]), younger brother of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, and owner of an extensive property to the west of the Round City in the island between the Greater and Lesser Ṣarāt Canals, named after him al-'Abbāsiyyah. See Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 377, 381; Le Strange, Baghdad under the Abbasid Caliphate, 142, 148; J. Lassner, The topography of Baghdad in the early Middle Ages, 75, 80, 188; idem, The shaping of 'Abbāsid rule, 240–1.

20. Also a grandson of 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās, brother of Ibrāhīm b. Ṣāliḥ and first cousin of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, and holder of many governorships until his death in 196 (811–12). See Ibn Qutaybah, 375, 384.

21. Abū al-Qāsim Muḥriz b. Ibrāhīm al-Jūbānī, participant in the 'Abbāsid Revolution as a lieutenant of Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb, a rāwī for Ṭabarī of events concerning Abū Muslim and an official with the functions of a quartermaster under al-Mahdī. See Ṭabarī, III, 1, 9, 46, 99, 461.

22. Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 6 n. 2, regards this variant account from al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān as less plausible than the first one emphasizing the roles of Yaḥyā and al-Rabī' in quelling the mutinous troops' outbreak in Baghdad.

When Hārūn in fact arrived, acting as the deputy for Mūsā al-Hādī and accompanied by al-Rabī' as a helper [wazīr] of his, he despatched delegations to the provincial main cities [amṣār], he announced to them the death of al-Mahdī, he required their oath of allegiance to Mūsā al-Hādī (in the first place) and then to himself as the next designated heir [walī al-'ahd] after him, and he got a firm grip of affairs in Baghdad (i.e., he took in hand its pacification).

(Previously to this), Nuṣayr the slave [al-waṣīf][23] had immediately set off from Māsabadhān to Jurjān with the news of the death of al-Mahdī and the giving of allegiance to al-Hādī. When Nuṣayr had reached al-Hādī, the latter had given the signal for departure and had forthwith set off by means of the barīd service,[24] as if he were a noble, swift horse, accompanied by Ibrāhīm (i.e., his brother) and Ja'far (i.e., his son) from his own family and by 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād al-Kātib, the head of his chancery, and Muḥammad b. Jamīl,[25] his secretary for military affairs, from among his administrative staff [al-wuzarā'].[26] Now, when he drew within sight of the City of Peace, a group of people from his own family and others came out to meet him. Al-Hādī had meanwhile been showing resentment towards al-Rabī' for what he had been doing, including his sending out delegations and his giving pay allotments to the army before al-Hādī's arrival. For his part, al-Rabī' had despatched his son al-Faḍl. He went to meet al-Hādī with all the presents prepared for him and came face-to-face with him at Hamadhān. Al-Hādī summoned him into his presence and [548] brought him close, and said to him, "How was my master (i.e., al-Rabī') when you left him?" Al-Faḍl then wrote back these words to his father. Al-Rabī' thereupon went forth to meet al-Hādī. The

23. This seems to be the correct rendering here of this—i.e., as a common noun; but it can also be a personal name of slaves, as with the Turkish military slave, the ḥājib Waṣīf, prominent in the events of the reigns of al-Mutawakkil and his successors.

24. In Jahshiyārī, 125, and Tha'ālibī, Laṭā'if al-ma'ārif, 131, tr. C. E. Bosworth, 104–5, it is recorded as noteworthy that al-Hādī was the first and only Caliph personally to use the barīd system.

25. Caliphal mawlā, subsequently governor of al-Baṣrah and Egypt for al-Rashīd. See Crone, 191.

26. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 117; and for 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Abī Laylā, who died shortly after this (Jahshiyārī, 127), ibid., I, 119–20.

latter reproached him gently, but al-Rabī' made his excuses and informed him of the reasons which had impelled him to behave thus. Al-Hādī accepted this apology, and appointed him vizier in place of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Abī Laylā, and added to his responsibilities the office of control of expenditure [al-zimām], which 'Umar b. Bazī' had until then exercised.[27] He appointed Muḥammad b. Jamīl over the financial department [dīwān al-kharāj] concerned with the two Iraqs (i.e., Mesopotamia and western Persia, 'Irāq 'Ajamī). He appointed 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād over the financial administration of Syria and adjoining lands. He confirmed 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān[28] as commander of his personal guard [ḥaras], adding to his responsibilities the department of the army [dīwān al-jund]. He appointed 'Abdallāh b. Mālik (al-Khuzā'ī)[29] as commander of the security police [shuraṭ] (in Baghdad) in place of 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim.[30] Finally, he entrusted the seal ring to the hands of 'Alī b. Yaqṭīn.[31]

Mūsā al-Hādī's arrival at Baghdad, at the time of his journey from Jurjān, was on the nineteenth of Ṣafar (August 31, 785) in this year.[32] It has been mentioned in this connection that he travelled from Jurjān to Baghdad in twenty days.[33] When he actually arrived in Baghdad, he established himself in the palace known as al-

27. On these administrative arrangements, see Jahshiyārī, 125; al-Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, II, 709; K. al-'Uyūn, 283; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 89; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 119.

28. Son of a deputy naqīb and dā'ī in Marw during the 'Abbāsid Revolution, who founded a leading Abnā' family in Baghdad; during al-Amīn's caliphate, he was one of the Caliph's most strenuous supporters, and died in battle against al-Ma'mūn's general Ṭāhir. See Crone, 178–9.

29. Son of one of the twelve naqībs, Mālik b. Haytham al-Khuzā'ī, from Khurāsān who participated in Abū Muslim's rising; 'Abdallāh eventually recovered favor under Hārūn, despite his support at this juncture for al-Hādī. See Crone, 181–2; Kennedy, The early Abbasid Caliphate. A political history, 80–1.

30. Read thus for the text's Ḥāzim. 'Abdallāh's father Khāzim b. Khuzaymah al-Tamīmī had been one of the deputy naqībs from Marw al-Rūdh in the 'Abbāsid Revolution, hence he stemmed from a prominent family of the Abnā'. See Crone, 180–1; Kennedy, 81–2.

31. On him, already earlier in life suspected of Shī'ī sympathies, see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 112, 120; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, ed. Pellat, Index, VII, 520. For all these administrative arrangements, see Abbott, 78–80; Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 17–18; Sourdel, Vizirat, II, 119–20.

32. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 447, has the date of the tenth of Ṣafar.

33. Cf. Tha'ālibī, loc. cit.

Khuld and stayed there for a month; then he moved to the Garden of Abū Jaʿfar and thence to ʿĪsābādh.[34]

In this year, al-Rabīʿ (b. Yūnus), the mawlā of Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr, perished.[35]

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Nawfalī[36] has mentioned that his father transmitted the information to him that Mūsā al-Hādī had a slave girl whom he prized greatly and who used to love him, this being at the time when he was in Jurjān on the occasion when al-Mahdī sent him thither. She composed some verses and wrote to him (with them) whilst he was staying in Jurjān, including the verse

O far-away one in a distant place, who has encamped in Jurjān!

He related: When Mūsā al-Hādī received the homage and he returned to Baghdad, his only thought was of her. He went into her presence, at a moment when she was singing her verses, and stayed with her all that day and night, before he showed himself to any of the people.[37]

Mūsā al-Hādī's Repression of the Dualist Infidels

In this year, Mūsā sought out with severity the dualist infidels
[549] [zanādiqah], and during it killed a considerable number of them.[38]

34. The palace built by al-Mahdī for his son ʿĪsā as a pleasure resort, in the eastern part of Baghdad (cf. Ṭabarī, III, 517). See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 172–3; Le Strange, Baghdad, 194; Abbott, 85–6; Lassner, Topography, 194.

35. Al-Rabīʿ had not remained long in al-Hādī's favor, having lost all his offices except control of the zimām (Ṭabarī, III, 598); certain sources, e.g., Ṭabarī, III, 597–8 (below, 85–86), and Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 265–6 = ed. Pellat, § 2473, state that the Caliph plotted to kill his minister. See Abbott, 86–7; Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 17–18.

36. Rāwī much cited by Ṭabarī for the period from al-Manṣūr to Hārūn, by Masʿūdī (Murūj, ed. Pellat, Index, VII, 517) and also by Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, Būlāq, XVII, 29 = Cairo, XVIII, 209. For his full nasab, see Ṭabarī, III, 563 (below, 32).

37. Cf. Abbott, 85.

38. For a general study of this persecution of the zindīqs, comprising mainly Manichaean dualists but probably also Mazdakites and other remnants of the many once-flourishing faiths and sects of Mesopotamia, see G. Vajda, "Les zindīqs en pays d'Islam au début de la période abbaside," RSO, XVII (1938), 173–229; F. Gabrieli, "La «zandaqa» au Iᵉʳ siècle abbasside," L'élaboration de l'Islam, Paris 1961, 23–38; F. Omar, "Some observations on the reign of the ʿAbbāsid caliph al-Mahdī 775–785 A.D.," in ʿAbbāsiyyāt, 89–93; S. N. C. Lieu, Manichaeism in the

Among those who were executed was Yazdān b. Bādhān, the secretary of Yaqṭīn (b. Mūsā)[39] and of the latter's son ʿAlī b. Yaqṭīn, who was a native of al-Nahrawān.[40] It has been mentioned concerning him that he made the Pilgrimage. He looked at the people tripping round performing the circumambulation of the Kaʿbah, and said, "I can only compare them with oxen trampling round a threshing-floor!" Al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaddād al-Aʿmā addressed to him (i.e., to al-Hādī) the verse,

O one whom God has made His trustee over His creation, and heir of the Kaʿbah and the (Prophet's) pulpit!
What do you think about an unbeliever who compares the Kaʿbah with a threshing-floor,
And who makes the people, when they perform the running [saʿy], into asses trampling wheat and corn?[41]

Thereupon, Mūsā killed and then gibbeted him. Subsequently, the wooden scaffolding on which he was gibbeted fell down on top of a pilgrim and killed both him and his ass.[42] Also executed was Yaʿqūb b. al-Faḍl from among the Hāshimites.

It has been mentioned from ʿAlī b. Muḥammad (b. Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh) al-Hāshimī,[43] who said: There were brought before al-Mahdī, as dualist infidels and in two separate court sessions, a son of Dāwūd b. ʿAlī[44] and Yaʿqūb b. al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b.

---

later Roman empire and medieval China. A historical survey, Manchester 1985, 83–4; EI[1] s.v. Zindīḳ (L. Massignon). For al-Hādī's measures in particular, see Vajda, 186–7; Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 7–8.

39. Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā is mentioned at several points in the narratives of Yaʿqūbī and Ṭabarī, from the beginning of al-Manṣūr's reign onwards, as a trusted servant and commander for the Caliphs, and was presumably one of the Abnāʾ. He held a land grant [qaṭīʿah] along the Ṣarāt Canal to the south of the Round City; see Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 243, tr. G. Wiet, 21. His son ʿUbayd is also mentioned as fighting in the government forces at Fakhkh; Ṭabarī, III, 562 (below, 30–31).

40. The name of the canal, town and district to the east of Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 324–7; Le Strange, Lands, 59–61.

41. Dawsar, according to R. P. A. Dozy, Supplément, I, 442a, Aegylops ovata, or in the form dawshar, ibid., I, 475b, corn, Canary grain.

42. Cf. al-Muṭahhar al-Maqdisī, K. al-Badʾ wa-al-taʾrīkh, VI, 100; Vajda, 186.

43. Described more specifically in Ṭabarī, III, 360, as "al-ʿAbbāsī," possibly the grandson of the Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh who was governor of Mecca in 214/829.

44. Paternal uncle of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, most respected of the ʿumūmah in the early decades of ʿAbbāsid rule and governor of al-Kūfah for al-Saffāḥ. See Ibn Qutaybah, 216, 372, 374; Lassner, The shaping of ʿAbbāsid rule, 146 and Appendix E.

ʿAbbās b. Rabīʿah b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib.[45] Al-Mahdī said the same words to each of them after both of them had affirmed to him their infidel beliefs. As for Yaʿqūb b. al-Faḍl, he said to the Caliph, "I affirm my beliefs privately between the two of us, but I refuse to proclaim them publicly, even though you were to cut me into little pieces with shears." Al-Mahdī said to him, "Woe upon you! Even though the heavens were to be laid open for you and the affair were as you say, you would still have had ineluctably to show family solidarity [taʿaṣṣaba] with Muḥammad![46] If it were not for Muḥammad, who would you be? Would you be anyone but an ordinary person? By God, if it were not for the fact that I have laid upon myself, before God, a charge when He invested me with this office (i.e., with the caliphate) that I would never kill a Hāshimite, [550] I would not have argued with you like this but would have killed you outright!" Then he turned to Mūsā al-Hādī and said, "O Mūsā, I solemnly adjure you, by my own right (to this office), that if you succeed to this position of authority after me, you do not engage in disputation with these two for a single moment!"

The son of Dāwūd b. ʿAlī died in prison before al-Mahdī's own death. As for Yaʿqūb, he remained (in prison) until al-Mahdī died and Mūsā arrived from Jurjān. Immediately he entered (Baghdad), he remembered al-Mahdī's injunction, and he despatched to Yaʿqūb someone who threw a mattress over him; several persons were then set down on top of him till he suffocated to death.[47] Al-Hādī's attention was then diverted from Yaʿqūb by the ceremony of homage to himself as ruler and by the need to make firm his caliphal power. All this happened on an extremely hot day. Yaʿqūb's corpse stayed there until the early part of the night had elapsed, but then people reported to Mūsā, "O Commander of the Faithful, Yaʿqūb's body has begun to swell up and stink." The Caliph said, "Send it along to his brother Isḥāq b. al-Faḍl and tell him that Yaʿqūb has

45. Hence, a direct descendant of a paternal uncle of the Prophet.

46. I.e., as a Hāshimite you cannot gainsay your genealogical connection with the Prophet. The Cairo edition, VIII, 190, has for taʿaṣṣaba [= tataʿaṣṣaba], taghḍaba (li-Muḥammad) "you would still have to show anger towards Muḥammad."

47. Obviously to avoid the impiety and scandal of openly shedding Hāshimite blood.

died in prison." Ya'qūb's corpse was put in a skiff [zawraq][48] and brought to Isḥāq. The latter took a look, and it was clear that there was no way of washing the corpse, so he buried Ya'qūb immediately in a garden of his. He then went off in the morning and sent a message to the Hāshimites informing them about Ya'qūb's death and summoning them to his obsequies. He gave orders for a wooden beam to be procured, and this was then carved into the rough shape of a man. It was then swathed in cotton bands and Isḥāq had it enshrouded. Then he had it mounted on a funeral bier, and none of those present at the ceremony had any idea that the corpse was in fact an artificial substitute. Ya'qūb left behind various issue of his loins, comprising 'Abd al-Raḥmān, al-Faḍl, Arwā and Fāṭimah. In regard to Fāṭimah, she was found to be pregnant by her father, and she herself confessed this.[49]

'Alī b. Muḥammad continued to relate: My father related: Fāṭimah and Ya'qūb b. al-Faḍl's wife, who was not herself a Hāshimite and who was called Khadījah, were brought into al-Hādī's presence, or into al-Mahdī's presence at an early date. They both affirmed their adherence to dualist beliefs, and Fāṭimah acknowledged that she was pregnant by her father. He sent the two of them to Rayṭah bt. Abī al-'Abbās.[50] She saw that they both had their eyelids darkened with kohl and their hands and hair dyed with henna, and she reproached them strongly, being particularly voluble against the daughter (i.e., Fāṭimah). The latter protested, "He compelled me (to submit to him)." Rayṭah, however, replied, "What is the meaning, then, of this dyestuff, this kohl and this air of gaiety, if you were compelled?" and she cursed them both. [551]

He related: I was informed that they were both reduced to an extremity of fear, and so died of this fear; they were beaten on the head with a thing called the ru'būb,[51] were stricken with terror by 48. See A. Mez, The renaissance of Islam, tr. Khuda Bakhsh and D. S. Margoliouth, 487; H. Kindermann, "Schiff" im Arabischen, 37–8; Darwīsh al-Nukhaylī, al-Sufun al-islāmiyya, 59–62: a small river craft used in Iraq.

49. Cf. Abbott, 40. Accusations of incest, like those of unnatural vice, are clichés of heresy trials as much in the Islamic world as in other cultures.

50. Daughter of al-Saffāḥ and the wife of her own first cousin al-Mahdī. See Abbott, 25, 39–40; Kaḥḥālah, A'lam al-nisā', I, 479.

51. Literally, "that which instills terror, ra'b," clearly some kind of club; cf. Glossarium, p. CCLXV.

it and thus died. As for Arwā, she survived; her paternal cousin al-Faḍl b. Ismā'īl b. al-Faḍl, a man of unimpeachably orthodox religion, married her.[52]

In this year, Windā(d)hurmuz, the ruler of Ṭabaristān, came to Mūsā under a guarantee of safety; the Caliph rewarded him munificently and sent him back to Ṭabaristān.[53]

The Remainder of the Events of This Year

These included the revolt of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan[54] b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, the one killed at Fakhkh.[55]

The Revolt and Killing of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī

It has been mentioned from Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Khwārazmī[56] that he related: Between al-Mahdī's death and al-Hādī's assump-

---

52. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 89; Vajda, 186–7; Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 7–8; Omar, in 'Abbāsiyyāt, 91. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 447–53, devotes a lengthy, special section to zandaqah under al-Hādī, with many novel details.

53. See on Windādhurmuz and his reign in Ṭabaristān, Ibn Isfandiyār, Ta'rīkh-i Ṭabaristān, tr. E. G. Browne, 125–32; Moscati, "Studi storici sul califatto di al-Mahdī," 347–50; idem, "Le califat d'al-Hādī," 8–9; W. Madelung, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 202. For the name Wi/andād Hurmuz, see Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 369–70.

54. Hence, grandson of the Ḥasanid known as al-Ḥasan al-Muthallath and great-grandson of al-Ḥasan al-Muthannā. See K. Öhrnberg, The offspring of Fāṭima. Dispersal and ramification, Table 16.

55. The primary sources for this episode of yet another futile 'Alid rebellion are: Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 704; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 488; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 266–8 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2474–5; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil al-Ṭālibiyyīn, 285–6, 289–307; Azdī, Ta'rīkh al-Mawṣil, 258–9; K. al-'Uyūn, 284–5; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 90–4; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, K. al-Fakhrī, 172–3, tr. C. E J. Whitting, 187; Fāsī, in Die Chroniken der Stadt Mekka, ed. and tr. F. Wustenfeld, II, 184–5; Nahrawālī, in ibid., III, 212–13. The main secondary sources are: F. Wüstenfeld, Chroniken ... IV. Geschichte der Stadt Mekka nach den arabischen Chroniken bearbeitet, 178–9; Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 9–14; C. Van Arendonck, Les débuts de l'Imāmat Zaidite au Yemen, 62–5; L. Veccia Vaglieri, "Divagazioni su due rivolte alidi," A Francesco Gabrieli. Studi orientalistici offerti nel sessantesimo compleanno ..., 315–6, 320–2, 335–9, 341–50; Y. Marquet, "Le Sī'isme au IX^e^ siècle à travers l'histoire de Ya'qūbī," Arabica, XIX (1972), 109; Kennedy, 109–10; EI² s.v. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, Ṣāḥib Fakhkh (Veccia Vaglieri).

On the place Fakhkh, one of the wadis running down into Mecca from the direction of the Juddah and Tan'īm roads, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 237–8; Bakrī, Mu'jam mā sta'jam, III, 1014–15; Azraqī, Akhbar Makkah, 282, 298.

56. Celebrated mathematician and astronomer, who worked in al-Ma'mūn's tion of the caliphate, there were eight days. He related: The news (i.e., of al-Mahdī's death) reached him when he was in Jurjān, and up to the point when he entered the City of Peace, up to al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan's revolt, and (finally) up to the killing of al-Ḥusayn, was a period of nine months and eighteen days.

Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ[57] has mentioned that Abū Ḥafṣ al-Sulamī transmitted the information to him as follows. He related: Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī[58] was governor of Medina. When al-Mahdī died and Mūsā was appointed Caliph, Isḥāq set off on a mission to Mūsā in Iraq, leaving behind as his deputy in Medina ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.[59] Al-Faḍl [552]
b. Isḥāq (b. Sulaymān) al-Hāshimī[60] has mentioned that Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī, when he was in charge of Medina, asked al-Hādī to release him from his duties and to permit him to come to Baghdad. Al-Hādī duly relieved him of his duties and appointed as governor in his stead ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. He has likewise mentioned that the reason behind al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan's revolt was that ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, when he took over the governorship of Medina—as al-Ḥusayn b. Muḥammad has mentioned on the authority of Abū Ḥafṣ al-Sulamī—arrested Abū al-Zift al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan,[61] Muslim b. Jundub the poet of Hudhayl,[62] and ʿUmar b. Sallām, a mawlā of the house of ʿUmar, reign and died ca. 232 (846–7). See Brockelmann, GAL, I², 239–40, S I, 381–2; Sezgin, GAS, V, 228–41, VI, 140–3; *EI*² s.v. (J. Vernet).

---

57. Unidentified, but not the Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Dīnār al-Madanī, narrator of historical traditions, who had died in 168/784; see GAS, I, 284.

58. First cousin of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr; hence, a scion of the ʿumūmah, and governor of Medina 167–9 (784–6); see Ibn Qutaybah, 374.

59. Descendant of the Caliph ʿUmar I and brother of the noted ascetic ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz feared and respected by Hārūn al-Rashīd; see Ṭabarī, III, 750–1 (below, 316–18).

60. Probably the son of the ʿAbbāsid prince Isḥāq b. Sulaymān who held various governorships under Hārūn.

61. I.e., the son of the Ḥasanid rebel against al-Manṣūr killed at Medina in 145 (762), al-Nafs al-Zakiyyah. See Öhrnberg, Table 7; *EI*¹ s.v. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh (F. Buhl).

62. The reference to this person is rather enigmatic. Abū ʿAbdallāh Muslim b. Jundub (or Jundab) al-Hudhalī is mentioned by Jāḥiẓ as a judge [qāḍī] and popular preacher [qāṣṣ] of the Prophet's Mosque at Medina (al-Bayān wa-al-tabyīn, I, 367–8), who had been tutor to the Caliph ʿUmar II b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz and who had himself died in 106 (724–5). This death date rules out our poet of the same unusual name; one wonders whether Ṭabarī's rāwī confused a possibly similar name with that of the earlier figure.

when they were engaged in a wine-drinking session which they had organized. He gave orders, and they were beaten en masse; and he gave further commands regarding them, and ropes were placed round their necks and they were paraded around Medina. Protests were raised regarding them, and al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī went along to ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. He spoke with him, and said, "They should not be subjected to this; you have had them beaten when you had no right to have them beaten, since the scholars of Iraq don't see any harm in wine-drinking;[63] so why are you having them paraded publicly?"[64] ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz accordingly sent a messenger after them—they having at this point reached the paved open place round the Prophet's Mosque [al-balāṭ][65]—and brought them back, ordering that they should be imprisoned instead. They were in jail for a day and a night, and then some people spoke up on their behalf and he released them all. They were required to report for inspection, but al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad was found to be missing, al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī being surety for his appearance.

Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ related: Also, ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad al-Anṣārī transmitted the information to me that al-ʿUmarī (sc. the governor ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz) had required various people to act as sureties for other people in the community, and al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan and Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan[66] both stood as guarantors for al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan; the latter had married a freedwoman [mawlāt] of theirs called

63. Alluding to the Ḥanafīs' allowing the drinking of nabīdh or date wine in moderation and for medicinal purposes. See *EI*² s.v. Khamr. 1. Juridical aspects (A. J. Wensinck).

64. According to Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 295, the Hāshimites objected to the ignominious treatment of members of their clan.

65. See Bakrī, I, 271, and Samhūdī, Wafāʾ al-wafāʾ, II, 734–40, where it emerges that this balāṭ (here, from Greek plateia "street" rather than in the sense of "court [in a palace]" from palation, see S. Fraenkel, Die aramäischen Fremdwörter im Arabischen, 28–9, 281), was originally the walkway to the mosque, paved with stones by the governor Marwān b. al-Ḥakam on the Caliph Muʿāwiya's orders, but then extended by him to the whole area stretching to the market. See also Ṭabarī, III, 555 (below, 20) for another balāṭ in Medina.

66. Yaḥyā was a half-brother on his father's side to al-Nafs al-Zakiyyah. Like his brother Idrīs, he escaped from the field of Fakhkh and, allegedly with the connivance of the Barmakī al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā, escaped and eventually reached Daylam, where he subsequently rebelled in 176 (792) against Hārūn al-Rashīd. See Ṭabarī, III, 612–24, 669–72, and the sources detailed below, 115–16, n. 440.

Sawdā', daughter of Abū Layth, the mawlā of 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥasan, and he used to visit her and stay with her. He failed to turn up for inspection on the Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday. Al- [553]
'Umarī's deputy[67] carried out the inspection on the Friday evening, and then he got hold of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī and Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh and interrogated them about al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad; he upbraided them somewhat harshly for a while, and then went back to al-'Umarī and informed him of what had happened concerning them, saying, "May God guide you uprightly! Al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad has been missing for three (nights)!" Al-'Umarī replied, "Bring me al-Ḥusayn and Yaḥyā." He went away and summoned them. When they came into al-'Umarī's presence, he said to them, "Where's al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad?" They replied, "By God, we don't know; he was absent from us on Wednesday, then Thursday came along and we received news that he was ill; and then we were under the impression that there was no inspection required today."[68] But 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz spoke to them very harshly; hence, Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh gave his oath that he would not sleep until either he came back to him with the missing man or he would knock on the door of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz's house with the news that he had indeed brought al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad back to him.

When they went out together, al-Ḥusayn said to Yaḥyā, "God is above all imperfection! Whatever impelled you to promise this? Where are you going to find Ḥasan?[69] You have given your oath to him for something which is impossible for you to perform!" Yaḥyā replied, "I have only sworn an oath in regard to Ḥasan." Al-Ḥusayn said, "God is above all imperfection! What thing, then, have you sworn an oath about?" Yaḥyā replied, "By God, may I not sleep until I beat on the door of his house (i.e., al-'Umarī's) with the sword!" He related: Ḥusayn said, "(If we do that,) we shall ruin the arrangements which we made with our supporters (i.e., by antici-

67. According to Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 295, the man thus deputed was both a mawlā and a weaver, both socially despised statuses.

68. I.e., because it was Friday, the day of congregational worship and holiday.

69. There does not seem to be any rationale behind the fact that, whilst the names al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn normally appear with the definite article, on occasion this is absent.

pating the planned revolt)." Yaḥyā replied, "What has happened has happened, and there is no going back on it."

According to what they have mentioned, they had indeed made a mutual agreement to raise the standard of revolt at Minā or in Mecca itself during the season of the Pilgrimage. A group of the people of al-Kūfah, who were among their partisans and who had given their oath of allegiance to Ḥusayn, had been lying in wait inside a certain house.[70] They now went off, and made their plans for action during the evening and night, until, when it was the latter part of the night, they sallied forth in revolt. Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh went along until he beat on the gate of the residential complex [dār] of Marwān (b. al-Ḥakam)[71] in order to get at al-ʿUmarī, but did not find him there. Then he went along to al-ʿUmarī's house in [554] the residential complex of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar,[72] but did not find him there either; he had hidden from them.

The rebels went along, and then they surged into the mosque, until when the call for the morning worship was given to the people,[73] al-Ḥusayn took his seat in the pulpit, wearing a white turban.[74] The people began to come into the mosque, but when

---

70. As now emerges, the revolt had been previously planned in concert with Shīʿī sympathizers in al-Kūfah, if not in a very detailed fashion, and cannot have been caused by the governor ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz's rigor against the wine drinkers (a detail which, understandably, the Shīʿī sources do not dwell upon). Moscati states, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 9–10, that discontent had been exacerbated among the Shīʿah by al-Hādī's abandonment of al-Mahdī's policy of conciliating the ʿAlids and of allotting to them subsidies, mentioned by Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 488, and Ṭabarī, III, 563, so that various of the Shīʿah rallied round al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī as their natural leader and planned the revolt. In fact, there cannot have been sufficient interval of time for the implications of al-Hādī's change of policy to have sunk into the minds of Shīʿī sympathizers, and Veccia Vaglieri notes (*EI*² s.v. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī) that there were signs that al-Mahdī himself was latterly abandoning his earlier pro-Shīʿī attitudes, and al-Hādī was simply continuing these recent trends. It is very probable that both Caliphs had become exasperated by al-Ḥusayn's irresponsibility in financial matters and his fecklessness; see Van Arendonck, Les débuts de l'Imāmat Zaidite, 62–3, and Ṭabarī, III, 563 (below, 33, and n. 137).

71. See for this, Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Marāghī, Taḥqīq al-nuṣraḥ, 80; Samhūdī, II, 720–1. It adjoined the Prophet's Mosque, and on the authority of ʿUmar b. Shabbah, was purchased by the state and used as a gubernatorial residence.

72. Marāghi, 73. According to Samhūdī, II, 718–19, this was the first house built adjoining the Prophet's Mosque when Muḥammad allotted plots of land there for houses, and was connected to the Mosque by a private passage [khūkhah].

73. According to Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 297, the rebels compelled the muezzin at swordpoint to make the adhān in the Shīʿī wording.

74. In the early ʿAbbāsid period, as a contrast to ʿAbbāsid black, white seems to they saw the rebels, they turned back without performing the worship. But when al-Ḥusayn had performed the morning worship, people began to come to him and to give him their allegiance on the basis of the Book of God and the Sunnah of His Prophet, for "the one pleasing (to God) [al-murtaḍā] from the house of Muḥammad."[75]

(At this point,) there appeared Khālid al-Barbarī,[76] who was at this time in charge of the state domains [al-ṣawāfī] at Medina and was the commander of a force of two hundred soldiers from the regular forces stationed at Medina. He advanced with his troops, and al-'Umarī came along, together with Wazīr b. Isḥāq al-Azraq and Muḥammad b. Wāqid al-Sharawī, and with a considerable number of persons, including al-Ḥusayn b. Ja'far b. al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḥusayn[77] who was mounted upon an ass. Khālid al-Barbarī rushed into the courtyard of the mosque [al-raḥbah], having put on two coats of mail, with the sword in his hand and a club slung round his waist, his sword being unsheathed, and he was shouting at Ḥusayn, "I am a stout warrior [kaskās]![78] May God strike me dead if I do not succeed in killing you!" He charged them until he drew near to their ranks. The two sons of 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan, Yaḥyā and Idrīs,[79] blocked his path. Yaḥyā struck him on the nasal of his helmet, and then cut through the helmet and cut off his nose. His eyes were filled with blood and he was unable to see. He was driven down to his knees and began to beat about with his sword to protect himself, being all this time unable to see. Idrīs have become the favored color of a wide spectrum of opposition movements, from pro-Umayyad Syrian ones to 'Alid ones, as here, and to heterodox Persian groups like the Mubayyiḍah or Ispīdh-jamāgān of Muqanna' in Transoxania. See Farouk Omar, "The significance of the colours of banners in the early 'Abbāsid period," in 'Abbāsiyyāt, 149–50.

---

75. It thus seems that al-Ḥusayn was formally claiming the caliphate and imāmate, an impression strengthened by the apparent adoption of al-Murtaḍā as a laqab or honorific.

76. As Moscati notes, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 11 n. 1, the sources give numerous variant forms of this name.

77. Presumably a descendant of the Third Imām al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

78. According to WbKAS, I, 168b, this means "a stocky but tough person," as in Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-'Arab[1], VIII, 80: al-qaṣīr al-ghalīẓ.

79. Brother of al-Nafs al-Zakiyyah, hence, uncle to al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, and after his escape from the débâcle of Fakhkh—presumably having mingled with the pilgrims in Mecca to escape detection—founder of the Idrīsid dynasty of Sharīfs in Morocco (172–314 [789–926]). See Ibn Qutaybah, 213; Ṭabarī, III, 561, 562 (below, 28–30, 31); Öhrnberg, Table 30; EI[2] s.v. Idrīs I (al-Akbar) (D. Eustache).

came up round him from the rear and struck him, knocking him to the ground, and Yaḥyā and Idrīs hacked at him with their swords from above until they finally killed him. Their companions fell upon Khālid's two mailed coats; they pulled them off his corpse and seized his sword and club. They brought along his body, and then orders were given that it should be dragged into the paved [555] open space [al-balāṭ]. They launched an attack on Khālid's forces, and the latter took to flight. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad related: All this I report as an eyewitness.

ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad has mentioned that Khālid struck Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh and cut through his headdress. The blow reached[80] as far as Yaḥyā's hand and left its mark there. Yaḥyā struck Khālid in the face, and a one-eyed man from the people of al-Jazīrah came round and fell upon him from behind; he struck him on his legs, and they hit Khālid by turns with their swords and thus killed him. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad has related: The wearers of black [al-musawwidah, sc. the partisans of the ʿAbbāsids] went into the mosque to hold it against the ʿAlid forces, when al-Ḥusayn b. Jaʿfar appeared mounted on his ass, but the wearers of white [al-mubayyiḍah, sc. the partisans of the ʿAlids] launched an attack and drove them out. Al-Ḥusayn (b. ʿAlī) shouted to them, "Treat the shaykh gently!" meaning al-Ḥusayn b. Jaʿfar. The public treasury was plundered, and around ten thousand dīnārs, which remained from the soldiers' salaries [ʿaṭā'],[81] seized from it. It has been said that the latter amounted (originally) to seventy thousand dīnārs which ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik had sent along to be distributed as subsidies for the Khuzāʿah.[82]

He related: The combatants [al-nās] dispersed, and the people of Medina locked their doors against them. The next morning, the ʿAlid partisans gathered together, and the supporters of the ʿAbbāsids came together and fought with them in the paved open space [balāṭ] which lies between the courtyard before al-Faḍl's house and al-Zawrā'.[83] The wearers of black began to attack the 80. Following n. a, balaghat, and the Cairo text, VIII, 194, waṣalat, for the text's khalaʿat.

81. Fāsī, Shifā' al-gharām, in Die Chroniken der Stadt Mekka, II, 184.

82. The powerful Ḥijāzī tribe of the region around Mecca, once themselves masters of the city and, subsequently, close allies of Quraysh; see *EI*² s.v. (M. J. Kister).

83. A section of the market quarter of the city; see Samhūdī, IV, 1228–9.

wearers of white until they drove them into the courtyard before al-Faḍl's house, and then the wearers of white counterattacked until they drove them back[84] to al-Zawrā'. Both sides suffered many casualties through wounds. They fought until midday and then dispersed. When it was towards the end of daylight on the second day, that being Sunday, the news arrived that Mubārak al-Turkī was encamping at the Well of al-Muṭṭalib.[85] The supporters of the 'Abbāsids were roused into activity again. They went out to him and persuaded him to come (into the town). So he came the next morning until he reached al-Thaniyyah.[86] The 'Abbāsid partisans and those who were eager to fight rallied round him. The two sides fought together extremely fiercely in the paved open space until midday, and then dispersed. The partisans of the 'Alids withdrew to the mosque, and those of the 'Abbāsids to Mubārak al-Turkī, to the house of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz at al-Thaniyyah in [556] order to shelter there from the noonday heat. He made an undertaking with his supporters to return later, towards evening (i.e., to fight). But when they showed no interest in him, he mounted his riding beasts and rode away. The 'Abbāsid partisans did in fact come back later, towards evening, but did not find him. So (they returned to the fray and) fought their opponents in a somewhat desultory fashion till sunset, and then they dispersed.

Ḥusayn and his partisans remained for several days, equipping themselves with travelling supplies. Their stay in Medina amounted to eleven days. He then departed on the twenty-fourth of Dhū al-Qa'dah, six days from its end (May 28, 786).[87] When

84. Following the preferred reading of n. c, yablaghū; the Cairo text, VIII, 195, has yublagha bihim "they were driven back."

85. See Samhūdī, IV, 1141–2. It is said to have lain seven or five miles from Medina and to have been named after al-Muṭṭalib b. 'Abdallāh al-Makhzūmī.

86. A frequent toponym in the area of Medina (thaniyyah "mountain road, track, which climbs over a height," see Mubarrad, Kāmil, I, 384), one of the best-known being the Thaniyyat al-Wadā' on the left of the road from Syria coming into the city. See Marāghī, 144, and Samhūdī, IV, 1166–72, who mentions, however, other thanāyā, such as that of al-Sharīd, IV, 1066–7.

87. The rebels had obviously failed to secure any appreciable part of the city and had been compelled to "hole up" in the mosque. As Iṣfahānī concedes, Maqātil, 297–8, two of the Ṭālibids of Medina refused to join the rising, al-Ḥasan b. Ja'far b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan and Mūsā al-Kāẓim b. Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, the Seventh Imām of the Shī'ah (cf. EI[1] s.v. [R. Strothmann]), who told al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī that his revolt was doomed to failure. Iṣfahānī also adds, ibid., 299, that al-Ḥusayn's force numbered about 300 men, apparently including some local Bedouin; see Van Arendonck, 64.

they left Medina, the muezzins came back; they made the call to worship, and the people went back into the mosque. They found there discarded bones which the 'Alids had been eating and other traces of their stay, and they began to bring down God's curses upon them, "May God deal with them as He thinks fit!"

Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ related: Nuṣayr b. 'Abdallāh b. Ibrāhīm al-Jumaḥī transmitted the information to me that when Ḥusayn reached the marketplace, on his way to Mecca, he turned towards the people of Medina and said, "May God not replace your losses with anything good!" But the people and the market traders retorted, "On the contrary, may God not replace your losses with anything good, and may He never bring you back (here)!" For Ḥusayn's followers had been defecating in the mosque and had filled it with filth and urine; hence, when they left, the people washed down the mosque.[88]

He related: The son of 'Abdallāh b. Ibrāhīm transmitted the information to me, saying: Al-Ḥusayn's partisans took the coverings of the mosque and used them as robes for themselves. He related: Al-Ḥusayn's partisans proclaimed in Mecca, "Every slave who comes to us is free!" The slaves came to him, and one slave belonging to my father came to him and then joined his side. When al-Ḥusayn resolved on departure, my father went to him and spoke with him. He said to al-Ḥusayn, "You have made approaches to slaves whom you did not yourself own, and then you have freed them; on what grounds do you consider this lawful?" Ḥusayn therefore said to his companions, "Take him along with you, and whichever slave he recognizes, hand that slave back to him (i.e., to the narrator's father)." So they went off in company with him, and he recovered his slave boy [ghulām] and two (other) slave boys belonging to neighbors of ours.[89]

---

88. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 92. Here as elsewhere, Ṭabarī is careful to note the swinish habits of the Shī'ī followers, doubtless to emphasize their plebeian nature.

89. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Fāsī, 184–5; Pipes, 134. Veccia Vaglieri, EI[2] s.v. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī, regards this attempted emancipation of the slaves at Mecca, plus the sharing-out of the money found in the state treasury at Medina, as manifestations of the Zaydī policy of greater social justice as being incumbent upon the Imām in return for the people's bay'ah. Cf. also the appeal during the 'Alid revolt in Mecca in 200 (816) in the name of the Ḥusaynid Muḥammad b. Ja'far al-Ṣādiq to the black slaves and similar elements there, mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 992. See further, below, 34, n. 140.

The news of al-Ḥusayn's revolt reached al-Hādī. Several male members of his family had gone on the Pilgrimage that year, [557] including Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī,[90] al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad and Mūsā b. ʿĪsā,[91] as well as the younger members. Sulaymān b. Abī Jaʿfar[92] acted as leader of the Pilgrimage. Al-Hādī now ordered the investiture patent appointing Muḥammad b. Sulaymān as military commander to be written out. People said to him, however, "What about your paternal uncle al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad?" He replied, "Don't interfere with me! No, by God, I won't be deprived of my royal authority!" The patent investing Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī with the military command was therefore put into effect, but the document only reached them when they were on the way back from the Pilgrimage.

Muḥammad b. Sulaymān had gone forth with a full panoply of weapons and men, because the road was fearful and dangerous on account of the Bedouins. Ḥusayn did not get his forces ready to confront them. The news about them (i.e., about Muḥammad b. Sulaymān's approaching forces) came to him when they were already in his direction, so he set out with his slaves and his brothers. Mūsā b. ʿAlī b. Mūsā had meanwhile proceeded to Baṭn Nakhl[93] thirty (farsakhs) from Medina. The news reached him, he having his brothers and his slave girls with him. The news further reached al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, and he entered into correspondence with them (i.e., with Muḥammad b. Sulaymān's approaching forces). They came to Mecca and entered it. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān came forward, his followers having donned the ritually pure garments (i.e., the iḥrām) for performing the ʿUmrah. They then proceeded to Dhū Ṭuwā[94] and encamped there.

90. First cousin of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, hence a noted scion of the ʿumūmah, and first husband of al-Rashīd's sister al-ʿAbbāsah; see Ibn Qutaybah, 375–6, 380–1.

91. Grandson of Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, brother of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, and third cousin of al-Hādī.

92. I.e., the son of al-Manṣūr; see Ibn Qutaybah, 379.

93. See Abdullah Al-Wohaibi, The Northern Hijaz in the writings of the Arab geographers 800–1150, 377. According to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 449–50, it lay on the Baṣrah road.

94. This wadi marked the edge of the central hollow of Mecca and the boundary of the ḥaram or sacred area. See Azraqī, II, 297–301; Hamdānī, Ṣifat Jazīrat al-ʿArab, 436; Bakrī, III, 896–7. The name is still known in contemporary Mecca for part of the Jarwal quarter there.

Amongst their number was Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far. All those supporters of the 'Abbāsids, their mawlās and their military commanders who had arrived in Mecca that year, joined up with them.[95] The people had come in successive groups that year for the Pilgrimage, and had grown to a great number.

Muḥammad b. Sulaymān then sent ahead of himself ninety mounted men, some mounted on horses and some on mules, whilst he himself was riding a powerful thoroughbred horse. Behind him were forty men also mounted on noble horses, bearing the travelling baggage, and behind them men riding on donkeys,[96] all in addition to the infantrymen and others who were with them.
[558] These appeared to the people as a very numerous force, and they filled (the streets/the mosque[97]); they imagined that they were several times their (real) numbers. They circumambulated the (Holy) House, made the running [sa'y] between al-Ṣafā' and al-Marwah, and completed their performance of the 'Umrah. They then moved on, and came to Dhū Ṭuwā and encamped there, this being Thursday. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān sent forward Abū Kāmil, a mawlā of Ismā'īl b. 'Alī,[98] with a force of twenty-odd cavalrymen, this being on the Friday, and he met up with them. There was at this time in the ranks of his troops a man called Zayd who had attached himself to al-'Abbās, hence, al-'Abbās had brought him with him as a fellow-pilgrim. Now when he saw the enemy, he threw down on the ground his shield and sword, and went over to join their side; this was at Baṭn Marr.[99] Subsequently, they got hold of his body, which had been battered with clubs.

During the night of Friday-Saturday, they sent forward fifty cavalrymen. The first person whom they invited (i.e., to act as their leader) was Abū al-Dhayyāl Ṣabbāḥ, then another and another and another. Abū Khalwah the eunuch [al-khādim],[100] Muḥammad's

95. The high proportion of mawlās, slaves, and eunuchs in the 'Abbāsid forces confronting al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī is notable; cf. Pipes, 137.

96. The Cairo text, VIII, 196, specifies "200 men mounted on donkeys."

97. To be thus added to complete the sense, according to n. a; the Cairo text has "and they filled their breasts (i.e., with reassurance)."

98. I.e., of Ismā'īl, brother of Muḥammad b. 'Alī, father of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, and holder of various provincial governorships; see Ibn Qutaybah, 374.

99. District of Mecca where the two streams forming the Wādī al-Nakhlatayn joined together; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 449.

100. That this general term "servant" was by this time very frequently used as mawlā, was the fifth. Then they went to al-Mufaḍḍal, the mawlā of al-Mahdī, and sought to make him commander over them. He refused, however, and exclaimed, "No, appoint someone else over them, and I will be one of the rank and file." So they appointed as commander over them ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥamīd b. Razīn al-Samarqandī, who was at that time a comparatively young man of thirty years. They went off, being a force of fifty cavalrymen, on the night of Friday-Saturday.

The enemy drew near, and the cavalry drew back[101] and the troops prepared for battle. Al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad and Mūsā b. ʿĪsā were on the left wing; Muḥammad b. Sulaymān on the right wing; and Muʿādh b. Muslim[102] was (in the centre) between Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad.[103] Just before sunrise began to gleam, Ḥusayn and his followers advanced. Three of Sulaymān b. ʿAlī's mawlās[104] launched an attack, one of these being Zanjawayh, Ḥassān's slave, and then came back with a (severed) head and threw it down in front of Muḥammad b. Sulay- [559] mān; they had previously promised five hundred (dirhams) to the (first) person who came back with a head. Muḥammad's troops came along and hamstrung the (enemy's) camels so that their litters and saddles fell down. Then they slaughtered them (i.e., the ʿAlid forces) and put them to flight.

Before this, they (i.e., the ʿAlid forces) had gone forth from those mountain tracks [thanāyā] with only the smaller part of them marching against Muḥammad b. Sulaymān's wing; their main force marched towards the wing of Mūsā b. ʿĪsā and his troops (i.e., against the ʿAbbāsids troops' left wing). Hence, the ʿAlid forces' main assault was against the latter. When Muḥammad b. Sulayone of several euphemisms for "eunuch," rather than the stark terms khaṣī and majbūb, has been emphasized by Ayalon. See his The military reforms of Caliph al-Muʿtaṣim, 3–4, 42–3; idem, "Preliminary remarks on the Mamlūk military institution in Islam," 50–1; idem, "On the eunuchs in Islam," JSAI, I (1979), 74–89.

---

101. Rajaʿat; the Cairo text, VIII, 197, has zaḥafat "moved forward slowly."

102. Muʿādh b. Muslim b. Muʿādh al-Dhuhlī was a Khurasanian mawlā and one of the Abnāʾ al-Dawlah settled in Baghdad in the Caliphs' service; see Crone, 183–4.

103. A slight variation in the pattern of command is given by Iṣfahānī in Maqātil, 300; cf. Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 12 n. 2; but all the sources agree essentially on the actual course of the battle.

104. I.e., the freedmen of the ʿAbbāsid prince Sulaymān b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh, uncle of al-Saffāḥ; see Ibn Qutaybah, 374–6.

mān had dealt with the troops assailing his wing, and his troops were conscious of the first gleams of dawn, they turned their attention to the ʿAlid troops attacking Mūsā b. ʿĪsā's wing—and behold, they were massed together as if they were a compact ball of spun thread. The center and right wing of the ʿAbbāsid forces penetrated into their ranks and became locked with them in fighting, [and they put to flight al-Ḥusayn's forces].[105] They [i.e., the ʿAbbāsid forces] returned toward Mecca, not knowing what had become of al-Ḥusayn himself. They were still without information, having by then reached Dhū Ṭuwā or somewhere near it, until a soldier from the Khurāsānian troops shouted out, "Great news, great news! This is Ḥusayn's head!" He produced it, and there were marks of a blow right along the forehead and another blow on the back of the head. The ʿAbbāsid troops were shouting promises of quarter [amān] when they had finished the assault;[106] hence, Abū al-Zift al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad stumbled forward, with one of his eyes closed by a wound received in the fighting, and stood behind Muḥammad [b. Sulaymān] and al-ʿAbbās [b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān]. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā and ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās came up round him and gave orders for him to be killed. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān became extremely angry at that.

Muḥammad b. Sulaymān entered Mecca by one road and al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad by another. The heads [of those slain in battle] were cut off, and there turned out to be over a hundred of them, including the head of Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan.[107] This battle took place on the Yawm al-Tarwiyah [i.e., the "Day of Refreshment," the eighth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah [June 11, 786]]. Al-Ḥusayn's sister, who had been with him, was taken prisoner; she was sent to the custody of Zaynab bt. Sulaymān.[108] The fugitives from the ʿAlid forces mingled with the pilgrims and then slipped away. Sulaymān b. Abī Jaʿfar was ill at this time; hence, he was not [560] present at the battle. ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar[109] led the ceremonies of the

105. This phrase supplied from other, parallel sources, according to n. b.

106. Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī himself expressly refused this offer of amān, preferring the martyr's crown, according to Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, loc. cit.

107. I.e., the brother of Idrīs, who managed to escape to the Maghrib, see below.

108. The daughter of the ʿAbbāsid prince Sulaymān b. ʿAlī [for whom see above, 25, n. 104]; see Ibn Qutaybah, 385.

109. Grandson of Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr, and later governor of al-Baṣrah under al-

Pilgrimage in that year. There was among Ḥusayn's followers a blind man who used to exhort them by his edifying stories and narratives [yaquṣṣu ʿalayhim], and he was killed (i.e., in the battle). None of them, however, was executed afterwards in cold blood.

Al-Ḥusayn b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh related: Mūsā b. ʿĪsā took captive four Kūfans, a mawlā of the Banū ʿIjl[110] and another person.

Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ related: Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. ʿAlī transmitted the information to me, from Mūsā b. ʿĪsā, who related: I arrived, bringing with me six captives. Al-Hādī said, "Begone with you! Would you kill my prisoner?" I replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, I reflected at length about him, and said to myself, 'ʿĀ'ishah and Zaynab[111] will go to the Commander of the Faithful's mother and weep profusely in her presence, and will speak with her. Then she will speak to the Commander of the Faithful on his behalf, and he will let him go free.'" Then al-Hādī said, "Bring in the captives." I said, "I have made solemn promises and covenants to them that they should be set free and given their liberty." He nevertheless said, "Bring them before me!" He ordered two of them to be killed. The third one was an obscure person, and I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, this man is extremely knowledgeable about (the genealogies of) the house of Abū Ṭālib, and if you spare his life, he will provide you with everything you require." The man himself added, "By God, yes indeed, O Commander of the Faithful, I very much hope that your action in sparing my life will render me of service to you." Al-Hādī bowed his head in thought for a while, and then said, "By God, your emerging safe from my hands, after Rashīd on four separate occasions from 173 (789) onwards, died in 192 (808); see Ibn Qutaybah, 385.

---

110. An Arab tribe, considered as part of Bakr b. Wā'il, which had been long established on the desert fringes of Iraq and considerably Christianized. In early Islamic times, ʿIjlīs seem to have been especially inclined to Shīʿī and various heretical tendencies. See the verse quoted in Ch. Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien et la formation de Ǧāḥiẓ, 199; M. G. Morony, Iraq after the Muslim conquest, 443, 499; EI[2] s.v. ʿIdjl (W. Montgomery Watt).

111. Abbott, 88, takes this as specifically referring to the senior ʿAbbāsid princess Zaynab bt. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh (hence, the first cousin of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr; see on her ibid., 43–5), but it may be a reference to female busybodies in general, ʿĀ'ishah and Zaynab being in grammatical parlance the female equivalents of ʿAmr and Zayd, N. and M.

falling into them, is certainly a serious matter," but he kept on talking with him until in the end al-Hādī ordered that he should be kept back (i.e., from those sent forward for execution) and that the required guarantee of his safety should be written out for him. As for the other, he forgave him (also). He ordered the execution and gibbeting of ʿUdhāfir al-Ṣayrafī and ʿAlī b. al-Sābiq al-Fallās[112] al-Kūfī, and they accordingly gibbeted them at the Bāb al-Jisr;[113] they had both been captured at Fakhkh. The Caliph vented his rage also on Mubārak al-Turkī, and ordered the confiscation of his goods and property and his demotion to service in the ranks of the grooms of the riding beasts.[114] He further vented his ire on Mūsā b. ʿĪsā because the latter had executed al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad, and ordered the confiscation of his goods and property.

Idrīs b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan's Escape to the Maghrib and His Foundation of the Idrīsid Dynasty in Morocco

ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr al-Thaljī related, transmitting the information from Muḥammad b. Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb al-Hāshimī, who had it from [561] ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿĪsā (b. Mūsā),[115] who said: Idrīs b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib escaped from the battle of Fakhkh during al-Hādī's caliphate. He reached Egypt, the official in charge of the barīd systems of Egypt at that time being Wāḍiḥ, a mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful al-Manṣūr's son Ṣāliḥ, and Wāḍiḥ was a vile partisan of the Shīʿah [rāfiḍī khabīth].[116] Wāḍiḥ therefore gave Idrīs the facilities of the barīd service mounts to convey him to the Western lands.[117] He ended up

112. The Cairo text, VIII, 198, has al-Qallās.

113. The gate at the western end of the Upper Bridge (jisr) over the Tigris connecting the Western Bank with the Shammāsiyyah quarter. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 178, 198; M. Canard, Histoire de la dynastie des H'amdânides de Jazîra et de Syrie, I, 168; Lassner, Topography, 79.

114. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 93.

115. Grandson of the ʿAbbāsid prince ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī.

116. The mawlā Wāḍiḥ was an ancestor of the historian Yaʿqūbī, called Ibn Wāḍiḥ and certainly a Shīʿī sympathiser; see Crone, 196.

117. Kindī, K. Wulāt Miṣr, 131–2, states that al-Hādī's governor in Egypt, the ʿAbbāsid prince ʿAlī b. Sulaymān, sheltered and encouraged the fugitive Idrīs.

in the region of Tangier, at a town called Walīlah,[118] and the Berbers of that place and of the neighboring tracts[119] rallied to his call. Al-Hādī had Wāḍiḥ beheaded and gibbeted. (Alternatively,) it is said that it was al-Rashīd who executed him and who sent, secretly, to plot against Idrīs, al-Shammākh al-Yamāmī, the mawlā of al-Mahdī, at the same time writing for him a letter of recommendation to Ibrāhīm b. al-Aghlab, his governor over Ifrīqiyah.[120] Al-Shammākh proceeded till he reached Walīlah, where he gave out that he was a physician and that he was one of their partisans. He went into Idrīs's presence, so that the latter came to regard him familiarly and to feel at ease with him. Al-Shammākh began ostensibly to show him great respect, support for his cause, and honor to him. Hence he was able to stay by his side at every stage where he halted (sc. on his journeyings). Then at one point, Idrīs complained to al-Shammākh of a toothache, so al-Shammākh gave him a deadly poisonous (supposed) medicament for rubbing on the teeth, and instructed him to rub it on them at daybreak, after he had passed the night. So when it was dawn, Idrīs took the dentifrice and began to rub it back and forth in his mouth repeatedly and energetically, so that it killed him.[121] A search was instituted for al-Shammākh, but he could not be caught. Al-Shammākh reached Ibrāhīm b. al-Aghlab and told him about what he had done. The news of Idrīs's death arrived after al-Shammākh's actual arrival. Ibn al-Aghlab now wrote to al-Rashīd about all this, and the latter appointed al-Shammākh over the barīd and intelligence services of Egypt.[122]

---

118. Probably (though the identification is not 100% certain) on the site of the Roman Volubilis, in what was the province of Mauritania Tingitana; see H. Terrasse, Histoire du Maroc des origines à l'établissement du Protectorat français, I, 58–9, 65–8, 112–15.

119. Actually, the Berbers of the Awrabah tribe of the Lawātah group.

120. Ibrāhīm was the founder of the Aghlabid line of autonomous governors of Ifrīqiyah (184–296 [800–909]), but was not yet at this time governor of the whole province, which was not formally conferred on him till 184/800. See *EI*² s.v. Aghlabids (G. Marçais, etc.).

121. Idrīs actually died in al-Muḥarram 175 (May–June, 791).

122. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 488–9; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 193–4 = ed. Pellat, § 2405; Azdī, 259; K. al-'Uyūn, 285; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 93–4; E. H. Palmer, Haroun Alraschid, Caliph of Baghdad, 73–4; G. Marçais, "La Berbérie au IX^e siècle d'après El-Ya'qoûbî," R.Afr., LXXXV (1941), 60–1; idem, La Berbérie musulmane et l'Orient au moyen âge, 116–22; Terrasse, I, 115. An alternative historical tradition makes

A certain poet—I think it was al-H.nāzī[123]—recited concerning these events,

Do you imagine, O Idrīs, that you can escape
the Caliph's wiles or that flight is of any avail?
For they (i.e., the Caliph's wiles) will certainly catch up with you, unless you alight in a land where (even) a young bustard cannot guide people towards you!
Indeed, when his anger unsheathes the swords, they are long ones, and lives prove to be short in face of them.
(He is) a monarch, and it is as if death inexorably follows his command, to the point that people say, "Even destiny obeys him!"

More Accounts of the Battle of Fakhkh and Its Aftermath

[562] Al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī has mentioned that when al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī raised his revolt at Medina, al-ʿUmarī being governor there, the latter remained in concealment during al-Ḥusayn's stay at Medina until al-Ḥusayn left for Mecca. Al-Hādī had meanwhile despatched Sulaymān b. Abī Jaʿfar to lead the Pilgrimage, and there went forth with Sulaymān, from among those members of the ʿAbbāsid family who intended to make the Pilgrimage, al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad, Mūsā b. ʿĪsā and Ismāʿīl b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā,[124] traveling via the Kūfah Road; Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and a number of the progeny of Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān, traveling, via the Baṣrah Road; and from among the mawlās, Mubārak al-Turkī, the slave[125] al-Mufaḍḍal, and Ṣāʿid the mawlā of al-Hādī. Sulaymān was in charge of all the arrangements, and among the well-known, prominent figures involved were Yaqṭīn b. Musa, ʿUbayd b. Yaqṭīn, and Abū al-

---

Idrīs's assassin Yaḥyā b. Khālid al-Barmakī's agent Sulaymān b. Jarīr (see Van Arendonck, 65 n. 5).

123. Unidentified; the name is apparently corruptly written in the manuscript.

124. Holder of various provincial governorships; see Ibn Qutaybah, 376.

125. Again, as above, Ṭabarī, III, 547, this seems to be the correct rendering here for waṣīf, for it emerges just below that al-Mufaḍḍal was a eunuch.

Wazīr[126] 'Umar b. Muṭarrif. They gathered together at the point when they received the news that al-Ḥusayn and his companions were making for Mecca, and they appointed as their (military) chief Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far because of his existing office as leader of the Pilgrimage. Abū Kāmil, the mawlā of Ismā'īl, had previously been placed in command of the vanguard troops, and they met up with him at Fakhkh. They left 'Ubaydallāh b. Qutham[127] behind at Mecca to look after the town and its people. Al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad had furthermore promised them (sc. al-Husayn's partisans) a guarantee of safe-conduct for what they had perpetrated, and had undertaken to treat them kindly and to bring about conciliation on the basis of kinship bonds, his envoy to them in this matter being the eunuch [al-khādim] al-Mufaḍḍal; but they had refused to accept these terms.

The battle then took place; considerable slaughter occurred; the survivors took to flight; a promise of quarter was proclaimed among them; and no fugitive was hunted down. Among those who fled were Yaḥyā and Idrīs, the two sons of 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan. In regard to Idrīs, he managed to reach Tāhart in the Western lands and sought refuge with its people;[128] they treated him with honor, and he remained with them until the secret mission and stratagem against him, with his resultant death. His son Idrīs b. Idrīs followed him as his successor,[129] and he (and his descendants) have remained to this day rulers over that region; all diplomatic connections with them have been severed.

Al-Mufaḍḍal b. Sulaymān[130] has related: When the news of 126. Thus, the reading preferred in Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCCLIX, and in the Cairo text, VIII, 199, in the light of mentions of this man in Ṭabarī, III, 491, 516, instead of the text's Abū al-Ward.

127. Hāshimite and great-grandson of 'Ubaydallāh, one of the sons of al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.

128. A town of what is now eastern Algeria, which was from 144 (761–2) the center of an Ibāḍī Khārijite principality under the Rustamids; see EI[1] s.v. Tāhert (Marçais). These anti-'Abbāsid Khārijites would naturally have provided a sympathetic haven for the fugitive Idrīs.

129. On Idrīs II al-Aṣghar, the real creator of the city of Fez, see Marçais, La Berbérie musulmane, 122–4; EI[2] s.v. (Eustache).

130. Presumably the al-Mufaḍḍal b. Ja'far b. Sulaymān mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 43, as a rāwī for the accounts of the death of the 'Abbāsid Ibrāhīm al-Imām b. Muḥammad in 132 (749–50).

[563] al-Ḥusayn's being killed at Fakhkh reached al-ʿUmarī, he being in Medina, he pounced upon al-Ḥusayn's house, and the houses of a group of the members of his family and of others who had joined al-Ḥusayn's rebellion, and had them pulled down. He burnt down their palm groves and appropriated what he did not burn, adding it to the state domains and the confiscated property.[131]

He related: Al-Hādī showed his anger against Mubārak al-Turkī because of what he had heard about Mubārak's shrinking from encountering al-Ḥusayn in battle after he had come within sight of Medina. He ordered Mubārak's goods and property to be confiscated and his demotion to service in the ranks of the grooms of his riding beasts; Mubārak remained in this position till al-Hādī's death. He further showed his ire against Mūsā b. ʿĪsā because he had killed Abū al-Zift al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh and because he had not followed the plan of sending him on as a captive so that he himself (i.e., al-Hādī) might be the arbiter of his fate. He likewise ordered Mūsā's goods and property to be confiscated, and they remained thus sequestrated until Mūsā (al-Hādī) died. The group from among those taken prisoner at Fakhkh was sent forward to Mūsā (al-Hādī), among them being ʿUdhāfir al-Ṣayrafī and ʿAlī b. Sābiq al-Fallās[132] al-Kūfī. He ordered them both to be decapitated and their bodies gibbeted at the Bāb al-Jisr in Baghdad, and this was done.

He related: He (i.e., al-Hādī) sent his mawlā Mahrūyah (or Mahrawayh)[133] (al-Rāzī) to al-Kūfah with orders to treat the people there harshly because some of them had joined the rebellion of al-Ḥusayn.[134]

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib has mentioned that Yūsuf al-Barm,[135] a

131. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 303.

132. Again, in the Cairo text, VIII, 198, we have al-Qallās.

133. Later governor of Ṭabaristān for al-Rashīd, see Ṭabarī, III, 649 (below, 174).

134. The revolt of Medina had in fact been planned in concert with Shīʿī sympathizers in al-Kūfah; see above, 18, n. 70.

135. Presumably, the Yūsuf b. Ibrāhīm al-Barm, also described as a mawlā of Thaqīf, who rebelled in Khurāsān or at Bukhārā in 160 (777) and was subsequently executed. See Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 478–9; Ṭabarī, III, 470–1; W. Barthold, Turkestan down to the Mongol invasion, 198; Moscati, "Studi storici sul califatto di al-Mahdī," 331–2; E. Daniel, The political and social history of Khurasan under Abbasid rule 747–820, 166–7. His contact with al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī must obviously have fallen within the first two years of al-Mahdī's caliphate.

mawlā of the family of al-Ḥasan, whose mother was a freedwoman of Fāṭimah bt. Ḥasan, transmitted the information to him, saying: I was with Ḥusayn at the time when he came to al-Mahdī's court, and the Caliph gave him forty thousand dīnārs. He straightaway divided it up among the people in Baghdad and al-Kūfah, and by God, he left al-Kūfah not possessing a thing to wear except a fur garment without even a shirt beneath it and a loincloth for sleeping in.[136] When he was traveling along the road to Medina and he halted for the night, he had to borrow from his own mawlās sufficient for their subsistence expenses during the coming day.[137]

ʿAlī continued to relate: Abū Bishr al-Sarī,[138] a confederate [ḥalīf] of the Banū Zuhrah,[139] transmitted the information to me, saying: I performed the morning worship (or: the morning worship was performed) on the day when al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan, the [564] protagonist at Fakhkh, began his revolt. Ḥusayn led us in the worship and ascended the pulpit, the Messenger of God's pulpit. He sat down there, wearing a shirt and a white turban which he had unwound and let trail in front and behind himself. His sword was unsheathed, and he had placed it between his legs, when behold, Khālid al-Barbarī and his band of followers approached. When he attempted to enter the mosque, Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh hastened forward to block his way. Al-Barbarī attacked him, whilst I myself was at this very moment watching him, but then Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh rushed forward against him and struck him a blow on the face. He hit his eyes and nose, and cut through his helmet and

136. Izār al-firāsh. The phrase "without a loincloth/waist-wrapper" in Ṭabarī, III, 601 (below, 94) would seem to imply that it was the norm to sleep in an izār; see also Ṭabarī, III, 668 (below, 202).

137. The Shīʿī sources regard this lavishness and then contentment with penury as signs of al-Ḥusayn's nobility of character and his asceticism, acts of a person for whom "gold, silver and a handful of earth are exactly the same" (Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 294; cf. also Fāsī, 185, and Nahrawālī, 212). In fact, al-Mahdī had given his cousin al-Ḥusayn the money for settling his pressing debts, but because of his lavishness in scattering his new-found wealth, his creditors only received a certain proportion of their due; see Van Arendonck, 62–3. Such actions on al-Ḥusayn's part could well have strained the patience of al-Mahdī and al-Hādī with him to breaking point.

138. This vocalization seems more probable than the text's al-Surrī.

139. Zuhrah b. Kilāb, a clan of the Quraysh al-Biṭāḥ; see Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, K. al-Muḥabbar, 167. Zuhrah was the brother of Quṣayy and father of ʿAbd Manāf. From this clan stemmed the Prophet's mother Āminah bt. Wahb. See al-Muṣʿab al-Zubayrī, K. Nasab Quraysh, 257–74; Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 5–8; idem, *EI*² s.v. Ḳuraysh.

cap, until I saw the bone of his skull flying in splinters from its place. Yaḥyā likewise attacked Khālid's companions, and they fled in disarray. Then he returned to Ḥusayn, and stood before him with his sword drawn and dripping with blood. Ḥusayn spoke, praising God and eulogizing Him, and he preached to the congregation, saying at the end of his speech, "O people! I am the Messenger of God's offspring, in the Messenger of God's sacred enclosure [ḥaram], in the Messenger of God's mosque and seated in the Prophet of God's pulpit! I summon you to the Book of God and the Sunnah of His prophet, and if I do not fulfill that for you, then I have no claim upon you for obedience."[140]

He continued to relate: The pilgrims that year were very numerous, and hence had filled the mosque. Suddenly, a man with a handsome face, tall of stature and with a red-dyed cloak,[141] rose up. He took the hand of one of his sons, a handsome, robustly built boy, and then strode through the ranks of assembled people until he reached the pulpit. He went right up to Ḥusayn and said, "O descendant of the Messenger of God, I set out on my journey from a distant land, accompanied by this son of mine, seeking to make the Pilgrimage of God's House and to visit the tomb of His prophet, without it ever occurring to my mind that these events involving you would happen. I have heard what you have said; do you really mean to fulfill what you have taken upon yourself to do?" Al-Ḥusayn replied, "Yes." The man said, "Stretch forth your hand, that I may clasp it in homage to you." He related: He accordingly did homage to al-Ḥusayn, and then he instructed his son, "Draw near and do homage." He related: By God, [later] I saw the [565] heads of the two of them among all the heads of people at Minā, because it happened that I myself made the Pilgrimage in that year.

---

140. There is a fuller version of al-Ḥusayn's oration in Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 298–9. The mention to the people of the Imām's obligation to fulfill to the people his side of the bay'ah by spreading justice is again characteristic of Zaydī Shī'ī attitudes. See Van Arendonck, 50–1; 135–6, 141, who notes the correspondences here with Mu'tazilī views regarding justice and the state, and Veccia Vaglieri, "Divagazioni su due rivolte Alidi," 332–6, who cites the similarity in themes of al-Ḥusayn's speech to that of Zayd b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, Zayn al-'Ābidīn, when giving his invitation to the bay'ah to himself during his revolt of ca. 122 [740] [cf. Van Arendonck, 30].

141. Mumashshaq, "dyed with red ochre or clay," cf. Glossarium, p. CDLXXXVI. In earliest Islam, this was used for iḥrām garments; see Majd al-Dīn Ibn al-Athīr, al-Nihāyah fī gharīb al-ḥadīth wa-al-athar, IV, 334.

He related: A group of the people of al-Madīnah related to me that Mubārak al-Turkī sent a message to Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, "By God, it would be easier for me to fall from the heavens and then for the birds to snatch me up, or for the wind to carry me along to a remote place, than that I should assault you with military forces or cut off a single hair of your head, but I have to exert myself to the utmost in deeds which must be excused (or: I have to be excused). Hence, fall upon me by night, and I will flee before you." He thereupon gave al-Ḥusayn a covenant and agreement sworn upon God that he would do this. He related: So al-Ḥusayn sent to him, or else al-Ḥusayn went out to him personally with a small force. When they drew near to Mubārak's army, they cried out and uttered takbīrs, and Mubārak and his partisans took to flight, until Mubārak himself joined up with Mūsā b. ʿĪsā.

Abū al-Miḍraḥī al-Kilābī has mentioned the following: Al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad b. al-Mufaḍḍal b. Ḥusayn b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib[142] has related that al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan recited on that day, with reference to a group of people who did not go out with him to battle, although they had promised him previously that they would join him, but who then remained behind, expressing himself in gnomic form,

He who has recourse to the sword will encounter a remarkable opportunity, (that is), a speedy death, or else he will live to a reasonably mature age.
Do not embark upon an easy affair, for such an affair will only bring about your degradation;
you will never attain glory until you plunge violently into a tough and difficult affair.

Al-Faḍl b. al-ʿAbbās al-Hāshimī has mentioned that ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad al-Minqarī[143] transmitted to him the information from his father, who said: ʿĪsā b. Da'b[144] went into Mūsā b. ʿĪsā's

142. I.e., a descendant of the ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās who had governed Yemen and Azerbaijan for his cousin the Caliph ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

143. Following Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLX, for this vocalization.

144. I.e., ʿĪsā b. Yazīd b. Da'b al-Kinānī al-Laythī, resident of Medina and cherished boon-companion of al-Hādī, as appears from the anecdotes concerning him presence at the time of the latter's return from Fakhkh, and found him in a fearful state, casting around for excuses for the killing of those whom he had slaughtered. ʿĪsā greeted him, "May God guide the Amīr uprightly! May I recite to you some verses which Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah wrote to the people of Medina, in which he ex-[566] cused himself for the killing of al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, may God be pleased with him?"[145] He replied, "Go ahead," so he recited to him thus,

O you who ride off early in the morning on your intended journey, upon a stout she-camel which faces perils in its travelling, Announce to Quraysh, despite the great distance involved in visiting them, that between me and al-Ḥusayn lie God and the ties of relationship.
At how many halting-places in the courtyard of the (Holy) House did I adjure him[146] by the covenant of God, but the conditions of the agreements were not being observed by him!
You have treated harshly your own people, out of excessive pride in your mother (i.e., Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Prophet), by my life, a virtuous woman,[147] one characterized by family piety, a noble one.
She is a person whose merit no one approaches, the daughter of the Prophet and of the best of mankind, as they have recognized.
Her merit is accounted a merit for you, and others from yourselves of your people have shares in her merit also.
Indeed, I know, and I hold an opinion like one who knows it firmly —for an opinion may sometimes express the truth and then become precise and orderly—and the Caliph given by Ṭabarī, III, 589–90, 592–3 (below, 71–72, 76–77); see also Ibn Qutaybah, 537–8.

---

145. Referring to the killing of the rebel Third Imām of the Shīʿah at Karbalāʾ in 61 (680) by Yazīd's commander ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād; see *EI*² s.v. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib (Veccia Vaglieri).

146. Following the Cairo text, VIII, 202, unshuduhu.

147. Following the Cairo text, loc. cit., umm^{un} ḥaṣān^{un}.

That the policies which you are at present pursuing will leave you as corpses, with the eagles and vultures swaggering over you.
O people of ours, do not rekindle the flames of war when they have died down, but hold fast to the cords of peace and find security for yourselves!
Do not commit iniquity, for indeed iniquity means a striking-down, and indeed, the one who drinks from the cup of iniquity becomes sickly and ill.
Those generations who have gone before you have experienced [567] war,
and whole peoples have perished because of it.
So act fairly with your people, and do not go to your destruction out of haughty pride, for often a proud person's foot causes him to stumble.[148]

He related: Some of the disquietude which Mūsā b. ʿĪsā felt was thereby dispelled.

ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā[149] has mentioned that al-ʿAlāʾ transmitted the information to him that when (the news of) the renunciation of allegiance by the rebels of Fakhkh reached the Commander of the Faithful al-Hādī, he spent that night alone and occupied in writing a letter in his own hand. His mawlās and close companions became perturbed at his shutting himself away, so they got hold of one of his slaves secretly and said, "Go and see what point this matter has reached." He related: The slave went up to Mūsā, and the latter saw him, he asked, "What do you want?" The slave adduced an excuse for his intrusion. He related: Mūsā lowered his glance to the ground and was silent, and then he raised his head towards him and recited,

Those who are not accustomed to travelling by night have gone to sleep,

148. On Yazīd as a poet—the authenticity of his verses being not, however, altogether certain—see GAL, S I, 96, and GAS, II, 316–17.

149. As already noted (above, 28, n. 115), a descendant of the ʿAbbāsid prince Mūsā b. ʿIsā present at Fakhkh.

and the one who has not been able to sleep has relieved them of the necessity of setting out at nightfall.

Aḥmad b. Muʿāwiyah b. Bakr al-Bāhilī[150] has mentioned that al-Aṣmaʿī[151] transmitted the information to us and narrated: Muḥammad b. Sulaymān said to ʿAmr b. Abī ʿAmr al-Madanī, on the night preceding the battle of Fakhkh, after he had been shooting arrows in the other's presence at two targets, "Shoot away!" (i.e., at the enemy). He replied, "By God, I won't shoot at the Messenger of God's own offspring; I only came with you to shoot in your presence at the two targets, and not to shoot at the Muslims." He related: Al-Makhzūmī said, "Shoot!" so he let fly. He was eventually to die of leprosy.

He related: When al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī was killed and Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā brought in his head, and it was laid before al-Hādī, the latter exclaimed, "By God, it is just as if you had brought me the head of some or other contumacious rebel! (i.e., the head was being hurled down unceremoniously and without any respect for its previous owner). The least way in which I can requite you for this is to deprive you of your (normally due) rewards!" He related: So he deprived Yaqṭīn and his followers in this fashion, and did not give them anything.[152] Mūsā al-Hādī also recited the proverbial verses, when al-Ḥusayn was killed, as follows, [568] The person who shoots at the (Banū) al-Qārah has only given them their just deserts.

Whenever we encounter a (hostile) group,
We drive back their leading warriors upon the rear ranks.[153]

---

150. Also mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 383–4, as a rāwī for events in al-Manṣūr's reign.

151. The celebrated philologist and authority on lexicography and ancient poetry. See GAL, I², 104, S I, 163–5; GAS, VIII, 71–6, IX, 66–7; EI² s.v. (B. Lewin).

152. See also Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 267–8 = ed. Pellat, § 2475; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 172–3, tr. 187; Fāsī, 185. Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 13, doubts the authenticity of such stories as this concerning al-Hādī's hesitation and regret over the killing of the ʿAlid rebels, for the accounts elsewhere in Ṭabarī, III, 560, and in other sources about the Caliph's killing in cold blood, among others, captives who had been promised amān at Fakhkh, indicate rather a calculated vindictiveness and desire for vengeance.

153. See *Lisān al-ʿArab*¹, VI, 436, and Maydānī, Majmaʿ amthāl al-ʿArab, tr.

Various Items of Information

In this year, Ma'yūf b. Yaḥyā (al-Ḥajūrī)[154] led the summer raid (against the Byzantines) by way of the "Monk's Road" [darb al-rāhib]. The Byzantines had approached, led by the Patricius,[155] as far as al-Ḥadath.[156] The governor, the garrison troops, and the market traders all fled, and the enemy entered the town. Ma'yūf b. Yaḥyā penetrated into the enemy's territory and reached the town of Ushnah.[157] They then seized captives and prisoners and took plunder.[158]

In this year, Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far al-Manṣūr led the Pilgrimage.[159] 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-'Umarī was governor of Medina; 'Ubaydallāh b. Qutham was over Mecca and Ṭā'if; Ibrāhīm b. Salm b. Qutaybah[160] was over Yemen; Suwayd b. Abī Suwayd, the Khurāsānian commander, was over al-Yamāmah and al-Baḥrayn; and al-Ḥasan b. Nasīm (?)[161] al-Ḥawārī was over 'Umān. Mūsā b.

G. W. Freytag, II, 257, for these proverbial verses and the occasion when they were allegedly uttered. The Qārah are said here to have been a group of archers or a component clan of the Banū Kinānah in the Jāhiliyyah, but established in Yemen under Islam and attached to the Banū Asad.

154. This commander had led summer raids into Anatolia in 153 (770) and 158 (775), and was to lead a punitive expedition against the rebellious people of Cyprus in 191 (806); see Ṭabarī, III, 371, 385, 711 (below, 265).

155. Baṭrīq, biṭrīq, the Arabized form of the Byzantine title Patricius. See Fraenkel, 279; Ahmed Hebbo, Die Fremdwörter in der arabischen Prophetenbiographie des Ibn Hischam (gest. 218/834), 47–8.

156. The town and fortress, now disappeared, of the Greek Adata, on the Taurus frontier between Mar'ash and Malaṭya, where an important pass, the Darb al-Ḥadath, led into the Byzantine lands. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 227–9; Le Strange, Palestine under the Moslems, 443–4; idem, Lands, E. Honigmann, Die Ostgrenze des Byzantinischen Reiches von 363 bis 1071, index s.v.; Canard, 269–70; EI[2] s.v. (S. Ory).

157. Honigmann, 141: ? Ūshīn, Ōshēn.

158. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 704; Balādhurī, Futūḥ al-buldān, 190–1; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 94; E. W. Brooks, "Byzantines and Arabs in the time of the early Abbasids," EHR, XV (1900), 740; Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 14–15.

159. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 704; Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 37; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 491; Azdī, 259.

160. Grandson of the great Umayyad governor of the East Qutaybah b. Muslim al-Bāhilī, both he and his brother Sa'īd being in high favor with al-Hādī (see Ṭabarī, III, 580–1, 587, and below, 59, 68); the family thus successfully made the transition from being servants of the Umayyads to intimates of the 'Abbāsids. See Crone, 136–8; Kennedy, 83.

161. Thus, in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 94; the text has ". . . b. Tasnīm."

ʿĪsā was in charge of the leading of the worship at al-Kūfah and over the local security forces [aḥdāth][162] and the poor-tax, as well as of Bihqubādh al-Asfal.[163] At al-Baṣrah, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān was in charge of the leading of the worship and the aḥdāth there, whilst ʿUmar b. ʿUthmān functioned as judge. Al-Hādī's mawlā al-Ḥajjāj[164] was governor of Jurjān; Ziyād b. Ḥassān was over Qūmis; Ṣāliḥ b. Shaykh b. ʿUmayrah al-Asadī was over Ṭabaristān and al-Rūyān; and al-Hādī's mawlā Ṭayfūr[165] was over Iṣfahān.[166]

---

162. The context would seem to require a sense like that of "local militia, police corps" for this much-discussed, but still mysterious, term. See F. Løkkegaard, Islamic taxation in the classic period, 187–8 (the EI[2] art. s.v. by Cl. Cahen deals only with the aḥdāth of a later period).

163. "Lower" Bihqubādh comprised the district around al-Kūfah, where the Euphrates enters the Baṭāʾiḥ or Great Swamp. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 516; Le Strange, Lands, 81; A. Musil, The middle Euphrates, 274–5; Morony, 147–51.

164. See Crone, 191.

165. See ibid., 195.

166. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 706–7; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 94–5.

The Events of the Year

170

(July 3, 786–June 21, 787)

The events taking place during this year included the death of Yazīd b. Ḥātim (al-Muhallabī) in Ifrīqiyah; after him, Rawḥ b. Ḥātim became governor over it.[167] [569]

In this year, ʿAbdallāh b. Marwān b. Muḥammad[168] died in the Maṭbaq (or Muṭbaq) prison.[169]

In this year, Mūsā al-Hādī died at ʿĪsābādh. There are varying reports concerning the reason for his death. Some say that he died of an abdominal ulcer.[170] Others say that his death was at the hands of some slave girls belonging to his mother al-Khayzurān, 167. The governorship of North Africa was a Muhallabid fief at this time; see Crone, 134–5, and Kennedy, 83. But according to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 496, and Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 108, 113–14, Yazīd was briefly succeeded by his son Dāwūd, whose misrule, however, provoked a rebellion of the local Ibāḍiyyah, so that Hārūn al-Rashīd replaced him after nine months by his uncle Rawḥ.

168. One of the few surviving Umayyad princes, son of the last Umayyad Caliph Marwān II b. Muḥammad, imprisoned by al-Mahdī (Ṭabarī, III, 485).

169. The prison in the Round City of al-Manṣūr. See Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 240, tr. 15–16; Le Strange, Baghdad, 27; Lassner, Topography, 55, 243.

170. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 99.

whom she had ordered to kill al-Hādī for various reasons, some of which we shall now mention.[171]

The Reason Why al-Khayzurān Had Ordered the Slave Girls to Kill al-Hādī

Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan[172] has mentioned that when al-Hādī became Caliph, he became openly hostile towards and quarreled with his mother. Khāliṣah (i.e., al-Khayzurān's slave girl) came to him one day and told him, "Your mother seeks a gift of clothing from you," so he ordered a storehouse full of clothing to be given to her. He related: There were found in al-Khayzurān's house (after her death) among her possessions eighteen thousand sleeveless robes [qarāqir[173]] of figured silk. He related: At the opening of Mūsā's caliphate, al-Khayzurān used to exercise her authority over him in all his affairs without consulting him at all, and she used to behave in regard to him, by assuming sole control over matters of ordaining and forbidding, just as she had done previously with his father (i.e., al-Mahdī). Hence, al-Hādī sent a message to her, "Do not step beyond the boundaries of a woman's traditional modest position into demeaning yourself by being careless with your honor. It is not dignified for women that they should involve themselves in affairs of state. Instead, stick to your performance of the worship, to recounting God's praises, and to devoting yourself to pious works for God. Then after that, be conformable to the female role which is incumbent upon you." He related: During Mūsā's caliphate, al-Khayzurān used frequently to bombard him with requests for favors, and he used to grant whatever she asked. This went on for 171. See Abbott, 111–12; Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 23. It is possible that both the illness and the murder were involved here. Thus, the K. al-'Uyūn, 288–9, states that al-Khayzurān's slave girls suffocated al-Hādī in the harem because al-Khayzurān feared that he was going to recover from his sickness. Certainly, his death appears as too opportune for so many people concerned that it should have been a natural one. Also, the touching story in Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 282–3 = ed. Pellat, § 2486, of al-Hādī's sickbed death holding his mother's hand to his heart and commending Hārūn as his successor seems highly improbable, perhaps the invention of a later tradition favorable to al-Hādī.

172. I.e., Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Abd al-Khāliq, frequently cited as a rāwī and described in Ṭabarī, III, 322, as the maternal uncle of al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'.

173. Sing. qarqar. See Glossarium, p. CDXXII (< Latin caracalla); R. B. Serjeant, Islamic textiles. Material for a history up to the Mongol conquest, 93–4.

four months of his caliphate, and people thronged round her, seeking her aid, and processions of people used to resort to her door. [570]

He related: One day, al-Khayzurān spoke to him about a matter concerning which he saw no way to satisfy her. He made an appropriate excuse, but she exclaimed, "You must satisfy my request without fail!" He replied, "I won't do it!" She expostulated, "But I've already promised this unreservedly to ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik." He related: Mūsā became enraged and said, "Woe upon the son of a whore! I have already realized that he is the person behind this request, but by God, I won't grant you it!" She retorted, "In that case, by God, I'll never ask anything of you again!" He said, "By God, in that case, I don't care a bit!" and he grew hot and enraged. Al-Khayzurān got up to go, equally angry, but he ordered her, "Stay where you are, and take good note of my words! (I swear) by God, on pain of forfeiting my status as a kinsman of the Messenger of God if I do not fulfill this oath, that if ever I hear about any of my commanders or any of my close courtiers or servants standing at your door, I shall certainly have their heads chopped off and their possessions confiscated. Let whoever will, follow that course! What are all these processions of suppliants which come each day, by morning and evening, to your door? Have you no spindle to keep you busy, or copy of the Qurʾān to remind you (of God) or house to keep you safe (from the public gaze)? Beware, and again beware, lest you open your door, whether to any Muslim or to any Dhimmī!" So she went off, hardly conscious where she was stepping; and after this, she never again uttered in his presence a single word (literally, either a sweet or a bitter word).[174]

Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan related that his father transmitted the information to him, saying: I heard Khālişah telling al-ʿAbbās b. al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ[175] that Mūsā sent to his mother al-Khayzurān a dish of rice, saying, "I found this tasty and accordingly ate some of it; so you have some too!" Khālişah related: But I said to her, "Don't

174. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad al-Bayhaqī, K. al-Maḥāsin wa-al-masāwī, ed. Schwally, 591 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 365–6; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 269–70 = ed. Pellat, § 2477; Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 453–4; K. al-ʿUyūn, 283–4; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 99–100; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 173, tr. 187–8; Abbott, 89–92.

175. Son of the subsequent vizier, who seems to have acted as an assistant to his father when the latter was chamberlain (Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 154, 190–1) and who is cited as a rāwī by Ṭabarī on three or four occasions, e.g., III, 682 (below, 222).

touch it until you investigate further, for I am afraid that it might contain something to your detriment." So they brought in a dog; it ate some and fell down dead. Mūsā sent to al-Khayzurān afterwards and said, "How did you like the dish of rice?" She replied, "I enjoyed it very much." He said, "You can't have eaten it, because if you had, I would have been rid of you. When was any Caliph ever [571] happy who had a mother (still alive)?"

He related: A certain man of the Hāshimites transmitted the information to me that the cause of al-Hādī's death was that when the latter directed his efforts at depriving Hārūn (of his succession rights as next heir) and at having allegiance done to his own son Ja'far[177] (as heir instead of Hārūn), and when al-Khayzurān became fearful for Hārūn's safety at al-Hādī's hands, she secretly despatched at the time of al-Hādī's illness some of her slave girls to kill him by covering over (his mouth and nose) and sitting on his face (i.e., thus suffocating him). She sent to Yaḥyā b. Khālid the message that "The man has died, so act decisively in what you have to do and don't fall short in the appropriate measures!"[178]

Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Bashshār has mentioned that al-Faḍl b. Sa'īd[179] transmitted the information to him from his father, saying: Mūsā kept receiving information about his commanders' resorting to his mother al-Khayzurān, these persons hoping by speaking with her thereby to have their various requests fulfilled by the Caliph. He related: She, for her part, was aiming at securing an ascendancy over his affairs just as she had enjoyed over al-Mahdī's affairs. Al-Hādī kept barring her from achieving this and would say, "What have women to do with the discussing of men's affairs?" When he began to find excessive the number of his commanders who were resorting to his mother, he gathered the commanders together one day and said to them, "Who is better, I 176. Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 591–2 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 366; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 454–5; K. al-'Uyūn, 289; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 100; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 173, tr. 188; Abbott, 104.

177. Apparently al-Hādī's son by a slave concubine called Raḥīm. As noted by Ṭabarī, III, 577–8 (below, 55), Hārūn subsequently married his daughter Ḥamdūnah to Ja'far; see Abbott, 66, 157.

178. Jahshiyārī, 132–3; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 455; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Abbott, 109.

179. Possibly a son of Sa'īd b. Salm b. Qutaybah, on whom see Ṭabarī, III, 580–1 (below, 59).

or you?" They replied, "Certainly, you are, O Commander of the Faithful!" He said, "Who then is better, my mother or your mothers?" They replied, "Assuredly, your mother, O Commander of the Faithful!" He continued, "Which then of you would like to have men talking about his mother's affairs, saying 'So-and so's mother did this, and so-and-so's mother acted in this way, and so-and-so's mother said this'?" They replied, "None of us would like that." He said, "So what do you think about the men who keep coming to my mother and who subsequently make her affairs the subject of their conversations?" When they heard this, they ceased their visits to her completely. Al-Khayzurān was deeply mortified by that; she kept away from him and swore that she would never speak to him again. Thereafter, she never entered his presence until death came upon him.[180]

The reason why Mūsā al-Hādī wished to deprive his brother Hārūn of the succession, to the point that he brought force to bear on the latter and exerted himself strongly (in applying this pressure), according to what Ṣāliḥ b. Sulaymān has mentioned, was that al-Hādī, when the caliphate passed to him, confirmed Yaḥyā b. Khālid (b. Barmak) in the administration of the Western lands which Hārūn was governing (nominally). Al-Hādī then had the idea of depriving Hārūn al-Rashīd of the succession and of securing homage as successor for his own son Jaʿfar b. Mūsā al-Hādī, and [572] the commanders, including Yazīd b. Mazyad (al-Shaybānī),[181] ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik, ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā (b. Māhān) and their likes, followed his lead (or: assisted him) in that.[182] Hence they removed Hārūn from 180. Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 454; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Abbott, 91–2.

181. Nephew of the famous late Umayyad and early ʿAbbāsid general Maʿn b. Zāʾidah, al-Hādī and al-Rashīd employed him as governor of Armenia and Azerbaijan till his death in 183 (799). With this power base in the eastern Caucasus region, Yazīd's sons established the local dynasty in Shirwān of the Shirwān-Shāhs, who endured until the early Seljuq period. See Minorsky, A history of Sharvān and Darband in the 10th–11th centuries, passim; Madelung, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 243–9; Crone, 169–70; Kennedy, 84–5.

182. See Abbott, 96; Kennedy, 110–11. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 489–90, states that the commander of the Azd, Abū Hurayrah Muḥammad b. Farrūkh al-Azdī (who was governor of al-Jazīrah but was executed by Hārūn in 171 [787–8], see Ṭabarī, III, 606, below, 102), was active in denigrating Hārūn (hence, doubtless, his speedy fate when Hārūn secured the throne) and was sent by al-Hādī to al-Jazīrah, Syria, Egypt, and the West with an army to terrorize people into assenting to Hārūn's removal the succession and did homage to Ja'far b. Mūsā. They spoke surreptitiously to the "party" [al-shī'ah] (sc. of the 'Abbāsid dynasty's supporters),[183] so that these last talked about Hārūn's position and spoke slightingly of him in the public sessions at court, saying, "We won't accept him!" Their whole plan became complicated and difficult, until it became clear, and al-Hādī ordered that no escort should go before Hārūn with a spear.[184] As a result, the people (at court) avoided him and left him by himself, to the point that no one would dare even to greet him or to approach his presence. Yaḥyā b. Khālid used to take charge of arrangements for al-Rāshid's lodging and subsistence expenses, and he and his sons used never to leave him, according to what has been mentioned.[185]

Ṣāliḥ (b. Sulaymān) related: Ismā'īl b. Ṣubayḥ (al-Ḥarrānī)[186] was Yaḥyā b. Khālid's secretary, and Yaḥyā wanted very much to get him installed in a position from which he could pass back to Yaḥyā information about what was going on. Ibrāhīm (b. Dhakwān) al-Ḥarrānī[187] held the position of vizier to Mūsā, and he now took Ismā'īl into his service as secretary. This appointment was reported to al-Hādī, but news of this fact reached Yaḥyā b. Khālid, so he ordered Ismā'īl to set off for Ḥarrān;[188] Ismā'īl accordingly from the succession; cf. Jahshiyārī, 132, and Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 19. However, according to an account from al-Hādī's personal physician, 'Abdallāh al-Ṭayfūrī, Harthamah b. A'yan, alone among the great commanders, condemned al-Hādī's plan to deprive Hārūn of the succession and dissuaded him. See Ibn Abī Uṣaybi'ah, 'Uyūn al-anbā', I, 154–5; Abbott, 105–6.

---

183. Al-Shī'ah, or phrases like Abnā' al-Shī'ah, occurs frequently in Ṭabarī and other sources as a designation for the Abnā' al-Dawlah, originally the Arabs of Khurāsān plus some Iranians who had spearheaded the 'Abbāsid Revolution and were now largely resident in Baghdad. See Ayalon, The military reforms of Caliph al-Mu'taṣim, 4 ff.; Crone, 66.

184. On ceremonial occasions, it was the custom for the ruler (or here, his designated heir) to be preceded by the commander of the police guard [ṣāḥib al-shurṭah] with his lance or spear held erect as a symbol of authority. See Sourdel, "Questions de cérémoniale 'abbaside," 144–5.

185. K. al-'Uyūn, 285.

186. Secretary, originally from the community of Sabians at Ḥarrān, who later served Hārūn and al-Amīn as a leading chancery official; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 122, 190.

187. Also from Ḥarrān, originally a mawlā of al-Manṣūr, and treasurer for al-Hādī, but not apparently acting as vizier in the full sense of the word. See Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 709; Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 344, tr. Carra de Vaux, 442–3; Moscati, Le califat d'al Hādī, 17–18; Abbott, 86, 92–4; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 121–4.

188. A town of northern Syria, classical Carrhae. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 235–6; Le Strange, Lands, 103; Canard, 93–4; *EI*² s.v. (G. Fehérvári).

departed thither. Some months later, al-Hādī asked Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarrānī, "Who is acting as your secretary?" He replied, "So-and-so is acting as secretary," giving his name. Al-Hādī commented, "Didn't I receive a report that Ismāʿīl b. Ṣubayḥ was acting as your secretary?" Ibrāhīm replied, "(That must have been) a false report, O Commander of the Faithful; Ismāʿīl is in Ḥarrān!"[189]

He related: Slanderous reports were passed on to al-Hādī about Yaḥyā b. Khālid, and al-Hādī was told, "There are no real grounds of difference between you and Hārūn, it is merely that Yaḥyā b. Khālid is exercising a bad influence on him; so send for Yaḥyā, threaten him with death and accuse him of ingratitude." All that accordingly stirred up Mūsā al-Hādī's anger against Yaḥyā b. Khālid.

Abū Ḥafṣ al-Kirmānī[190] has mentioned that Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Khālid (al-Barmakī) transmitted the information to him, saying: Al-Hādī sent to Yaḥyā by night. Yaḥyā despaired therefore of his life; he said farewell to his family, he anointed himself with the aromatic substances used in preparing corpses for burial, he put on new clothes, and he did not doubt that al-Hādī was going to put him to death. When Yaḥyā was brought into the Caliph's presence, the latter said, "O Yaḥyā, what is the relationship between us?" Yaḥyā replied, "I am your slave, O Commander of the Faithful, and the only possible relationship which there can be between the slave and his master is one of obedience towards him." The Caliph said, "Why, then, are you coming between me and my brother, and [573] are influencing him unfavorably against me?" He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, who am I that I should presume to come between the two of you? It is merely that al-Mahdī appointed me to accompany him, and ordered me to look after him and his needs, so I undertook this in accordance with his command. Then you yourself ordered me to do that, and I fulfilled your command." The Caliph said, "What exactly has Hārūn been up to?" Yaḥyā replied, "He hasn't been up to anything, and it is not in his character or capability to do anything untoward." He related: al-Hādī's wrath thereupon subsided.[191]

189. Jahshiyārī, 126–7; Abbott, 96; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 122.

190. Presumably, the al-Kirmānī mentioned by Jahshiyārī, 208, as one of his rāwīs.

191. K. al-ʿUyūn, 285–6; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 96.

Hārūn personally had reconciled himself to being deprived of his succession rights, but Yaḥyā said to him, "Don't behave thus!" Hārūn replied, "Won't it leave me in a contented state of mind and a healthy physical state? These two things will be sufficient for me, and I shall live (peacefully) with my paternal uncle's daughter (i.e., with Zubaydah)—Hārūn was passionately enamored of Umm Jaʿfar—but Yaḥyā said to him, "What is that in comparison with the dignity of the caliphate? It may well be that this (happiness of life) will not be left open for you, to the point that it will elude you altogether!" and he stopped him from responding (to al-Hādī's pressures).[192]

Al-Kirmānī related that Ṣāliḥ b. Sulaymān transmitted the information to him, saying: "Al-Hādī sent to Yaḥyā b. Khālid by night when he was at ʿĪsābādh. This summons filled Yaḥyā with fear. He went into the private presence of the Caliph, and was then instructed to search out a man whom the Caliph had rendered fearful (or: whom the Caliph had become suspicious about), so that he had disappeared from the Caliph's sight; al-Hādī was now wanting to take him as a boon-companion and prevent him from continuing in his friendly relationship with Hārūn. The Caliph now treated Yaḥyā as a favored companion, and Yaḥyā spoke with the Caliph about the man. Al-Hādī then gave the man a guarantee of personal security and gave Yaḥyā a red, ruby ring which was on his own hand, saying, "This is (a token of) the guarantee of security for the man."[193] Yaḥyā went away; he sought out the man, and brought him to al-Hādī. At this, the Caliph rejoiced greatly. He related: Several people have transmitted to me the information that the person whom the Caliph was seeking was Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī.[194]

Ṣāliḥ b. Sulaymān related: Al-Hādī said to al-Rabīʿ one day, "Don't let Yaḥyā b. Khālid enter except at the end of everybody else." He related: So al-Rabīʿ sent to Yaḥyā, and he devoted his 192. Jahshiyārī, 128; K. al-ʿUyūn, 286; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 96–7.

193. Following Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLX, hādhā amānuhu.

194. I.e., Ibrāhīm b. Māhān or Maymūn, father of Isḥāq al-Mawṣilī and famous musician and composer, in great demand at the courts of al-Mahdī, al-Hādī and al-Rashīd, died in 188 (804). See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, V, 2–48 = ed. Cairo, V, 154–258; H. G. Farmer, A history of Arabian music to the XIIIth century, 116–17; GAS, I, 370; *EI*² s.v. (J. W. Fück).

undivided attention to him.[195] He related: When al-Hādī held court the next morning, he gave permission (for suppliants and others to come forward), until the point arrived when there were none of these remaining. Yaḥyā came into his presence, the Caliph having around him (from among his permanent entourage of courtiers) ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī,[196] al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad, and the senior members of his own family, together with his commanders. Al-Hādī kept summoning Yaḥyā to draw near to him until he made him sit directly before him, and he said to Yaḥyā, "I have been wronging you and branding you as one who has denied God's favors, but please absolve me now from this." Those present were astonished at the Caliph's show of honor towards him and his [574] words. Yaḥyā kissed his hand and gave thanks to him,[197] and al-Hādī then said to him, "Who is it who says concerning you, O Yaḥyā,

If a miser were to touch Yaḥyā's palm, his mind would glow with a feeling of generosity for the lavishing of gifts?"

Yaḥyā replied, "That is your generous palm, O Commander of the Faithful, not that of your slave."

He related: When al-Hādī spoke to Yaḥyā about depriving Hārūn of the succession, Yaḥyā said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, if you urge the people to break their oaths, they will come to regard their oaths lightly; but if you leave them to retain their oath of allegiance to your brother, and then make Jaʿfar the designated heir after Hārūn, that will make Jaʿfar's position as designated heir all the firmer." The Caliph replied, "You have spoken truly and

195. Following the text here and that of Cairo, VIII, 209, tafarragha lahu; but the Leiden editor also suggests, n. d, the possible reading tafazzaʿa lahu "he pretended to seek his aid"; cf. for this meaning, Ṭabarī, III, 333, and Glossarium, p. CDII.

196. The youngest paternal uncle of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, died in 185 (801–2); hence, one of the ʿumūmah. Having been involved in the revolt against al-Manṣūr of the latter's discontented uncle ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī ('Abd al-Ṣamad's elder brother) in 137 (754), he was not allowed thereafter to play any outstanding role in affairs. See Ibn Qutaybah, 374; Kennedy, 53, 59–60.

197. A person summoned to the Caliph's presence normally halted at the edge of the ruler's personal carpet [bisāṭ, muṣallā] and then kissed his hands (and possibly feet; see Ṭabarī, III, 509, jathā bayna yadayhi); see Sourdel, "Questions de cérémoniale ʿabbaside," 137–8.

have given good advice, and this will be a sound plan of action for me."[198]

Al-Kirmānī related, that Khuzaymah b. ʿAbdallāh also transmitted the information to him, saying: Al-Hādī ordered Yaḥyā b. Khālid to be imprisoned because of the course of action which Yaḥyā had endeavored to make him adopt over al-Rashīd's being deprived of the succession to the caliphate. Yaḥyā, however, sent a message to the Caliph containing these words, "I have some good advice," so the Caliph sent for him. Yaḥyā said, "O Commander of the Faithful, permit me to speak to you alone," so the Caliph took him in privately with himself. Yaḥyā continued, "O Commander of the Faithful, do you think that, if that momentous event (i.e., al-Hādī's own death)—and I pray God that we may never live to see it and that He may bring forward our own demise before that occurs!—takes place, do you really imagine that the leading figures in the state [al-nās] will hand over the caliphate to Jaʿfar, when he has not yet reached the age of puberty, and be satisfied with him as leader in their worship, in the Pilgrimage, and in military expeditions?" He replied, "By God, I don't imagine that they would." Yaḥyā continued, "O Commander of the Faithful, are you, moreover, sure that your own family and prominent members of it, like so-and-so and so-and-so, will not aspire to the caliphate, and that others may not have designs on it, with the result that the office might become diverted from the offspring of your father?" Al-Hādī replied to him, "You have made me alert to all that, O Yaḥyā!" He related: Yaḥyā used to say, "I never spoke with any Caliph who was more intelligent than Mūsā." He related: Yaḥyā further told him, "If it had not been for the fact that this affair (i.e., the succession to the caliphate) had already been settled on your brother, would it not have been necessary for you yourself to designate him (sc. Hārūn) as successor in the rule? How then can you contemplate removing him from the succession, when al-Mahdī appointed [575] him to it? It is my opinion, O Commander of the Faithful, that the best course is to confirm this arrangement as it now stands. Then when Jaʿfar reaches puberty—and may God bring him to this stage!—you can bring al-Rashīd into his presence, and al-Rashīd will renounce his succession rights in his favor and be the first to swear allegiance and to clasp his hand." He then related: Al-Hādī accepted his arguments and his judgement, and ordered his release.[199]

198. Jahshiyārī, 128; Azdī, 260; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 96–7; Palmer, 33–4; Abbott, 94; Moscati, Le califat d'al Hādī, 19.

Al-Mawṣilī[200] has mentioned, from Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā (b. Khālid al-Barmakī), who said: Al-Hādī (nevertheless) resolved on depriving Hārūn of the succession after my father's words with him. A group of his mawlās and commanders urged him on to this course of action, whether Hārūn agreed to his own deprivation or not. Al-Hādī's anger against Hārūn grew more intense, and he put more and more pressure on him. Yaḥyā said to Hārūn, "Ask the Caliph for permission to go off hunting, and when you go forth, keep yourself far away and put off the days (of your return)." So Hārūn sent in a request, seeking permission to depart, and the Caliph gave his permission. Hārūn journeyed to Qaṣr Muqātil[201] and stayed there for forty days, until al-Hādī began to show disapproval of Hārūn's actions, and his keeping away caused al-Hādī disquiet. He began writing to him and telling him to come back,[202] but Hārūn made excuses (for not returning), until the affair assumed serious proportions. Al-Hādī began to abuse Hārūn, and his

199. Jahshiyārī, 128–9; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 280–1 = ed. Pellat, § 2485; Palmer, loc. cit.; Abbott, 94–5; Moscati, Le califat d'al Hādī, 19–20. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 590, and a later author on the history of the Barmakīs, 'Abd al-Jalīl al-Yazdī, in his Ta'rīkh-i āl-i Barmak, state that both Yaḥyā and Hārūn were nevertheless imprisoned (Mas'ūdī, Murūj, loc. cit.: Yaḥyā only) and only saved from execution by al-Hādī's own death. A later account in Ṭabarī, III, 599–600 (below, 92), places both Yaḥyā and Hārūn in jail and on the point of execution when al-Hādī conveniently died. Finally, an account in the K. al-'Uyūn, 286–8, states that al-Hādī ordered Harthamah b. A'yan to kill Yaḥyā secretly during the night, but Harthamah feared that al-Hādī would then kill him in order to conceal all knowledge of the murder; he was saved from his dilemma by al-Hādī's death during the night.

200. I.e., Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, the celebrated poet, musician and singer, died in 235 (850). See Farmer, 124–6; GAS, I, 371, II, 578; EI[2] s.v. (Fück).

201. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 364, a place out in the Samāwah or desert between the Euphrates and Syria, beyond 'Ayn al-Tamr to the south of Hīt, originally built by one Muqātil b. Ḥassān of the Banū Imru' al-Qays b. Zayd Manāt (thus in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 282) and restored by the 'Abbāsid prince 'Īsā b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh, Hārūn's great-great-uncle. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 97 and elsewhere, inserts Banī before the name Muqātil.

202. Yaṣrifuhu, perhaps with the additional nuance, from the idea of "embellishing speech" [ṣarf al-kalām], of "cajoling, trying to persuade by fair words."

mawlās and commanders made slanderous talk about him. At this particular moment, al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā was acting as the representative of his father and al-Rashīd at the caliphal court; he kept sending reports of all this to Hārūn, so that the latter then returned, the whole affair having become prolonged.[203]

Al-Kirmānī related that Yazīd, the mawlā of Yaḥyā b. Khālid, transmitted the information to him, saying: Al-Khayzurān sent ʿĀtikah, who had been a wet nurse for Hārūn, to Yaḥyā. She tore at the neck opening of her gown in his presence, all the while weeping to him and saying, "The lady (i.e., al-Khayzurān) says to you, 'I beseech you by God to have regard for my son's interests! Don't bring about his death, just let him agree to what his brother demands and seeks from him, for his preservation is more dear to me than this present world and everything in it!'" He related: Yaḥyā cried out to her and told her, "What do you know about this? If it is as you say (i.e., that my advice is likely to bring about Hārūn's death), then I, my children and my family will all be killed before Hārūn, and even if I am held in suspicion (by al-Khayzurān) on account of him, I cannot be held in suspicion on account of my own self and my family."[204]

[576] He related: When al-Hādī saw that Yaḥyā b. Khālid was not going to go back on what he had undertaken to do for Hārūn, despite his lavishing on him marks of honor, grants of land, and presents, he sent a messenger to Yaḥyā threatening him with death unless he renounced this course of action. He related: This state of fearfulness and sense of danger continued unremittingly. Yaḥyā's mother died whilst he was in the Khuld Palace[205] at Baghdad, because Hārūn used to live there, accompanied by Yaḥyā, whilst he was heir to the succession, staying in his residence and constantly in contact with him night and day.

Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim b. al-Rabīʿ[206] has mentioned that Mu-

---

203. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 281–2 = ed. Pellat, § 2486; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 97–8; Bouvat, 46 n. 1; Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 20.

204. Abbott, 104–5.

205. The palace on the west bank of the Tigris and to the northeast of the Round City, built by al-Manṣūr, who took up residence there in 158 (775). See Le Strange, Baghdad, 101–5; Lassner, Topography, 55, 149.

206. Presumably a grandson of the minister al-Rabīʿ b. Yūnus, on whom see Ṭabarī, III, 545 (above, 3, and n. 3).

ḥammad b. ʿAmr al-Rūmī transmitted the information to him from his father,[207] saying: After he had achieved royal power and in the opening days of his caliphate, Mūsā al-Hādī held a court session of his intimates [julūs khāṣṣ].[208] He summoned Ibrāhīm b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Jaʿfar,[209] Ibrāhīm b. Salm b. Qutaybah and [Ibrāhīm b. Dhakwān] al-Ḥarrānī. These last took their places on his left hand, together with one of al-Hādī's black eunuchs who had the name of Aslam and the patronymic of Abū Sulaymān; al-Hādī used to repose great confidence in him and put him forward into a prominent place. Whilst the Caliph was in this situation, behold, the ṣāḥib al-muṣallā Ṣāliḥ[210] came in and announced the arrival of Hārūn b. al-Mahdī. Al-Hādī said, "Allow him to come in." So Hārūn entered, greeted the Caliph, kissed his hand, and took his seat on al-Hādī's right, but at some distance and at one side. Mūsā lowered his gaze and was silent, whilst regarding him, and he remained thus for a while. Then he turned to him and said, "O Hārūn, it appears to me that you are dwelling too lengthily on the fulfillment of the dream[211] and are hoping for something which is beyond your reach; but before that can come to pass, you will have to strip the spiny leaves from the tragacanth bush's branches.[212] Do you really hope for the caliphate?"

He related: Hārūn knelt on both knees and answered, "O Mūsā, if you act haughtily, you will be abased; if you show humility, you will be exalted in rank; and if you act oppressively, you will be

---

207. ʿAmr al-Rūmī was a freedman of al-Hādī, who was in charge of the laying out of a new settlement, called Madīnat Mūsā, which the Caliph laid out opposite Qazwīn when he journeyed to Rayy; see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 323.

208. On the distinction between, and different conventions for, public and intimate court sessions, see Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial ʿabbaside," 136.

209. I.e., Zubaydah's brother and first cousin of al-Hādī; see Ibn Qutaybah, 379.

210. The muṣallā here seems to have been the prayer carpet covering the divan or seat [sarīr] on which the Caliph sat, regarded as one of the insignia of royalty; it was an honor to be invited to sit on it. Ṣāliḥ is mentioned by Jahshiyārī, Yaʿqūbī, and Ṭabarī on various occasions as being the official responsible for the placing of the muṣallā and admitting of those privileged to sit on it, from the reign of al-Manṣūr to that of al-Amīn, and his son ʿAlī had the office, and then that of chamberlain, under al-Maʾmūn, according to Ibn Abī Ṭāhir Ṭayfūr and Shābushtī. See Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial ʿabbaside," 131–2, 146 n. 181.

211. Explained below.

212. This was a proverbial expression for anything extremely difficult, the tragacanth bush being very spiny. See Mubarrad, Kāmil, I, 329; Maydānī, tr. Freytag, I, 476.

deceived (by God). I certainly hope that the ruling power will come to me in due course, so that I may then mete out justice to those whom you have oppressed and give bounty to those whom you have cut off (from your generosity). I shall place your sons above my own ones and give them my daughters in marriage, and I shall bring to pass the due rights of the Imām al-Mahdī (i.e., in regard to his wishes for his descendants)." He related: Mūsā then said to [577] him, "That is what I would have expected of you, O Abū Jaʿfar! Draw near to me!" So Hārūn drew near and kissed his hands, and then he withdrew back to his place. Al-Hādī exclaimed to him, "Nay, by the illustrious shaykh and noble monarch—I mean your grandfather al-Manṣūr—you shan't sit anywhere else but here with me!" and he made Hārūn sit with him in the center of the court assembly. Next he said, "O Ḥarrānī, convey a million dīnārs to my brother (immediately), and when the collection of the land tax is in hand [idhā iftataḥa al-kharāj],[213] convey to him half of it; throw open for him all our wealth in the treasuries and what was confiscated from the members of the accursed house (i.e., the Umayyads), and let him take everything he desires." He related: He put all that into execution, and when Hārūn rose (to leave), he said to Ṣāliḥ, "Bring his mount near to the (Caliph's) carpet."[214]

ʿAmr al-Rūmī related: Hārūn used to regard me as a close companion, so I stood up before him and said, "O my master, what was the dream which the Commander of the Faithful spoke to you about?" He replied, "Al-Mahdī stated, 'I saw myself in my dream giving a rod each to Mūsā and Hārūn, and Mūsā's rod put forth leaves for a little way at the top only, whereas Hārūn's one sprouted leaves from one end to the other.' Al-Mahdī summoned al-Ḥakam b. Mūsā al-Ḍamrī,[215] who had the patronymic of Abū Sufyān, and said to him, 'Give an interpretation of this dream.' Al-Ḥakam

213. Iftitāḥ al-kharāj was a technical term of the financial secretaries denoting the beginning of the collection process, and is defined as such by Muḥammad b. Aḥmad al-Khwārazmī; see Bosworth, "Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the technical terms of the secretary's art," JESHO, XII (1969), 134–5 = Medieval Arabic culture and administration, no. XV.

214. I.e., as a sign of honor. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 98; cf. Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 208–9 = ed. Ibrāhīm, I, 314–5.

215. The "al-Ḥakam b. Isḥāq al-Ṣaymarī" of Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 285, should, as Pellat notes in his edition, IV, 194 = § 2489 n. 5, and see Index, VI, 283, be corrected in the light of Ṭabarī's text here.

replied, 'Both of them will exercise the royal power; but as for Mūsā, his reign will be short, whereas in regard to Hārūn, his reign will extend further than that of any other Caliph who has ever lived; his days will be the finest of days and his age the finest of ages.'" He related: only a few days passed before Mūsā fell ill and died, his illness lasting for three days only. 'Amr al-Rūmī related: The caliphate passed to Hārūn. He gave (his daughter) Ḥamdūnah in marriage to Ja'far b. Mūsā and Fāṭimah to Ismā'īl b. Mūsā; he [578] fulfilled everything which he had promised, and his age was the finest of ages.[216]

It has been mentioned that al-Hādī had set out for al-Ḥādithah, that is, Ḥādithat al-Mawṣil;[217] he took ill there and his sickness grew worse, so he turned back homewards.[218] 'Amr al-Yashkurī, who was one of the body of eunuchs, has mentioned that al-Hādī came back from al-Ḥādithah after he had written to all his governors, those in the East as well as those in the West, ordering them to report to him. When his illness became serious, the gang of persons who had done homage to al-Hādī's son Ja'far as successor to the throne came together and said to each other, "If the power in the state passes to Yaḥyā, he will kill us and will not spare us." Hence, they plotted together that one of them should go to Yaḥyā with a (forged) order from al-Hādī and cut off his head. But then they said, "Perhaps the Commander of the Faithful will recover from his illness, and what excuse will we be able to give him?" So they gave up the plan. Then al-Khayzurān sent a message to Yaḥyā[219] informing him that the man (i.e., al-Hādī) was near to his

216. Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 208–9 = ed. Ibrāhīm, I, 315–16; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 285 = ed. Pellat, § 2489; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 98; Abbott, 97–8, who notes that al-Hādī seems to have had a superstitious and irrational streak in his makeup, perhaps inflamed by tales like this and similar prognostications, if these are genuine and not ex post facto explanations for his short reign (for al-Hādī's horoscope, see Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 487; according to Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 281–2 = ed. Pellat, § 2486, it forecast a short reign only).

217. I.e., the Ḥadithah to the south of al-Mawṣil, at the confluence of the Tigris and the Great Zāb, as opposed to that on the middle Euphrates. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 230; Le Strange, Lands, 90–1; Canard, 122–3; *EI*² s.v. Ḥadītha (E. Herzfeld).

218. K. al-'Uyūn, 284, attributing al-Hādī's return to Baghdad to the onset of his illness plus receipt of the news of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī's rebellion in al-Madīnah; Abbott, 106.

219. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 490, al-Khayzurān went personally to deliver Yaḥyā from jail.

return (to God, i.e., near death) and ordering him to be prepared to do what was necessary. Al-Khayzurān was the real directing influence behind al-Rashīd's candidature and the direction of caliphal affairs up to al-Hādī's actual death. Yaḥyā b. Khālid gave orders, and the secretaries were summoned and gathered together in al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā's house. They spent the whole night writing letters from al-Rashīd to the provincial governors announcing al-Hādī's death and instructing them that al-Rashīd confirmed them in their existing governorships. When al-Hādī was actually dead, they despatched the letters by the mounts of the barīd service.[220]

Al-Faḍl b. Sa'īd has mentioned that his father transmitted the information to him that al-Khayzurān had sworn that she would never speak to Mūsā al-Hādī again, and she had removed herself away from his presence. When death came to al-Hādī, and the messenger announcing that news came to her, she exclaimed, "What shall I do concerning him?" Khālişah said, "Arise and go to your son, O noble lady, since this is no time for recrimination and displays of anger."[221] She said, "Give me some water, that I may perform the lesser ablutions in preparation for the worship." Then al-Khayzurān added, "Did we not use to say among ourselves that in this one night, one caliph would die, another caliph would succeed to power, and a third caliph would be born?" He related: At that point, Mūsā died, Hārūn came to power and al-Ma'mūn was born.[222] Al-Faḍl related: I handed on this account to 'Abdallāh
[579] b. 'Ubaydallāh,[223] and he transmitted it on my authority in the same words that my father had told me. I asked him, "How did al-Khayzurān acquire this piece of knowledge ['ilm]?" He replied, "She had heard it from al-Awzā'ī."[224]

220. Azdī, 261; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 99; Abbott, 107, 109–10; Kennedy, 112. According to Jahshiyārī, 133, Yaḥyā's secretary Yūsuf b. al-Qāsim b. Ṣubayḥ did the actual writing of the letters.

221. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 101; Abbott, 107.

222. I.e., to his Persian concubine Marājil; see Jahshiyārī, 133, and Ṭabarī, III, 758 (below, 327). This became celebrated as the "night of the caliphate," laylat al-khilāfah. See Tha'ālibī, Thimār al-qulūb, 510; idem, Laṭā'if, 141, tr. 109–10; Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 160–1 = ed. Ibrāhīm, I, 244; Shābushtī, K. al-Diyārāt, 227.

223. Apparently the 'Abbāsid prince 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad, second cousin of al-Hādī and subsequently governor of Yemen under al-Mu'taṣim, also cited by Ṭabarī, III, 450, as a rāwī for events in al-Manṣūr's reign.

224. Cf. Abbott, 41. Al-Khayzurān must accordingly have heard this prophecy

Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan (b. ʿAbd al-Khāliq) has mentioned that Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī transmitted the information to him, saying that he got it from his paternal aunt Zaynab the daughter of Sulaymān,[225] who said: When Mūsā died at ʿĪsābādh, al-Khayzurān gave us the news, we being four ladies, myself, my (full) sister, Umm al-Ḥasan and ʿĀ'ishah, (we four being) the youthful daughters of Sulaymān, together with Umm ʿAlī Rayṭah.[226] Khālişah came along at that point, and al-Khayzurān asked her, "What are the people doing?" She replied, "O my lady, Mūsā is dead and they have buried him." Al-Khayzurān exclaimed, "If Mūsā is dead, then Hārūn has been spared. Bring me some sawīq!"[227] Khālişah brought in some sawīq. She drank some herself, and then gave us some to drink. She said, "Fetch four hundred thousand dīnārs for my masters," and then, "What has my son Hārūn been doing?" Khālişah answered, "He has sworn that he will not perform the noon worship anywhere else except in Baghdad." She said, "Fetch the riding saddles and equipment, for there's no point in my sitting here when he has departed!" She subsequently caught up with him at Baghdad.[228]

The Time of al-Hādī's Death, the Term of His Life, the Extent of His Rule and (the Names of) Those Who Led the Worship over Him

Abū Maʿshar related:[229] Mūsā al-Hādī died during the night of Friday (i.e., of Thursday-Friday), in the middle (i.e., the fifteenth or sixteenth) of Rabīʿ I (September 14 or 15, 786). Aḥmad b. Thābit (al-Rāzī)[230] transmitted the information to us about that from (see on it, Thaʿālibī, Laṭāʾif, 141, tr. 109–10) from the famous Syrian jurist before 157 (774), the date of his death, see EI[2] s.v. al-Awzāʿī (J. Schacht).

---

225. See on her, Ṭabarī, III, 559 (above, 26, and n. 108).

226. I.e., al-Saffāḥ's daughter, the widow of al-Mahdī. See for the daughters of Sulaymān, Ibn Qutaybah, 375.

227. In the first place, a dish made from flour, and then a soup made from flour and added ingredients. See Thaʿālibī, Laṭāʾif, 10, tr. 41 and n. 20; EI[1] s.v. (J. Ruska).

228. Abbott, 109–11.

229. Presumably the historian Abū Maʿshar Najīḥ b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Sindī, who himself died in the year 170 (786) and was the author of a history of the Caliphs. See GAL, S I, 207; GAS, I, 291–2.

230. Often cited by Ṭabarī as a rāwī of Abū Maʿshar's historical information; see GAS, I, 292.

someone who had mentioned it to him from Isḥāq. Al-Wāqidī[231] related: Mūsā died at ʿĪsābādh in the middle of Rabīʿ I. Hishām b. Muḥammad (Ibn al-Kalbī)[232] related: Mūsā al-Hādī perished on the fourteenth of Rabīʿ I (September 13, 786), this being the night of Friday, in the year 170.[233] A certain authority related: He died during the night of Friday, the sixteenth of that month, and the length of his caliphate was one year and three months. Hishām [580] related: He reigned for fourteen months and died at the age of twenty-six.[234] Al-Wāqidī related: His period of power was one year, one month, and twenty-two days. Others, however, have related that he died on Saturday, the tenth of Rabīʿ I (September 9, 786) or else on the night of Friday, when he was twenty-three years old, and his caliphate was one year, one month, and twenty-three days. His brother Hārūn al-Rashīd b. Muḥammad led the worship over him. His patronymic was Abū Muḥammad and his mother al-Khayzurān, the former slave concubine [umm walad]. He was buried in his garden at ʿĪsābādh the Greater. Al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq (al-Hāshimī) has mentioned that he was tall, full-bodied handsome, whitish in complexion but tinged with red, and with a contracted upper lip.[235] He used to have the nickname of "Mūsā, shut your mouth!" He was born at al-Sīrawān[236] in the region of al-Rayy.[237]

Mention of His Children

He had nine children, seven sons and two daughters. Regarding the sons, one of them was Jaʿfar, whom he was grooming for the role of his successor in the caliphate, and (the others were) al-ʿAbbās, ʿAbdallāh, Isḥāq, Ismāʿīl, Sulaymān, and Mūsā b. Mūsā the blind

231. The celebrated historian of the Prophet's maghāzī or raids, Muḥammad b. ʿUmar, died in 207 (823). See GAL, I², 141–2, S I, 207–8; GAS, I, 294–9; *EI*¹ s.v. (J. Horovitz).

232. Noted Kūfan historian and genealogist, died in 204 (819–20) or 206 (821–2). See GAL, I², 144–5, S I, 211–12; GAS, I, 268–71; *EI*² s.v. al-Kalbī (W. Atallah).

233. This gives the exact correspondence of the day and date, and seems the most likely one.

234. Thus also in Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 491; the K. al-ʿUyūn, 289, places his death at the age of 24 or 25; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 705, and Dīnawarī, 386, state that he died in mid-Rabīʿ I at age 24.

235. Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 455; Thaʿālibī, Laṭāʾif, 44, tr. 62; Abbott, 61.

236. See on this place Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 297; Schwarz, 799–800.

237. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 101; Abbott, 106 ff.; Moscati, Le califat d'al Hādī, 23.

one, all of them born from originally slave mothers. The blind son, Mūsā, was actually born after his father's death. Of the two daughters, one of them was Umm ʿĪsā, who became the wife of al-Maʾmūn,[238] and the other was Umm al-ʿAbbās bt. Mūsā, who had the nickname of Nūnah.[239]

Some of the Historical Events Involving Him and Some Aspects of His Behavior

Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Salām,[240] the son of al-Sindī's brother, and called Abū Ṭūṭah,[241] has mentioned that al-Sindī b. Shāhik[242] transmitted the information to him, saying: I was with Mūsā in Jurjān. At that point, there came to him the messenger announcing the death of al-Mahdī and his own succession to the caliphate. So he set off for Baghdad, in company with Saʿīd b. Salm (b. Qutaybah),[243] using the relays of the barīd system, and sent me on to Khurāsān.[244] [581]

Saʿīd b. Salm transmitted the information to me, saying: We travelled along, with the pastoralists' tents of Jurjān on one side, and the gardens and orchards on the other. He related: He then heard a noise from one of those gardens, made by a man who was singing. So al-Hādī said to the commander of his guard, "Fetch me that man immediately!" He related: I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, how similar is the episode of this wretch (literally, "treacherous one") to the episode involving Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik!" Al-Hādī said, "How is that?" He related: I said to him: Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik was once in one of his pleasure gardens, with the womenfolk of his household accompanying him, when 238. She was the mother of his two eldest sons, see Ṭabarī, III, 836.

239. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit. Ibn Qutaybah, 381, simply says "his progeny was numerous."

240. A rāwī of this name is mentioned in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, IV, 82 = ed. Cairo, IV, 219.

241. Literally, "the man affected by satyriasis."

242. Mawlā of al-Manṣūr, who contrived to survive and to serve every Caliph up to al-Amīn and then Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī; see Crone, 194–5.

243. Brother of Ibrāhīm (see Ṭabarī, III, 568, above, 39, n. 160) and like him a boon-companion of al-Hādī (Ṭabarī, III, 587, below, 68); later, he became governor for Hārūn of among other places al-Jazīrah and Armenia (Ṭabarī, III, 645, 647). See Crone, 137–8; Kennedy, 83.

244. See Ṭabarī, III, 545, 547 (above, 5, 8).

he heard from another nearby garden the sound of a man singing. He thereupon summoned the commander of his guard and instructed him, "Fetch me the man who is singing!" The man was brought into his presence, and when he appeared before him, the Caliph said to the man, "What impelled you to start singing, when you are in close proximity to me and I have my ladies with me? Have you not realized that when stud-mares hear the sound of a stallion, they feel drawn towards him? O slave, emasculate this man!"[245] So the man was emasculated. The next year, Sulaymān returned to the pleasure garden, and sat down in exactly the same place as on the previous occasion. He thereupon remembered the same man, and what he had done to him, and he said to the commander of his guard, "Fetch me the man whom we caused to be emasculated!" So he brought him into the Caliph's presence. When he appeared before him, Sulaymān said to him, "Either you sold them (i.e., his testes), and we will give you the full price; or else you gave them freely, and we will reward you." He related: By God, the man did not address him as Caliph, but spoke to him thus: "O Sulaymān, I adjure God against you! You have cut off my hopes of progeny, you have taken away all my honor and you have deprived me of all pleasure, and yet now you say, 'Either you gave them freely, and we will reward you, or else you sold them, and we will give you the full price!' Nay, by God, (never,) until I stand before God (i.e., for judgment)!" He related: Mūsā then said, "O slave, bring back the commander of the guard," so he brought him back, and the Caliph instructed him, "Don't place any obstacles in the man's way (i.e., let him go free)."

Abū Mūsā Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Ismā'īl b. Mūsā al-Hādī[246] has mentioned that 'Alī b. Ṣāliḥ transmitted the information to him that one day, when he was still a boy, he was standing close to [582] al-Hādī at a time when the latter had avoided[247] the duty of hear-

245. Sulaymān had the reputation later in Islamic lore of being a devotee of sex and of being extremely jealous about his harem. See Tha'ālibī, Laṭā'if, 117, tr. 96; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 114, tr. 123.

246. I.e., the grandson of al-Hādī's son Ismā'īl, who married Hārūn's daughter Fāṭimah (Ṭabarī, III, 577–8, above, 55).

247. Following the reading here of jafā, preferred by the editor, who notes, however (Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLX) that there seems to be a lacuna here, judging by the parallel passages in Bayhaqī's Maḥāsin and Ibn al-Athīr (see below, 62, n. 251).

ing petitions and complaints [maẓālim][248] for three entire days. [Ibrāhīm b. Dhakwān] al-Ḥarrānī came into his presence and said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, the mass of subjects will not remain obedient to your rule if you persist in these habits; it is three days since you last heard petitions and complaints." He thereupon turned to me and said, "O ʿAlī, let the people into my presence bi-al-jafalā and not bi-al-naqarā." I rushed forth from his presence in a headlong manner, but then I stopped short, and [I realized that] I did not know what he had told me to do. I said to myself, "If I refer back to the Commander of the Faithful for an explanation, he will say to me, 'Do you claim to act as my doorkeeper when you don't understand what I have said?'" Then my native wit returned, and I accordingly sent a message to a Bedouin who had arrived in a visiting delegation and questioned him about the words jafalā and naqarā. He replied, "Al-jafalā means jufālah [i.e., "group, body of people"] and al-naqarā is when he summons only the élite among them."[249] So I then gave orders for the curtains [i.e., those veiling the Caliph from the masses of petitioners] to be drawn aside and for the doors to be opened, and this was done.[250] The people entered en masse, and the Caliph remained busy receiving their petitions and complaints till nightfall. Then when the sessions broke up, I appeared before him and he said, "It looks as if you wish to mention some matter, O ʿAlī!" I replied, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful, you spoke to me using expressions which I had never heard before this very day, and I was afraid

248. Concerning this duty of meting out justice personally to the subjects, see H. F. Amedroz, "The Mazālim jurisdiction in the Aḥkam Sultaniyya of Mawardi," JRAS [1911], 635–74; R. Levy, The social structure of Islam, 348–51; EI[2] s.v. Maẓālim [J. S. Neilsen].

249. The lexica give jafalā, jufālah, ajfalā, etc., with the sense of "group, body of people, invited en masse and without distinction of person," the root j.-f.-l having the general meaning, however, of "to disperse quickly, flee in disorder" (Lane, Lexicon, s.v.); perhaps the connection lies in the idea of a mass stampede. The root n.-q.-r conveys such ideas as "pecking out, carving out, hollowing out, boring, excavating" (Lane, s.v.). The word naqarā used here obviously stems from the eschatological concept of the Angel Isrāfīl blowing [naqara] a horn [nāqūr] to summon the resurrected bodies for judgement (Qur'ān, LXXIV, 8), summoning them one by one.

250. On the curtains [astār, sing. sitr] veiling the monarch from the public, see E. Tyan, Institutions du droit public musulman. I. Le califat, 498–501; Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial ʿabbaside," 132.

to refer back to you lest you say, 'Do you claim to act as my doorkeeper when you don't understand what I have said?' Hence, I sent a message to a Bedouin who was here with us, and he elucidated the expressions for me. So reward him suitably on my behalf, O Commander of the Faithful!" He said, "Certainly; one hundred thousand dirhams will be conveyed to him." I protested to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, he is only a rough Bedouin, and ten thousand dirhams would satisfy him and be adequate recompense for him." He replied, "Shame upon you, O ʿAlī, I am being generous and you are behaving like a miser!"[251]

He related: ʿAlī b. Ṣāliḥ also transmitted the information to me, saying: Al-Hādī rode off one day with the intention of visiting his mother al-Khayzurān because of some illness from which she had suffered. But ʿUmar b. Bazīʿ planted himself in his path and said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, let me point out to you a course of action which will be more advantageous to you (i.e., in the sight of God) than this present one." He enquired, "What is that, O ʿUmar?" ʿUmar replied, "Looking into petitions and complaints—you haven't attended to them since three (nights) ago now." He related: The Caliph thereupon made a sign to his well-trained she-camel that he wished to turn aside to the building where petitions and complaints were heard. Then he sent a mes-
[583] sage to al-Khayzurān by the hand of one of his eunuchs conveying his excuses to her for his neglect in not visiting her, saying (to him), "Tell her that ʿUmar b. Bazīʿ has informed us about duties owed towards God which are more pressing upon us than duty towards you, so we have inclined to his words. We shall, however, visit you tomorrow morning, if God wills."[252]

It has been mentioned from ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik (al-Khuzāʿī) that he related: I used to hold the office of commander of the police guard [shurṭah] under al-Mahdī. Al-Mahdī would send for al-Hādī's boon-companions and singers and order me to have them beaten. Al-Hādī, in turn, would beg me to treat them with gentleness and consideration, but I would pay no heed to that and would just go on carrying out al-Mahdī's orders to me. He related: When al-Hādī succeeded to the caliphate, I felt certain that I was going to perish. He sent for me one day. I entered into his presence, with my shroud wrapped around me and having anointed myself with the spices and aromatic substances used to prepare corpses for burial, and behold, he was seated there on a stool [kursī][253] with the executioner's sword and leather mat before him. I greeted him with the taslīm salutation, but he replied, "May God not grant peace to the one regarded as an outcast! Do you recall the day when I sent to you concerning the matter of al-Ḥarrānī, and the beating and imprisonment which the Commander of the Faithful had ordered for him, yet you would not respond to me; and likewise, the matters of so-and-so and so-and-so"—and he began to enumerate the names of his boon-companions—"yet you paid no attention to my words nor to my orders!"

251. Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 206–7 = ed. Ibrāhīm, I, 311–13; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 101–2.

252. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 102; Abbott, 84.

I responded, "True, O Commander of the Faithful, but will you now allow me to provide a complete justification?" He said, "Yes." I began, "I adjure you by God, O Commander of the Faithful, would you yourself be pleased if you had appointed me to the office to which your father appointed me, and you commanded me to do a certain thing, and then one of your sons sent a message to me ordering me to do something which was completely counter to your original command, and I then carried out his orders but disobeyed yours?" He admitted, "No." I then replied, "That is how I stand in relationship to you at present, and how I stood in relationship to your father in the past." He thereupon made me draw near, and I kissed his hands. He ordered robes of honor (to be brought), and largesse was bestowed on me. Then he said, "I have reappointed you to your old office, so go forth as one established in the right course." I departed from his presence and proceeded to my residence, reflecting about my position and his attitude, and I said to myself, "(He is) a young man who drinks wine, and the group of persons regarding whom I disobeyed him (during the previous reign) are now his boon-companions, viziers, and secretaries. I can visualize myself in regard to them, when the effects of [584]

253. For the kursī, originally an Iranian article of furniture, see Sourdel, "Questions de cérémoniale 'abbaside," 131; J. Sadan, Le mobilier au Proche Orient médiéval, 92–4, 123 ff; EI[2] s.v. (Huart and Sadan). Here the implication is that it was exceptional for al-Hādī to sit himself thus.

wine take control of them and they will have countermanded his decision about me and will have impelled him to act concerning me in a way which I would hate and fear (i.e., they would bring about his destruction)."

He related: I was sitting there, round about that time, with one of my small daughters before me and with a brazier in front of me and some thin cakes of bread which I was dividing up with some spicy vinegar relish [kāmakh][254] and then toasting on the fire and feeding to the child, when suddenly there was a great noise, till I imagined that the whole world had been torn up by its roots and shaken with the beating of hoofs and the immense clamor. I said to myself, "By God, this is what I thought would happen, and what I feared of the Caliph's vengeance (or: of God's decree, min amrihi) has now caught up with me." Then the door was thrown open, the eunuch attendants burst in, and there was the Commander of the Faithful, al-Hādī, mounted on an ass in their midst. When I saw him, I jumped up from my seat, hastening (towards him), and kissed his hand, his foot, and the hoof of his ass. Then he said to me, "O ʿAbdallāh, I have been thinking about your affair, and I said to myself, 'It may readily come into your mind that, when I have been drinking wine, surrounded by your enemies, they might controvert the favorable attitude which I now have towards you.' This could have perturbed you and given you cause for alarm. Hence, I have come to your house in order to put you at ease and to let you realize that all rancor towards you has been dispelled from my mind. So come and bring me to eat something of what you yourself were eating, and carry on preparing the food which you were preparing, so that you may know that, through eating your food, I have entered into a relationship which prevents me from harming you and have become completely at home in your house; thus your fear and apprehension will vanish away." I brought before him the thin cakes of bread and the bowl[255] containing the spicy

254. From Persian kāmah, older form kāmak, "sour and piquant hors d'oeuvres," various types of kawāmikh being described by Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 392–4 = ed. Pellat, § 3554. Also, the Ayyūbid period cookery book, the K. al-Wuṣlah ilā al-ḥabīb, defines kāmakh baghdādī as a kind of concoction for seasoning with gourds and yoghourt. See M. Rodinson, "Recherches sur les documents arabes relatifs à la cuisine," REI (1949), 142; Ahsan, 106–7.

255. Sukurrajah, presumably the sukrūjah of Dozy, Supplément, I, 668b.

vinegar relish, and he ate some of it. Then he said, "Bring in the gifts which I have bestowed on ʿAbdallāh from my own court session," and four hundred mules loaded with dirhams were brought in to me. He said, "This is a gift for you, so use it for your own personal affairs, and keep these mules for me in your care, for I may need them one day for some journey or other of mine." Then he said, "May God protect you with goodness!" and he went away homewards.[256]

Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh has mentioned that his father gave him the garden which he had in the midst of his residence, and he then built around it stables for those mules. He used to supervise them personally and look after their welfare as long as al-Hādī remained alive.

[585]

Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd b. Ṭahmān al-Sulamī[257] has mentioned that his father related to him, saying: ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān used to get angry when the Caliph got angry and show himself pleased when the Caliph was pleased. My father (sc. Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd) used to say: I don't feel towards any Arab or non-Arab the way I feel towards ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, for he came in one day to me in prison with a whip in his hand and said, "The Commander of the Faithful Mūsā al-Hādī has ordered me to beat you with a hundred lashes." He related: He stepped forward, and laid it on my arms and shoulders, striking me with it until he had counted out a hundred strokes, and then he left. He (i.e., the Caliph) said to him (i.e., ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān), "What did you do with the fellow?" He replied, "I dealt with him according to your command." He said, "And how is he now?" He replied, "He is dead." The Caliph exclaimed, "Indeed we belong to God and to Him we shall return! Woe upon you! By God, you have brought me into disgrace in the eyes of the people! This was a righteous man! The people will say, 'He has killed Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd!'" He related: When ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā saw how violently the Caliph was grieved, he informed him, "He is in fact alive, O Commander of the Faithful, he didn't die!". The Caliph exclaimed, "God be praised for that!"[258]

256. Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 189–90 = ed. Ibrāhīm, I, 286–8; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 102–3; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 171–2, tr. 185–6.

257. Rāwī mentioned several times by Ṭabarī for events in al-Mahdī's reign, and despite the similarity in names and nisbah, his grandfather is not apparently to be confused with al-Mahdī's chief minister Yaʿqūb b. Dāwūd b. ʿUmar b. ʿUthmān al-Sulamī, on whom see Ṭabarī, III, 688 (below, 230, n. 800), and Masʿūdī, Murūj, ed. Pellat, Index, VII, 775–6.

He related: Al-Hādī had appointed as his doorkeeper [ḥājib] after al-Rabī'[259] the latter's son al-Faḍl. He said to al-Faḍl, "Don't keep back the people from access to me, for that will deprive me of the aura of divine blessing, and don't bring before my attention any matter which, when I have investigated it, turns out to be of no consequence, for that depreciates royal power and is harmful to the subjects."[260]

Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh (b. Mālik) related: A man was brought before Mūsā (al-Hādī), and the latter began to reproach him for his crimes and to threaten him. The man replied to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, my excusing myself from what you are reproaching me with would be contradicting you, whilst my acknowledging its truth would be imputing to myself a crime. I would rather say to you,

'If you have been hoping to merit divine mercy by inflicting punishment, then do not hold yourself back from the recompense earned by an act of pardoning.'"

He related: The Caliph ordered the man to be set at liberty.[261]

[586] 'Umar b. Shabbah[262] has mentioned that Sa'īd b. Salm was once with Mūsā al-Hādī. A delegation from the Byzantines came into his presence, and Sa'īd b. Salm was at that moment wearing a cap [qalansuwah]; he had become bald even though he was still only young. Mūsā said to him, "Take off your cap, so that you give an appearance of wisdom and seniority [tatashāyakhu] through your bald head!"[263]

---

258. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 103–4.

259. Who had died around this time, conceivably poisoned by al-Hādī, see Ṭabarī, III, 597–8 (below, 85–86).

260. Cf. Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 173 = ed. Ibrāhīm, I, 262–3.

261. Jahshiyārī, 127–8 (according to whom the man was one of his secretaries); Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 283 = ed. Pellat, § 2487; Azdī, 260–1; Ibn al-Abbār, I'tāb al-kuttāb, 75.

262. Baṣran reciter of historical traditions, died in 264 (877), author of several works known only fragmentarily and of a history of al-Madīnah recently edited by Ḥabīb Muḥammad Aḥmad, Ta'rīkh al-Madīnah al-munawwarah, Jeddah 1393/1973, 4 vols.; see GAS, I, 345–6.

263. Azdī, 269.

Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbd al-Khāliq has mentioned that his father transmitted to him the information, saying: I set off for ʿĪsābādh, intending to visit al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ, and I encountered the Commander of the Faithful, Mūsā, but I did not recognize him. For lo, he was wearing a thin shift,[264] mounted on a horse and with a bamboo spear shaft in his hand. Every person he met, he thrust at with this shaft.[265] He said to me, "O son of a whore!" He related: I perceived a man, with the stature of an idol—I had actually seen him previously in Syria—whose thighs were like the thighs of a camel. I clapped my hand to the hilt of my sword, but a man then said to me, "Woe upon you, (this is) the Commander of the Faithful!" At that, I spurred on my riding beast—which happened to be a horse of Persian breed,[266] which al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ had presented to me, he having purchased it earlier for four thousand dirhams—and went into the residence of Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim, the commander of the Caliph's personal bodyguard. The Caliph halted at the gate, with the bamboo shaft in his hand, and exclaimed, "Get away, you son of a whore!" I nevertheless refused to budge, and he passed by and proceeded on his way. I told al-Faḍl, "I saw the Commander of the Faithful and so-and-so took place." He replied, "In my judgement, your only hope of salvation lies in your making for Baghdad. When I myself go there to perform the Friday worship, meet me then." He related: I never set foot in ʿĪsābādh again until al-Hādī perished.

Al-Haytham b. ʿUrwah al-Anṣārī has mentioned that al-Ḥusayn b. Muʿādh b. Muslim,[267] who was the foster-brother of Mūsā al-Hādī, related: I used to spend a lot of time with Mūsā, with just the two of us present, and I never felt in my mind any feeling of apprehension from his high status when we were alone together because he always used to put me at my ease. On occasion (or: often[268]), he wrestled with me and I would throw him on the 264. Ghilālah; see for this garment, Ṭabarī, III, 753 (below, 320, and n. 1070).

265. Cf. Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 26.

266. For shihrī (? shahrī) "Persian or Kurdish horse," pl. shahārī, see BGA, IV, Indices, glossarium et addenda et emendanda ad Part. I–III, 277–8: < O Ir. khshathriya- "royal"; cf. Jāḥiẓ, Risālah fī manāqib al-Atrāk wa-ʿāmmat jund al-khilāfah, in Majmūʿat rasāʾil, Cairo 1323 (1905–6), 11: al-khuyūl al-shihriyyah.

267. Son of a Khurasanian mawlā and brother of Muʿādh, who later served as deputy governor of Khurasan and governor of Syria. See Ṭabarī, III, 711; Crone, 184.

268. Inserting the word rubbamā, as in the Cairo text, VIII, 218.

ground, without any fear of him, and would pound the ground with him. But when he assumed the mantle of the caliphate, and then took his place on the seat from which commands and prohibitions are given out, I stood by his head; and by God, I could hardly contain myself from terror and fear of him!

[587] Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbd al-Khāliq has mentioned that Muḥammad b. Saʿīd b. ʿUmar b. Mihrān[269] transmitted the information to him from his father, who had it from his grandfather, who said: The highest rank at al-Hādī's court was held by Ibrāhīm b. Salm b. Qutaybah. One of Ibrāhīm's sons called Salm died, and Mūsā al-Hādī came to him on a visit of condolence for the son's death mounted on a greyish-white ass—no one coming to visit him (i.e., al-Hādī) was ever prevented and no one giving a greeting was sent back—until he dismounted in his (i.e., Ibrāhīm's portico. Then he said, "O Ibrāhīm, (one's child) brings you joy, even when he is hostile and a source of dissension, and brings you grief, even when he is a source of blessing and mercy!" Ibrāhīm replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, every part of me that formerly contained grief has now become filled with consolation." He related: When Ibrāhīm died, the highest rank (at court) passed to (his brother) Saʿīd b. Salm after him.[270]

ʿUmar b. Shabbah has mentioned that ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib[271] used to be called al-Jazarī.[272] He married Ruqayyah bt. ʿAmr al-ʿUthmāniyyah, who had previously been the wife of al-Mahdī.[273] The news of this reached Mūsā al-Hādī in the opening days of his caliphate, and he sent a messenger to him, accusing him of acting imprudently. He said (in the message), "Was it impossible for you to find, among all other women, any wife except one who had been the Commander of the Faithful's wife?" He replied, "The only women whom God has declared 269. Presumably the grandson of the ʿUmar b. Mihrān, secretary to al-Khayzurān, who restored order in Egypt in 176 (792–3); see Ṭabarī, III, 626–8 (below, 134–37).

270. Azdī, 270; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 104; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 172, tr. 186–7.

271. I.e., the grandson of the Fourth Imām ʿAlī Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn and first cousin of Jaʿfar al-Ṣādiq.

272. This is normally the nisbah from al-Jazīrah, i.e., northern Iraq and northeastern Syria; see Samʿānī, K. al-Ansāb, III, 269–71.

273. Al-Mahdī had married her during his Pilgrimage visit to al-Madīnah in 160 (777). See Ṭabarī, III, 483; Abbott, 39.

forbidden for His creatures are the wives of my own forefather (i.e., of the Prophet); as for the rest, there is no prohibition whatsoever." The Caliph thereupon lashed him round the head with a staff which he happened to have in his hand, and ordered him to be given five hundred lashes of the whip; he was accordingly beaten thus. The Caliph wanted him to divorce her, but he refused.[274] He was then borne away from the Caliph's presence in an executioner's leather mat and hurled down away at one side. He had a very choice seal ring on his hand; one of the eunuchs saw it, at the time when 'Alī had lost consciousness from the flogging, and the eunuch bent over ('Alī) to the ring (i.e., in order to steal it from him). But 'Alī clutched at the eunuch's hand and struck it, so that the eunuch cried out. Mūsā flared up in anger and exclaimed, "He does this to my eunuch, in addition to his slighting my father and his (insolent) words to me!" He sent a message to him, "What [588] impelled you to do that?" He replied, "Speak with the eunuch, and inquire of him, and order him to place his hand on your head, and he will of certainty tell you the truth." Mūsā did that, and the eunuch told him the true story. He exclaimed, "By God, he acted correctly! I myself testify that he is truly a paternal cousin of mine! If he had not acted thus, I would have disowned him!" Then he ordered him to be set free.[275]

Abū Ibrāhīm al-Mu'adhdhin has mentioned that al-Hādī used to leap up on to his mount wearing two coats of mail, and al-Mahdī used to call him "My dear son!" (literally, "my sweet-smelling herb," rayḥānatī[276]).

Muḥammad b. 'Aṭā' b. Muqaddam al-Wāsiṭī has mentioned that his father transmitted the information to him that al-Mahdī said to Mūsā one day—at a time when a dualist infidel [zindīq] had just been brought before him, and he had asked the dualist to repent of his error, but the latter had refused, so the Caliph had had him decapitated and had ordered his corpse to be gibbeted—"O my 274. Abbott, 98.

275. Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 515–16 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 256–7; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 104.

276. From the tradition of the Prophet that he called al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn rayḥānatayya "my two sweet-smelling herbs"; see Majd al-Dīn Ibn al-Athīr, Nihāyah, II, 288.

dear son, if this royal authority passes to you, turn your whole attention vigorously to this gang ['iṣābah]"—he meant the adherents of Mani—"for they are a sect who summon men to what are superficially fine doctrines, such as the avoidance of immoral deeds, abstinence from the affairs of the material world, and conduct aimed at achieving a place in the hereafter. Then they lead men on to the prohibiting of all meat, the use of purified water only (i.e., for ritual ablutions), and the avoidance of killing any crawling insects or reptiles, as measures for avoiding all sinfulness and criminal behavior. Then from this stage, they lead men on to the worship of two principles, one of them light and the other darkness. After this, they declare lawful sexual relations with sisters and daughters, washing oneself in urine and stealing infants from the streets in order to save them from the erroneous path of darkness for the rightly guided way of light. So erect gibbets for this sect, unsheathe the sword among them, and by dealing with them thus draw yourself near to God, He has no partner! For indeed, I saw in a dream your ancestor al-'Abbās investing me with two swords[277] and commanding me to kill the dualists." He related: Mūsā said, ten months of his reign having elapsed, "Ho, by God, if I live, I shall certainly exterminate this sect in its entirety, to the point that I won't leave a single eye whose gaze can range forth!" It is said that he ordered one thousand palm-tree trunks to be erected for him to use (i.e., by gibbeting the dualists). He pronounced these words in such-and-such a month, and died two months later.[278]

Ayyūb b. 'Inābah[279] has mentioned that Mūsā b. Ṣāliḥ b.

277. The two swords in this dream are symbolic, but it was an ancient Arabian practice for warriors to bear two swords, and girding them on was adopted as part of the investiture ceremony for high officials under the 'Abbāsids, whence the honorific Dhū al-Sayfayn. See I. Goldziher, "Zwei Schwerter," Isl. XII (1922), 198–9 = Gesammelte Schriften, V, 469–70.

278. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 104–5; Vajda, "Les zindīqs en pays d'Islam," 190–1, citing valuable parallels to this description of allegedly Manichaean doctrines and practices, but noting that certain accusations, such as those of incest and immorality (cf. Ṭabarī, III, 551–2, above), are commonly launched at religious dissidents who have to pursue a clandestine existence, and that other accusations, such as that of washing in urine, reflect rather Zoroastrian practice; Farouk Omar, in 'Abbāsiyyāt, 92–3.

279. Mentioned as a rāwī in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, VII, 109 = ed. Cairo, VIII, 152.

Shaykh[280] transmitted the information to him that ʿĪsā b. Da'b [589] was the most knowledgeable person of the Ḥījāzīs about polite learning [adab] and the one with the sweetest speech. He had secured a place in al-Hādī's favor which no one else enjoyed in the Caliph's eyes. The Caliph used to summon for him a cushion or backrest on which he could prop himself,[281] a privilege which he never extended to anyone else in his court circle, and he used to say, "I have never deemed a single day or night with you to be too long, nor have you ever been absent from my sight without my wishing that I might see no one but you." ʿĪsā was amusing company to joke with, a pleasant companion for nocturnal storytelling sessions, full of remarkable stories, excellent at poetry and adept at citing verses appositely.[282]

He related: Hence, on a certain night, the Caliph ordered him to be given thirty thousand dīnārs. When Ibn Da'b arose next morning, he sent his steward to Mūsā's gate, and he said to the steward, "Make contact with the chamberlain, and tell him to forward this sum of money to us." The steward accordingly made contact with the chamberlain and conveyed to him Ibn Da'b's message. But the chamberlain smiled and said, "This is not within my sphere of responsibility; go off and find the man who will countersign [the order] [ṣāḥib al-tawqīʿ], so that he may issue for Ibn Da'b a letter of authorization to the Dīwān (i.e., the exchequer). You can then make the necessary arrangements for it here, and subsequently proceed concerning it in such-and-such a manner." So he went back to Ibn Da'b and told him the story. Ibn Da'b said, "Drop the whole affair; don't devote any more effort to it and don't make any more inquiries about it."

He related: Now whilst Mūsā was up on a belvedere [mustashraf] of his in Baghdad, he suddenly noticed that Ibn Da'b had drawn near, unaccompanied except by a solitary slave boy. So he said to Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarrānī, "Just look at Ibn Da'b! He hasn't changed a single feature of his usual mode of life, nor has he spruced himself up for us, even though we showed our bountiful-

280. Rāwī who is later mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 1641, as taking part in the events around the abdication of the Caliph al-Musta'īn in 251 (866).

281. Muttaka', for which see Sadan, 113–14.

282. Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 207 = ed. Ibrāhīm, I, 313; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 263–4 = ed. Pellat, § 2471.

ness to him yesterday in order that our marks of favor might be visible upon him." Ibrāhīm said to him, "If the Commander of the Faithful commanded (a similar favor) for me, I would display something of that to him." The Caliph commented, "No, he knows his own business best." Ibn Da'b entered and started to engage in conversation with the Caliph until Mūsā raised with him the topic of some aspects of his present condition, saying to him, "I see that your robe is much washed, and this is winter weather; a new and soft robe is required for it." Ibn Da'b replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, my means are too exiguous for me to satisfy my needs." The Caliph said, "How can this be, when we have just allocated to you as much of our largesse as we thought [590] would provide fittingly for your status?" He responded, "It hasn't reached me (yet) and I haven't got my hands on it!" So the Caliph sent for the official in charge of the Privy Exchequer [ṣāḥib bayt māl al-khāṣṣah] and told him, "Rush thirty thousand dīnārs to him this very instant!" The sum was brought in, and was transported (to his house) in front of his gaze.[283]

'Alī b. Muḥammad[284] has mentioned that his father transmitted the information to him from 'Alī b. Yaqṭīn, saying: One night, I was with Mūsā, in the company of a group of his companions, when suddenly there came to him a eunuch who whispered something in his ear secretly. Thereupon, the Caliph sprang up with alacrity, saying, "Don't disperse," and went off. He was away for a considerable time, but then came back, breathing heavily. He hurled himself down on his couch, still breathing heavily for a while until he became calm again. He had with him a eunuch carrying a dish covered over with a napkin. The eunuch stood before him and then came forward trembling. We were amazed at all this. Then the Caliph sat up and said to the eunuch, "Set down what you are carrying," so he put down the dish. He said to the eunuch, "Take off the napkin," so he did this, and behold, the dish

283. Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 207–8 = ed. Ibrāhīm, 313–14; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 105–6. For further anecdotes of Ibn Da'b and al-Hādī, see Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 264–5, 270–7 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2472, 2478.

284. I.e., 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Sayf al-Madā'inī, historian who was among Ṭabarī's most important sources; he probably died in 228 (843). See GAL, S I, 214–15; GAS, I, 314–15; *EI*² s.v. (U. Sezgin).

held the heads of two slave girls, with more beautiful faces and hair, by God, than I had ever seen before; there were jewels on their heads, arranged in the hair, and a sweet perfume was diffused (from them). We found this a horrific sight. The Caliph said, "Do you know what these two were up to?" We replied in the negative. He said, "We received information that they were in love with each other, and had got together for an immoral purpose. So I set this eunuch to watch over them and to report to me what they were doing. In due course, he came to me and informed me that they had got together, so I went along and found them under a single coverlet committing an immoral act. I thereupon killed them." After saying this, he told the slave to take the two heads away. He related: The Caliph then resumed his former conversation as if he had done nothing unusual in the meantime.[285]

Abū al-ʿAbbās b. Abī Mālik al-Yamāmī has mentioned that ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad al-Bawwāb related: I used to act as al-Hādī's doorkeeper and chamberlain, deputizing for al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ. He related: One day, the Caliph was holding a court session when I was in his palace. He had just eaten his midday meal, and had called for some date wine [nabīdh]. Previous to that, he had gone into his mother al-Khayzurān's presence and she had asked him to appoint his maternal uncle al-Ghiṭrīf[286] as governor of the Yemen; he had replied, "Remind me about it before I get involved in the wine-drinking session." He related: When the Caliph had determined on his drinking session, al-Khayzurān sent to him either Munīrah or Zahrah (i.e., one of her slave attendants) in order [591] to remind him. The Caliph said, "Go back and tell her, 'Choose for him (i.e., for Ghiṭrīf) either the divorcing (i.e., by myself) of his daughter ʿUbaydah or else the governorship of the Yemen!'" However, the slave girl only understood his words "Choose for him!"

285. See on this episode of lesbianism—which must have been rife in the enclosed life of the harem—Abbott, 98–9. On lesbian sexual activity (saḥq, siḥāq) in early ʿAbbāsid society, see Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Munajjid, *al-Ḥayāt al-jinsiyyah ʿind al-ʿArab*², 89–92, and E. Wagner, Abū Nuwās, eine Studie zur arabischen Literatur der frühen ʿAbbāsidenzeit, 179–80.

286. See Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 481. Al-Ghiṭrīf b. ʿAṭāʾ was the brother of al-Hādī's mother al-Khayzurān, and also his father-in-law; he rose from slave origins to this governorship and then to that of Khurāsān. See *EI*² Suppl. s.v. (Bosworth), and for this particular episode, Abbott, 88–9, and Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 26.

and she went on her way. Al-Khayzurān said, "I have already chosen for him the governorship of the Yemen." Al-Hādī thereupon divorced al-Ghiṭrīf's daughter ʿUbaydah. The Caliph heard the clamor (i.e., arising from the women's quarters), and said (to al-Khayzurān), "What's the matter with you all?" Al-Khayzurān then told him what had happened. He retorted, "You yourself made the choice for him," but she protested, "The message from you wasn't conveyed to me in those terms." He related: The Caliph ordered Ṣāliḥ, the ṣāḥib al-muṣallā, to stand with his sword over his boon-companions, with the instructions that they were to divorce their wives. The eunuchs came out to me with these instructions, and also to inform me that I was not to allow anyone in.[287]

He related: There was standing at the door a man muffled up in his ṭaylasān,[288] shifting his weight from one foot to the other. At that point, there occurred to me two verses of poetry, and I recited them, those verses being:

O my two friends of the tribe of Saʿd, halt and greet Maryam—may God not make Maryam distant!
And say to her, "Have you really resolved on this separation, and is there any act of favor after this which might be known [fa-yuʿlamā]?

He related: The man muffled up in his ṭaylasān then said to me, "(The correct word is) fa-naʿlamā ("Which we might know")!" I replied, "What is the difference between yuʿlamā and naʿlamā?" He said, "Poetry is rendered excellent by its meaning, and it may be spoilt by its meaning; (in this instance), we don't want people in general to know our secret thoughts."[289] I said to him, "I have a better knowledge of this poetry than you." He said, "Who is the author of the poetry?" I replied, "Al-Aswad b. ʿUmārah al-

287. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XIII, 13 = ed. Cairo, XIV, 171–2.

288. I.e., the hood or scarf-like garment which went over the head and shoulders, often considered to be in origin a Persian garment. See Dozy, Dictionnaire détaillé des noms de vêtements chez les arabes, 278–90; D. A. Agius, Arabic literary works as a source of documentation for technical terms of the material culture, 218–20.

289. I.e., the specific, more restrictive first person plural active verb gives a better meaning in the context of the two verses than the vague, general third person singular passive verb.

Nawfalī."[290] He then informed me, "I am he." I went up to him closely and related to him the story of Mūsā, and gave my apologies to him for my repeated questioning and arguing with him. He related: He turned away his mount and observed, "The best plan is to quit this residence!"[291]

Muṣʿab [b. ʿAbdallāh] al-Zubayrī[292] related that Abū al-Muʿāfā[293] said: I recited to al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad[294] a eulogy on Mūsā and Hārūn,

O Khayzurán, may greeting on greeting be upon you! [592]
Your two sons will surely rule over the people![295]

He related: He told me, "I am giving you sound advice; al-Yamānī has said, 'Don't mention my mother either with good or ill!'"[296]

Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Abī Fanan [?][297] has mentioned that Yūsuf al-Ṣayqal, the poet of Wāsiṭ,[298] transmitted the information to him, saying: We were with al-Hādī in Jurjān before he succeeded to the caliphate and entered Baghdad. He went up on to a fine belvedere which he had, and someone[299] sang this verse of poetry, 290. Poet who was at one point of his career head of the state treasury in al-Madīnah. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XIII, 12–14 = ed. Cairo, XIV, 169–73.

---

291. Ibid., ed. Būlāq, XIII, 13–14 = ed. Cairo, XIV, 172.

292. Descendant of the Successor Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr and author of the genealogical work al-Jamharah fī nasab Quraysh, died in 233 (848) or 236 (851). See GAL, S I, 212; GAS, I, 271–2.

293. I.e., Abū al-Muʿāfā Yaʿqūb b. Ismāʿīl al-Muzanī, poet of Syria and Iraq. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, IV, 122 = ed. Cairo, IV, 415–16; Marzubānī, Muʿjam al-shuʿarā', 496; GAS, II, 479.

294. Presumably, the senior ʿAbbāsid prince, see Ṭabarī, III, 547 (above, 7).

295. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 269 = ed. Pellat, § 2476; Azdī, 257; Munierah al-Rasheed, The Abū Ḥafṣah family of poets, 149, no. 130; Abbott, 53. In Thaʿālibī, Laṭā'if, 81, tr. 81, the verse is attributed to Ibn Abī Ḥafṣah, presumably Abū Simṭ Marwān b. Sulaymān (105–82 [723–97]) of the famous poetic family; see GAL, I², 73, S I, 112–13, and GAS, II, 447–8.

296. I.e., such a reference would be impolite and a personal intrusion. The reference to "al-Yamānī" is obscure; Marzubānī, 515, mentions a poet named Abū al-Humaysiʿ al-Yamānī.

297. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XX, 93 = ed. Cairo, XXIII, 217, has Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ al-Hishāmī for this name.

298. I.e., Yūsuf b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Ṣayqal al-Thaqafī, nicknamed al-Laqwah "having a contorted face," poet and secretary from al-Kūfah of the period of al-Hādī and al-Rashīd, and companion of Abū Nuwās. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XX, 93–6 = ed. Cairo, XXIII, 217–23; Ibn al-Abbār, 96–7, with the nisbah of "al-Kūfī"; GAS, II, 615.

299. In Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, loc. cit., the singer is Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī.

And their men have hoisted over their shoulders[300] their Rudaynī spears,[301] getting ready for action.

He said, "How does this poem go?" So they recited (the whole of it) to him. He went on, "I would have preferred this singing to be of a more tender and delicate poem than this; go along to Yūsuf al-Ṣayqal and get him to recite (some much more suitable poetry)." He related: So they came to me and told me the story. I accordingly recited,

Do not blame me for showing grief,
(for) my lord has become distant and inaccessible (to me).
Alas for my sorrow, if the former relations between us have been severed!
Indeed, Mūsā, through his generosity, has gathered together within himself all generosity.

He related: He looked up, and behold, there was a camel before him. Al-Hādī said, "Load up this beast with dirhams and dīnārs and convey that load of money to him." He related: They then brought to me the loaded camel.[302]

Muḥammad b. Sa'd[303] has mentioned that Abū Zuhayr transmitted the information to him, saying: Ibn Da'b was the most highly favored of men in al-Hādī's eyes. One day, al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' sallied forth and announced, "The Commander of the Faithful orders everyone waiting at his gate to go away, but as for you, O Ibn Da'b, please enter!" Ibn Da'b related: I went into the Caliph's presence and found him sprawled out on his couch, and his eyes [593] were bloodshot and red from sleeplessness and from the wine which he had drunk the previous night. He said to me, "Recount to me a story about wine drinking." I replied, "Certainly, O Commander of the Faithful. A group of men from the tribe of Kinā-

300. There are significant variants for this hemistich in Ms. C and in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XX, 93 = ed. Cairo, XXIII, 217.

301. I.e., with well-straightened shafts, allegedly from a woman called Rudaynah who was expert at straightening these; see Lisān al-'Arab[1], XVII, 37.

302. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XX, 93–4 = ed. Cairo, XXIII, 217.

303. The great traditionist, historian, and biographer of the generations of early Muslims, died in 230 (845). See GAL, I[2], 142–3, SI, 208; GAS, I, 300–11, EI[2] s.v. Ibn Sa'd (Fück).

nah[304] went forth in search of wine from Syria.[305] The brother of one of them died, so they all sat round his grave, drinking wine, and one of them recited,

Do not be niggardly in giving to the screech-owl[306] its required drink;
give the dead man wine to drink, even though he has been laid in his tomb.
Give to drink limbs, skulls and contents of the skull in the manner of a wind which dispels the morning clouds and as one setting out in the morning.
He was a noble one, and he came to his death among those who died;
every spring and branch is shattered.[307]

He related: The Caliph sent for an inkstand and wrote the verses down, and then he instructed al-Ḥarrānī (to issue to Ibn Da'b) forty thousand dirhams, saying that ten thousand were for himself and thirty thousand were for the three verses of poetry. He related: I went to al-Ḥarrānī, and he said, "Come to an arrangement with us over ten thousand dirhams, with the stipulation that you swear to us never to mention it to the Commander of the Faithful." I duly swore that I would never mention it to the Commander of the Faithful until he should predecease me. Then he (i.e., Mūsā al-Hādī) died, and he never mentioned it until the caliphate passed to al-Rashīd.[308]

---

304. Tribe of the Ḥijāz, to whom Quraysh of Mecca were reckoned; see EI[2] s.v. (Watt).

305. Wine had, of course, to be imported into the Arabian peninsula from the wine-growing lands to the north.

306. The owl [hāmah], generally regarded as a bird of ill-omen, was believed to hover over the grave of an unavenged person until blood had been exacted in reparation. See Goldziher, "Der Seelenvogel im islamischen Volksglauben," Globus, LXXXIII (1902), 302–3 = Gesammelte Schriften, IV, 404–5; Sir Charles Lyall, Translations of ancient Arabian poetry chiefly pre-Islamic, pp. xxx, 67; T. Fahd, La divination arabe, 513; and now the penetrating study by T. E. Homerin, "Echoes of a thirsty owl: death and afterlife in pre-Islamic Arabic poetry," JNES, XLIV (1985), 165–84, with an examination at pp. 175–7 of the semantic connections of the terms hāmah "owl/skull" and ṣadā "owl/brain/contents of the skull" used in the verses cited here.

307. Emending the vowelling of the last words of each line, in accordance with the Cairo text, VIII, 224: qubir, al-mubtakir, munkasir.

308. In Jahshiyārī, 130–1, the indignant Ibn Da'b tears up the promissory note

Abū Du'āmah[309] has mentioned that Salm b. 'Amr al-Khāsir[310] eulogized Mūsā al-Hādī and recited,

At 'Īsābādh is a noble one of Quraysh, at whose sides is always to be found abundantly flowing wine.
The Muslims resort to his flanks for protection whenever there is anything to be feared or to be hoped for.
In the main square (i.e., of Baghdad) are lofty residences which people who claim a relationship have erected.
But how many persons make the claim, "I am of sound lineage," when all created beings and the person of handsome appearance reject it!
Such a person has a pride in lineage, which he is niggardly over, in order that he may achieve a permanent reputation;
    yet no one who is niggardly over this secures immortality!
[594] There is blame[311] upon al-Ḍabbī, which cannot be concealed;
    he conceals it, but the cover is ripped away.
By my life, if Abū Khadīj were to construct a house, the structure would never be demolished![312]

He related: Salm al-Khāsir recited, when Mūsā took over the caliphate after al-Mahdī, Mūsā has obtained the caliphate and the divine guidance, and the Commander of the Faithful Muḥammad (i.e., al-Mahdī) has died.

Thus the one whose loss has affected the whole of mankind has died, but is cheated of obtaining justice by the Caliph's death shortly afterwards; cf. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 123 n. 2.

---

309. I.e., 'Alī b. Yazīd, a rāwī mentioned in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, III, 129 = ed. Cairo, IV, 8, as quoting Yaḥyā b. Khālid al-Barmakī.

310. Eulogist of the early 'Abbāsids, died in 186 (802). See Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 165; GAL, S I, 113; GAS, II, 511–12.

311. The Cairo text, VIII, 224, has lu'm "ignobleness" for the Leiden text's lawm "blame."

312. G. E. von Grunebaum, "Three Arabic poets of the early Abbasid age. V. Salm al-Ḥāsir," Orientalia, XIX (1950), 62, no. II = Shu'arā' 'Abbāsiyyūn, 92, no. 2. The reference to "Abū Khadīj," literally "father of a prematurely born camel foal, or of a sickly calf," is presumably to Mūsā as the father of a newly born son at that particular moment.

and the one who will satisfactorily take the place for you of the one whose loss is felt, has arisen (in his place).[313]

He also recited,

(Other) monarchs become hidden on account of Mūsā, on the occasion of his rise to eminence, just as the stars (are concealed) because of the shining rays of the sun, when these last appear.
There is not a single person, out of all creation, who sees a full moon and its rising into view, and is not abased or becomes submissive (before it).[314]

He also recited,

Were it not for the Caliph Mūsā (coming) after his father, there would be no successor for the people after their divinely appointed leader [mahdiyyihim].[315]
Do you not see the community of the gentile prophet [ummat al-ummī] going down to get water (i.e., life enhancement, succor), as if they were scooping up water from the regions adjoining the sea,
From the two hands of a monarch whose munificent gifts have become universal, as if his gifts, because of his generosity, were spendthriftiness?[316]

Idrīs b. Abī Ḥafṣah[317] has mentioned that (Abū Simṭ) Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah[318] transmitted the information to him, saying: When

313. Von Grunebaum, op. cit., 64, no. IX = Shu'arā' 'Abbāsiyyūn, 96, no. 9. There is a play on words from the same root [jināṣ] in this verse, between faqd "loss" and man yutafaqqadu "the one who loss is felt."

314. Von Grunebaum, op. cit., 71, no. XXXI = Shu'arā' 'Abbāsiyyūn, 107, no. 31.

315. With a play upon words between the Caliph al-Mahdī's laqab or honorific and the concept of the eschatological figure of the awaited charismatic leader, whose appearance on earth will herald the coming end of the world; see *EI*² s.v. al-Mahdī (Madelung).

316. Von Grunebaum, op. cit., 71, no. XXXIII.

317. I.e., Abū Sulaymān Idrīs b. Yaḥyā b. Abī Ḥafṣah, brother of Abū Simṭ Marwān, and himself a poet of secondary importance. See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 182, tr. B. Dodge, I, 354; GAS, II, 582.

318. The first poet of major importance from this famed poetic family, and a Mūsā al-Hādī came to power, I went into his presence and recited to him,

If my soul were granted immortality after the Imām Muḥammad (i.e., al-Mahdī), it would not rejoice at its prospect of perpetual existence.[319]

He (i.e., Marwān) related: I uttered panegyric poetry, and recited concerning him,

Your father strengthened my personal position with (a gift of) 70,000 (dirhams) and provided me with nourishment and clothing, and indeed, I saw face-to-face in that a remarkable sight.[320]
Indeed, I am certain, O Commander of the Faithful, that my share of liberality (literally, "my drink") from your hands will not be seen as one doled out in a niggardly fashion.[321]

When I recited this poetry to him, he said, "Who can reach the extent of al-Mahdī (in generosity)? Nevertheless, we shall render you contented." He related: But death came upon him before anything else, and he never gave me anything; I did not receive a single dirham from anyone until al-Rashīd's accession.

[595] Hārūn b. Mūsā al-Farawī[322] has mentioned that Abū Ghuzayyah (al-Anṣārī)[323] transmitted the information to him from al-Ḍaḥḥāk fierce defender of the legal claims to rule of the ʿAbbāsids against the ʿAlids, died ca. 181 (797). See A. H. Harley, "Abu's-Simṭ Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah—a postclassical Arab poet," JRASB, Letters, III (1937), 71–90; GAS, II, 447–8; *EI*² s.v. Marwān al-Akbar b. Abī Ḥafṣa (J. E. Bencheikh).

---

319. Six other verses of this poem are to be found in the anthology of Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-ʿUbaydī, al-Tadhkirah al-saʿdiyyah, see Munierah al-Rasheed, 184; Shiʿr Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah, ed. Ḥusayn ʿAṭawān, 15 no. 1; Harley, 83.

320. Reading with the Cairo text, VIII, 225, mashhadā.

321. Munierah al-Rasheed, 119 no. 58; Shiʿr Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah, 30 no. 14,

322. Following Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLX, and the Cairo text, VIII, 225, pace the text's "al-Qarawī." He is mentioned as a rāwī in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, I, 187 = ed. Cairo, II, 55.

323. Judge of Medina and a rāwī in Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, III, 135, 155, VIII, 104–5 = ed. Cairo, IV, 20, 58, IX, 165–6, for events in connection with the poet Abū al-ʿAtāhiyah at al-Mahdī's court.

b. Ma'n al-Sulamī, who said: I went into Mūsā's presence, and I recited to him the verses,

O you two places of the heart's yearning, speak, for at you I often used to see (in the past) al-Rabāb and Kulthum (i.e., two beloved ones)!
There are not two places of former encampment, in a condition of ancientness and decay, which move to tears more strongly what lies beneath the ribs (i.e., the heart) than you two places!
Return a salutation on an old man, whose emotions the ruined traces of the two encampments have stirred up and who has become deeply moved, and then give a (further) salutation!

He related: I eulogized him in these verses, and then when I reached the verse,

With the agility of his fingertips in activity (i.e., in bestowing largesse) I thought that he would not leave a single dirham in the treasuries

he turned to the treasurer Aḥmad and said, "Woe upon you, O Aḥmad! It is as if he were looking at us only yesterday!" He related: He had in fact brought out that night a great sum of money and then distributed it.

It has been mentioned from Isḥāq al-Mawṣilī, or from someone else, relating from (Isḥāq's father) Ibrāhīm, who said: One day, we were in Mūsā's presence, and he had with him Ibn Jāmi'[324] and Mu'ādh b. al-Ṭabīb.[325] It was the first day that Mu'ādh had ever come into our circle; he was very expert in singing melodies and very knowledgeable about the more ancient songs. The Caliph said, "Whichever of you moves me the most to emotion, he can choose what he likes." So Ibn Jāmi' sang a song for him, but it failed to move the Caliph. I knew what kind of songs made up his 324. I.e., Abū al-Qāsim Ismā'īl b. Jāmi', musician and singer of Mecca and rival of Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī, died in 192 (808). See Farmer, 115–16; Ziriklī, A'lām, I, 306; EI[2] s.v. Ibn Djāmi' (A. Shiloah).

325. Cited as a rāwī and composer of melodies in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XIII, 133–4, XIV, 45 = ed. Cairo, XV, 68–71, 253.

object of desire. The Caliph said, "Step forward, O Ibrāhīm," so I sang to him,

Sulaymā has brought us together;
but where, O where, can we say[326] that she is?

At this, he became transported with emotion, to the point that he rose up from his seat, raised his voice and exclaimed, "Sing it again!" So I sang it again. He said, "This is the kind of song which is to my taste, so decide now what you want!" I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, the walled garden of ʿAbd al-Malik and its murmuring spring." At that, his eyes rolled round in his head until they became like two gleaming red-hot coals. Then he burst out, "O son of a stinking, uncircumcised whore! You wanted to let the people at large know that you were able to stir up my emotions and that I gave you your free choice and accordingly granted to you an estate! By God, were it not for the hasty error caused by your stupidity, [596] which has clouded your sound judgment, I would strike off that which contains your eyes (i.e., your head)!" Then he bowed his head in silence for a brief while, and I had a vision of the angel of death standing between me and him awaiting his word of command. Then he summoned Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarrānī and told him, "Take the hand of this stupid fellow, and lead him into the treasury; and then let him take from there whatever he likes." So al-Ḥarrānī brought me into the treasury and said, "How much are you going to take?" I replied, "A hundred purses."[327] He said, "Let me consult him (i.e., the Caliph)." He related: I said, "Eighty, then." He replied, "(Wait) until I consult him." I thereupon realized what he wanted, so I said, "Seventy purses for me and thirty for you!" He said, "Now you have put forward the correct solution! Please go ahead!" So I went away with seven hundred thousand dirhams, and the angel of death vanished from before my face.[328]

---

326. Reading, in accordance with Glossarium, P. DXXVIII, naqūluhā, for the text's nuqūluhā.

327. A badrah contained 10,000 dirhams, so this meant a total of one million dirhams.

328. In Jahshiyārī, 133–4, the singer is Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī, who arouses the Caliph's ire by asking for the property of Marwān (b. al-Ḥakam) in al-Madīnah, but is able to take his full reward without Ibrāhīm b. Dhakwān exacting his usual commission (cf. Ṭabarī, III, 593, above, 77). In Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, V, 16 =

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad (al-Nawfalī) has mentioned that Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī b. ʿAṭiyyah al-Aḍjam[329] transmitted the information to him from Ḥakam al-Wādī,[330] who said: Al-Hādī used to be fond of a moderate, measured emotional pitch of singing [al-ghinā' al-wasaṭ], the kind which has few often-repeated refrains [tarjīʿ],[331] but it did not have much appreciable effect of lightening his spirits. He related: One night, we were at one of his sessions, at which Ibn Jāmiʿ, al-Mawṣilī, al-Zubayr b. Daḥmān[332] and al-Ghanawī were also present, when the Caliph suddenly called for three purses of money. He ordered them to be brought in, and they were set down in the midst of the circle of the Caliph and his companions. Then he put them altogether in one heap and said, "Whoever can sing to me a melody which is consonant with the emotional state which I am at present feeling, shall have the whole lot." He related: Al-Hādī had a laudable trait of character in that, if he disliked a thing, he would never linger over it but would turn away from it. Ibn Jāmiʿ now sang to him, but he showed his aversion from it. All the other members of the assembled company then sang, but he started displaying a similar aversion until I myself sang. I adapted my singing to his emotional state, so that he cried out "Bravo! Bravo! Give me some wine to drink!" He then drank and became stirred with feeling. I got up and then sat down by the purses of money, and I knew that I had won possession of them. Ibn Jāmiʿ came forward in an approving, congratulatory manner and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, he (has sung), by God, just as you said, whereas all the rest of us, apart from him, have not sung in harmony with your present feelings." He related: The Caliph said,

---

ed. Cairo, VI, 184–5, the singer is Ibrāhīm, with the essential points in the story being those of Jahshiyārī.

329. Literary figure of Abnāʾ origin and resident in Wāsiṭ. It was allegedly (but improbably) he who strangled the poet Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah when the latter was ill in 181 (797) or 182 (798); see Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, IX, 48, XVIII, 37, 46 = ed. Cairo, X, 95, XX, 138, 147.

330. I.e., al-Ḥakam (b. Yaḥyā) b. Maymūn, a mawlā of Persian origin but a cameleer engaged in trade along the Wādī al-Qurā (hence his nisbah) in early life, and a famous singer under the last Umayyads and the early ʿAbbāsids up to Hārūn's time; see Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, VI, 64–8 = ed. Cairo, VI, 2808 et passim.

331. I.e., music which neither excited the emotions nor unduly depressed them.

332. Musician of Mecca of mawlā origin, and partisan of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī at Hārūn's court; see Farmer, 123–4.

"The purses are yours," and he went on drinking until his desire [597] for melodies was satisfied, and he got up. Then he said, "Instruct three of the attendants to bear the purses with him," and then he entered (his private apartments). We departed, walking across the courtyard, heading homewards. Ibn Jāmiʿ caught me up, and I said, "May I be made your ransom, O Abū al-Qāsim! You behaved as a person of your pedigree could be expected to do; so look in the money bags for what takes your fancy." Ibn Jāmiʿ replied, "May God vouchsafe to you His approval! We desired to increase your share of favour!" Al-Mawṣilī also caught up with us and said, "Present us with a gift (i.e., from the money bags)!" But I retorted, "Why should I? You didn't behave in a suitable manner at the court session! No, by God, you shan't have a single dirham!"[333]

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh has mentioned that Saʿīd al-Qāriʾ al-ʿAllāf, the companion[334] of Abān al-Qāriʾ,[335] told him that Mūsā's boon-companions were with him in his court session, including al-Ḥarrānī, Saʿīd b. Salm and others. Mūsā had a slave girl who used to pour out wine for them. She had a bantering, provocative manner, and she used to address one of the company as "O boorish one [jilfī]!"[336] and joke with others of them. Yazīd b. Mazyad came in, and he heard what she was saying to them. He therefore told her, "By the Great God! If you speak to me like you speak to them, I will certainly strike you a blow with my sword!" Mūsā said to her, "Woe upon you! He will indeed, by God, do what he says, so take care!" He related: She accordingly held back from him, and never exchanged any pleasantries with him. He related: Saʿīd al-ʿAllāf and Abān al-Qāriʾ were Ibāḍīs.[337]

---

333. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, VI, 67 = ed. Cairo, VI, 286–7, giving the actual words of Ḥakam al-Wādī's winning song.

334. Ṣāḥib. perhaps also "famulus, colleague, master," given the vagueness of this term.

335. Both these Qur'ān readers are mentioned by Ibn Qutaybah, 533. Saʿīd is described as being especially high in al-Rashīd's favor, being known as "the Qur'ān reader of the Commander of the Faithful." He is further cited by Ṭabarī, III, 1134, as an authority for an account of al-Ma'mūn's last illness and death.

336. Jilf has many meanings, according to the Lisān al-ʿArab[1], X, 375; the one followed here is that of "gross, coarse [al-jilf: al-aʿrābī al-jāfī], but another possibility might be "corpulent, with a sack-like figure" [al-ẓarf mithl al-khurj wa-al-juwāliq].

337. I.e., of the Ibāḍiyyah subsect of the Khārijites. See EI[2] s.v. [T. Lewicki]. These Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm b. Ismāʿīl b. Dāwūd al-Kātib[338] has mentioned that Ibn al-Qaddāḥ transmitted the information to him, saying: Al-Rabīʿ (b. Yūnus) had a slave girl called Amat al-ʿAzīz, of superlative beauty, a splendidly rounded bosom and shapely body. He presented her to al-Mahdī. When the latter perceived her beauty and fine appearance, he said, "This girl will be more suitable for Mūsā!"; hence he gave her to him. She became the most beloved of all creation to Mūsā, and gave birth to his elder sons.[339] Then a certain enemy of al-Rabīʿ's told Mūsā that he had heard al-Rabīʿ say, "I have never placed between myself and the earth anyone like Amat al-ʿAzīz." Mūsā became violently enraged with [598] jealousy at these words, and swore that he would kill al-Rabīʿ. So when he was appointed Caliph, he summoned al-Rabīʿ one day, and had his midday meal with him, showed him honor and handed to him a cup of wine mingled with honey. He related: Al-Rabīʿ said, "I realized that my life was contained in that cup (i.e., that it was poisoned), and that if I were to hand it back he would cut off my head, since I had for some time back been aware of his animus against me because of my going to his mother (i.e., to al-Khayzurān)[340] and because of (slanderous) reports he had received concerning me, without his having listened to any excuses from me. So I drank the cup." Al-Rabīʿ returned homewards. He gathered together his children and told them, "I am going to die, either on this very day or by next morning." His son al-Faḍl said to him, "Why do you say this, may I be made your ransom?" He said, "Mūsā gave me to drink, with his own hand, a poisoned drink, and I can feel it working in my body now." Then he made his last testament, setting forth his wishes, and died on that day or the foltwo Ibāḍī scholars may well have stemmed from the well-known group of Ibāḍīs in al-Baṣrah; see Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 212–14.

338. In Ṭabarī, III, 439, given the full nasab of . . . b. Muʿāwiyah b. Bakr, this last person described as one of the Prophet's companions. It is therefore possible that this Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm b. Ismāʿīl is identical with the rāwī Aḥmad b. Muʿāwiyah b. Bakr al-Bāhilī mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 567 (above, 38, and n. 150).

339. According to Abbott, 66, his two eldest sons; see further on her, ibid., 86, 97, 99.

340. I.e., when he had gone to her in Baghdad, at the time of al-Hādī's accession to the throne, see Ṭabarī, III, 546 (above, 6).

lowing morning.[341] After Mūsā al-Hādī's death, al-Rashīd married Amat al-ʿAzīz,[342] and he gave her the child ʿAlī b. al-Rashīd.[343]

Al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī has asserted that when al-Hādī transferred to ʿĪsābādh in the opening months of the year in which he took over the caliphate, he dismissed al-Rabīʿ from the offices of vizier and head of the correspondence department which he had held up till then, and appointed in his stead ʿUmar b. Bazīʿ. He appointed al-Rabīʿ to be head of the department of accounting control [al-zimām], and al-Rabīʿ retained this latter office until he died.[344] His decease came a few months after al-Hādī's accession to power, and his death was publicly proclaimed. Al-Hādī did not attend the funeral; Hārūn al-Rashīd read the prayers over him, being at that time heir to the throne. Mūsā appointed in al-Rabīʿ's place Ibrāhīm b. Dhakwān al-Ḥarrānī, and he appointed as his deputy in the offices which he held Ismāʿīl b. Ṣubayḥ. Then he dismissed Ismāʿīl and appointed as deputy Yaḥyā b. Sulaym, appointing Ismāʿīl to the post of accounting control of the Dīwān of Syria and its dependencies.[345]

Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbd al-Khāliq, the maternal uncle of al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ, has mentioned that his father transmitted to him [599] the information that Mūsā al-Hādī said, "I want to bring about al-Rabīʿ's death but I don't know how to encompass it." So Saʿīd b. Salm told him, "Designate a man to take a poisoned dagger and order him to slay al-Rabīʿ, and then order that assassin himself to be killed." He replied, "That is a good solution." He therefore gave orders to a man, who then crouched down in wait for him by the roadside, and commanded him to do that (i.e., to assassinate al-Rabīʿ). However, a certain subordinate official of al-Rabīʿ's went along to him and told him, "He (i.e., the Caliph) has given orders

341. Abbott, 86–7; Moscati, Le califat d'al-Hādī, 17–8, 26.

342. She having attained, after giving sons to al-Hādī, the free status of an umm walad.

343. See Ṭabarī, III, 758 (below, 327); Ibn Abī Ṭāhir Ṭayfūr, Kitāb Baghdād, 25–6; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 216.

344. Jahshiyārī, 125–6; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 121.

345. Jahshiyārī, 125–7; cf. Abbott, 96, and Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 122 and n. 4. There may be a confusion here between Yaḥyā b. Sulaym and Yaḥyā b. Sulaymān, whom Jahshiyārī names here as Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarrānī's deputy.

regarding you for such-and-such action to be taken." Hence, al-Rabī' took a different route from that. He went into his house and feigned illness. Then he became (really) ill after that for eight days, and died a natural death. His death was in the year 169 (785–6). He was al-Rabī' b. Yūnus.

The Events of the Year 170 (cont'd)

(July 3, 786–June 21, 787)

Hārūn's Assumption of the Caliphate on Mūsā al-Hādī's Death

Allegiance was given to al-Rashīd Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās as Caliph on the night of the Friday during which his brother Mūsā al-Hādī died. On that day when he assumed power he was twenty-two years old.[346] It is also said that on the day when allegiance was given to him as Caliph he was twenty-one years old. His mother was a slave wife from Jurash in the Yemen called Khayzurān,[347] and he himself was born at al-Rayy on the twenty-sixth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 145 (March 17, 763) during al-Manṣūr's caliphate.[348] In regard to the Barmakīs, according to what has been mentioned, they assert that al-Rashīd was born on 346. Thus in K. al-ʿUyūn, 290, and Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 106.

347. According to Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 261 = ed. Pellat, § 2469, and K. al-ʿUyūn, 282, she was the daughter of ʿAṭāʾ, a mawlā of al-Mahdī's; see also Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., and Abbott, 22–6, 29.

348. Abbott, 24, notes that the dates given for Hārūn's birth vary between 145 (762–3) and 150 (767).

the first of al-Muḥarram 149 (February 16, 766) and that al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā was born seven days before him, al-Faḍl's day of birth being the twenty-second of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 148 (February 8, 766).[349] Al-Faḍl's mother, Zaynab bt. Munīr, was appointed a wet nurse to al-Rashīd. Thus, she gave milk to al-Rashīd from the suckling of al-Faḍl, and al-Khayzurān gave milk to al-Faḍl from the suckling of al-Rashīd.[350]

Sulaymān b. Abī Shaykh[351] has mentioned that when it was the night in which Mūsā al-Hādī died, Harthamah b. A'yan (al-Ḍabbī)[352] brought forth Hārūn al-Rashīd during the hours of dark-[600] ness and then set him down on the Caliph's official seat.[353] Hārūn thereupon summoned Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak, who was at that moment in jail; Mūsā had in fact resolved upon killing both Yaḥyā and Hārūn al-Rashīd that very night. He related: Yaḥyā now became present and assumed the office of the vizierate.[354] He sent (a messenger) to Yūsuf b. al-Qāsim b. Ṣubayḥ al-Kātib.[355] He had him appear, and commanded him to compose letters (announcing Hārūn's succession to the throne). When the morning after that night dawned, and the military leaders were all present, Yūsuf b. al-Qāsim stood up. He offered praises to God, eulogizing Him, and gave blessings upon Muḥammad. Then he began to speak in an eloquent fashion, and recounted the death of Mūsā and Hārūn's assumption of control in succession to him, and what Hārūn had commanded by way of pay allotments for the troops.

---

349. Hence, eight days before!

350. Shābushtī, 227, 229; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 183, tr. 198–9; cf. Bouvat, 41, and Kennedy, 117. According to Ṭabarī, II, 840, Khālid b. Barmak's wife Umm Khālid bt. Yazīd suckled al-Saffāḥ's daughter Rayṭah, whilst al-Saffāḥ's wife Umm Salamah suckled Khālid's daughter Umm Yaḥyā. As Abbott, 24, implies, Ṭabarī seems to show a certain scepticism about the Barmakī claims to foster-relationship between Hārūn and al-Faḍl.

351. Cited elsewhere by Ṭabarī as a rāwī for events in al-Mahdī's reign.

352. Member of the Abnā' who was one of the chief commanders of al-Rashīd and al-Ma'mūn, filling many governorships until his execution through the intrigues of al-Faḍl b. Sahl in 200/816. See Crone, 177, and *EI*² s.v. (Pellat).

353. Azdī, 261; K. al-'Uyūn, 290; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

354. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 106–7.

355. Secretary, of mawlā origin, like most of those employed by the Barmakīs; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 134, 141, 179, 226. He was the founder of a line of secretaries who served subsequent Caliphs and who included in their ranks several poets; see J. Bencheikh, "Les sécretaires poètes et animateurs de cénacles aux IIe et IIIe siècles de l'Hégire," JA, CCLXIII (1975), 269 ff.

Aḥmad b. al-Qāsim has mentioned, transmitting information from his paternal uncle ʿAlī b. Yūsuf b. al-Qāsim (b. Ṣubayḥ), as follows: He related: Our mawlā Yazīd al-Ṭabarī transmitted the information to me that he was present at that time, carrying the inkstand for my father Yūsuf b. al-Qāsim, and he remembered the complete text of his words. He related: Yūsuf b. al-Qāsim said, after praising God, He is exalted and magnified, and after offering blessings on the Prophet, as follows:

God, with His favor and His grace, has vouchsafed to you of His goodness, O people of the house of the Prophet, the house of the caliphate and the original stock of the apostleship. He has, moreover, brought to you,[356] O obedient ones from among the supporters of the dynasty and helpers of the mission [al-daʿwah, i.e., of the ʿAbbāsids], manifestations of His favor which are innumerable and which will not pass away through the whole extent of eternity, and His all-embracing acts of beneficence, in that He has brought firmly together the bond of your fellowship, has exalted your position, has strengthened your arm, has humbled your enemy, and has shown forth the word of divine truth, for you have become worthy of it and fitting people for it. Hence, God has made you mighty—for God is a powerful and mighty one—and thus you have become supporters of the religion of God, the One who is well-pleased (with you), and have become defenders, by means of His drawn sword, of the members of the house of His Prophet. Through you, He rescued them from the hands of the oppressors, the imāms of tyranny, of those who broke God's covenant, of those who shed innocent blood and of those who consumed and appropriated for themselves the income from the captured lands [fayʾ]. So bear in mind all this favor which God has accorded you, and take care not to change your attitude, or He will change His attitude towards you.

God, He is exalted and magnified, has taken to Himself His Caliph, Mūsā al-Hādī the Imām, and has drawn him to Him- [601] self. He has appointed as Mūsā's successor a rightly guided, well-pleasing one as Commander of the Faithful for you, one who is compassionate and merciful towards you, one who will receive cordially those of you who act righteously and who will show himself tender-hearted by pardoning those of you who act evilly. The Caliph—may God grant him the permanent enjoyment of divine favor, preserve for him what He has entrusted to his care of the affairs of the Muslim community, and bestow upon him what He has bestowed on those who are His supporters and the people showing Him obedience—promises for you, from his heart, compassion and mercy towards you and the sharing-out among you of your stipends when you justly deserve them. He will bestow upon you presents from what God has bestowed on His Caliphs, stored up in the state treasury, which will be of such a magnitude that you will not require your regular pay allotments for so-and-so number of months, not however subtracting a corresponding sum to this from any advance pay allotments which you may receive in the future, but making over the remainder of that for the protection of your families and also what monies may accrue to the state treasuries in the provinces and distant areas from rebellious heretics, to the point that the accumulated treasure becomes ample and great in size and is restored to the level which it originally was.

356. Following the Cairo text, VIII, 231, wa-atākum instead of the Leiden text's wa-iyyākum.

So give praise to God and renew your thanks, and this will inevitably bring you an increase in His beneficence towards you through what He has renewed for you by means of the Commander of the Faithful's lofty judgement and through what He has bestowed upon you by means of it—may God strengthen him through his obedience (to Him)! Make petition to God for the Caliph's long life and for yourselves, that through him you may enjoy long-lasting favor; perhaps you will receive God's mercy! Give (the Caliph) your right hands in the clasp of homage and adhere to your professions of allegiance—may God protect you and defend you, bring about righteousness through you and at your hands, and take you as His helpers just as He takes His righteous devotees!

Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbd al-Khāliq has mentioned, saying that Muḥammad b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī transmitted the information to me, saying: When Mūsā died, Yaḥyā b. Khālid came to al-Rashīd whilst the latter was asleep, wrapped up in a coverlet and without any waist-wrapper. Yaḥyā said, "Arise, O Commander of the Faithful!" At that, al-Rashīd said to him, "How much you frighten me by your enthusiasm in describing me as Caliph, when you know my position vis-à-vis this man (i.e., al-Hādī)! If news of this reaches him, what will my position be then?" Yaḥyā thereupon told him, "This is (Ibrāhīm) al-Ḥarrānī, Mūsā's vizier, and this is his seal ring." He related: Hārūn sat down on his mattress and said, "Give me guidance on what to do!" He related: Whilst he [602] was speaking with him, another messenger suddenly appeared and announced, "You have just become the father of a boy!" He replied, "I hereby name him ʿAbdallāh."[357] Then he said to Yaḥyā, "Give me advice on what to do!" Yaḥyā said, "I advise you to take your seat immediately on Mūsā's Armenian carpet." He replied, "I have as good as done that; and by God, I shan't perform the worship at ʿĪsābādh except on that carpet, and I shan't perform the noon worship except in Baghdad and with the head of Abū ʿIṣmah before me!" He related: He then put on his robes and went forth. He performed the worship on it (i.e., the Armenian carpet) and had Abū ʿIṣmah brought forward, and then he had him decapitated and his scalp fastened to the tip of a spear shaft, and with this entered Baghdad.

All this was because he and Jaʿfar b. Mūsā al-Hādī had once been out riding together. They had come to one of the bridges of ʿĪsābādh. At that point, Abū ʿIṣmah had turned to Hārūn and said, "Stay where you are until the heir to the throne crosses over!" Hārūn had replied, "I hear and obey the Amīr!" So he had halted until Jaʿfar had crossed over. This was accordingly the reason for Abū ʿIṣmah's being killed.[358] He related: When al-Rashīd came to the crown of the bridge,[359] he summoned divers and then said, "Al-Mahdī gave me a seal ring which had cost one hundred thousand dīnārs and which was called 'the mountain' [al-jabal]. Subsequently, I went into the presence of my brother (i.e., of al-Hādī) with this seal ring on my finger. When I returned homewards, Sulaym al-Aswad caught up with me at the crown of the bridge, 357. Azdī, 261–2; Palmer, 35.

358. K. al-ʿUyūn, 290; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 107.

359. Kursī al-jisr, i.e., of one of the main bridges across the Tigris. For kursī in this sense, Glossarium, p. CDL, has caput pontis "crown of the bridge," and WbKAS, I, 127a–b, "pillar (of a bridge)." One would expect kursī to mean something like "supporting structure," clearly the actual span over the water in this context.

and then said, 'The Commander of the Faithful commands you to give me the seal ring!' At that, I hurled it away in this very spot." They then dived down and fished out the ring. Hārūn rejoiced exceedingly at its recovery.[360]

Muḥammad b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī has related that several of his companions transmitted the information to him, including Ṣabbāḥ b. Khāqān al-Tamīmī,[361] saying: Mūsā al-Hādī had deprived al-Rashīd of the succession and had secured allegiance to his own son Ja'far, this being at the time when 'Abdallāh b. Mālik was commander of the police. But when al-Hādī died, Khuzaymah b. Khāzim [al-Tamīmī][362] burst in during that same night, being accompanied by five thousand of his mawlās, bearing arms,[363] pulled Ja'far out of his bed and told him, "Unless you renounce your succession rights to the caliphate, I'll chop off your head!" Hence, the next morning the people rode forth to Ja'far's gate. Khuzaymah brought him forward and set him up on an elevated place by the [603] gate of the palace, all the gates being locked. Ja'far stepped forward and announced, "O Muslims, I have released from their undertakings all those who gave their allegiance to me as heir; the caliphate belongs to my paternal uncle Hārūn, and I have no claim to it."[364] This was the reason for 'Abdallāh b. Mālik al-Khuzā'ī's going all the way to Mecca on foot in felt slippers [lubūd], because he had sought the opinion of the religious lawyers regarding the oaths he had sworn in recognition of Ja'far's succession, and they had told him, "The breaking of any oath you have sworn can only be expiated by your going on foot to the House of God; there is no other way out." So he made the Pilgrimage on foot. Khuzaymah secured favor in al-Rashīd's sight by that action of his.[365]

---

360. Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 502–4 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 236–8; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 456; Qāḍī Ibn al-Zubayr, K. al-Tuḥaf wa-al-dhakhā'ir, 180–3, §§ 232–5; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Palmer, 35–6. In Jahshiyārī, 131–2, Yaḥyā b. Khālid is charged by al-Hādī, on pain of death for failure, to get the seal ring from Hārūn, but forgiven when Hārūn himself flings it into the river.

361. Cited previously by Ṭabarī for events in al-Manṣūr's caliphate.

362. Brother of 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim, see Ṭabarī, III, 548 (above, 9, n. 30).

363. The size of the force seems excessively large for the purpose intended, unless Khuzaymah expected strenuous opposition from the supporters of the child Ja'far's succession claim.

364. Nothing further seems to be recorded of Ja'far's life after this.

365. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 457; Azdī, 262; K. al-'Uyūn, 291; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 107;

Hārūn's Official Appointments and Dismissals

It has been mentioned that al-Rashīd was angry with Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarrānī and Sallām al-Abrash[366] on the day of Mūsā's death, so he ordered them to be sent to prison and their wealth confiscated. Ibrāhīm was imprisoned under Yaḥyā b. Khālid's charge in the latter's house. Then Muḥammad b. Sulaymān interceded with Hārūn for him, and asked the Caliph to show his favor to Ibrāhīm, to release him and to allow him to accompany Muḥammad on the journey down to al-Baṣrah; the Caliph then gave Muḥammad his consent to this.[367]

In this year, al-Rashīd dismissed ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-ʿUmarī from the governorship of the City of the Messenger of God (i.e., of Medina) and its administrative dependencies, and he appointed Isḥāq b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī[368] as governor of all that.

In this year, Muḥammad b. Hārūn al-Rashīd (i.e., the future al-Amīn) was born. According to what Abū Ḥafṣ al-Kirmānī has mentioned, from Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Khālid, he was born on Palmer, 34; Kennedy, 112–13. Khuzaymah's role here secured him a position of influence for the whole of al-Rashīd's reign, whereas ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik was for long under a cloud, according to an anecdote in Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 542–3 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 297–8, being for a while boycotted and cut off from contact with the court; no doubt the hatred between Yaḥyā b. Khālid and ʿAbdallāh (ibid., ed. Schwally, 415 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 102) was a factor here. Kennedy, 116, notes that the other prominent supporters of Jaʿfar b. al-Hādī's succession, Yazīd b. Mazyad and ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān, were given no important appointments for the next decade. According to Jahshiyārī, 135, al-Khayzurān at first wanted to execute all those who had opposed al-Rashīd's succession, but Yaḥyā al-Barmakī dissuaded her, suggesting instead that they should be given dangerous military commands and, as with David's appointment of Uriah the Hittite, placed in the battle line with a good chance of finding death anyway (on Jahshiyārī as a source for the events of al-Rashīd's reign, see Sourdel, "La valeur littéraire et documentaire du 'Livre des Vizirs' d'al-Ǧahšiyārī d'après le chapitre consacré au califat de Hārūn al-Rašīd," Arabica, II [1955], 193–210).

---

366. As emerges from Ibn Abī Ṭāhir Ṭayfūr, 133, and Ṭabarī, III, 1065, see II, 684 (below, 224, n. 771), Abū Salamah Sallām (the full name in Jahshiyārī, 187) was a eunuch (abrash, more usually applied to animals = "mottled, speckled," doubtless in allusion to his skin). He later recovered favor and was employed by al-Rashīd for various confidential missions, including duties during the arrest of the Barmakīs and the confiscation of their property; see Ṭabarī, III, 684.

367. Jahshiyārī, 135, who says that Yaḥyā's intercession with al-Rashīd secured for Ibrāhīm the post of secretary to Muḥammad b. Sulaymān.

368. Grandson of al-Rashīd's great-great-grandfather ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās.

Friday, the thirteenth of Shawwāl of this year (April 7, 787),[369] whilst al-Ma'mūn was born before him, on the night of Friday (i.e., of Thursday-Friday), the sixteenth of Rabī' I (September 15, 786).[370]

In this year, al-Rashīd appointed Yaḥyā b. Khālid as his vizier and told him, "I have invested you with responsibility for the subjects' affairs and have transferred the burden from myself to you. So exercise authority in this with what you consider to be sound judgement; appoint as your subordinate governors whom [604] you think fit; and conduct affairs as you consider best." At the same time, he handed his seal ring over to him. Concerning this event, Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī recited,

Have you not seen that the sun was sickly,
but when Hārūn assumed power, its light gleamed forth.
Through the auspicious effects of the trusted one of God, Hārūn, the munificent one?
For Hārūn is its ruler, and Yaḥyā its vizier.[371]

Al-Khayzurān was the one who had the oversight of affairs; Yaḥyā used to lay matters before her and do things on her advice.[372]

In this year, Hārūn gave orders concerning the share of the Prophet's kindred (i.e., the share from the poor-tax to the dhawū al-qurbā), and it was divided out among the Hāshimites in equal portions.

In this year, he gave a guarantee of safe-conduct to those who had fled or who had gone into concealment, with the exception of a group of the dualist infidels [al-zanādiqah], including Yūnus b. Farwah and Yazīd b. al-Fayḍ.[373] Among the Ṭālibids who came

369. Actually, a Saturday.

370. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 491–2; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr., IV, 456–7; Azdī, 262; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 107; Palmer, 35; Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd e la guerra fra al-Amīn e al-Ma'mūn," RSO, XI (1926–8), 344.

371. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 288–9 = ed. Pellat, § 2494; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, V, 41 = ed. Cairo, VI, 242; Ibn Khallikān, VI, 221, tr. IV, 105. Cf. Palmer, loc. cit.; Abbott, 113; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 134–5, who notes that similar laudatory verses are attributed to Abān al-Lāḥiqī.

372. Jahshiyārī, 134; K. al-'Uyūn, 291; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 107–8.

373. Yazīd b. al-Fayḍ was a former secretary of al-Manṣūr, who had been arrested by al-Mahdī in 167/783–4, but had contrived to escape (Jahshiyārī, 115–16; Ṭabarī, III, 519–20), only, it seems, to have been recaptured; see Vajda, "Les zindīqs au pays d'Islam," 186.

into the open were Ṭabāṭabā, that is, Ibrāhīm b. Ismāʿīl,[374] and ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan.[375]

In this year, al-Rashīd detached the whole of the Byzantine marches [al-thughūr] from al-Jazīrah and Qinnasrīn, and made them into a single (administrative) region called "the frontier strongholds" [al-ʿawāṣim].[376]

In this year, Tarsus[377] was rendered prosperous and populous through the efforts of Abū Sulaym Faraj al-Turkī the eunuch [al-khādim],[378] and people settled there.[379]

In this year, Hārūn al-Rashīd led the Pilgrimage from the City of Peace. He gave the people of the two sanctuaries (i.e., Mecca and Medina) numerous gifts and divided out among them a huge sum of money.[380] It has been said that he both performed the Pil- [605]

374. I.e., the Ḥasanid Ibrāhīm b. Ismāʿīl Ṭabāṭabā al-Rassī, father of the subsequent Zaydī Imām in Yemen al-Qāsim, died in 246 (860); Ibrāhīm fought with al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī in the rising which ended at Fakhkh. See Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 297, 304; Öhrnberg, Tables 20, 22–3.

375. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 108.

376. Ibid.; M. A. Shaban, Islamic history. A new interpretation. 2. A.D. 750–1055 (A.H. 132–448), 28–9. See on this region of the "frontier strongholds," Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 165–6; Le Strange, Lands, 128 ff.; Canard, 226–35; *EI*² s.v. al-ʿAwāṣim (Canard).

377. Town and fortress of Cilicia. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 28–9; Le Strange, Lands, 132–4; Canard, 282; *EI*¹ s.v. Ṭarsūs (F. Buhl).

378. Mawlā of al-Rashīd; see Crone, 190. As Ayalon has pointed out (The military reforms of Caliph al-Muʿtaṣim, 3–4), the role of the eunuchs in affairs increases perceptibly during al-Rashīd's caliphate; Masrūr was one of his closest confidants, and he and others of the court eunuchs were present at the Caliph's deathbed (Ṭabarī, III, 738, below, 303). As with Faraj here, eunuchs were prominent as military commanders, especially on the Byzantine frontiers. The eunuch al-Mufaḍḍal was invited to lead an ʿAbbāsid force at Mecca in 169 (786) against the ʿAlid al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī (Ṭabarī, III, 558, above, 25). Such instances make nonsense of the assertion by Shaban, 139, that the eunuch "certainly cannot lead armies or rule governments" (on the latter point, cf. the skillful rule in Egypt of Kāfūr as Regent for the Ikhshīdids).

379. Balādhurī, 168; Azdī, 262; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 108–9; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 740; Canard, in Cambridge medieval history, IV. The Byzantine empire. Part 1, Byzantium and its neighbours, 706; Shaban, 29. In Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 711, and Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 495, this work of restoration by Faraj al-Khādim, with the building of five gates and eighty-seven towers for the town, is placed in the year 171 (787–8).

380. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 592, who states that Hārūn actually deputed Mūsā b. ʿĪsā to lead the Pilgrimage when he first acceded to the throne, but then decided to lead it himself; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 709; Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Dīnawarī, 387; Azdī, 266, Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 109; Shaban, 27.

grimage and led an expedition against the infidels in this same year. Dāwūd b. Razīn[381] has recited concerning this,

Through Hārūn, the light has shone forth in every region, and the straight path has become established by the justness of his conduct.
(He is) a leader who has ordered his affairs[382] through attention to God's requirements, and whose greatest concern is with raiding the infidels and the Pilgrimage.
People's eyes are unable to endure the brilliance of his face, when his resplendent aspect appears to them.
Indeed, the trusted one of God, Hārūn, the munificent one, gives the one who has hope of his bounty several times more than what he hopes.

In this year, Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bakkāʾī led the summer raid.[383]

In this year, the governor of Medina was Isḥāq b. Sulaymān al-Hāshimī; of Mecca and al-Ṭāʾif, ʿUbaydallāh b. Qutham; of al-Kūfah, Mūsā b. ʿĪsā, with his deputy there being his son al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā; and of al-Baṣrah, Baḥrayn, the Gulf littoral ports, al-Yamāmah and the administrative districts of Ahwāz and Fārs, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī.[384]

---

381. Poet of Wāsiṭ, whose poems are largely lost; he died at some point after this date. See GAS, II, 455.

382. The text here is better (cf. de Goeje's comment in Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLX) than the aṣbaḥa shughaluhu of the Cairo text, VIII, 234.

383. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

384. Ibid.

The Events of the Year

171

(June 22, 787–June 10, 788)

Among the events taking place during this year was the arrival of Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān al-Ṭūsī in the City of Peace, returning from Khurāsān.[385] At the time of his arrival, the seal ring of the caliphate was in the hands of Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath (al-Khuzāʿī),[386] but then when Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Ṭūsī arrived, al-Rashīd took it from Jaʿfar and transferred it to Abū al-ʿAbbās.[387] Shortly afterwards, however, Abū al-ʿAbbās died, so he handed over the seal ring to Yaḥyā b. Khālid. Thus, Yaḥyā now combined the two vizierial functions [al-wizārataynِ].[388] [606]

385. Dīnawarī, loc. cit. According to Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, T. Sinī mulūk al-arḍ wa-al-anbiyāʾ, 164, al-Faḍl had arrived in Khurāsān in Rabīʿ I 166 (October 782).

386. Soon afterwards to be nominated governor of Khurāsān, which he governed 170–3 (787–9). See Ḥamzah, loc. cit.; Ṭabarī, III, 609 (below, 108); Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 114, 120.

387. According to Jahshiyārī, 134, the dīwān al-khātam, thus given to Abū al-ʿAbbās, was the only government department not entrusted immediately to Yaḥyā al-Barmakī on al-Rashīd's accession; cf. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 136–7. Jahshiyārī, 135, further relates that Yaḥyā became exasperated at Abū al-ʿAbbās's dilatoriness and his making heavy weather over the sealing of letters, hence he started to take measure with his own hands over correspondence with provincial governors.

388. I.e., of the financial dīwān al-kharāj and the dīwān al-khātam for official

In this year, Hārūn had Abū Hurayrah Muḥammad b. Farrūkh, who was governor of al-Jazīrah, executed. Hārūn sent Abū Ḥanīfah Ḥarb b. Qays to him, who brought Abū Ḥurayrah back to the Caliph at the City of Peace; he was then decapitated in the Khuld Palace.[389]

In this year, Hārūn ordered the expulsion of all the Ṭālibids in the City of Peace to the City of the Messenger (of God) (i.e., al-Madīnah), with the exception of al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib; the latter's father al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbdallāh was nevertheless among those whom the Caliph sent off.[390]

Al-Faḍl b. Saʿīd al-Ḥārūrī rebelled, but Abū Khālid al-Marwarrūdhī killed him.[391]

In this year, Rawḥ b. Ḥātim (al-Muhallabī) arrived in Ifrīqiyah.[392]

In this year, al-Khayzurān set out in the month of Ramaḍān for Mecca, and she stayed there until the time for the Pilgrimage, and then she performed it.[393]

In this year, ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās[394] led the Pilgrimage.[395]

---

correspondence. On this title, see Goldziher, "Ueber Dualtitel," WZKM, XIII (1899), 323–4 = Gesammelte Schriften, IV, 197–8; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 137–8.

389. Azdī, 267, with detail on Abū Hurayrah's governorship in al-Jazīrah; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 114.

390. Op. cit., VI, 114–15.

391. Op. cit., VI, 115, records a further Khārijite revolt during this year, that of al-Ṣaḥṣaḥ in al-Jazīrah against the local governor Abū Hurayrah; possibly his difficulties over this were a cause of al-Rashīd's having him executed during this year, as mentioned above.

392. The detailed background to this appointment (the governorship of his nephew Dāwūd b. Yazīd b. Ḥātim, his unsatisfactory conduct, a revolt of the Ibāḍiyyah Khārijites and his replacement by Rawḥ) is given by Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 496, and Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 108, 113–14, 115.

393. Her Pilgrimage and her extensive benefactions in the Ḥaramayn are placed by the K. al-ʿUyūn, 291, in 172 (788–9). For details of these charitable works, see Abbott, 117–20.

394. See on him, Ṭabarī, III, 573 (above, 49, and n. 196).

395. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 711, also recording that it was Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Aṣamm who led the annual expedition against the Byzantines; Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Azdī, 267.

The Events of the Year 172

(JUNE 11, 788–MAY 30, 789)

Among the events taking place during this year was al-Rashīd's setting out for Marj al-Qal'ah,[396] seeking there a residence (or, an encampment, manzil) where he might stay.

Mention of the reason for that. It has been mentioned that the motive behind his journey thither was that he found the City of Peace intolerable—he used to call it "the steamy place" [al-bukhār]—so he set off for Marj al-Qal'ah; but he fell ill there, hence he turned back homewards.[397]. That particular journey was called "the journey of the seeker." [607]

In this year, al-Rashīd dismissed Yazīd b. Mazyad from the governorship of Armenia, and gave it to 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Mahdī.[398]

396. "The pasture-ground of the fortress," the district around the town of Karind in Jibāl, on the Khurāsānian highway between Ḥulwān and Kirmān-shāh where, it is mentioned, the 'Abbāsid Caliphs kept their studs of horses. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 101; Le Strange, Lands, 192; Schwarz, 491–2.

397. Hence, he never seems to have used this new palace.

398. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 515–16, with the background details of this appointment; Azdī, 269; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 118.

In this year, Isḥāq b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī led the summer raid [al-ṣāʾifah].[399]

In this year, Yaʿqūb b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr led the Pilgrimage.[400]

In this year, Hārūn lifted from the shoulders of the inhabitants of the Sawād the tithe which used to be taken from them after the tax of a half (of their produce).[401]

---

399. Azdī, 270; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; but according to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522, the leader was Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, and according to Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 712, it was Ẓufar b. ʿAṣim al-Hilālī together with his son ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz.

400. Khalīfah, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

401. Ibid.; cf. Shaban, 32–3.

The Events of the Year 173

(May 31, 789–May 19, 790)

The Death of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and the Confiscation of His Fortune

Among the events taking place during this year was the death of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān[402] at al-Baṣrah a few nights before the end of Jumādā II (mid-November 789). It has been mentioned that when Muḥammad b. Sulaymān died, al-Rashīd despatched an agent for every category of what Muḥammad b. Sulaymān had left behind, ordering him to select the best items from it. Thus, he sent for the precious metals which he had left behind a man from the staff of his head treasurer; for the clothing, likewise; and for the carpets and coverings, for the slaves, for the riding beasts, including horses and camels, for the perfumes and aromatic substances, for the jewels and for every utensil, a man from the staff of each of these categories of possessions. So they came to al-Baṣrah and then sequestrated the whole of Muḥammad's property which might be valuable to the caliphate, leaving behind nothing except the worthless remnants which were of no possible use to the Caliphs. They acquired on the Caliph's behalf sixty million (dirhams' worth), and transported it back together with all the rest which was brought [608] back. When it arrived in the boats, al-Rashīd was informed about the position of the boats which had conveyed that consignment, and he ordered the whole of it to be placed in his treasuries, with the exception of the actual money. He ordered authorizations for payment [ṣikak][403] (regarding this last) to be prepared, and they were written out for the boon-companions (at court), whilst the singers received authorizations for smaller sums, which were not put through the dīwān (i.e., through the normal accounting procedure). Then he handed over to each person a draft for the amount which he thought fit to give that person; these persons then sent their agents to the boats, and took the whole of the money, according to what the Caliph had awarded them in the drafts, not a single dīnār or dirham entering the Caliph's treasury. The Caliph also selected what he wanted from Muḥammad b. Sulaymān's estates, including one called Barashīd (?) in Ahwāz, which brought in a considerable amount of revenue.[404]

402. The senior 'Abbāsid prince and victor at Fakhkh, see Ṭabarī, III, 557 ff. (above, 23 ff. and n. 90).

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad has mentioned from his father, saying: When Muḥammad b. Sulaymān died, there was recovered from his treasury all his clothing from the time when he was a boy in the Qur'ān school till the time when he died, covering a period of many years; some of this clothing even had ink stains on it. He related: They brought out of his treasury what had been given to him as presents from the land of Sind, Makrān, Kirmān, Fārs, Ahwāz, al-Yamāmah, al-Rayy and ʿUmān, including fine gifts, unguents and balms, musk,[405] grain, cheese and such-like, but the

403. For this technical term of the financial departments of the administration, sing. ṣakk, see Bosworth, "Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the technical terms of the secretary's art," 125–6.

404. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 713; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 289–92 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2496–7; Azdī, 270; Qāḍī Ibn al-Zubayr, 221–2, §§ 308–9; K. al-ʿUyūn, 292; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 119; cf. Kennedy, 118. Among Muḥammad b. Sulaymān's estates resumed by the Caliph was that of the town of Bālis on the Euphrates above al-Raqqah, on the borders of Syria and al-Jazīrah; formerly the possession of Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik, al-Saffāḥ had given it to Sulaymān b. ʿAlī; see Balādhurī, 151, and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 328.

405. Following the reading of Ibn ʿAsākir for the text's al-samak "fish."

greater part of all this was found to have become spoilt. Also included in that were five hundred kanʿadah fish[406] which were thrown out of the house of Jaʿfar and Muḥammad into the street and which then became a nuisance.[407] He related: For some time, we were unable to pass by al-Mirbad[408] because of its stench.

In this year, al-Khayzurān, mother of Hārūn al-Rashīd and Mūsā al-Hādī, died.

The Time of al-Khayzurān's Death and Her Burial

Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan has mentioned that his father transmitted the information to him, saying: I saw al-Rashīd on the day when al-Khayzurān died—this being in the year 173—wearing a Saʿīdī robe [jubbah][409] and a patched and ragged ṭaylasān which was tied [609] around his waist, gripping the framework of the funeral bier and walking barefoot through the mud until he reached the Cemetery of Quraysh.[410] He washed his feet and then called for a pair of boots, prayed over her corpse and went down into her grave. When he came away from the cemetery, a stool was set down for him, and he sat down on it. He summoned al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ and said to him, "By the right of al-Mahdī!"—and he never used to swear such an oath except when he was expressing himself forcefully—"For some time now [min al-layl], I have been intending to confer on you some administrative charge or similar responsibility, but my mother has (hitherto) been restraining me and I have accordingly been obedient to her command; but now, take over the seal ring from Jaʿfar (b. Yaḥyā al-Barmakī)." Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ said to Ismāʿīl b. Ṣubayḥ, "I have too much respect for Abū al-Faḍl (i.e., Yaḥyā, father of Jaʿfar and al-Faḍl) that I should write to him and 406. See for this term, WbKAS, I, 39ob.

407. Despite the recommendation in the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLX, of the reading malā, the original reading of the text here (and that of the Cairo one, VIII, 238), balā', seems preferable.

408. The celebrated commercial quarter on the western side of al-Baṣrah (literally, "place where dates are spread to dry, where camels and sheep are herded together"). See Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 11–12, and *EI*² s.v.

409. For the term Saʿīdī, see Lane, Lexicon, s.v., and BGA, IV, Glossarium, 260; for the jubbah as a garment, see Ahsan, 40.

410. This was situated on the western bank of the Tigris opposite al-Ruṣāfah. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 157–8, 193; Lassner, Topography, 111, 253–4, 285–6.

take it away from him; but perhaps he might, if he thinks fit, convey it to me?" He related: He (i.e., the Caliph) gave al-Faḍl charge of the public and privy expenditure and of Bādurayā[411] and al-Kūfah, comprising five *ṭassūj*s. His power and prestige thus began to increase, up to the year 187 (803). It has been said that the deaths of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and al-Khayzurān took place on the same day.[412]

In this year, al-Rashīd recalled Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath from Khurāsān, and he entrusted it to his son al-'Abbās b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath.[413]

In this year, Hārūn himself led the Pilgrimage. It has been mentioned that he set out from the City of Peace observing the taboos and wearing the ritually clean garments of the Pilgrimage [muḥrim^{an}].[414]

---

411. The district to the west of Baghdad on the Nahr 'Īsā. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 317–18; Le Strange, Lands, 66–7; idem, Baghdad, 50–1.

412. Jahshiyārī, 145; Qāḍī Ibn al-Zubayr, 235, § 343; K. al-'Uyūn, 292; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 119; Abbott, 125–8; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 138; idem, EI^{2} s.v. al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'. If she died at the same time as Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, her death must also be placed in late Jumādā II (November 789). As Sourdel remarks, the information given here by Ṭabarī and by Jahshiyārī does not imply, as some modern historians (e.g., Abbott, 126–7) have asserted, that al-Faḍl took charge of the office of the seal at this point; this seems to have been retained by Ja'far till 180 (796), when al-Rashīd transferred it to his father Yaḥyā (Ṭabarī, III, 644, below, 162).

413. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr., IV, 457; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 120. Ja'far b. Muḥammad had replaced in this governorship Abū al-'Abbās Faḍl b. Sulaymān al-Ṭūsī; see Ṭabarī, III, 605, 740, and Barthold, Turkestan, 203. According to Ḥamzah, 164, the governorship had been briefly given to al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah before Ja'far.

414. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 713; Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Azdī, 270, 274; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit. Khalīfah and Azdī also record that 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī led the summer raid.

The Events of the Year

174

(May 20, 790–May 9, 791)

Among the events taking place during this year was the factional strife ['aṣabiyyah] which took place in Syria.[415]

In this year, al-Rashīd appointed Isḥāq b. Sulaymān al-Hāshimī governor of Sind and Makrān.[416]

In this year, al-Rashīd appointed Yūsuf b. Abī Yūsuf as judge whilst his father was still alive.[417]

In this year, Rawḥ b. Ḥātim perished.[418]

In this year, al-Rashīd set out for Bāqirdā and Bāzabdā,[419] and built a palace at Bāqirdā.[420] A poet has said concerning that, [610]

---

415. It is possible that this is the rebellion raised by the people of Damascus against their governor Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far al-Manṣūr over a crystal vessel [qullah billawr] kept in the miḥrāb (presumably of the Umayyad Mosque) mentioned, without a clear date, in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 494–5. Dīnawarī, 387, attributes the strife to the usual rivalry of Muḍar and Yaman.

416. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 493.

417. I.e., the son of one of the founders of the Ḥanafī law school, Abū Yūsuf. The son Yūsuf became deputy judge for his father over the western side of Baghdad and died in 192 (808); see EI[2] s.v. Abū Yūsuf (J. Schacht).

418. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 496; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 121; Kennedy, 192.

419. These were districts on the eastern and western banks, respectively, of the

At Qirdā[421] and Bāzabdā are places where one finds hospitality and a site for residence, a source of sweet, cool water, which resembles al-Salsabīl (i.e., the fountain in Paradise).
Whereas Baghdad, how can one describe Baghdad? On the one hand, its soil is pure excrement, and on the other, its heat is intense.[422]

ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ led the summer raid.[423]

In this year, Hārūn al-Rashīd led the Pilgrimage. He began by visiting al-Madīnah and distributed a great deal of money among its people. During this year, an outbreak of plague hit Mecca, hence Hārūn held back from entering it. Then he did actually enter on the "Day of Refreshment" and made the circumambulation of the Kaʿbah and the running (between al-Ṣafā and al-Marwah) without however staying in Mecca.[424] upper Tigris near Jazīrat Ibn ʿUmar, in the eastern part of Diyār Bakr. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 321, 327; Le Strange, Lands, 93–4.

---

420. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit. Al-Rashīd seems nevertheless not to have used this new palace to any known extent; cf. Kennedy, 120.

421. According to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 327, quoting this hemistich, Qirdā or Qardā was the popular pronunciation of Bāqirdā.

422. Both verses cited (with minor variants) in op. cit. I, 321, s.v. Bāzabdā.

423. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 714; Azdī, 274; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 740. According to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522, Sulaymān b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr was the leader.

424. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 521; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year 175

(May 10, 791–April 27, 792)

Among the events taking place during this year was al-Rashīd's formal designation, in the City of Peace, of his son Muḥammad as heir to the rule over the Muslims, his receiving the oath of allegiance to that arrangement on Muḥammad's behalf from the commanders and the troops, and his giving him the honorific title of al-Amīn, the latter being at that time five years old.[425] Salm al-Khāsir has said,

God has bestowed His favor on the Caliph when he made firm the structure of the caliphate for the nobly-born, fair-of-face one.

425. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 493; Dīnawarī, 390; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 457–8, 459; K. al-'Uyūn, 292; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 122; Gabrieli, "Successione," 344–5. Gabrieli points out that this designation of Muḥammad al-Amīn cannot have been viewed by al-Rashīd as definitive, in the light of the unfolding, over the course of time, of the respective characters and abilities of Muḥammad and his brother 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn, leading him to make the fresh succession arrangements at Baghdad and al-Raqqah in 182 (802), see Ṭabarī, III, 647 (below, 167). The reports in Dīnawarī, 387–9, and Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 317 ff. = ed. Pellat, §§ 2520 ff., of the subsequent doubts in al-Rashīd's mind over his two sons' capabilities tend to confirm this.

For he is the Caliph in descent from his father and his grandfather; both of them have testified to this, on the basis of external appearance and inner qualities.

The two weighty creations (i.e., men and jinn) have given their allegiance, in the seat of divine guidance (i.e., in Baghdad) to Muḥammad son of Zubaydah, the daughter of Ja'far (b. al-Manṣūr).[426]

The Reasons for al-Rashīd's Exacting Allegiance to Muḥammad al-Amīn as Heir

[611] According to what Rawḥ, the mawlā of al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā b. Khālid has mentioned, the reason behind this was that he had noted that 'Īsā b. Ja'far had gone along to al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā and had said to him, "I adjure you by God to work[427] for allegiance to be given to my sister's son"—he meant Muḥammad b. Zubaydah bt. Ja'far b. al-Manṣūr—"for he is in effect a child of yours and his caliphate will be in effect your rule." Al-Faḍl promised him that he would do that. Al-Faḍl directed his efforts at securing it, at a time when a group of the 'Abbāsids had openly shown their ambitions (literally, "had stretched forth their necks") for the caliphate after al-Rashīd, since he had not yet designated his heir. When he did in fact settle the succession on Muḥammad, they rejected (or: disapproved of, ankarū) giving him allegiance on account of his youthfulness.[428]

He related: When al-Faḍl had become governor of Khurāsān, he had resolved to secure recognition of Muḥammad as heir. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣ'ab has mentioned that when al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā went to Khurāsān he divided out among the people there sums of money and gave the troops successive allotments of pay.

---

426. Von Grunebaum, "Three Arabic poets of the early Abbasid age. V. Salm al-Ḥâsir," 66–7, no. XVII = Shu'arā' 'Abbāsiyyūn, 100, no. 17; Azdī, 274–5, adding also verses by Abān al-Lāḥiqī.

427. Lammā 'amilta; for lammā = illā after verbs of beseeching and adjuring, see W. Wright, Arabic grammar, Cambridge, 1896–8, I, 294, II, 340; H. Reckendorf, Arabische Syntax, Heidelberg 1921, 512 § 262.12.

428. Cf. the doubts of several members of the Hāshimite family because of Muḥammad al-Amīn's youthfulness, expressed in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit., and K. al-'Uyūn, loc. cit.; Ya'qūbī reports that 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī, Hārūn's great-great-uncle, tried to assuage their fears by saying, "O people, don't let his tender age delude you, for this is indeed the blessed tree whose roots are vigorously growing and whose branches stretch up to the heavens"; cf. Gabrieli, "Successione," 345.

Then he proclaimed openly the matter of allegiance to Muḥammad b. al-Rashīd as heir, and as a result, the people gave their allegiance and addressed Muḥammad as al-Amīn.[429] (Manṣūr) al-Namarī said concerning this,

At Marw, with God's favor and through the agency of al-Faḍl, the hands of both Persians and Arabs have become clasped together.
In an act of allegiance to the designated heir to the throne, which he (i.e., al-Faḍl) has made firm with his sincere advice, his solicitude and his benevolence.
Al-Faḍl has made secure an affirmation of allegiance which cannot be broken, to a chosen and selected one of the ʿAbbāsid house.[430]

He related: When the news about that finally reached al-Rashīd, and the people of the East had given their allegiance to Muḥammad, he (formally) hailed Muḥammad as heir to the throne and [612] wrote to all the provinces and the great cities. Abān (b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd) al-Lāḥiqī[431] said concerning this,

O Commander of the Faithful, you have determined upon the right path by means of a judgment based on divine guidance, so praise be to God, the One worthy of praise!

In this year, al-Rashīd dismissed al-ʿAbbās b. Jaʿfar from the governorship of Khurāsān and gave it to his maternal uncle al-Ghiṭrīf b. ʿAṭāʾ.[432]

In this year, Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan proceeded to Daylam and became active there (i.e., in rebellion).[433]

---

429. K. al-ʿUyūn, loc. cit.

430. Shiʿr Manṣūr al-Namarī, ed. al-Ṭayyib al-ʿAshshāsh, 71. On this eulogist of al-Rashīd (who died at some uncertain date in that Caliph's reign), see Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XII, 16–26 = ed. Cairo, XIII, 140–57; GAS, II, 541–2; *EI*² s.v. (T. Achèche).

431. Eulogist of al-Rashīd and the Barmakīs, who died ca. 200 (815–16). See Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 179–80; GAS, II, 541–2; *EI*² s.v. (S. M. Stern).

432. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 745; Dīnawarī, 387; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 488; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 164; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 122; Daniel, 169; *EI*² Suppl. s.v. al-Ghiṭrīf b. ʿAṭāʾ. Cf. also Ṭabarī, III, 590–1, above, 73.

433. Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 458; Abū al-Faḍl Bayhaqī, Taʾrīkh-i Masʿūdī, 414; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; and see below, 115–20, for a full account of this episode.

In this year, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ led the summer raid and reached as far as Iqrīṭiyah (i.e., Crete).[434] Al-Wāqidī has related, that it was ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ who led the summer raid in this year.[435] He related: During the course of this raid, they encountered severely cold weather, which made their hands and feet drop off (i.e., from frostbite).[436]

In this year, Hārūn al-Rashīd led the Pilgrimage.[437]

---

434. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 715; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 740; cf. *EI*² s.v. Iḳrīṭish (Canard).

435. Thus in Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522.

436. Brooks, loc. cit.

437. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 521; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year 176

(April 28, 792–April 17, 793)

Among the events taking place during this year was al-Rashīd's appointment of al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā as governor of the districts of Jibāl, Ṭabaristān, Dunbāwand, Qūmis, Armenia and Azerbaijan.[438]

In this year, Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib appeared in Daylam.[439]

Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan's Uprising and His Role in These Events [613]

Abū Ḥafṣ al-Kirmānī has mentioned, saying: The first reports about Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib were that he had appeared in Daylam, that his military strength had grown, that his power had increased and that people from the great cities and the provincial districts had gone over to his side.[440] Al-

438. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. loc. cit.; Azdī, 277; Bayhaqī, Ta'rīkh-i Mas'ūdī, 414–15.

439. I.e., the inland mountain region of the western part of the Elburz mountains, the hinterland of Gīlān, a region at this time hardly Islamized. See *EI*² s.v. (Minorsky).

440. For this episode of the adventures of Yaḥyā, half-brother of the "Pure Soul"

Rashīd became much distressed over this, and during these days refrained from drinking any date wine. He then invited al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā to march against him with fifty thousand men, accompanied by the stoutest commanders, and he appointed al-Faḍl over the regions of Jibāl, al-Rayy, Jurjān, Ṭabaristān, Qūmis, Dunbāwand and al-Rūyān, and quantities of money were taken along with him. He then allotted the various regions among his commanders. He made al-Muthannā b. al-Ḥajjāj b. Qutaybah b. Muslim[441] governor over Ṭabaristān and ʿAlī b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Khuzāʿī[442] over Jurjān, and he ordered that he should be given five hundred thousand dirhams. He encamped at al-Nahrabīn.[443] The poets sang his praises, for which he rewarded them profusely. People sought to ingratiate themselves with him through their poetry, and he distributed great sums of money among them.

Al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā set off, and left behind as his representative at the Commander of the Faithful's court Manṣūr b. Ziyād,[444] with the responsibility of personally conveying al-Faḍl's letters and of transmitting the answers to the letters to al-Faḍl. They (i.e., the Barmakīs) used to have complete trust in Manṣūr and his son

---

Muḥammad and of Idrīs, founder of the Idrīsid line in Morocco (see Ṭabarī, III, 561–2; above, 28–30), see also of the primary sources, Jahshiyārī, 145–6; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 492–3; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 193, 300–1 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2405, 2505; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 308–23; K. al-ʿUyūn, 292–4, 306–7; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 122, 125–6; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 176, tr. 190–1. Of the secondary sources, see Palmer, 57–61; Bouvat, 58–9; Van Arendonck, 65–70; Marquet, "Le Šīʿisme au IXe siècle," 109–10; Kennedy, 119–20, 206–7. After the failure of the revolt of al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī (at the time of which Yaḥyā had been a guarantor for the good conduct of the Ḥasanid al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, see Ṭabarī, III, 552, above, 16) at Fakhkh in 169 (786), Yaḥyā had fled like his brother Idrīs and had travelled clandestinely throughout the Islamic world from the Maghrib to Transoxania, but had finally sought refuge in the Caspian region of Persia. His stay in Daylam, though brief, seems to have paved the way for Zaydī Shīʿī activity in the Caspian provinces a century or so later (see Madelung, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 206 ff).

441. Ibn Isfandiyār, tr. 132. Al-Muthannā was another of the descendants of the Umayyad governor Qutaybah b. Muslim al-Bāhilī who prospered greatly under the early ʿAbbāsids; see Crone, 137.

442. According to Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 375, ʿAlī was at one time commander of the police [shurṭah] for al-Rashīd.

443. Restored by the editor from the text's al-nahrayn and presumably a form of the Nahr Bīn/Bīl of Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 318, a ṭassūj or rural administrative district of the Sawād of Baghdad.

444. According to Jahshiyārī, 135 (cf. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 142), Manṣūr was very close to Yaḥyā's confidence, to the extent that people desiring his help would seek it through Manṣūr's intercession.

regarding all their affairs, because of Manṣūr's long-established association with them and his attitude of respectfulness and solicitude for them. Then al-Faḍl set out from his military encampment. Al-Rashīd's letters came to him in a continuous stream, expressing kindness and benevolence, and with presents and robes of honor. He (i.e., al-Faḍl) then wrote to Yaḥyā, treating him with consideration, conciliating him, exhorting him, giving him warnings, offering him advice, and enlarging his hopes. Al-Faḍl encamped at al-Ṭālaqān in the vicinity of al-Rayy[445] and at Dastabā in a place called Ashabb.[446] The weather was extremely cold and very snowy; concerning this, Abān b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd al-Lāḥiqī says, [614]

Indeed, the habitations of former days at al-Dawlāb,[447] where the irrigation canal winds along Are dearer to me than the habitations of Ashabb, when they are covered in snow.

He related: Al-Faḍl remained in this spot. He sent a series of letters to Yaḥyā, and wrote to the ruler of Daylam offering him a million dirhams on condition that he should facilitate Yaḥyā's reversion to his previous state of obedience. This sum was transported to him, and Yaḥyā responded to the offer of peace and agreed to come forth under his (i.e., al-Faḍl's) auspices provided that al-Rashīd would personally and in his own hand write out for him a guarantee of safe-conduct which he (i.e., al-Faḍl) would forward to him. So al-Faḍl wrote to al-Rashīd about that; this made him rejoice, and al-Faḍl's status rose in his sight. The Caliph wrote out a guarantee of safe-conduct for Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh and had it witnessed by the religious lawyers and judges and by the leading figures and shaykhs of the Hāshimites, including ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī, al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm,[448] Mūsā b.

445. For this al-Ṭālaqān on the borders of Jibāl and Daylam (to be distinguished from the one in northern Afghanistan), see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 7–8; Le Strange, Lands, 225; Schwarz, 733–5; EI[1] s.v. (Huart).

446. K. al-ʿUyūn, 293; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 125; Bouvat, 58. On Ashabb, see Schwarz, 734–5. Dastabā probably lay to the south of Qazwīn, see Le Strange, Lands, 220.

447. Literally, "water-wheel, contrivance for raising water," but also the name of at least one place in the Baghdad area, as is intended by the contrast here. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 485; Le Strange, Baghdad, 190, 321.

448. I.e., Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, first cousin of al-Mahdī, governor on various occasions of Mecca and Medina, died in 185 (801).

ʿĪsā, and others like them. He forwarded it, together with presents, marks of respect and benevolence, and gifts. Al-Faḍl in turn sent these on to Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh, who then came to him; al-Faḍl then brought him to Baghdad. Al-Rashīd presented him with everything which he desired, ordered him to be given a large sum of money, allotted to him on a regular basis munificent living allowances, and installed him in a fine house after he had stayed for some days in Yaḥyā b. Khālid's house. He was supervising all these arrangements for Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh personally, and would not delegate these to anyone else. He further ordered people (i.e., the leading men in the state and at court) to go to him after his move from Yaḥyā (b. Khālid)'s house and to present their greetings to him. Al-Rashīd also exerted himself to the utmost in showing honor to al-Faḍl.[449] Concerning this, Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah says,

You gained the victory, and may a Barmakī arm never lose its power!
with it you closed up the breach which was between (the members of) Hāshim (i.e., between the ʿAbbāsid al-Rashīd and the ʿAlid Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh).

[615] At a time when repairing it proved impossible for those who (normally) close up breaches, so that they gave up the attempt, protesting that the breach was irreparable.

But then you came along, and your hands accomplished a glorious deed, whose renown will endure through all the seasons of the Pilgrimage.

The contest-arrow of royal authority (i.e., of the Caliph) will continue to come out the winner for you whilst ever the contestant's[450] arrows are gathered together.[451]

He related: Abū Thumāmah al-Khaṭīb[452] recited to me a poem of his own authorship, including the lines, 449. Jahshiyārī, 145–6; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 492; Azdī, 277; Abū al-Faḍl Bayhaqī, Taʾrīkh-i Masʿūdī, 415; K. al-ʿUyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Bouvat, 58–9; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 144–5, 164; Kennedy, 119–20.

450. Following the reading of the Cairo text, VIII, 243, al-musāhim.

451. Munierah al-Rasheed, 168; Shiʿr Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah, ed. ʿAṭawān, 103 no. 65; Harley, "Abu's-Simṭ Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah," 84–5.

452. There is a bare mention of him in Marzubānī, 508.

Al-Faḍl secured the victory on the day of al-Ṭālaqān, and before that, on a day when he deployed his forces against Khāqān.[453]
There have never been two days like al-Faḍl's ones, in which there followed successively two battles in the course of two campaigns.
He stopped up the breaches, and restored harmony among Hāshim after it was split apart, so that its divisions are now brought closely together again.
His judgment has made the whole body of Hāshim secure from the unsheathing of two (opposing) swords among its ranks.[454]
That judgment [ḥukūmah] is not of the kind whose confused nature gave rise to momentous reports, and the two arbiters [al-ḥakamān] dispersed.[455]

As a result, al-Faḍl gave him one hundred thousand dirhams and presented him with a robe of honor, and Ibrāhīm (al-Mawṣilī) made a song out of the verses.

Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Ja'far has mentioned from 'Abdallāh b. Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan, saying: When Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh arrived from Daylam, I went to him, at a time when he was staying in the house of (the descendants of) 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, and said to him, "O my paternal uncle, there is no one after you who can bring news, and no one after me who is so well-informed about the news (i.e., no one knows all the news better than we two; between us we know all the news!), so tell me all the news about yourself." He replied, "O my nephew, I am, by God, merely just as Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab said,

By your life, Ibn Akhṭab did not reproach himself, but he whom God forsakes is completely forsaken.
He exerted[456] himself until he justified his high opinion of himself

---

453. Cf. Ṭabarī, III, 631 ff. (below, 143 ff.).

454. These two verses in Azdī, loc. cit.

455. Alluding to the arbitration [ḥukūmah] at Ṣiffīn in 37 (657) between Mu'āwiyah's supporter 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ and 'Alī's one Abu Mūsā al-Ash'arī, the "two arbiters."

456. Following the text of the Cairo edition, VIII, 244, la-jāhada, also the reading in Ibn Hishām (see next note).

(literally, "until he made his self reach the point of praise of itself") and he stormed onwards to the utmost in pursuit of glory.[457]

Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh al-ʿAlawī's Altercation with Bakkār b. ʿAbdallāh al-Zubayrī [616] Al-Ḍabbī[458] has mentioned that a shaykh of the Nawfalīs[459] said: We went into ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar's presence, at a moment when long cushions had been laid out for him, one on top of the other, and he himself was in a propped-up position, reclining on his side with them at his back. Moreover, at this particular point he was laughing to himself at something and displaying wonder at it. We said, "What is causing the Amīr to laugh, may God make his joy perpetual?" He replied, "Today, a feeling of joy has come over me such as I have never experienced before." We said, "May God complete the Amīr's joy and increase him in it!" He replied, "By God, I can only recount the story to you in a propped-up position (i.e., because of his fit of laughing)," and he reclined on his side on the mattress, remaining in a propped-up position.

He then began, "Today I was with the Commander of the Faithful al-Rashīd. He sent for Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh, and he was brought forth from the prison loaded with iron fetters.[460] The Caliph had

---

457. Ḥuyayy was a leading figure of the Jewish tribe of Qurayẓah in al-Madīnah and strenuous opponent of the Prophet; see Ibn Hishām, Sīrat al-Nabī, passim; in the Sīra, III, 252, tr. A. Guillaume, 464, the poem quoted here (uttered on the occasion of Ḥuyayy's execution) is attributed to the contemporary Jewish Medinan poet Jabal b. Jawwāl al-Thaʿlabī.

458. On chronological grounds, it seems impossible that this should be the famous Kūfan philologist and rāwī al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad al-Ḍabbī, who died ca. 170 (786–7).

459. Since Nawfal was, with Hāshim, al-Muṭṭalib and ʿAbd Shams, one of the sons of ʿAbd Manāf of Quraysh in pre-Islamic Mecca, the clan of Nawfal claimed a kinship with the house of the Prophet as fellow-Manāfīs.

460. Al-Rashīd's initial favor to Yaḥyā on his arrival from Daylam in the capital under the guarantee of amān had speedily turned into suspicion and hostility, leading to his imprisonment (on four separate occasions, according to Ṭabarī, III, 624; below, 131). See Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 313–4; K. al-ʿUyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 125–6; Van Arendonck, 69–70; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 164–5. According to Maqātil, 313, al-Rashīd welcomed Yaḥyā hypocritically and intended all the time to procure his downfall, and issued a mendacious and false letter allegedly from a partisan of Yaḥyā's to secure this.

with him Bakkār b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab b. Thābit b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr.[461] Bakkār had a violent hatred for the house of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and used to send reports to Hārūn about them and put the worst construction on information about their doings. Also, al-Rashīd had appointed him as governor of Medina and ordered him to press hard on the ʿAlids. He related: When Yaḥyā was summoned, al-Rashīd said to him with an appearance of laughter, "Go away! Go away! Does this man allege too that we have poisoned him?"[462] Yaḥyā replied, "What do you mean by 'allege?' Just look at what is wrong with my tongue!" He related: And he put out his tongue, which was as dark as beetroot. He related: Hārūn scowled and became extremely angry. Yaḥyā said, "O Commander of the Faithful, we have a bond of relationship and kinship between us, and we (i.e., the ʿAlids) are not Turks or Daylamīs. O Commander of the Faithful, we and you are members of a single house, and I remind you of God and our common relationship to the Messenger of God, that you should not imprison and ill-treat me."[463]

He related: Hārūn then felt compassion towards him. But al-Zubayrī came up to al-Rashīd and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, don't let this man's words delude you, for he is a dissident and rebel and this is mere trickery and deceit; indeed, this fellow has introduced an element of evil into our own city (i.e., Medina, the home of the Prophet after the hijrah) and has manifested rebellion there." He related: Yaḥyā then went up to him, but by God, he did not ask the Commander of the Faithful for permission to speak before he said, "I am introducing evil into your city! And who are you, anyway, may God grant you good health?" Al- [617]
Zubayrī retorted, "This is what he says to your face, so what do

461. Father of the genealogist of Quraysh, al-Zubayr b. Bakkār (on whom see EI[2] s.v. Ibn al-Zubayr [J. F. P. Hopkins]). Bakkār was governor of Medina for al-Rashīd at a date subsequent to 183 (799), see Ṭabarī, III, 739 (below, 304). His hatred for the ʿAlids would be explicable in the light of the ancient hostility between the two Meccan leading Companions ʿAlī and al-Zubayr, dating back at least to the time of the Battle of the Camel in which ʿAlī's forces killed al-Zubayr, and their descendants.

462. From the time of the Second Imām al-Ḥasan onwards, it was frequently alleged by the Shīʿah when their leaders died that they had in fact been poisoned.

463. K. al-ʿUyūn, 294. In Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 315 ff., Yaḥyā attacks the Zubayrids for various aspects of their lukewarmness as Muslims in the early days of Islam.

you think he says when he is away from you? He says, 'And who are you, anyway?' thereby refering to us contemptuously." He related: Yaḥyā then came up to him and said, "Yes, and just who are you, may God grant you good health? Was Medina the place of refuge [muhājar] sought by ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr[464] or by the Messenger of God? And who are you to say, 'He has introduced evil into our city,' when it was only through my forefathers and the forefathers of this person (i.e., the Caliph) that your forefather (i.e., al-Zubayr) migrated for refuge to Medina?"

Then he went on to say, "O Commander of the Faithful, the true founders of Islam [al-nās] are ourselves and your family; if we come out in revolt against you, we can say (in extenuation), 'You have eaten, but have left us hungry; you have clothed yourselves, but have left us naked; you have gone off on your mounts, but have left us to go on foot.' We have derived grounds of complaint against you from that, and you have derived grounds of complaint against us from our rebelling against you. Thus, the two complaints balance each other out, and the Commander of the Faithful will renew his favor upon his own house. O Commander of the Faithful, why do this man and his likes dare to impugn the people of your own house [ahl baytika]? He bears slanderous reports to you about them. Indeed, by God, he doesn't bear slanderous reports to you about us as an act of good counsel to you on his part, and indeed, he comes to us and brings slanderous reports to us about you without any intention thereby of providing us with good counsel; he only wishes to introduce an element of separation between us and inflict injury on both parties to his own satisfaction. By God, this man came to me, O Commander of the Faithful, when my brother Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh was killed,[465] and said, 'May God curse the one who killed him!' and he recited to me an elegy on him, uttering about twenty verses of it.[466] He also said, 'If you make a move in this affair (i.e., join in the rebellion), I will be the first to give allegiance to you. What is there to prevent you going to al-Baṣrah, and then our forces will be joined together with yours?'"

464. I.e., Bakkār's great-great-grandfather, anti-Caliph in Mecca and Medina during ʿAbd al-Malik's caliphate, died in 73 (692); see *EI*² s.v. (Gibb).

465. I.e., the "Pure Soul"'s death in battle, see above, 15, n. 61.

466. Isfahani, Maqātil, 316–17, gives nine verses of the poem in his account of these exchanges between Yaḥyā and Bakkār, and Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 297 = ed. Pellat, § 2503, a single verse.

He related: Al-Zubayrī's face became transformed and grew dark. Hārūn went up to him and said, "What is this man saying?" He replied, "(He is) lying, O Commander of the Faithful, not a word of what he is saying really happened." He related: The Caliph went up to Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh and asked, "Can you recite the ode in which he eulogized him (i.e., Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh)?" He replied, "Certainly, O Commander of the Faithful, may God guide you uprightly!" The Caliph said, "Then recite that ode of his!" Al-Zubayrī protested, "O Commander of the Faithful, by God, than whom there is no God but He"—and he went on until he came to the end of the mendacious oath [al-yamīn al-ghamūs][467]—"there [618] is nothing at all in what he says, and he has falsely accused me[468] of what I didn't in fact say." He related: Al-Rashīd came up to Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh and said, "He has sworn an oath; now is there any testimony (from people) who heard him recite this elegy?" He replied, "No, O Commander of the Faithful, but I will make him swear to what I desire." He said, "Go ahead and make him swear."

He related: So he went up to al-Zubayrī and said, "Say, 'May I be deprived of God's strength and power, and abandoned to my own strength and power only, if I really did say that!'" Al-Zubayrī said, "O Commander of the Faithful, what sort of an oath is this? I swear to him by God, the Unique God, yet he makes me swear by a formula which is meaningless to me." Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh retorted, "O Commander of the Faithful, if he is speaking the truth, what is preventing him from swearing by what I am asking him to swear?" So Hārūn said, "Swear to him, woe upon you!" He related: Al-Zubayrī then said, "May I be deprived of God's strength and power, and abandoned to my own strength and power only!" He related: He became agitated by these words and reduced to a state of trembling, and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I don't know 467. Etymologically, an oath made firm by dipping the hands [ghamasa] into blood, perfume, date or fruit syrup, etc., according to J. Wellhausen, *Reste arabischen Heidentums*², 128–9; hence, originally "a firm, binding oath," still with this sense in Ṭabarī, III, 1903, in connection with the Zanj rebellion. The sense of a false or perjured oath, as here, developed later; see J. Pedersen, Der Eid bei den Semiten, 26, 192 n. 1, 217 n. 2.

468. Following the Cairo text, VIII, 246, taqawwala ʿalayya.

what this oath which he is making me swear is all about, and I have already sworn to him by God the Mighty One, the Mightiest of all things." He related: Hārūn nevertheless said to him, "You must certainly swear to him, or if not, I shall indeed attach credence (to his words) against you and shall punish you." He related: So he pronounced the formula "May I be deprived of God's strength and power, and abandoned to my own strength and power only, if I really did say that!" He related: He then went forth from Hārūn's presence, God thereupon afflicted him with a paralytic stroke, and he died instantly.[469]

He related: ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar said, "By God, what gives me joy is that Yaḥyā did not omit a single word of what passed between the two of them, nor did he cut short any part at all of what he addressed to him."

He related: As for the members of the Zubayrid family, however, they assert that his wife killed him, she being a descendant of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf. Isḥāq b. Muḥammad al-Nakhaʿī has mentioned that al-Zubayr b. Hishām transmitted the information to him from his father that Bakkār b. ʿAbdallāh married a woman who was a descendant of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf,[470] and he had a place dear to her heart. But then he took to himself a slave con-
[619] cubine, to her detriment, and aroused her jealousy. Hence, she said to two black slaves of his, "This evildoer (i.e., her husband) is planning to kill you both," and she cajoled and led them on,[471] "so will you help me to kill him?" They replied, "Certainly!" So she went into his presence whilst he was asleep, accompanied by the two slaves, and the two of them sat down on top of his face until he died. He related: She then gave them date wine to drink until they vomited all over and around the bed furnishings. Then she dismissed them and placed by his head a wine flask. When next morning came, his household assembled together and she said,

469. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 298–300 = ed. Pellat, § 2505; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 317–18; K. al-ʿUyūn, 294; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 176–7, tr. 191–2. The Shīʿī sources give lurid details of his death from leprosy [judhām], swelling and blackening of the body, etc., and the impossibility of filling in his grave with earth so that it had to be roofed over with planks of teak.

470. Companion of the Prophet and member, after ʿUmar's death, of the Shūrā or council which elected ʿUthmān as Caliph; see *EI*² s.v. (M. Th. Houtsma, W. M. Watt).

471. Following Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLX, lāṭafat-humā.

"He got drunk and then vomited and choked, and thus died." But the two slaves were seized and savagely beaten, to the point that they confessed to his murder and that she had ordered them to do it. She was accordingly ejected from the house and excluded from inheriting anything.

Al-Rashīd's Repudiation of Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh's Guarantee of Safe-Conduct

Abū al-Khaṭṭāb[472] has mentioned that Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā b. Khālid transmitted the information to him one night whilst he was engaged in his nocturnal storytelling session, saying: Today, al-Rashīd summoned Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan, there being already present with him the judge Abū al-Bakhtarī[473] and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan the religious lawyer,[474] the disciple [ṣāḥib] of Abū Yūsuf.[475] He produced the guarantee of safe-conduct which he had given to Yaḥyā, and then said to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan, "What do you say concerning this guarantee, is it legally valid?" He replied, "It is valid." Al-Rashīd then argued and disputed with him over that. Muḥammad b. Ḥasan said to him, "What are you going to do about the guarantee? If he were to make war, and then renounce the struggle, he would still have a guarantee of security." Al-Rashīd showed his anger towards Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan because of his words. Then he asked Abū al-Bakhtarī to examine the guarantee. Abū al-Bakhtarī reported, "This is invalid, on such-and-such counts." Al-Rashīd said, "You are the supreme judge [qāḍī al-quḍāt], and you are the person most knowledgeable about that." He thereupon tore up the guarantee and Abū al-Bakhtarī spat on it.[476]

---

472. I.e., Ḥamzah b. ʿAlī, a rāwī frequently cited by Ṭabarī.

473. I.e., Wahb b. Wahb, traditionist, genealogist and judge of ʿAskar and then of Medina, died in 200 (815–16). See GAS, I, 267.

474. I.e., the great lawyer and pupil of, among others, Abū Ḥanīfah, al-Shaybānī, died in 189/805. See GAS, I, 421–33; EI[1] s.v. (W. Heffening).

475. The famed lawyer, died in 182 (798). See GAS, I, 419–21; EI[2] s.v. (Schacht). In Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 314, these persons are included in "a group of Ḥijāzīs" who instituted the calumnies against Yaḥyā and who persuaded al-Rashīd that the guarantee of amān was invalid. See Van Arendonck, 69–70, and Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 165 n. 1, outlining the various forms of this story in the different sources.

476. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 318–19; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 125–6.

More Accusations from the Zubayrī Family against Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh al-ʿAlawī

Bakkār b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab happened to be present at the court session, and he went up to Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh, confronting him face-to-face, and said, "You have separated yourself from the community of Muslims (literally, "you have split the staff") and have abandoned the majority body [al-jamāʿah] (i.e., the majority Sunnī [620] community); you have opposed our doctrine and have planned designs on our Caliph, and you have acted in regard to us as is well-known." Yaḥyā replied, "Who are you, may God have mercy on you?" Jaʿfar related: By God, al-Rashīd could not prevent himself from laughing heartily.[477] He related: Yaḥyā rose up in order to go back to the prison, when al-Rashīd said to him, "Go free! Don't you (i.e., the courtiers around him) perceive signs of sickness in him? If he dies at this moment, people will say, 'They poisoned him.'" Yaḥyā replied, "Not at all! I have been continuously ill since I have been in prison, and before then I was ill also." Abū al-Khaṭṭāb related: Yaḥyā only remained one month after this before he died.

Abū Yūnus Isḥāq b. Ismāʿīl has mentioned, saying: I heard ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAlī,[478] who was known as al-Khaṭīb, saying: One day, my father and I were at al-Rashīd's gate, and on that particular day there was present such a number of troops and commanders as I have never seen the like at any Caliph's gate either before then or since. He related: Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ came out to my father and said to him, "Come in!" and he remained for a while and then came out to me and said, "Come in too!" so I went in. Behold, there I was with al-Rashīd, who had with him a woman with whom he was talking. My father made signs to me by moving his head, (conveying the sense) that "He does not want anyone to come in today, but I asked permission for you to enter because of the great press of people that I saw crowding round the gate; and if you come in by this entrance, that will increase your prestige in the eyes of the people."

---

477. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 296 = ed. Pellat, § 2503.

478. Descendant of ʿAlī's son al-ʿAbbās (killed with al-Ḥusayn at al-Ṭaff or Karbalāʾ) by his wife Umm al-Banīn bt. Ḥizām al-Kilābiyyah. See Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 253; Ṭabarī, I, 3471; Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 298, tr. 388.

We did not wait very long before al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ came along and said, "ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab al-Zubayrī seeks permission to enter." The Caliph replied, "I don't want anyone to be allowed to come into my presence today." Al-Faḍl stated, "He has said, 'I have something (important) to mention.'" The Caliph retorted, "Tell him to say it to you!" Al-Faḍl said, "I told him that, but he asserts [621] that he can only tell it to you personally." The Caliph said, "Bring him in, then," and al-Faḍl went out to bring him in. The woman returned, and the Caliph became immersed in talking to her. My father came up to me and said, "He hasn't really got anything to mention. Al-Faḍl only means by this to convey the idea to all those at the gate that the Commander of the Faithful hasn't allowed us to enter because of some special matter for which we have been specifically singled out; he has merely allowed us to enter because of some request we have to make of him (i.e., of the Caliph), just as this al-Zubayrī has entered."

Al-Zubayrī appeared and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, here is something which I must mention." The Caliph said to him, "Speak on!" Al-Zubayrī said to him, "It's a secret!" The Caliph said, "We have no secrets from al-ʿAbbās." I got up (as if to go), but he said, "Nor from you, my dear fellow," so I sat down again. The Caliph then said, "Now speak!" Al-Zubayrī said, "By God, I have become fearful for the Commander of the Faithful on account of his wife and daughter, the slave girl who sleeps by his side, his slave attendant who hands him his clothes, and both the most intimate of mankind with him from among his commanders and those more distant from him" (i.e., there is virtually no one who should not be regarded with suspicion). He related: I saw that his (i.e., the Caliph's) color changed, and he said, "What's this about?" Al-Zubayrī replied, "The summons to the cause of Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan came to me, and I realized that it must not have reached me—in view of the enmity between us (i.e., the Zubayrids) and them (i.e., the ʿAlids)—until he had not left anyone at your gate (i.e., at court) without bringing him into opposition against you."[479]

479. I.e., as the least likely person to adhere to the ʿAlid cause, a Zubayrid would be the very last person to be invited to join it; hence, all the less intransigent foes of the ʿAlids must already have been invited!

The Caliph said, "Will you say this to him to his face?" He replied, "Yes." Al-Rashīd said, "Bring him in." He came in, and he repeated the words which he had said to the Caliph. Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh then replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, he has by God brought forward something which, if it were said to a person of lower status than you in regard to a person of higher status than me, and he had the controlling power over him, he would never escape (from the accusation) at all. I have a bond of kinship and relationship; so why do you not either lay aside this matter or else dispose of it quickly? It may be that you will be relieved of the burden of me by some hand or tongue other than your own; or you may well find that you will sever the bond of kinship without your being aware of it! I will contend with him in argument in your presence, bringing down the curse of God on whomever is proved wrong, if you will be patient for a little while."

The Caliph said, "O ʿAbdallāh, arise and perform the worship, if [622] you judge that appropriate." Yaḥyā arose and faced towards the qiblah, and performed two shortened (literally, "light") rakʿahs,[480] and ʿAbdallāh likewise performed two rakʿahs. Then Yaḥyā knelt down and said (to ʿAbdallāh), "Kneel," and then he intertwined his own right hand with ʿAbdallāh's one and said, "O God, if you have known that I summoned ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab to rebelliousness on the basis of this"—and he place his (other) hand on the intertwined right hands and pointed to them—"then destroy me with an act of Your divine punishment, and abandon me to my own strength and power alone. But if the contrary is true, then abandon him to his own strength and power alone, and destroy him with an act of Your divine punishment. Amen, O Lord of the Worlds!" ʿAbdallāh also repeated, "Amen, O Lord of the Worlds!" Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh then said to ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab, "Say the words which I have just said." ʿAbdallāh accordingly said, "O God, if you have known that Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh did not summon me to rebelliousness on the basis of this, then abandon me to my own strength and power alone, and destroy me with an act of Your divine punishment. But if the contrary is true, then abandon him to his own strength and power alone, and destroy him with an act of Your divine punishment. Amen, O Lord of the Worlds!" On that, the two of them parted.

---

480. Rakʿatayn khafīfatayn, i.e., consisting only of the Fāṭiḥah plus a short sūrah or portion of the Qurʾān, a permissible abridgment of the ṣalāt; cf. Jahshiyārī, 218, fa-khaffafa al-rajul ṣalātahu.

Orders were then given for Yaḥyā to be imprisoned in an out of the way part of the palace. When he went back there and ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab went away, al-Rashīd came up to my father and said, "I have done so-and-so for him and I have done so-and-so for him," and then he enumerated his favors to him. My father addressed him with a couple of words which were so innocuous as not to have scared away a sparrow, out of fear for his own safety. The Caliph commanded us to depart, so we departed homewards.

I entered (the house) with my father, taking off from him his black robes, as was my wont. Whilst I was unloosing his girdle, the slave boy suddenly burst into his presence and said, "ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab's messenger (is here)!" He replied, "Bring him in!" When the messenger entered, he said to him, "What's the reason behind your coming?" The messenger said, "My master says to you, 'I adjure you by God, please come to me!'" My father said to the slave, "Tell him that I have been with the Commander of the Faithful right up till this very moment, but I am just sending ʿAbdallāh to you; whatever you wish to communicate to me, deliver the message to him," and he further told the slave, "Set off, and he (i.e., ʿAbdallāh) will follow on your tracks."

My father remarked to me, however, "He has only summoned me in order to seek assistance from me in the furtherance of the [623] lies which he has put forward. If I help him, I shall sever my bond of relationship with the Messenger of God; and if I oppose him, he will spread slanderous reports about me. Yet people can use their children as shields and protect themselves against unpleasant occurences by means of them; so go along to him, and to everything which he says to you make your reply, 'I will inform my father.' I am sending you, without however feeling confident about your safety." My father had told me when he returned homewards (from the palace)—that (delay) having arisen because we were kept back with al-Rashīd—"Did you not observe the slave strategically placed to block the way out of the palace? He did not, by God, dismiss us until he had finished with him"—he meant Yaḥyā—"Indeed we belong to God and to Him we shall be returning, and we expect our reward from God (i.e., ultimately, and not immediately)!"[481]

481. Following the ʿinda Allāh of the Cairo text, VIII, 251, for the Leiden text's ʿAbdallāh.

I accordingly set off with the messenger. When I had gone some distance along the way, disturbed in my mind at what I was about to embark on, I said to the messenger, "Woe upon you! What is he up to, and what has disquieted him into sending to my father at this time?" He replied, "When he came back from the palace, the very moment he alighted from his mount he cried out, 'My belly, my belly!'" ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās related: I did not attach much significance to these words of the slave's nor pay much attention to him. But when we came to the gate of the house, which was in a cul-de-sac, the two doors were thrown open[482] and behold, the womenfolk had come forth with their hair flowing loose, girt with cords around their waists, beating their faces and crying out in lamentation. The man had just died!

I said (to myself), "I have never seen anything more remarkable than this," and I pulled at my mount's reins to turn it round homewards, galloping at a pace I had never galloped at previously nor ever did subsequently. The slaves and retainers were meanwhile awaiting me (anxiously), because of the strength of the shaykh's (i.e., his father al-ʿAbbās's) attachment to me. Hence, when they saw me, they ran into the house. He came out to meet me in a state of agitation, wearing only his shirt and a towel (round his waist) and crying, "What sort of situation have you left behind, my dear son?" I replied, "He is dead!" He exclaimed, "Praise be to God, who has brought about his death and has freed you and ourself of him!"

He had not finished his words when one of al-Rashīd's eunuchs [624] arrived, ordering my father to ride forth and me with him. My father observed, while we were travelling along the road, "If it were permissible for a gift of prophecy to be attributed to Yaḥyā, then his family (i.e., ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab's)—may God have mercy on him!—might well claim that to be so! We reckon him to have earned a recompense from God! By God, we cannot doubt but that he has been struck dead!" We proceeded onwards until we entered al-Rashīd's presence. When he looked up at us he said, "O ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan, have you not heard the news?" My father replied, "Yes indeed, O Commander of the Faithful, and praise be to God who has struck him down through the words of his own tongue, and may God protect you, O Commander of the Faithful, from the severance of your bonds of relationship!" Al-Rashīd said, "By God, the man (i.e., Yaḥyā) is perfectly free to do what he likes!" and he drew aside the curtain. Yaḥyā came in and, by God, I discerned clearly the shaykh's joy.

482. Following the emendations recommended in n. c.

When al-Rashīd looked at him he cried out, "O Abū Muḥammad, have you not yet realized that God has destroyed your enemy, the tyrant!" He (i.e., Yaḥyā) exclaimed, "Praise be to God who has made clear to the Commander of the Faithful his enemy's mendacity against me and who has spared him from severing the bonds of his relationship! By God, O Commander of the Faithful, even if this matter (i.e., Yaḥyā's alleged bid for power and assumption of the rule) were something which I seek, and am suitable for and earnestly desire, how (could I achieve it?). In fact, I don't seek or earnestly desire it! And (even if) attaining it could only be achieved by enlisting his (i.e., ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab's) help and then there was no one left in the world except myself, yourself and him, I would never overpower you by means of his help. Also, this man, by God"—and he pointed to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ—"is one of the misfortunes which you are afflicted with. By God, even if you were to give him ten thousand dirhams, and then he had an avid desire for one single date from me, he would sell you to me for that date" (i.e., he is totally mercenary). The Caliph replied, however, "As for al-ʿAbbāsī,[483] don't say anything but good about him." He ordered Yaḥyā to be given that very day one hundred thousand dīnārs, having imprisoned him for just part of a day. Abū Yūnus related: Hārūn had imprisoned him on three occasions in addition to this spell of imprisonment and had presented him with four hundred thousand dīnārs.

In this year, factional strife [ʿaṣabiyyah] was stirred up in Syria between the Nizārīs and Yamānīs (i.e., the North and South Arabs), the head of the Nizārīs being at that time Abū al-Haydhām.[484]

---

483. The name which al-Rashīd was wont to give al-Faḍl, presumably referring to his clientage [walāʾ] to the ʿAbbāsid family.

484. This person must be the Abū al-Haydhām ʿĀmir b. ʿUmārah who, according to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 495, and Azdī, 279, was head of the Nizārīs and who rebelled in the Ḥawrān in this year, slaughtering the Yamānīs; the Caliph sent against him, these sources continue, al-Sindī (b. al-Shāhik? See Ṭabarī, III, 580, above, 59), who

[625]

The Internecine Strife [fitnah] among the North and South Arabs in Syria

It has been mentioned that this internecine strife was stirred up in Syria at the time when Mūsā b. ʿĪsā[485] was governor there on behalf of the ruling power. A large number of people were killed among the Nizārīs and Yamānīs on account of the factional strife between them. So al-Rashīd appointed Mūsā b. Yaḥyā b. Khālid as governor over Syria,[486] and strengthened his power by attaching to him a body of commanders, troops and senior secretaries. When he reached Syria, this body of retainers was halted and accommodated [uḥillat] for his entry into (the house of) Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī al-Hāshimī.[487] Mūsā then remained there until he had restored peace among its people, the strife had died down and affairs in Syria became settled and on an even keel. The news about this reached al-Rashīd in the City of Peace, and he awarded jurisdiction over the people of Syria to Yaḥyā; the latter forgave them and overlooked the violence that had raged between them and brought them (i.e, the leaders of the Syrian factions) to Baghdad. Concerning this, (Abū Yaʿqūb) Isḥāq b. Ḥassān al-Khuraymī[488] says, killed Abū al-Haydhām and scattered his forces. In Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 127 ff., we have a highly detailed and original account of this factional strife and of the activities of the Zawāqīl or banditry, including the fighting of Abū al-Haydhām al-Murrī with the Yamānī faction, placed under the year 176 (792–3) but giving a connected narrative of events up to Abū al-Haydhām's death, placed in 182 (798), hence, encompassing also the account of the unrest in Syria given by Ṭabarī, III, 639–41. Cf. further Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 494–5; Palmer, 63–4; P. von Sievers, "Military, merchants and nomads: the social evolution of the Syrian cities and countryside during the classical period, 780–969/164–358," Isl., LVI (1979), 220–1.

---

485. It is stated in Ṭabarī, III, 626, below, 134, that Mūsā was governor of Egypt around this time. His governorship in Syria may have followed after his second spell of power in Egypt, ending in Ṣafar 176 (June 792); see below, loc. cit., n. 494.

486. Cf. Bouvat, 49.

487. The text here, as the editor notes, is evidently corrupt. The present tentative translation is an attempt to make sense of it on the lines suggested by the editor (and, in regard to the vocalization uḥillat, by the Cairo text, VIII, 251), including the insertion of a word like dār before the name of Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh, the former ʿAbbāsid governor of Syria and father of ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ, who had himself been dead since 152 (769).

488. Eulogist of al-Rashīd and the Barmakīs, and supporter of al-Amīn in the Civil War, died ca. 206/821–2 (the nisbah to be read thus according to Pellat, and not "al-Khuzaymī" as here in the text). See GAL, S I, 111–12; GAS, II, 550–1; *EI*² s.v. Abū Yaʿḳūb al-Khuraymī (Pellat).

Who will go as a messenger to Yaḥyā, when before meeting up with him lie the thickets of every valiant lion?
O shepherd of Islam, who is not neglectful of his duties,
(at this moment residing) in the pleasant circumstances of a contented way of life and the fragrance of sweet-smelling perfumes.
Its watering places are sweet and wholesome, and you are given water to drink, whilst it (i.e., the camel bearing the messenger to him) spends the nights in the hills and mountain ridges, Until it lays down its forequarters, striking (the ground) with the upper part of its neck, and its tethering ropes become firmly fixed in an abode of peace.
Every gap in the frontiers has a guard, through his forethought, and in regard to the bright gleams of a glance, no one who raises his eyes is rendered weak.[489]

Another poet, in addition to Abū Ya'qūb (i.e., al-Khuraymī), has said, Syria raged with unrest

such as to make the hair of a child turn white!
Then Mūsā was unleashed upon it, [626] with his cavalry and his detachment of troops.
So that Syria submitted (to him), when he came with the auspiciousness of his unique presence.[490]
He is the generous one, and every other generous person is surpassed by his generosity.
The generosity of his father Yaḥyā and that of his forefathers has passed to him, So that Mūsā b. Yaḥyā has become generous with both recently acquired liberality and his hereditary qualities,

489. Dīwān, ed. 'Ali Jawād al-Ṭāhir and Muḥammad Jabbār al-Mu'aybid, 58 no. 47.

490. The Cairo text, VIII, 252, has "when he brought his unique presence."

And indeed, Mūsā reached the zenith of glory when he was still a young child in his cradle.
I have singled him out for my eulogies, both eulogies in prose and those in the form of poetic odes.
He has a branch from (i.e., is a scion of) the Barmakīs, and how noble is his branch!
They have acquired possession of the whole of poetry, that in the khafīf metre and that in the madīd one!

In this year, al-Rashīd dismissed al-Ghiṭrīf b. ʿAṭāʾ from the governorship of Khurāsān and appointed Ḥamzah b. al-Haytham al-Khuzāʿī, who had the nickname of "the Bride,"[491] over it.[492]

In this year, al-Rashīd appointed Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak over Egypt, and the latter appointed (as his deputy) there ʿUmar b. Mihrān.[493]

The Reason behind al-Rashīd's Appointment of Jaʿfar al-Barmakī over Egypt and the Latter's Appointment of ʿUmar b. Mihrān (as His Deputy) over It

Muḥammad b. ʿUmar has mentioned that Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Mihrān transmitted the information to him that the news reached al-Rashīd that Mūsā b. ʿĪsā, the governor in Egypt at that time,[494] had resolved to throw off allegiance.[495] Al-Rashīd ex-

491. Son of the naqīb prominent in the ʿAbbāsid Revolution and commander of guard for al-Manṣūr and al-Mahdī, died in 181 (797–8). See Crone, 181; Kennedy, 81.

492. Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 459; Ḥamzah, 165; Azdī, 277.

493. Bouvat, 68; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 148–9. Jahshiyārī, 146, states that in this year there was something like a division of the empire into two governorships for Yaḥyā's sons, and with Jaʿfar taking over all the lands west of Anbār and al-Faḍl all the lands east of al-Nahrawān. In fact, al-Faḍl's stay in Khurāsān was only brief, 178–9 (794–5), see Ṭabarī, III, 631–7 (below, 143–51), and Jaʿfar's must have been nominal, for he stayed in Baghdad over the next years, apart from his expedition to quell a revolt in Syria, see Ṭabarī, III, 639 ff. (below, 155 ff.).

494. According to Kindī, 132, 134, 137, the member of the ʿAbbāsid family Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad (a second cousin of al-Rashīd's) was governor of Egyt on three separate occasions, the one mentioned here being the second governorship al-Muḥarram 175–Ṣafar 176 (May 791–June 792). Kindī does not, however, give this episode of ʿUmar b. Mihrān's surprise arrival in Egypt and deposition of Mūsā.

495. More feasible as a reason for al-Rashīd's displeasure are the reports of Mūsā b. ʿĪsā's oppressions in Egypt, as adduced, e.g., by Jahshiyārī, 171.

claimed, "By God, I'll replace him with the most insignificant person at my court! Search out for me such a man!" Hence, the name of 'Umar b. Mihrān, who was at that time functioning as secretary for al-Khayzurān,[496] and had no experience of acting thus for anyone else, was mentioned (to him). 'Umar had a squint [627] and an unprepossessing face; he wore inferior-quality clothes, the most valuable part of his clothing being his ṭaylasān which was worth thirty dirhams. He used to tuck up his robes and roll up his sleeves; he used to ride a mule, with a halter and an iron bridle, and with his slave boy mounted behind him.[497] Al-Rashīd now summoned him and then appointed him governor over Egypt, with responsibility for its finances, the caliphal estates there, and the conduct of warfare there. 'Umar said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I will act as governor there on one condition." He replied, "And what is that?" 'Umar said, "That I may make the decision myself about laying down office; when I have restored peace to the land, I shall depart." So al-Rashīd granted him that condition.

'Umar b. Mihrān made his way to Egypt, and his tenure of the governorship followed immediately upon that of Mūsā b. 'Īsā. The latter was expecting 'Umar's arrival. 'Umar b. Mihrān then entered Egypt, mounted on a mule, with his slave boy Abū Durrah[498] riding on a baggage mule. He sought out Mūsā b. 'Īsā's house, at a moment when Mūsā had a throng of people around him, went in and sat down among the people at the back. When the people attending the session dispersed, Mūsā b. 'Īsā enquired of 'Umar, "Is there anything you want, O shaykh?" 'Umar replied, "Yes, may God guide the Amīr uprightly!" Then he stood up with the documents (i.e., those he had brought with him, containing his own letter of appointment) and handed them over to him. Mūsā said, "Abū Ḥafṣ—may God preserve him!—is coming?" 'Umar replied, "I am Abū Ḥafṣ." Mūsā exclaimed, "Are you really 'Umar b. Mihrān?" He replied, "Yes." Mūsā commented, "May God curse Phar-

496. Cf. Abbott, 121–4.

497. 'Umar's unprepossessingness and his shabby clothes are emphasized in Jahshiyārī, loc. cit.

498. Specified in ibid. as black; hence, with the name "Father of the pearl" by antiphrasis, as often in the names of slaves.

aoh when he says, 'Is not the kingdom of Egypt mine?' "[499] Then he handed over to him the administrative charge of the province and departed.[500]

'Umar b. Mihrān went up to his slave boy Abū Durrah and instructed him, "Don't accept any presents except those which can be put into a bag (i.e., small ones, or those in cash form); don't accept any riding beast, slave girl, or slave boy." The people now began to send their presents. He (i.e., Abū Durrah) for his part began to send back the larger presents in kind but would accept presents of money and clothing and would take them along to 'Umar, who would then record on them the names of the donors. At this point, 'Umar began the process of collecting the taxes. Now there was in Egypt a group of people who were accustomed to put off payment of the taxes due and evade them.. 'Umar made a start with one of these persons, but he pleaded inability to pay him. 'Umar thereupon exclaimed, "By God, you're going to have to [628] pay the taxation due from you at the public treasury in the City of Peace itself, if you live to tell the tale!" The man said, "I'll pay it," and then begged for his indulgence and intercession. But 'Umar said, "I have sworn an oath and I cannot break it," so he despatched the man under an escort of two soldiers. Provincial governors were at this time able to correspond directly with the Caliph,[501] hence 'Umar sent with them a letter to al-Rashīd in the following terms:

"I summoned so-and-so, son of so-and-so, and demanded payment of the taxation due from him, but he refused to pay me and asked for a delay; so I gave him a respite. Then I summoned him again, but he put off paying once more, and looked like refusing payment altogether. Whereupon I swore that he should only pay it at the public treasury in the City of Peace. The total sum due from him is such-and-such, and I have sent him forward under the escort of so-and-so, son of so-and-so, and so-and-so, son of so-and-

499. Qur'ān, XLIII, 50/51.

500. Jahshiyārī, 171–3; K. al-'Uyūn, 294–5; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 126; Ibn Taghrībirdī, al-Nujūm al-zāhirah, II, 78–81, discussing at length why mention of 'Umar b. Mihrān apparently dropped out of mention among the governors of Egypt; Palmer, 61–2.

501. I.e., without having to go through the central Dīwān of the Seal, a concession obtained from the Caliph by al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā because of the administrative tardiness of the then head of that department, Abū al-'Abbās al-Faḍl al-Ṭūsī. See Jahshiyārī, 135; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 137.

so, from the section of the Commander of the Faithful's army under the command of so-and-so, son of so-and-so. If the Commander of the Faithful thinks fit to write back to me confirming his arrival, then, if God Most High so wills, perhaps he would kindly do so?"

He related: No one now pleaded inability to pay him any part of the taxation due, so he sought payment of the taxation for the first stipulated period, and then the second one. But when it was time for the third instalment, demands for payment had to be made and people put off payment. 'Umar accordingly summoned the taxpayers and the traders, and pressed them for payment; they put off payment and complained of indigence. 'Umar thereupon ordered those presents which had been sent to him to be brought in, looked into the bags and summoned the assayer and valuer [jahbadh].[502] He weighed out their contents and used them as payments toward the sums required from their original donors. He sent for baskets, and had the sale of their contents publicly proclaimed; he sold them and used the price gained towards settling the original donors' tax liabilities. Then he said, "O group of men, I kept back from you your presents for the time when you would need them. So hand over to us now the remainder of the taxation due to us." They duly handed it over to him until the whole of the taxation of Egypt was gathered in. Then he departed; it is not known that anyone else except 'Umar ever succeeded in collecting by the end of the fiscal year the whole of the taxation of Egypt due [aghlaqa māla Miṣr][503] and then departed. So he set out on a mule, with Abū Durrah on another mule, he himself having made the decision to lay down office.[504]

---

502. On the functions of this official in the financial administration of the mediaeval caliphate, see EI[2] s.v. [W. J. Fischel].

503. For the technical term of the financial departments ighlāq, see Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the technical terms of the secretary's art," 135. The difficulties of collecting taxation in Egypt are well-known to us, through, inter alia, the papyri from there; see E. Ashtor, A social and economic history of the Near East in the Middle Ages, 67–9.

504. Jahshiyārī, 173–4; K. al-'Uyūn, 295–6; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 127; Ibn Taghrībirdī, II, 80–1; Palmer, 61–3; Abbott, 122–4. According to Kindī, 134–5, followed by Ibn Taghrībirdī, II, 83, Mūsā's successor after this second governorship of his was another 'Abbāsid prince, Ibrāhīm b. Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh (a first cousin twice removed of al-Rashīd's), himself serving as governor for the second time.

In this year, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbd al-Malik led the summer raid and captured a fortress.[505]

[629] In this year, Sulaymān b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr led the Pilgrimage, and according to what al-Wāqidī has mentioned, Hārūn's wife Zubaydah and with her her brother[506] also made the Pilgrimage.[507]

---

505. Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 740. According to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522, Hāshim b. al-Ṣalt, but according to Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 716, there was no summer raid this year.

506. Presumably, her full brother Ibrāhīm b. Jaʿfar b. al-Manṣūr.

507. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 521; Abbott, 242.

The Events of the Year

177

(April 18, 793–April 6, 794)

Among the events taking place during this year was al-Rashīd's dismissal, according to what has been mentioned, of Ja'far b. Yaḥyā from the governorship of Egypt and his appointment to Egypt of Isḥāq b. Sulaymān;[508] also, al-Rashīd's dismissal of Ḥamzah b. Mālik from Khurāsān and his appointment of al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā to there, together with al-Rayy and Sijistān, in addition to the provinces which he was already governing.[509]

In this year, 'Abd al-Razzāq b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Taghlibī led the summer raid.[510]

---

508. According to Kindī, 136, governor after the second governorship of Ibrāhīm b. Ṣāliḥ, from Rajab 177 to Rajab 178 (October 793–October 794). Isḥāq b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh was in fact a first cousin of his predecessor.

509. Jahshiyārī, 146, placing the appointment in 176; Ḥamzah, 165; K. al-'Uyūn, 296; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 140; Ibn Tiqtaqā, 183, tr. 199; Bouvat, 59–60; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 145–6; Daniel, 169. Al-Faḍl did not actually set out for Khurāsān till the following year, see Ṭabarī, III, 631 (below, 143).

510. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 741. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 522, however, the leader was Dāwūd b. al-Nu'mān on behalf of 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ (who, according to Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 717, was the actual leader, with Sulaymān b. Rāshid al-Thaqafī the leader of an apparently successful winter raid (the event recorded by Ṭabarī, III, 637, under the year 178?).

In this year, according to what al-Wāqidī has mentioned, there occurred a (violent) wind, and overshadowing (of the heavens) and a redness (in the sky), on the night of Sunday (i.e., the night of Saturday-Sunday), the twenty-sixth of al-Muḥarram[511] (May 13, 793).[512] Then there was a further overshadowing (of the heavens) of the heavens on the night of Wednesday (i.e., the night of Tuesday-Wednesday), the twenty-eighth of al-Muḥarram (May 15, 793), and then a violent wind and intense overshadowing of the heavens on Friday, the second of Ṣafar[513] (May 19, 793).[514]

In this year, Hārūn al-Rashīd led the Pilgrimage.[515]

---

511. Actually, a Monday, which would fit correctly with the next-mentioned day of Wednesday, the twenty-eighth of al-Muḥarram.

512. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

513. Actually, a Sunday.

514. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

515. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 521; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year 178

(April 7, 794–March 26, 795)

Among the events of this year was the uprising of the Arab tribesmen of the Ḥawf[516] in Egypt, comprising the Qays,[517] Quḍā'ah and others, against al-Rashīd's governor there, Isḥāq b. Sulaymān, their fighting with him, and al-Rashīd's despatching to him of Harthamah b. A'yan, in company with a group of commanders attached to him as reinforcements for Isḥāq b. Sulaymān, until the tribesmen of the Ḥawf submitted, returned to their obedience and handed over the taxes due to the central government which were incumbent upon them. Harthamah was at that moment al-Rashīd's governor over Palestine. When the episode of the Ḥawf tribesmen was settled, Hārūn removed Isḥāq b. Sulaymān from the governorship of Egypt and appointed in his stead Harthamah for about a month; then he removed him and appointed 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ over Egypt.[518] [630]

516. Literally, "the flank," the region stretching from the eastern Nile delta to the fringes of Sinai; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 322.

517. On the influx of North Arab tribesmen into Egypt from 109 (727) onwards, see C. H. Becker, Beitrage zur Geschichte Ägyptens unter dem Islam, II, 121 ff.

518. Kindī, 136; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 141; Ibn Taghrībirdī, II, 87–8; Palmer, 64–5; Becker, II, 132–3.

Harthamah b. Aʿyan Restores Order in Ifrīqiyah

In this year occurred the uprising of the people of Ifrīqiyah against ʿAbdawayh al-Anbārī and the troops of the army who were with him there. As a result, al-Faḍl b. Rawḥ b. Ḥātim was killed and the members of the house of al-Muhallab there were expelled.[519] So al-Rashīd sent Harthamah b. Aʿyan against them, and they returned to their obedience. It has been mentioned that, when this ʿAbdawayh seized control of Ifrīqiyah and threw off allegiance to the central government, his power grew and the number of his supporters swelled and the people of the outlying areas rushed to join him. Al-Rashīd's vizier at that particular moment was Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak, and the latter sent Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā and his secretary Manṣūr b. Ziyād against ʿAbdawayh.[520] Yaḥyā b. Khālid kept continuously despatching letters to ʿAbdawayh, encouraging him to return to his obedience, putting him in fear of the consequences of rebellion, going to great lengths in exhorting him, giving him hopes of future bounty and promises, until he accepted a guarantee of safe-conduct and returned to his obedience and came to Baghdad. Yaḥyā implemented his guarantee of ʿAbdawayh and treated him handsomely;[521] he secured a guarantee of safety on his behalf from al-Rashīd, gave him presents and appointed him to high office.[522]

---

519. According to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 496, and Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 135–6, al-Faḍl had succeeded Naṣr b. Ḥabīb al-Muhallabī (Ibn al-Athīr, Ḥabīb b. Naṣr), arriving in Ifrīqiyah in al-Muḥarram 177 (April –May 793). In Ibn al-Athīr's detailed account, VI, 135–9, it is described how the Ifrīqiyan troops rebelled under ʿAbdawayh against the bad conduct of the Muhallabī governors there, with ʿAbdawayh extending his power from Tunis to Qayrawān and killing al-Faḍl b. Rawḥ; but at VI, 137, the further revolt of a section of ʿAbdawayh's army against its leader is placed immediately after the killing of al-Faḍl and, by implication, made into a result of this killing.

520. According to Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 138, Yaḥyā was sent on ahead by Harthamah to negotiate because of his influence and standing with the Khurasanian troops who formed a good proportion of the garrison of Ifrīqiyah.

521. Bouvat, 49. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 139, says however that he was imprisoned [uʿtuqila] at Baghdad.

522. In Yaʿqūbī's detailed account of events in Ifrīqiyah, Taʾrīkh, II, 496, the leader of the revolt is given as ʿAbdallāh b. al-Jārūd, but with Harthamah as the pacifier of the country before his return to Egypt in 179 (795–6); the equally detailed account of Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 135–9, combines the two names as "ʿAbdallāh b. al-Jārūd, known as ʿAbdawayh al-Anbārī." This same account makes clear that

In this year, al-Rashīd entrusted all his affairs to Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak.[523] [631]

In this year, al-Walīd b. Ṭarīf the Khārijite[524] rebelled in al-Jazīrah and proclaimed there the doctrine of taḥkīm;[525] he fell upon Ibrāhīm b. Khāzim b. Khuzaymah at Nisībīn,[526] and then moved from there into Armenia.[527]

Al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā's Governorship in Khurāsān and the Poetic Eulogies of Him

In this year, al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā set out for Khurāsān as governor over it. He behaved in a praiseworthy way there, building mosques and *ribāṭ*s and making raids into Transoxania. Khārākharah (?), the ruler of Ushrūsanah,[528] submitted to him, having previously refused allegiance. It has been mentioned that al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā formed in Khurāsān an army of the local population [al-ʿAjam] which he called "partisans of the ʿAbbāsids" [al-ʿAbbāsiyyah], attaching them as clients [jaʿala walāʾahum] to the ʿAbbāsids. [It the complex military operations in Ifrīqiyah extended at least up to the year 180 (796–7), for Harthamah did not return from Ifrīqiyah till Ramaḍān 181 (November 797), after a governorship there of two and a half years. See also Palmer, 67–72; Marçais, La Berbérie musulmane et l'Orient au Moyen Age, 52–3; Kennedy, 192–3.

---

523. Azdī, 280; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 145; cf. Bouvat, 49.

524. In Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, Azdī, 283, the K. al-ʿUyūn and Ibn al-Athīr (see below, n. 527), he is given the nisbah of "al-Taghlibī," but in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XI, 9 = ed. Cairo, XII, 94, and the biography given by Ibn Khallikān, VI, 31–4, tr. III, 668–71, that of "al-Shaybānī." This must be correct, in the light of the verses given by Ṭabarī, III, 638 (below, 153, see n. 564), unless we amend "al-Taghlibī" to "al-Thaʿlabī," for Thaʿlabah was the forebear of Shaybān of the great group of Bakr b. Wāʾil; see *EI*² s.v. (W. Caskel).

525. Echoing the slogan of the early Khārijites at the time of their secession from ʿAlī's army at Ḥarūrā in protest at the Caliph's acceptance of the idea of arbitration between himself and Muʿāwiyah; from this slogan "no judgment [ḥukm] except by God" arose the alternative name for the sect of al-Muḥakkimah.

526. A town of upper al-Jazīrah on the Hirmās river. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 288–9; Le Strange, Lands, 94–5; Canard, Hʿamdânides, 103; *EI*¹ s.v. (Honigmann).

527. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 718; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 495, placing the beginning of al-Walīd's revolt in 179 (795–6); Azdī, 280; K. al-ʿUyūn, 296; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 141. Ṭabarī considers the later stages of this revolt under the year 179; see III, 638 (below, 153–54).

528. I.e., the Afshīn; for this ancient Iranian title, see *EI*² s.v. (Barthold-Gibb). The name of the ruler given here is perhaps identical with the name Kh.rākh.rāf (?) in Maqdisī, Aḥsan al-taqāsīm, 274.

has also been mentioned) that these troops numbered as many as five hundred thousand, that twenty thousand of them went on to Baghdad, being known there as K.r.n.biyyah,[529] and that al-Faḍl left the remainder of them in Khurāsān, registered according to their names and entries in the pay-registers.[530] Concerning this event, Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah says,

Al-Faḍl is none other than a brilliant shooting star that sets not in battles when other stars set.
A protector over the realm of a house whose share of power is resplendent,[531] through inheritance, having a connection (i.e., with the Prophet, as descendants of the Prophet's paternal uncle al-ʿAbbās) in their possession.
An access of strength has been formed for the sons of the one who provided the pilgrims with water to drink (i.e., for the descendants of Hāshim, grandfather of al-ʿAbbās[532]), made up of squadrons of cavalry who have no other allegiance except to them.
Squadrons of cavalry for the descendants of al-ʿAbbās; the latter have recognized what al-Faḍl has brought together of these troops, both non-Arabs and Arabs.

---

529. In Jāḥiẓ, K. al-Bukhalā', 69, kurunbiyyah = "a dish made with cabbage"; cf. WbKAS, I, 150b. But could this usage here be an opprobrious designation, "cabbage [kurunb] eaters"? The penchant of the Khurāsānians for their own regional dishes, even when they were resident in Baghdad, appears from Ṭabarī, III, 1046.

530. Jahshiyārī, 146–7; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 292 (mentioning a rebellion of the people of Ṭālaqān [i.e., of Ṭālaqān in Ṭukhāristān]; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 6–7; Le Strange, Lands, 423–4; EI[1] s.v. [Huart]); Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 165; Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 459; Azdī, 280; K. al-ʿUyūn, 296; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 145; Ibn Khallikān, IV, 29, tr. II, 460–1; Barthold, Turkestan, 202–3; Bouvat, 60–2; Daniel, 169; Pipes, 137; Kennedy, 120, 181. Shaban, 31, 36, explains al-Faḍl's concessions on tax arrears and other financial matters in Khurāsān—unusual in a family so keen on exacting all the state's dues—as measures to ensure a continued flow of recruits for the troops at that time being raised in Khurāsān.

531. Vocalizing here gharra sahmuhum; the Cairo text, VIII, 257, has ʿazza sahmuhum "whose share of power is exalted," with a similar meaning.

532. Hāshim had the right of siqāyah, supplying water to the pilgrims in Mecca during pre-Islamic times, a right confirmed by the Prophet at the conquest of Mecca in 8 (630). See M. Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 64, 173; idem, Le pèlerinage à la Mekke, 89 ff.

He set down of their numbers, five hundred [632]
thousands, which the registers have enumerated for you,
Who go forth in defence of a group of persons who are the closest to Aḥmad (i.e., to the Prophet Muḥammad)
(who figures) in the Holy Book [al-Furqān],[533] if their genealogy is traced back.
Indeed, in regard to the munificent one, the son of Yaḥyā, al-Faḍl, neither silver coins nor gold ones remain for very long, through the lavish generosity of his two hands.
Not a single day of his life has elapsed since he girded up his loincloth (i.e., prepared for action in the Caliph's service) without people becoming rich from what he bestows in gifts.
How many utmost efforts in munificence and valor has he guarded closely for those who seek their furthest extent, to such a degree that one experiences fatigue before that extent is reached!
He lavishes handsome presents, when even the (ordinarily) generous person does not give them, and he does not shrink back when the sharp, slender[534] Indian swords are unsheathed.
Neither the desire for approbation—and the desire for God's approbation is his supreme aim—nor anger impels him to anything unjust.
Your liberality has flowed forth in floods, to the point that no life-giving rain nor sea with swelling waves equals it.[535]

He related: Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah had recited the following to al-Faḍl in his military encampment before the latter set out for Khurāsān:

Have you not seen that generosity passed down from Adam till it reached al-Faḍl's palm?

---

533. A Qur'ānic term with connotations of "deliverance, redemption, separation (of the believers from the unbelievers)," often applied to the Qur'ān as a whole; see *EI*² s.v. Furḳān (R. Paret).

534. Following the al-quḍub of Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLX, and the Cairo text, VIII, 257.

535. Munierah al-Rasheed, 101, no. 8; Shi'r Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah, ed. 'Aṭawān, 18–19, no. 3; Harley, "Abu's-Simṭ Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah," 85.

When Abū al-ʿAbbās's heavens become favorable and open (i.e., when al-Faḍl bestows his largesse), what fine continuous rain and heavy downpours (i.e., of bounty) you experience![536]

[633] He also said:

When her child's hunger makes a child's mother fearful, she calls him by the name of al-Faḍl and the child finds security.
Islam is given new life through you, for you are indeed its strength and glory, and you stem from a family whose youngest one is fully mature (i.e., in wisdom and power).[537]

Muḥammad b. al-ʿAbbās has mentioned that al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā ordered one hundred thousand dirhams to be given to him (i.e., to Marwān), and presented him with fine clothes and a she-mule as a mount. He related: I heard him say, "From this visit of mine to the court I netted seven hundred thousand dirhams." He further says concerning al-Faḍl,

I have selected for praise the son of Yaḥyā b. Khālid, and this is sufficient for me; and I have not acted wrongfully in thus choosing.
He habitually spreads forth justice and munificence to the leading men of Qaḥṭān and of those attaching themselves to Nizār (i.e., of the South and North Arabs).
He has travelled to the pulpit (i.e., the commanding position of an Islamic leader) of the eastern lands, and he has always had a father who takes up the lofty position on a dais and a pulpit.
He is accounted with Yaḥyā al-Barmakī, and is never seen as anything but a military leader or as one appointed to a position of power.[538]

Salm al-Khāsir also eulogized him, saying,

536. Munierah al-Rasheed, 163, no. 152; Shiʿr, 92, no. 58; Harley, 84–5.
537. Jahshiyārī, 142; Munierah al-Rasheed, 162, no. 151; Shiʿr, 86, no. 53; Harley, 85.
538. Munierah al-Rasheed, 126, no. 76; Shiʿr, 45, no. 26.

How can you fear any misfortune in a place which the Barmakīs, the munificent ones, have encompassed with their protection?
And a people who include al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā, a group of warriors who hurl themselves into the fray and whom no other group of warriors can withstand (or: can equal, yuwāzinuhu)?
He has two days, one for munificence and one for valor in battle, [634] as if Time were a captive between them.
When one of the Barmakīs reaches the age of ten years, his ambition is to become a vizier or an amīr.[539]

Al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī has mentioned that Ibrāhīm b. Jibrīl[540] set out with al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā for Khurāsān, with Ibrāhīm reluctant to depart; this consequently made al-Faḍl angry with him. Ibrāhīm related: One day, he sent for me, having paid no attention to me for a while. I went into his presence, and when I stood before him, I greeted him, but he failed to return the salutation. So I said to myself, "By God, this portends something unpleasant." He was all this time reclining, but now sat upright and then said, "Let not your mind be troubled (or: let your fear be dispelled), O Ibrahim, for the fact of my power over you restrains me from doing anything to you." He related: Then he conferred the governorship of Sijistān upon me, and when I brought in the province's taxation, he thereupon gave it back to me and gave me five hundred thousand dirhams additionally. (Al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq) related: Ibrāhīm was the commander of al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā's police force and personal guard. Al-Faḍl sent him against Kābul; he conquered it and took immense booty.[541]

539. Von Grunebaum, "Three Arabic poets of the early Abbasid age. V. Salm al-Ḥâsir," 67, no. XIX = Shu'arā' 'Abbāsiyyūn, 101, no. 19.

540. Son of a Khurasanian Jibrīl b. Yaḥyā al-Bajalī, who had probably taken part in the 'Abbāsid da'wah in Khurāsān; as noted below, Ibrāhīm was in charge of the shurṭah and ḥaras for al-Faḍl. See Crone, 179–80.

541. This operation of al-Faḍl in eastern Afghanistan and Sīstān, penetrating as far as Zābulistān, Kābul and Bāmiyān, was important for the extension of Muslim arms in these regions. See Jahshiyārī, 148; Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 289–91, tr. 102–3, 106–7; anon., Ta'rīkh-i Sīstān, 154–5, tr. M. Gold, 122; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 146; Bosworth, Sīstān under the Arabs, from the Islamic conquest to the rise of the Saffārids (30–250/651–864), 85–6; Kennedy, 181.

He related: Al-Faḍl b. al-ʿAbbās b. Jibrīl, who was with his paternal uncle Ibrāhīm, transmitted the information to me, saying: As a result of that episode, Ibrāhīm acquired seven million (dirhams), at a time when he already had in his possession four million dirhams from the money collected in taxation. When he came back to Baghdad and built the house for himself at al-Baghayīn,[542] he invited al-Faḍl to pay him a visit so that he might show al-Faḍl the results of the latter's benevolence towards him. He prepared for al-Faḍl presents, rare and costly gifts, and vessels of gold and silver, and he ordered four million (dirhams) to be placed in a certain part of the house. He related: When al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā seated himself, Ibrāhīm offered him the presents and the rare and costly gifts, but al-Faḍl refused to accept a single one of [635] them and told him, "I haven't come to you in order to despoil you!"[543] Ibrahim replied, "O Amīr, it is really your own munificence." Al-Faḍl said, "You can count on further munificence from us (in the future)." He related: Out of all that, al-Faḍl only accepted a Sijzī whip, saying, "This is part of the equipment of real cavalrymen (i.e., of outstanding warriors)." Ibrāhīm then told him, "This money is the money collected in taxation." Al-Faḍl replied, "It is all meant for you." Ibrāhīm repeated his protest to him a second time. Then al-Faḍl said, "Haven't you a house big enough for it?" Then he made all that over to Ibrāhīm and departed homewards.[544]

He related: When al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā arrived back from Khurāsān, al-Rashīd proceeded to the Garden of Abū Jaʿfar, going forth to meet him ceremonially, and the Hāshimites and a great crowd of the military commanders, secretaries, and nobles [ashrāf] met him. He began to offer presents to people of a million (dirhams) and of five hundred thousand (dirhams),[545] and Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah eulogized him, saying:

We give praise to the One who has safely brought back Ibn Yaḥyā,

---

542. The quarter on the west bank of the Tigris just below the Upper Bridge. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 108; Lassner, Topography, 68.

543. Following Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXI, the Cairo text, VIII, 259, and Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 197 = ed. Ibrāhīm, I, 297: li-uslubaka.

544. Jahshiyārī, 148; Bayhaqī Maḥāsin, loc. cit.

545. Jahshiyārī, 147; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 165; K. al-ʿUyūn, 296; Ibn Khallikān, IV, 29, tr. II, 461.

and with his advent
the birds are flying back to us with portents of great fortune.
Our eyes did not sink into a state of calm until they beheld him, nor did they cease to be suffused with tears until he returned.
His cavalrymen and his foot soldiers came to us in the morning, led by a man exciting intense admiration, who outstrips all other people in valor and commanding authority.[546]
He drove the foe away from Khurāsān, just as the morning sunshine dispells the enveloping garment of night, so that it has vanished away.
The one whose route was in the evening at Marw has returned to us, and people have said, "Our throng of people (or: host of warriors, sha'bunā) has now dispersed!"
On the occasion when he dashed down the padlock of every act of wrong, and with his forgiveness set free the captive loaded with fetters,
And he distributed among them, without arousing a sense of obligation and with fairness, beneficent gifts, perpetually enduring and repeated ones.
In this way, he dispelled from them the causes of fear which [636] alarmed,
and instituted and completed among them highly desired security and peace.
Moreover, he lavished his bounty upon the orphans among them, to such an extent that he was more caring and more beneficial (to them) than real fathers.
If people wish to attain the extremity of al-Faḍl's generosity and valor, they will find it farther away than the stars.
Yaḥyā and Khālid have become elevated through al-Faḍl to every high and noble aim.
He acts with clemency towards the one who gives the Caliph his obedience, but gives the sharp-bladed Indian sword to drink the rebel's blood.

546. The Cairo text, VIII, 259, has "... a man who has subdued people with his valor and eminence."

His swords have brought low hypocrisy in religion, together with polytheism, yet they have been a source of everlasting might and glory to the followers of the faith.
The one who, in addition to (or: because of, ʿalā) his own excellence, has been invested with the companionship of the Caliph, has acquired strength through his allegiance to the Chosen One (i.e., the Prophet Muḥammad, al-Muṣṭafā),
The contender with the Prophet in excellence, the one who inaugurates affairs and finishes them, through whom God bestows all beneficence and cuts it off.
You made the mountains of the ruler of Kābul lawful spoil and you did not leave there any hearth (or: any fuel, mūqad) for the fires of error;[547]
And then you let them experience (the impact of) cavalrymen who trampled down their massed forces, (leaving them) as slain ones, captives and routed troops in disarray.
[637] Your benevolence was shown again to Ibn al-Barm[548] after he had humbled himself, as one rendered forsaken by God, who sees death face-to-face, standing alone.[549]

Al-ʿAbbās b. Jarīr has mentioned that Ḥafṣ b. Muslim,[550] the brother of Rizām b. Muslim the mawlā of Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī,[551] transmitted the information to me, saying: I went into al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā's presence at the time of his return from Khurāsān, and he had scattered about bags of money, with their seals still intact; not a single one of these bags had its seal broken. Whereupon I recited, 547. Referring to the expedition sent against Kābul under Ibrāhīm b. Jibrīl by al-Faḍl in this year, see Ṭabarī, III, 634 (above, 147).

---

548. I.e., the son of the Khurasanian rebel Yūsuf b. al-Barm, executed by al-Mahdī in 170 (786–7), see Ṭabarī, III, 563 (above, 32, and n. 135).

549. Munierah al-Rasheed, 114, no. 43; Shiʿr Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah, 31–2, no. 15; Harley, 85–6.

550. Abū Muqātil Ḥafṣ b. Muslim al-Fazārī is mentioned as a rāwī by Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 249, s.v. Samarqand, in a tradition stemming from Anas b. Malik and in material taken from Samʿānī.

551. I.e., the Umayyad governor of Iraq during Hishām's caliphate, died in 126 (743–4); see *EI*² s.v. (G. R. Hawting).

Through al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā b. Khālid and the liberality of his hands, God has compensated for the avarice of every miser.

He related: Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah said to me, "I wish I had forestalled you in reciting this verse, and I am ready to pay ten thousand dirhams!" (i.e., for the use of this verse).

In this year, Mu'āwiyah b. Zufar b. 'Āṣim[552] led the summer raid, and Sulaymān b. Rāshid led the winter one, accompanied by Elpidius [Albīd], the Patricius of Sicily.[553]

In this year, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī, who was governor of Mecca, led the Pilgrimage.[554]

---

552. Member of a North Arab family of al-Jazīrah, whose grandfather 'Āṣim al-Hilālī had been killed in the 'Abbāsid Revolution fighting for the last Umayyad Caliph Marwān II; see Crone, 166.

553. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 145; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 741. According to Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 718, al-Bakhtarī b. Sharīk b. 'Alā' al-'Absī led the raid under 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ, but according to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 522, Yazīd b. Ghazwān led it. Elpidius had been strategos of Sicily, but had rebelled there and then in 782 fled to the Arabs in North Africa. This particular expedition penetrated as far north as Amisus (i.e. Samsun) on the Black Sea coast. See M. V. Anastos and Canard, in Cambridge medieval history. IV. The Byzantine empire. Part 1, 83, 707.

554. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit.; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 521; Azdī, 281; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year

179

(March 27, 795–March 15, 796)

Among the events of this year was the return home from Khurāsān of al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā and his appointment as his deputy there of ʿAmr b. Shuraḥbīl.[555]

[638] In this year, al-Rashīd appointed as governor of Khurāsān Manṣūr b. Yazīd b. Manṣūr al-Ḥimyarī.[556]

In this year, Ḥamzah b. Atrak al-Sijistānī led a Khārijite rebellion [sharā] in Khurāsān.[557]

In this year, al-Rashīd dismissed Muḥammad b. Khālid b. Bar-

555. Jahshiyārī, 147, calls ʿAmr "ʿUmar b. Jamīl," resembling the "ʿAmr b. Ḥ.m.l" of Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 165.

556. Manṣūr had been governor of Yemen for al-Mahdī, his father being a maternal uncle of that Caliph. See Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 481, 515; Ṭabarī, III, 502–3, 518; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 146; Crone, 255, n. 580.

557. Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 304, tr. 133; Gardīzī, K. Zayn al-akhbār, ed. ʿAbd al-Ḥayy Ḥabībī, 131–3; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 147. On the very serious revolt of Ḥamzah b. Adharak (thus correctly for Ṭabarī's Atrak) or ʿAbdallāh, which disturbed Khurāsān and Sīstān for some thirty years, till his death in 213 (828), see Palmer, 108–9; Bosworth, Sīstān under the Arabs, 87–104; idem and B. Scarcia Amoretti, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 96–7, 108–9, 510–12; R. N. Frye, The golden age of Persia, The Arabs in the East, 119.

mak from the office of court chamberlain and gave the job to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ.[558]

In this year, al-Walīd b. Ṭarīf the Khārijite returned to al-Jazīrah, and his military might grew strong and his partisans numerous.[559] Hence, al-Rashīd sent against him Yazīd b. Mazyad al-Shaybānī.[560] Yazīd enticed al-Walīd onwards and then met him in battle above Hīt,[561] when the latter was unprepared, and killed him and a numerous group of his followers, the remainder of them dispersing.[562] The poet has said in this connection,[563]

One group of Wāʾil[564] is slaughtering another group of themselves; only the steel (of a sword blade) can make notches in another sword blade.

Al-Fāriʿah, the sister of al-Walīd, said,

O trees of the Khābūr, what are you doing, putting forth leaves, as if you felt no grief for Ibn Ṭarīf?

---

558. Jahshiyārī, 184; cf. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 144. Muḥammad b. Khālid had been given the post in 172 (788–9), according to Jahshiyārī, 143.

559. The early stages of this revolt are recorded by Ṭabarī, in the events of the previous year, at III, 631 (above, 143).

560. According to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 496, the Caliph had previous to this sent two other commanders against the rebel. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XI, 9 = ed. Cairo, XII, 95, and Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 142, emphasize the Barmakīs' hostility to Yazīd regarding this appointment; this stemmed of course from Yazīd's support for the succession of Jaʿfar b. al-Hādī in the last days of al-Hādī's caliphate, see Ṭabarī, III, 572 (above, 45).

561. Town on the Euphrates to the west of Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 420–1; Le Strange, Lands, 64–5; *EI*² s.v. (M. Streck).

562. Jāḥiẓ, al-Bayān wa-al-tabyīn, I, 342; Ibn Qutaybah, 382; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 720–3; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XI, 9–10 = ed. Cairo, XII, 94–6; Azdī, 281–2; K. al-ʿUyūn, 296–7; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 141–3; Ibn Khallikān VI, 31–4, 327–9, tr. III, 668–71, IV, 218–20; Palmer, 65–7. Khalīfah, Azdī, Ibn al-Athīr, and Ibn Khallikān give considerable detail about what was clearly a serious and prolonged outbreak of some two years affecting not only al-Jazīrah and Armenia but also parts of Diyārbakr and western Persia; cf. Kennedy, 121.

563. Identified in Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 723, as Ibn al-Naṭṭāḥ, i.e., Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Mihrān, called Ibn al-Naṭṭāḥ, historian and traditionist of Baṣrah, died in 252 (866). See GAL, S I, 216; GAS, I, 317.

564. Shaybān, to which both al-Walīd and Yazīd belonged, were a component of Bakr b. Wāʾil, see *EI*² s.v. (Caskel). In Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 142, and Ibn Khallikān, VI, 31, tr. III, 668, the Barmakīs, hostile to Yazīd, allege that the latter was not prosecuting the war against al-Walīd energetically enough because of the tribal kinship bond between them.

A noble youth, who prefers provision for a journey only in the form of piety,[565]
and wealth only in the form of spears and swords.[566]

In this year, in the month of Ramaḍān, al-Rashīd performed the ʿUmrah as an act of thanksgiving to God for the benevolence which He had vouchsafed to him regarding al-Walīd b. Ṭarīf. Then when he had completed the ʿUmrah, he returned to Medina and he remained there till the time for the Pilgrimage. Then he led the people in the Pilgrimage and traveled on foot from Mecca to Minā and thence to ʿArafāt. He visited on foot the various places involved in the rites of the Pilgrimage and then came back homewards along the Baṣrah road. Al-Wāqidī, however, states that when [639] al-Rashīd had completed the ʿUmrah, he remained at Mecca until he led the people in the Pilgrimage.[567]

565. Echoing Qurʾān, II, 193/197.

566. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 723; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XI, 8–11 = ed. Cairo, XII, 92–9, giving eleven verses of this elegy plus verses by the poet Muslim b. al-Walīd Sarīʿ al-Ghawānī, who accompanied Yazīd b. Mazyad on the final campaign against al-Walīd and eulogized him for his victory; Azdī, 282–3; K. al-ʿUyūn, 297; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 142–3; Ibn Khallikān, VI, 32–3, tr. III, 669, giving eighteen verses of the elegy of al-Fāriʿah plus five more from another marthiyah; Kaḥḥālah, Aʿlām al-nisāʾ, IV, 20.

567. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 719; Azdī, 284; K. al-ʿUyūn, 297.

The Events of the Year 180

(March 16, 796–March 4, 797)

Among the events of this year was the factional strife which raged in Syria between its people.

The Outcome of the Factional Strife in Syria and the Poetic Eulogies of Ja'far b. Yaḥyā, Restorer of Order There

It has been mentioned that, when this factional strife took place in Syria between its people and the state of affairs became grave, al-Rashīd grew disturbed about what was happening among them; so he invested Ja'far b. Yaḥyā with control of Syria and told him, "Either you go forth (to settle affairs there) or I'll go myself." Ja'far exclaimed to him, "Nay, I will protect you personally," so he set out with a numerous host of military commanders, horses and armaments, and appointed al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr[568] as commander of his police force and

568. Grandson of a Khurasanian, al-Musayyab al-Ḍabbī, prominent as a deputy naqīb in the 'Abbāsid da'wah; he remained in charge of the shurṭah until al-Ma'mūn's arrival in Baghdad in 204 (819). See Crone, 187–8.

Shabīb b. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah[569] as commander of his personal guard. He went to them (i.e., to the warring factions), arranged peace between them, killed the Zawāqīl[570] and brigands in their ranks and did not leave there a single lance or horse (i.e., any matériel for future warfare). Thus, they returned to a state of security and tranquillity, and he extinguished that rancor.[571] Manṣūr al-Namarī recited when Ja'far set out,

The fires of civil strife have been kindled in Syria, but this is now the time in Syria when its fire will be allayed.
When the waves of the sea of the house of Barmak rose high over it, its blazing flames and sparks became extinguished.
The Commander of the Faithful has launched an assault upon this civil strife by means of Ja'far, and through the latter there have come together both the suppression of the trouble and then restoration of the damage (or: both its damaged part and the restored part).
He (i.e., the Caliph) has launched an attack on this civil strife by means of one auspicious in his nature, a noble one,

---

569. Grandson of the naqīb and outstanding figure in the da'wah, Qaḥṭabah al-Ṭā'ī, and subsequently head of al-Ma'mūn's ḥaras for a time. See Crone, 188–9; Kennedy, 79–80.

570. This group (the etymology of whose name remains obscure; in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 523, s.v. Dayr al-'Adhārā, we have the collective form Zāqūlah) is an intriguing one. The definition in Glossarium, p. CCLXXVIII, "non-Arab soldiers of Syria (and Mesopotamia)," is not appropriate. From mentions like the present one and that in the passage dealing with fighting at al-Raqqah in al-Amīn's reign, in 196 (811–12) (see Ṭabarī, III, 843, 845), it is clear that the Zawāqīl were Arabs, predominantly of the North Arab Qays or Muḍar group, for their chiefs were the heads of such prominent tribes as 'Uqayl, Hilāl and Sulaym. Their being linked with brigands (here, mutalaṣṣiṣah) and other lawless elements (as emerges, e.g., from Jāḥiẓ's mention of the Zawāqīl al-Shām in his K. al-Bukhalā', 49, among such notorious predators as the Kurds, the Zuṭṭ and the Qufṣ) presumably arose from their anti-'Abbāsid stance in this period; their head Naṣr b. Shabath al-'Uqaylī led a prolonged rebellion against the caliphate in al-Ma'mūn's reign, see Ṭabarī, III, 1045–6, 1069–72. From all this, we discern that the Zawāqīl were a social group rather than an ethnic or sectarian or confessional one. For a detailed consideration of the Zawāqīl, see Ayalon, The military reforms of Caliph al-Mu'taṣim, 18–20.

571. Jahshiyārī, 162–3, and Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 495, giving the (differing) texts of a khuṭbah or oration which Ja'far pronounced to the people of Syria, presumably at Damascus, after completing his operation there; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 459–60; Azdī, 289; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 151; Bouvat, 68–9; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 149; K. S. Salibi, Syria under Islam: empire on trial, 634–1097, 37; Kennedy, 122.

a man with whom both the Qaḥṭān and Nizār factions of Syria have become content.[572]

A hard, Barmakī rock has come down upon them, [640] whose onslaught penetrates as far as the brains in the skulls of those who have broken their trust.
You have set out in the morning, driving forward a dense mass of troops, on whose heads are the gleaming stars of the Pleiades and whose fruit is death.
When their banners flutter and the wind murmurs gently through them, their sudden, dazzling appearance strikes fear into those who hear them.
So say to the people of Syria, "Do not let either long-term or immediate hopes deprive you of your native intelligence.
For indeed, the Commander of the Faithful is coming to you in person, and if not in person, then his personal choice."
He (i.e., Ja'far) is the wielder of authority, whose beneficence and piety are hoped for,
and against whose battle assaults no one can stand firm.
The Caliph's helper, sword and spearshaft; and in warfare, their blades become stained with blood!
Some persons have the Caliph's secrets kept from them, but you are their repository and the place where they are held safe.
You have fulfilled your trust, and have never acted treacherously towards any group of people with a covenant of protection, and you have never come near to any matter whose dishonorable aspects have reached you.
A physician, in bringing fresh life to affairs; when necks become contorted through the onslaughts of time, you are their healing splint.
When momentous strokes of ill fate come upon the son of Yaḥyā, [641]
Ja'far,
the most serious of them do not affright him.

572. This eulogy of Ja'far's pacifying role among both South and North Arabs confirms that the Zawāqīl were a component element of the local Syrian Arabs.

There has arisen in Syria, from your approach, a cloud, whose gifts are eagerly hoped for but whose destructiveness is feared.
So well for the people of Syria, but woe for their mother!
Either life-giving rain has come to it, or else destruction for it!
If they agree to peace, it will be the cloud of a lavish giver and abundant rain; but if not, then its rain will be composed of blood!
Your father is the father of those wielding authority, Yaḥyā b. Khālid, the one who is characterized by liberality and beneficence;
even the small acts of beneficence which he does are great ones (i.e., by other people's standards) (or: even the great acts of liberality are [for him] small ones).
How many acts of generosity do you see among the Barmakīs, and how many of their rushing-forward battle horses, whose dust cannot be penetrated!
The person who alights with his baggage by you comes with auspicious stars, and a band of people having you as their protector is rendered strong.
My defender (or: excuser, ʿadhīrī) from the attacks of fate; can its determined actions and its acts of constraint keep me back from Jaʿfar?
Hence, the eye of sorrowfulness is continually fixed from fear of separation from him;
my soul is attached to him, and its recollection does not allow any sleep.[573]

Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā's Return from Syria and His Address of Thanks to the Caliph

Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā appointed Ṣāliḥ b. Sulaymān governor of the Balqāʾ[574] and adjoining regions, and appointed as his deputy in 573. Shiʿr Manṣūr al-Namarī, 92–3, no. 23.

574. The hilly district, still thus known today, east of the Jordan. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 489; Le Strange, Palestine, 34–5; *EI*² s.v. (J. Sourdel-Thomine).

Syria ʿĪsā b. al-ʿAkkī,[575] and then returned homewards. Al-Rashīd heaped further honors on him. When he came to al-Rashīd, he went into his presence, according to what has been mentioned, and kissed his hands and feet. Then he stood respectfully before him[576] and said, [642]

"O Commander of the Faithful, praise be to God who has put my fearfulness at ease, answered my prayers, shown mercifulness in regard to my supplications and prolonged my predetermined span of life so that He has let me see the face of my master! He has honored me with proximity to him, He has bestowed favor on me by allowing me to kiss his hand, and He has brought me back to his service. By God, if I were indeed to mention my absence from him, the occasion of my going away and the strokes of destiny which have disquieted me, then know that they were the result of sins against God which overtook me and errors which encompassed me. If my absence from you were to prove long, O Commander of the Faithful—may God make me your ransom!—I would be afraid of my reason giving way out of anxious solicitude for your presence and sorrowfulness at being separated from you, and afraid that violent yearning to see you would speedily turn me away from giving ear to you! So praise be to God, who has preserved me safe during the period of my absence, has let me enjoy sound health, has taught me to respond readily, has held me fast to obedience and has stepped in to keep me back from embarking on courses of disobedience. For I only set out in accordance with your judgment, and I have only come back with your express permission and command; and death has not intervened to cut me off before I could reach you. By God, O Commander of the Faithful—and there is no mightier oath than one sworn by God—I have experienced directly things regarding which, if the whole of the present world were set out before me, I would nevertheless prefer over it being close to you, and would not indeed consider it a fair exchange for staying close to you."

575. Cf. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 149 n. 2.

576. On these customs of respectful greeting, see Sourdel, "Questions de cérémoniale ʿabbaside," 136–8. It was humiliating to have to stand thus for an inordinately long time.

Then Ja'far said to al-Rashīd immediately after the previous speech and on the same spot,

"O Commander of the Faithful, God has not ceased to confer favors upon you in your caliphate, inasmuch as He knows your intentions and lets you see in your subjects the full extent of your hopes. He sets their community aright for you, He brings together their social cohesion and He repairs the disorder of their affairs, as an act of preserving your power among them and as an act of mercifulness for them. All this is only in order (for them) to hold firmly to obeying you and to preserve the bond of your favor; God is the One deserving of praise and merit for this. O Commander of the Faithful, I have left the people of various districts of Syria in a state of obedience to your command, remorseful over their previous rebelliousness against you, holding fast to their allegiance to you, placing themselves within your sphere of authority, seeking your forgiveness, feeling assured of your magnanimity, hopeful of [643] your graciousness and secure against the manifestations of your anger. Their condition in their present state of unity and agreement is exactly as it was in their (former) state of mutual dissension, and their condition in their present state of harmony is exactly as it was in their (former) state of refractoriness and rebellion. The Commander of the Faithful's pardon and forgiveness towards them is bestowed before they actually plead their extenuating circumstances, and his conciliatory approach to them and favorable attitude towards them is vouchsafed in advance by him before their actually seeking (forgiveness).

"God's oath, O Commander of the Faithful, if it is true that I have set out homewards from them, and that God has allayed the sparks of their violence, extinguished their blazing, expelled their rebellious ones, set on the upright way the mass of them, bestowed on me a fortunate outcome in my dealings with them and given me the upper hand over them, all that stems only from your charismatic power, your auspiciousness, your victorious strength, the perpetuation of your happy, fortunate and enduring ruling authority, and their fearfulness of you, combined at the same time with hopefulness of favor from you. By God, O Commander of the Faithful, I only marched against them in accordance with your instructions, I only dealt with them strictly according to your command, and I only went among them in exact conformity with what you indicated and delineated to me and gave me the resources to achieve; and by God, it was only because of your summons, because of God's singling you out to use as His instrument and because of their fear of your severity, that they submitted.

"That which I myself have accomplished—even though I have exerted myself to the utmost and reached the farthest extent of my powers—has not fulfilled a part of the duty which I owe to you. Nay, your beneficence towards me has only increased in intensity as I myself have increased in inability and sense of weakness to render you thanks. God has not created a single person out of your subjects who has striven further than myself in stimulating within himself the desire to fulfill the obligations due to you. My sole desire is to expend my life blood in obedience to you and in everything which brings (me) nearer to conformity with your will. But I experience your acts of benevolence towards me on a scale which I experience from no one else. Moreover, how can I thank you enough, when I have become unique among my contemporaries in regard to what you have done for me and through me? Or how can I thank you enough, when I am only able to give thanks to you through your own acts of beneficence to me? Or how can I thank you enough, when, even if God were to set my act of thanks among the enumeration of the acts of generosity which you have vouchsafed to me, the abundance of these from me would not reach to that? Or how can I thank you enough, when you are my [644] refuge to the exclusion of any other refuge which I might have? Or how can I thank you enough, when you do not accept what I want for myself (i.e., the Caliph knows what is good for him better than he does himself)? Or how can I thank you enough, when you renew your acts of beneficence to me to an extent which exceeds everything bestowed on me previously by you? Or how can I thank you enough, when you make me forget all your earlier favors to me by the renewed favors which you heap upon me (at present)? Or how can I thank you enough, when, through your bounty, you set me in the foremost place above my peers? Or how can I thank you enough, when you are my patron and master [waliyyī]? Or how can I thank you enough, when you are the bestower of honors upon me? I beseech God, who has bestowed that upon me through you, without any just claims (of mine) to it—for thankfulness is impotent to attain the conveying of a part of that, nay, a part of the tenth of a tenth of it—that He will take charge of recompensing you on my behalf with what He is more able to accomplish and more powerful to attain, and that He will fulfill, on my behalf, the obligations justly due to you and (the requiting of) the great extent of your favor. For all that lies within the power of His hand, and He is the One able to bring it about!"

Various Items of Information

In this year, al-Rashīd took away the seal ring from Ja'far b. Yaḥyā and handed it over to his father Yaḥyā b. Khālid.[577]

In this year, Ja'far b. Yaḥyā was appointed governor of Khurāsān and Sijistān. He appointed as his deputy over them Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah.[578]

In this year, al-Rashīd set out from the City of Peace, intending to travel to al-Raqqah via the Mawṣil road. When he encamped at al-Baradān, he appointed 'Īsā b. Ja'far governor of Khurāsān and dismissed Ja'far b. Yaḥyā from it. Ja'far b. Yaḥyā's tenure of power over it was twenty days (literally, "nights") only.[579]

In this year, Ja'far b. Yaḥyā was appointed commander of the guard.[580]

[645] In this year, al-Rashīd had the walls of al-Mawṣil demolished because of the Khārijites who had raised rebellions from there.[581] Then he proceeded to al-Raqqah; he encamped there, and made it one of his homes.[582]

In this year, he dismissed Harthamah b. A'yan from Ifrīqiyah and 577. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 152; Bouvat, 69; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 138.

578. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 686; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 165; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Bouvat, loc. cit. Muḥammad was a grandson of the naqīb Qaḥṭabah al-Ṭā'ī, see Ṭabarī, III, 639 (above, 156, n. 569), and Crone, 188.

579. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Bouvat, loc. cit.; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 149.

580. Ibid.

581. Dīnawarī, 390; Azdī, 279–80, 284–7; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 152–3. The Khārijite rebel is named here as al-'Aṭṭāf b. Sufyān al-Azdī, who according to Azdī began his rebellion in the Mawṣil region as far back as 177 (793–4) and who eventually escaped to Armenia.

582. Azdī, 289; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 153. Al-Raqqah became in fact al-Rashīd's favored residence rather than Baghdad, possibly because, Shaban has suggested, the Barmakīs' effective methods of collecting taxation were detested by the Abnā' of Baghdad. See Shaban, 30, 37; Kennedy, 120.

brought him back to the City of Peace. Ja'far b. Yaḥyā then appointed him as his deputy over the guard.[583]

In this year, there was a severe earthquake in Egypt, and as a result, the top of the Pharos at Alexandria fell down.[584]

In this year, Khurāshah (b. Sinān) al-Shaybānī proclaimed a Khārijite revolt [ḥakkama . . . wa-sharā] in al-Jazīrah, but Muslim b. Bakkār b. Muslim al-'Uqaylī killed him.[585]

In this year, the "wearers of red" [al-muḥammirah][586] rebelled in Jurjān. At this, 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān[587] wrote that the person who had stirred up that outbreak against him was 'Amr b. Muḥammad al-'Amrakī and that he was a dualist infidel [zindīq];[588] so al-Rashīd ordered him to be killed, and he was executed at Marw.[589]

In this year, he dismissed al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā from Ṭabaristān and al-Rūyān and appointed as governor there 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim (b. Khuzaymah). He also dismissed al-Faḍl from al-Rayy; Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥārith b. Shikhkhīr[590] became governor there, and Sa'īd b. Salm (b. Qutaybah) became governor over al-Jazīrah.[591]

---

583. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 152.

584. K. al-'Uyūn, 301; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit. The Pharos was frequently affected by earthquakes, but remained in use till the 5th (11th) century; see *EI*² Manār, Manāra (J. Sadan and J. Fraenkel).

585. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 724–7, gives a detailed account of this revolt, which began in 179 (795–6) and affected western Persia and central Iraq rather than al-Jazīrah; al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā sent Ibrāhīm b. Jibrīl to suppress it in this year. Azdī, 279, places this revolt under the year 176, and at p. 291, as continuing into the year 181. For Muslim b. Bakkār, member of an al-Jazīrah family whose members served both the Umayyads and the 'Abbāsids, see Crone, 106–7.

586. This is the name later given to the partisans of Bābak al-Khurramī. These must have been the neo-Mazdakites who had already risen in Gurgān in 162 (779) in conjunction with the Khurramiyyah or Abū-Muslimiyyah (Ṭabarī, III, 493). See on both these revolts, Scarcia Amoretti, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 505; Daniel, 147; *EI*² s.v. Khurramiyya (Madelung).

587. 'Alī b. 'Īsā had been appointed governor of Khurāsān in 180 (796–7) in place of al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā al-Barmakī's deputy Manṣūr b. Yazīd, an appointment not actually noted by Ṭabarī,. See Jahshiyārī, 180; Dīnawarī, 390; Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 165; Gardīzī, 131; Daniel, 170; Crone, 178; Kennedy, 121.

588. Presumably a Manichaean.

589. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 152; Daniel, loc. cit.

590. The Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXI, suggest for this last component B.sh.khīr in the light of Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVII, 74 = ed. Cairo XVIII, 301 (here read as Buskhunnar).

591. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

In this year, Muʿāwiyah b. Zufar b. ʿĀṣim led the summer raid.[592]

In this year, al-Rashīd went to al-Baṣrah on his return from Mecca. He reached it in al-Muḥarram of this year and then encamped at al-Muḥdathah[593] for some days before transferring thence to the palace of ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar[594] at al-Khuraybah.[595] Then he sailed on the Sayḥān Canal, which Yaḥyā b. Khālid had dug out,[596] with the aim of inspecting it and the weir [sikr] across the Ubullah Canal and the Maʿqil Canal,[597] until (as a result of that) the condition of the Sayḥān (Canal) was put in good order. Then he set out [646] from al-Baṣrah on the eighteenth of al-Muḥarram and arrived at the City of Peace. Then he set out for al-Ḥīrah;[598] he established himself there, had residences built there and allotted parcels of building land [khiṭaṭ] for his retinue, remaining there about forty days. The people of al-Kūfah rose up against him and made his position in the neighborhood uncomfortable, so he traveled to the City of Peace.[599] From there, he set out for al-Raqqah, appointing as his deputy in the City of Peace at this time Muḥammad al-Amīn, to whom he entrusted the governorship of the two Iraqs (i.e., Mesopotamia and ʿIrāq ʿAjamī, western Persia).

In this year, Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī led the Pilgrimage.[600]

---

592. Ibid.; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 741. According to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522, Ismāʿīl b. al-Qāsim led the raid.

593. "The newly founded," presumably a new suburb of the expanding city of al-Baṣrah.

594. I.e., the ʿAbbāsid prince, grandson of al-Manṣūr, at this time governor of al-Baṣrah; see Ṭabarī, III, 559 (above, 26–27, n. 109).

595. A place in al-Baṣrah, according to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 363–4.

596. Balādhurī, 363; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 293–4; Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 64. The surroundings of this canal seem to have been noisome, judging by the poetry on it.

597. For these canals, see Balādhurī, 358–63; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 363–4; Le Strange, Lands, 46–8; Pellat, 16–19.

598. Town of central Iraq, the ancient capital of the pre-Islamic Lakhmid kings, but in Islamic times gradually eclipsed by the nearby military camp of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 328–31; Le Strange, Lands, 75–6; *EI*² s.v. (I. Shahīd).

599. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 152–3.

600. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 720; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522; Azdī, 290; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 153.

The Events of the Year

181

(March 5, 797–February 21, 798)

Among the events taking place in this year was al-Rashīd's leading a raid into the Byzantine lands. He captured by force of arms the fortress of al-Ṣafṣāf.[601] Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah accordingly recited,

Indeed, the Commander of the Faithful, the Chosen One, has left al-Ṣafṣāf a desert plain [qāʿan ṣafṣafā]![602]

In this year, ʿAbd al-Mālik b. Ṣāliḥ led a raid against the Byzantines; he reached as far as Anqirah and captured Maṭmūrah.[603]

---

601. Dīnawarī, 390 (with "Maʿṣūf" for "Ṣafṣāf"); Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 460; Azdī, 290; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 158; Palmer, 75. This fortress ("The Willows") lay beyond the northern end of the Cilician Gates, on the Constantinople road, near Loulon or Luʾluʾah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 413; Le Strange, Lands, 134–5, 139; Honigmann, 42; Canard, Hʿamdânides, 284; idem, in Cambridge medieval history, IV/1, 707; Shaban, 31–2.

602. Munierah al-Rasheed, 143, no. 119. This rajaz verse utilizes the same play on words as v. 4 of the complete ode in the ṭawīl metre given by Ṭabarī, III, 741–3 (below, 306–8).

603. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 741. Anqirah is the modern Ankara; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 271–2; Le Strange, Lands, 149; and *EI*² s.v. Ankara (F. Taeschner). Maṭmūrah, or its plural form Maṭāmīr, lay in Cappadocia north of

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah and Ḥamzah b. Mālik both died.[604]

In this year, the "wearers of red" gained control of Jurjān.

In this year, at the time of his establishment at al-Raqqah, al-Rashīd introduced as the opening formula of his official documents the words "Blessings [al-ṣalāt] be upon Muḥammad, may God bless him and grant him peace!"[605]

In this year, Hārūn al-Rashīd led the Pilgrimage.[606] He led the people in the Pilgrimage rites, and then he turned back in haste. Yaḥyā b. Khālid remained behind, but then caught up with al-Rashīd at al-Ghamrah.[607] He begged to be excused from his official post, hence, al-Rashīd released him from the charge. Yaḥyā therefore gave back the seal ring to al-Rashīd and asked the Caliph for permission to remain in Mecca. Al-Rashīd gave him this, so Yaḥyā returned to Mecca.[608] the Taurus range. See Le Strange, Lands, 138; Honigmann, 46; *EI*² s.v. (Ed.). According to the K. al-ʿUyūn, 301, it was ʿAbd al-Razzāq (b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd al-Taghlibī, see Ṭabarī, III, 629, above, 139) who led the summer raid; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522, makes al-Rashīd its leader.

---

604. Azdī, 290; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 159.

605. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit. Hilāl al-Ṣābiʾ mentions innovations in the invocatio of official letters from the caliphate of al-Maʾmūn, with wording similar to this (was'aluhu an yuṣalliya ʿalā Muḥammadⁱᵇⁿ ʿabdihi wa-rasūlihi); see his Rusūm dār al-khilāfah, 106, tr. Elie A. Salem, 83.

606. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, loc. cit.; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 728; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; Azdī, 292; K. al-ʿUyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

607. The stage on the Pilgrimage route from Mecca to Iraq which conventionally marked the transition from the lowland Tihāmah to the upland Najd. See Bakrī, III, 1003–4; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 212–13; Al-Wohaibi, 135, 381; Saad A. Al-Rashid, Darb Zubaydah. The Pilgrim Road from Kufa to Mecca, 136, 138.

608. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 138–40.

The Events of the Year 182

(February 22, 798–February 11, 799)

Among the events taking place during this year was al-Rashīd's return from Mecca and his journeying to al-Raqqah. He exacted there homage to his son ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn in succession after his other son al-Amīn, and secured allegiance to him from the army at al-Raqqah. He confided al-Maʾmūn to the care of Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā, and then despatched him to the City of Peace, accompanied by the members of the ʿAbbāsid family Jaʿfar b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr[609] and ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ, and by the military commander ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā. Homage was given to al-Maʾmūn at the City of Peace when he arrived there, and his father appointed him governor of Khurāsān and its dependencies as far (west) as Hamadhān, and gave him the honorific of "al-Maʾmūn."[610] [647]

609. Governor of al-Baṣrah for al-Rashīd, died in 186 (802); see Ṭabarī, III, 651 (below, 179).

610. Jahshiyārī, 165 (without specifying the date); Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 460; Azdī, 293; K. al-ʿUyūn, 301; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 161. These events are, however, placed by Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 500–1, in the following year 183 (799–800), which accords with Ṭabarī's also placing them, III, 652 (below, 180) in 183. This later year for al-Maʾmūn's nomination seems to be the one favored by Gabrieli, "Successione,"

In this year, the daughter of the Khāqān, ruler of the Khazars, was brought to al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā, but she died at Bardhaʿah,[611] Saʿīd b. Salm b. Qutaybah al-Bāhilī being governor of Armenia at that time. The Khazar nobles [al-ṭarākhinah[612]] who had been accompanying her went back to her father and told him that his daughter had been slain by treachery. He accordingly grew enraged on account of this, and began making preparations for war against the Muslims.[613]

In this year, Yaḥyā b. Khālid returned to the City of Peace.

In this year, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ led the summer raid[614] and reached as far as Ephesus [D.fsūs, read Afsūs], the town of the Companions of the Cave.[615]

In this year, the Byzantines blinded their ruler Constantine, son of Leo, and set up as ruler his mother, Irene [Rīnī], who was called by the honorific of "Augusta."[616]

344–5; but Bouvat, 69, and Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 151, favor 182. See also Abbott, 181–2, and Kennedy, 124. Jaʿfar was regarded at the time as the main proponent of al-Maʾmūn's claims as second heir, as is expressed in the poetry cited in Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 367 = ed. Pellat, § 2564.

611. The main town of Arrān in eastern Transcaucasia. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 379–81; Le Strange, Lands, 177–8; *EI*² s.v. (D. M. Dunlop); EIr s.v. Barḏaʿa (Bosworth).

612. Sing. ṭarkhān (Tkish. tarqan, tarkhan, terken), a title used among the ancient Turks to denote a princely status just below that of the Qaghan. See Sir Gerard Clauson, An etymological dictionary of pre-thirteenth century Turkish, 544; and for its use among the Khazars, Dunlop, The history of the Jewish Khazars, 72, 180 n. 43, and among their neighbors the Oghuz, A. Z. V. Togan, Ibn Faḍlāns Reisebericht, text 16–17, tr. 30–1, and Excursus § 36a, 143–4.

613. Azdī, 294; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 161. Dunlop, 180–1, 183–5, believes that the episode of the Khazar Khaqan's daughter placed in 182–3 (798–9) is a confusion with the events of 145 (762–3), when the Khazars did invade the Muslim lands after the death of a Khazar princess who had married the governor of Armenia Yazīd b. Usayd al-Sulamī; the confusion may have arisen from the similarity of this latter name with that of the governor of Armenia in 183, Yazīd b. Mazyad.

614. Azdī, 293; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Brooks, loc. cit.; Canard, in Cambridge medieval history, IV/1, loc. cit.

615. I.e., of the Qurʾānic Aṣḥāb al-Kahf or Sleepers of Ephesus (Qurʾān, XVIII, 9–25/10–26; see *EI*² s.v. (Paret).

616. K. al-ʿUyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Brooks, loc. cit. Constantine VI, son of Leo IV, was blinded in 797 by his mother, Irene, when he achieved his majority so that she might retain control of the real power, and she held this till she was deposed in the revolution of 802, as the last of the Isaurian dynasty, by Nicephorus I. See A. A. Vasiliev, History of the Byzantine empire 324–1453, I, 234–5; Anastos and Canard, in Cambridge medieval history, IV/1, 88–91, 706.

In this year, Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī led the Pilgrimage.[617]

617. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 729; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522; Azdī, 294.

The Events of the Year

183

(February 12, 799–January 31, 800)

[648] The Khazar Invasion of Armenia

Among the events taking place during this year was the invasion of the Khazars through Bāb al-Abwāb,[618] on account of the Khāqān's daughter, their sweeping down on the Muslims and the Protected Peoples [ahl al-dhimmah] there, and their capture and enslavement—according to what has been mentioned—of more than 100,000 persons. They perpetrated a monstrous deed, whose like had never been heard of previously in Islam. Hence, al-Rashīd appointed Yazīd b. Mazyad as governor of Armenia, together with Azerbaijan, reinforced him with the army and sent him forward, and he stationed Khuzaymah b. Khāzim at Nişībīn as a supporting force for the troops of Armenia.[619]

---

618. The later town of Darband on the western shore of the Caspian Sea, guarding a celebrated pass between the Sea and the Caucasus mountains; see EI[2] s.v. Bāb al-Abwāb (Dunlop).

619. Dīnawarī, 390; K. al-'Uyūn, 301–2; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 163. The appointment of Yazīd over Armenia and Arrān, and subsequently of his sons Asad and Khālid (see Crone, 170), established a connection of the family with the Transcaucasian region

A differing account of the reason behind the Khazar's invasion of Armenia has, however, been related. This is what Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh has mentioned, to the effect that his father transmitted the information to him that the reason for the Khazars' invasion of Armenia in Hārūn's reign was that Saʿīd b. Salm had executed, by the axe, al-Munajjim al-Sulamī.[620] His son thereupon went to the land of the Khazars and asked them for military assistance against Saʿīd. Hence, they invaded Armenia through the breach.[621] Saʿīd was defeated and fled, and the Khazars raped the Muslims' womenfolk and remained there—according to what I believe is the truth—for seventy days. Hārūn then sent Khuzaymah b. Khāzim and Yazīd b. Mazyad to Armenia, until the two of them restored the position which Saʿīd had brought to such a parlous state and expelled the Khazars. The breach was thus closed up.[622]

Various Items of Information

In this year, al-Rashīd wrote to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān, who was at that time (governor) in Khurāsān, to come to him. The reason for his despatch to ʿAlī with these instructions was that a rumor had been brought to his notice and he had been informed that ʿAlī had determined upon an act of rebelliousness. So ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā appointed which later led to the rule in Sharvān of a line of Yazīdī Sharvān-Shāhs, in the course of time largely Iranized; see Minorsky, A history of Sharvān and Darband in the 10th–11th centuries, 116 ff.

---

620. Probably to be identified with the local ruler of Bāb al-Abwāb or Darband, al-Najm b. Hāshim, mentioned in Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 518, as being executed by Saʿīd, whereupon his son Ḥayyūn rebelled and appealed to the Khazars for aid; cf. Dunlop, The history of the Jewish Khazars, 183–4.

621. I.e., the Caspian Gate.

622. Azdī, 294–5; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Kennedy, 122–3. This is the version of events concerning the Khazar invasion accepted by Dunlop, loc. cit., as the correct one, i.e., as having no connection with the death of a daughter of the Khazar ruler but rather with internal events in Armenia and Transcaucasia. As Yaʿqūbī's detailed account of events there in al-Rashīd's caliphate (Taʾrīkh, II, 515–19) shows, these regions had been continuously in turmoil during the earlier part of his reign, partly, it seems, because of an influx of North Arab tribesmen brought in by North Arab governors into regions prevously largely settled by Yamanī tribesmen. Salm's governorship had begun peacefully, but then relations with the local aristocracy [al-baṭāriqah] had deteriorated. The situation was restored, after the retreat of the Khazars, by punitive measures of al-Rashīd's new governors and the achievement of a balance between Nizār and Yaman there.

[649] his son Yaḥyā as his deputy in Khurāsān, a procedure confirmed by al-Rashīd, and then came to the Caliph, bringing to him an immense sum of money. Al-Rashīd thereupon sent him back to Khurāsān as governor responsible to his own son al-Ma'mūn, with the task of combatting Abū al-Khaṣīb; so at this, he returned.[623]

In this year, Abū al-Khaṣīb Wuhayb b. 'Abdallāh al-Nasā'ī, mawlā of (the tribe of) al-Ḥarīsh,[624] rebelled at Nasā' in Khurāsān.[625]

In this year, there died at Baghdad Mūsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad[626] and the judge Muḥammad b. al-Sammāk.[627]

In this year, al-'Abbās b. Mūsā al-Hādī b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī led the Pilgrimage.[628]

---

623. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit. Ḥamzah, 165, places 'Alī b. 'Īsā's journey to al-Rashīd at al-Rayy in Jumādā I, 184 (June, 800).

624. I.e., the Banū al-Ḥarīsh b. Ka'b b. Rabī'ah b. 'Āmir, see Ibn Durayd, K. al-Ishtiqāq, 297–8, 300–1.

625. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 460; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 164; Daniel, 171, noting that Abū al-Khaṣīb was possibly the governor of Abīward in northern Khurāsān, since Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 305, tr. 133, says that he rebelled there. Nasā was a town of northern Khurāsān. See Ḥudūd al-'ālam, tr. 103, comm. 326; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 281–2; Le Strange, Lands, 394; EI[1] s.v. (Minorsky).

626. I.e., the Seventh Imām Mūsā al-Kāẓim who, in spite of his apolitical stance, had been imprisoned by al-Rashīd in Baghdad. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 499–500; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 309–11, 329–30 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2512–13, 2532; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 332–6; K. al-'Uyūn, 302; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Ibn Khallikān, V, 307–10, tr. III, 463–6; EI[1] s.v. Mūsā al-Kāẓim (Strothmann).

627. I.e., Abū al-'Abbās Muḥammad b. Sabīḥ, described also as a mudhakkir or homilist. See Azdī, 295; al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, V, 368–73, no. 2895; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 165.

628. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 730; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 522; Azdī, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 164.

The Events of the Year 184

(FEBRUARY 1, 800–JANUARY 19, 801)

Among the events taking place during this year was Hārūn's entering the City of Peace in Jumādā II, returning thither from al-Raqqah by boat down the Euphrates.[629] When he reached the City of Peace, he instituted punitive measures against the people regarding arrears of taxation from previous years [al-baqāyā[630]], and, according to what has been mentioned, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Haytham b. Sām assumed the task of extracting these arrears, by imprisonment and flogging.[631] Ḥammād al-Barbarī was governor of Mecca and the Yemen;[632] Dāwūd b. Yazīd b. Ḥātim al-Muhallabī was governor over Sind; Yaḥyā (b. Saʿīd) al-Ḥarashī was 629. Dīnawarī, 390.

630. This technical term of the financial departments, "arrears of taxation from previous years," seems to have been distinguished from al-bāqī "taxation of the current year still uncollected"; see Bosworth, "Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the technical terms of the secretary's art," 135.

631. Dīnawarī, loc. cit.; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 501.

632. Ḥammād was a slave and mawlā of the Caliph whom al-Rashīd had freed at the opening of his reign (Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 498–9). See Crone, 191; Ṭabarī, III, 712 (below, 267, and n. 923).

governor over al-Jabal;[633] and Mahrūyah (or Mahrawayh) al-Rāzī was governor over Ṭabaristān. Ibrāhīm b. al-Aghlab took charge of affairs in Ifriqīyah, and then al-Rashīd (formally) appointed him governor there.[634]

In this year, the Khārijite [al-Shārī] Abū ʿAmr rebelled, so the Caliph sent against him Zuhayr al-Qaṣṣāb, and the latter killed Abū ʿAmr at Shahrazūr.[635]

In this year, Abū al-Khaṣīb sought a grant of safe-conduct, so ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā gave it to him. Abū al-Khaṣīb came to meet ʿAlī at Marw, and the latter received him honorably.[636]

[650] In this year, Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad (al-Mahdī) b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī led the Pilgrimage.[637]

---

633. Member of a family from northern Syria prominent in the early ʿAbbāsid period who, like his (?) brother Saʿīd al-Ḥarashī, filled various governorships; see Crone, 145.

634. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 494, 497–8; K. al-ʿUyūn, 302–3; Ibn Isfandiyār, tr. 140; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 166.

635. Azdī, 299; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

636. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Daniel, 171.

637. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, loc. cit.; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 731; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522; Azdī, 300; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year 185

(January 20, 801–January 5, 802)

Among the events taking place during this year was the people of Ṭabaristān's killing the governor of that province, Mahrūyah al-Rāzī. Al-Rashīd now appointed in his place ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd al-Ḥarashī.[638]

In this year, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Abnāwī[639] killed the rebel (or: the Khārijite, al-khārijī) Abān b. Qaḥṭabah at Marj al-Qalʿah.[640]

In this year, the Khārijite [al-Shārī] Ḥamzah wrought mischief in the Bādhghīs region of Khurāsān. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī b ʿĪsā[641] then swept down on ten thousand of Ḥamzah's partisans and killed them, and penetrated as far as Kābul, Zābulistān and al-Qandahār.[642] Abū al-ʿUdhāfir[643] has recited concerning these events,

---

638. Ibn Isfandiyār, tr. 140–1; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 168. ʿAbdallāh, son of the prominent commander and (?) brother of the Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd mentioned in Ṭabarī, III, 649 (above, 173–74), later fought for al-Amīn; see Crone, 144–5.

639. Following the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXI, and the Cairo text, VIII, 273, instead of the text's al-Anbārī, this last followed by Ibn al-Athīr.

640. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

641. I.e., the son of the governor of Khurāsān; see Crone, 178–9.

642. This seems to be a conflation of a complex and protracted series of events

ʿĪsā has almost become Alexander the Great;
he has reached the two Easts and the two Wests.[644]
He has not left untouched Kābul or Zābulistān,[645] and then the surrounding regions as far as the two al-Rukhkhajs.[646]

In this year, Abū al-Khaṣīb revolted at Nasāʾ a second time. He seized control of it and of Abīward,[647] Ṭūs and Naysābūr. He marched at a measured pace on Marw and surrounded it, but was repulsed, and then proceeded towards Sarakhs,[648] with his power becoming mighty.[649]

In this year, Yazīd b. Mazyad died at Bardhaʿah, and Asad b. Yazīd was appointed governor in his place.[650] which involved western Afghanistan (including Herat and Bādhghīs, where the local governor ʿAmr b. Yazīd al-Azdī was involved in fighting Ḥamzah before his death) and Sīstān but not, so far as is known, eastern Afghanistan. See Gardīzī, 131; Taʾrīkh-i Sīstān, 156–60, tr. 123–6; Bosworth, Sīstān under the Arabs, 94–5. Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 305, tr. 133, states that ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā killed Ḥamzah at Kābul; in fact, Ḥamzah continued his rebellion for a further quarter-century.

In this year, Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā died at Baghdad.[651]

---

643. Following for the name Abū al-ʿUdhāfir Addenda et emendanda, loc. cit. This poet is in fact Ward b. Saʿd al-ʿAmmī, poet of al-Baṣrah and Baghdad in al-Rashīd's time; see GAS, II, 524. Azdī, 303, makes the poet Abū al-ʿIdām al-Qummī and the occasion ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's killing of Abū al-Khaṣīb (see Ṭabarī, III, 651, below, 178).

644. Cf. Qurʾān, LV, 16–17.

645. The region of eastern Afghanistan around Ghaznah; see Ḥudūd al-ʿālam, tr. 112, comm. 346.

646. The region of eastern Afghanistan around Qandahār, classical Arachosia; see ibid., tr. 111, comm. 346. It was from this region that the mawlā Faraj al-Rukhkhajī, prominent in the service of al-Rashīd and al-Maʾmūn, was captured; see Crone, 190.

647. Town of northern Khurāsān, on the edge of the Qara Qum desert, also known as Bāward. See Ḥudūd al-ʿālam, tr. 103, comm. 326; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 86–7, 333; Le Strange, Lands, 394–5; EI[2] s.v. (Minorsky); EIr s.v. (Bosworth).

648. Town adjacent to Nasā and Abīward and also on the northern edge of Khurāsān. See Ḥudūd al-ʿālam, tr. 104, comm. 327; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 208–9; Le Strange, Lands, 395–6; EI[1] s.v. (J. Ruska).

649. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 733 (placing this under the year 186); Daniel, 171.

650. Azdī, 300–1; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 169–71; Ibn Khallikān, VI, 338, tr. IV, quoting a lengthy elegy on Yazīd by Abū Muḥammad ʿAbdallāh b. Ayyūb al-Taymī (correct Ibn al-Athīr's "al-Tamīmī" thus). Ibn Khallikān cites also a further elegy on him by Muslim b. al-Walīd (cf. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVIII, 237–8 = ed. Cairo, XIX, 42–3).

651. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 169.

In this year, in Jumādā II, ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī died at Baghdad, never having lost his front milk teeth; he was placed in his grave with the teeth of a child, not lacking a single one of them.[652]

In this year, al-Rashīd set out for al-Raqqah via the al-Mawṣil [651] road.[653]

In this year, Yaḥyā b. Khālid sought al-Rashīd's permission to perform the ʿUmrah and to spend some time in the Holy City, and the Caliph gave him his consent. So Yaḥyā went forth in Shaʿbān and performed the ʿUmrah in the month of Ramaḍān. Then he passed his time in pious exercises [rābaṭa] at Juddah till it was time for the Pilgrimage, and then he performed that.[654] A thunderbolt struck the Sacred Mosque and killed two men.

In this year, Manṣūr b. Muḥammad (al-Mahdī) b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī led the Pilgrimage.[655]

---

652. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 732; Azdī, 300; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., stigmatizing ʿAbd al-Ṣamad as "the base one [quʿdud] of the Banū ʿAbd Manāf" and approximating him to the hated Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah in this.

653. Dīnawarī, 390; Azdī, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., but making al-Rashīd set out from al-Raqqah for Baghdad.

654. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 168.

655. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 169. Khalīfah records that there was no summer raid against the Byzantines this year.

The Events of the Year

186

(January 6, 802–December 29, 802)

Among the events taking place during this year was ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān's setting out from Marw for Nasā' in order to combat Abū al-Khaṣīb. He killed the latter there, and captured and took over his wives and progeny, and Khurāsān became peaceful once more.[656]

In this year, al-Rashīd imprisoned Thumāmah b. Ashras because of his coming to know about al-Rashīd's lying in the matter of Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. Zayd.[657]

---

656. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 733; Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 305, tr. 133; Azdī, 303; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 174; Daniel, 171.

657. Abū Maʿn Thumāmah b. Ashras al-Numayrī, who died ca. 213 (828), was a Muʿtazilī of al-Baṣrah and a leading participant in the theological and intellectual symposia of the Barmakīs, al-Rashīd and al-Maʾmūn; see Watt, The formative period of Islamic thought, 178, 197, 222. Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā, great-grandson of the Fourth Imām ʿAlī Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn and member of the Zaydī branch of the Ḥusaynid Shīʿah (see Öhrnberg, Table 91), was subsequently, in 188 (804), arrested by al-Rashīd and imprisoned at al-Rāfiqah but succeeded in escaping and then disappeared underground at al-Baṣrah, according to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 512, see Van Arendonck, 62 n. 1, and Marquet, 110 (this episode not however mentioned by Ṭabarī or Masʿūdī). Given Thumāmah's close connections with the Barmakīs, and the accusations later brought against Yaḥyā b. Khālid and Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā of tenderness towards and clandestine support for the ʿAlids (see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 158, 168–9), the Caliph's animus against him is not surprising.

In this year, Ja'far b. Abī Ja'far al-Manṣūr died whilst with Harthamah, and al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad died at Baghdad.[658]

Al-Rashīd's Succession Arrangements for His Three Sons

In this year, Hārūn al-Rashīd led the Pilgrimage. He set out from al-Raqqah on the Pilgrimage in Ramaḍān of this year (September, 802). He passed through (or: by, bi-) al-Anbār and did not enter the City of Peace, but encamped at a halting-place on the banks of the Euphrates called al-Dārāt,[659] seven farsakhs from the City of Peace. He left behind Ibrāhīm b. 'Uthmān b. Nahīk (al-'Akkī)[660] in charge of al-Raqqah, and took with him his two sons Muḥammad al-Amīn and 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn, his two designated heirs. He began at Medina, and its people were given three sums of money as gifts. They would come forward to him, and he would give them a gift of money. Then they would come forward to Muḥammad, and he would give them a second gift of money. Then they would come to al-Ma'mūn, and he would give them a third gift of money. [652] Then he proceeded onward to Mecca, and gave its people a gift of money. All this amounted to one million and fifty thousand dīnārs.[661]

According to what Muḥammad b. Yazīd (al-Tamīmī) has mentioned from Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad al-Ḥajabī,[662] al-Rashīd had conferred the succession on his son Muḥammad on a Thursday in 658. See for these two 'Abbāsid princes, above, p. 167, n. 609, and p. 7, n. 19. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., has for the second deceased prince his son 'Alī b. 'Abbās b. Muḥammad, apparently incorrectly.

---

659. Literally, "the encampments, settlements," not mentioned, it seems, by the geographers, but clearly lying to the south of the capital.

660. 'Uthmān b. Nahīk had been a deputy naqīb at the time of the 'Abbāsid Revolution. Ibrāhīm acted as al-Rashīd's commander of police (shurṭah) (Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 375), but because of his closeness to the Barmakīs was executed by the Caliph in 187 (803). See Ṭabarī, III, 699–701 (below, 245–47); Crone, 189; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 151 n. 3.

661. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 733; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 501; Dīnawarī, 390; Azdī, 302; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 326 = ed. Pellat, § 2527; Ḳ. al-'Uyūn, 303; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 173; Azraqī, in Die Chroniken der Stadt Mekka, I, 159–60; Abbott, 189.

662. Sam'ānī, IV, 70, refers this nisbah to the right of ḥijābat al-bayt al-mu'aẓẓam, which was traditionally held by the clan of 'Abd al-Dār of Quraysh, a right confirmed by Muḥammad at the conquest of Mecca. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 69; EI[1] s.v. Shayba, Banū (Gaudefroy-Demombynes).

Sha'bān 173 (December 789–January, 790) and had given him the honorific title of al-Amīn,[663] and he had made over to him the governorships of Syria and Iraq in 175 (791–2). Then he designated 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn as his (second) heir at al-Raqqah in 183 (799–800) and appointed him governor of the regions from the limits of Hamadhān to the farthest ends of the East.[664] Salm b. 'Amr al-Khāsir recited concerning this,

Hārūn, the Imam of guidance, has had allegiance done to the sagacious one, the one with an excellent moral character,
(To) the one who replaces his wealth and expends it prodigally, and the one who assumes responsibility for the heavy burdens of the person bearing a load,
(To) the one who is learned and penetrating[665] in his knowledge, and the one who is the excellent and equitable dispenser of justice,
(To) the one with supreme power to bring together and to disjoin the bond of guidance, and the one who speaks the word of truth and acts efficaciously,
To the best (of the sons) of 'Abbās, when they are enumerated in the registers (or: when they are gathered together, ḥuṣṣilū), and the one who bestows favors and brings sufficiency for the person burdened with a family,
(To) the most assiduous of them in piety and the speediest of them in conferring beneficence when calamities befall,
To the one who resembles al-Manṣūr in his kingly power, when the darkness of falsehood spreads its covering.
The light of divine guidance has become complete through al-Ma'mūn, and ignorance has been dispelled from the ignorant one.[666]

---

663. This is actually recorded by Ṭabarī, III, 610 (above, 111–12), under the events of 175 (791–2), which must be correct; cf. Gabrieli, "Successione," 344.

664. Actually recorded by Ṭabarī, III, 647 (above, 167), under the events of 182 (798–9), cf. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 461; but Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 550–1, confirms the date of 183. Cf. Gabrieli, loc. cit.

665. Following the reading al-nāfidh of Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXI.

666. Von Grunebaum, "Three Arabic poets of the early Abbasid age. V. Salm al-Ḥāsir," 73, no. XLI = Shu'arā' 'Abbāsiyyūn, 110–11, no. 41.

Al-Ḥasan b. Quraysh has mentioned that al-Qāsim b. al-Rashīd[667] was under the tutelage of ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ. When al-Rashīd had allegiance done to Muḥammad and al-Maʾmūn as heirs to the succession, ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ wrote to him (as follows),

O monarch, who,
if he were a star would be an auspicious one,
Have an oath of allegiance sworn to Qāsim, and strike sparks with a fire-stick for him in the kingdom!
God is a Unique, Sole One,
so make the heirs to the succession a unique group!

These verses were the factor which first impelled al-Rashīd to [653] proclaim allegiance to al-Qāsim. He then had allegiance done to his son al-Qāsim, gave him the honorific of al-Muʾtaman and conferred on him the governorship of al-Jazīrah and the frontier regions and defensive fortresses [al-thughūr wa-al-ʿawāṣim].[668] He (i.e., ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ) recited in this connection,

Love for the Caliph is a love which the person who has rebelled against God, causing dissension and strife, does not hold as an act of faith.
God invested Hārūn with the direction of our affairs when He chose him (as ruler) and thereby gave fresh life to the faith and the Sunnah.
Hārūn has, out of his compassion for us, invested a trusted one [amīn], a trustworthy one [maʾmūn] and a trusty one [muʾtaman] with the whole earth.[669]

He related: When he divided the earth between his three sons, some of the masses of the common people said, "He has made the fabric of the state firm," but others said, "On the contrary, he has given full rein to their propensities for clashing among themselves, and the result of his arrangements concerning that will be a source of trepidation for the subjects."[670] The poets composed verses on this topic, and one of them recited,

667. Al-Rashīd's son by a slave concubine Qaṣīf; see Abbott, 141.

668. Dīnawarī, 391; Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr., loc. cit.; Azdī, 302–3; K. al-ʿUyūn, 303–4; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Abbott, 188. Gabrieli, "Successione," 346 n. 2, points out that Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 328 = ed. Pellat, § 2530, places al-Qāsim's nomination as third heir in the next year, 187 (803), suggesting that this was an afterthought; certainly, Yaʿqūbī does not mention it in his account of the events leading up to and surrounding the Meccan Agreements. Cf. also Kennedy, 125.

669. Azdī, 303.

I say to the feeling of grief within my spirit, at a time when the tears in my eyes are flowing freely, Take suitable provision against the forthcoming dread, with resoluteness;
you will encounter that which will keep you from all sleep!
For if you are spared alive, you will see a momentous affair which will cause you prolonged distress and sleeplessness.
A really skillful and experienced monarch would have seen the ill judgment in his action of dividing up the caliphate and the land.
He would have discerned a course of action which, if he were to examine critically its consequences, would turn snow-white the black hair on the partings of his hair.
He intended, by doing this, that he might remove from among his sons the causes of dissension, and that they might give free rein to amicableness.
But he has implanted unremitting enmity and has bequeathed a legacy of divisiveness and separation to the unity of their family solidarity, And he has sown among them recurring warfare, and has made easy the way for their avoidance of each other (i.e., their separation).
So woe to the subjects, in the near future!
He has presented them with a fatal gift of violent distress,
And he has clothed them with a garment of permanent affliction, and has made inevitable for them humiliation (or destruction, taḍa'ḍu') and corruption!
[654] Swollen seas of their blood will flow, for which they will see no end.

670. K. al-'Uyūn, 304; Abbott, 189.

And as a result, the burden of their sufferings will be for ever upon him;
was that (decision) the result of error or right guidance [rashād]?[671]

The Taking of the Solemn Oaths in the Ka'bah by the Two Princes

He related: Hārūn made the Pilgrimage, accompanied by Muḥammad and 'Abdallāh and by his military commanders, ministers and judges, in the year 186 (802). He left behind at al-Raqqah Ibrāhīm b. 'Uthmān b. Nahīk al-'Akkī in charge of his womenfolk, the treasuries and material wealth, and the army, and he despatched his son al-Qāsim to Manbij[672] and then installed him there with the military commanders and soldiers whom he had attached to al-Qāsim's side.

When he had accomplished the rites of the Pilgrimage, he composed for his son 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn two letters, over the composition of which the religious lawyers and judges had expended intensively their intellectual efforts. One of them comprised stipulations laid upon Muḥammad setting forth the conditions which Hārūn had imposed on him regarding Muḥammad's faithful adherence to the arrangements in the document concerning the handing over of the administrative regions for which 'Abdallāh was to assume responsibility, and he conveyed to him estates, sources of revenue, jewels, and wealth. The other was the documentary text of the oath of allegiance which the Caliph had extracted from the nobles and commoners alike, and that of the obligations due to 'Abdallāh and incumbent upon both Muḥammad himself and those nobles and commoners.

He placed the two documents in the Holy House after he had

671. The latter nine verses are translated by Gabrieli, op. cit., 349. The last hemistich clearly contains a play on words with the Caliph's name al-Rashīd "the Rightly Guided One." A verse similarly prophesying dissension and bloodshed as a result of the Caliph's measures, uttered by a Bedouin of Hudhayl, is given in Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 326–7 = ed. Pellat, § 2528.

672. A town of northern Syria, classical Hierapolis, and facing the Byzantine marches. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 205–7; Le Strange, Palestine, 500–2; idem, Lands, 107–8; Canard, H'amdânides, 87, 233–4; *EI*² s.v. (N. Elisséeff).

extracted the oath of allegiance to Muḥammad and after he had called to witness in his favor regarding the terms of the oath, God, His angels and all those who were with him in the Ka'bah, comprising the rest of his children, his family, his mawlās, his military commanders, his ministers, his secretaries, and so forth. The act of witness to the succession oath and the (other) document took place in the Holy House, and he ordered the doorkeepers to guard the two documents and to prevent anyone from taking them away and making off with them. 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad, Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Tamīmī, and Ibn al-Ḥajabī have mentioned that al-Rashīd was present and that he summoned the leading members of the Hāshimite family, the military commanders and the religious lawyers. They were taken into the Holy House, and he ordered the document to be read out to 'Abdallāh and Muḥammad, and made the whole of those present bear witness to the attestation of the two of them to the document. Then he thought it fitting to hang up the document in the Ka'bah, but when it was lifted up in order to attach it for suspension, it fell down, and people commented that this arrangement would speedily be dissolved before it could be carried through completely.[673]

The text of the document was as follows:[674]

673. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Jahshiyārī, 175; Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 733; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 501–10; Azdī, 302; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 326–8 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2527–2530; idem, Tanbīh, 345, tr. 444; K. al-'Uyūn, 304–5; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 173; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 193, tr. 211; Azraqī, in Die Chroniken der Stadt Mekka, I, 160–1 = ed. Milḥas, I, 231–4; Palmer, 114–16; Abbott, 189–91; Gabrieli, op. cit., 346–7; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 151–2; Shaban, 39–40; Kennedy, 123–7. Azdī adds the detail that the documents were placed in silver tubes and then hung up. On the placing or hanging of solemn undertakings and covenants, as here in the Ka'bah, see Pedersen, 144.

674. The texts of the documents attested by the two brothers, the first of which, written out by Muḥammad al-Amīn, now follows, exist in two forms, one somewhat shorter, in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 502–9 (also given in Azraqī, in Die Chroniken der Stadt Mekka, I, 161–8 = ed. Milḥas, I, 235–41), and the slightly fuller one given here by Ṭabarī. As Gabrieli states in his discussion about the authenticity of these and other documents pertaining to the struggle between al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn ("Documenti relativi al califfato di al-Amīn in aṭ-Ṭabarī," RCAL, Classe di Scienze Morali, Storiche e Filologiche, Serie sesta, Vol. III [1927], 192–3), there seems no reason to doubt their essential authenticity, even if this cannot be irrefutably demonstrated.

A new attempt at analyzing the significance of the documents, concentrating on Ṭabarī's production of a version of these differing from that given by Ya'qūbī and Azraqī, has recently been made by R. A. Kimber in his "Hārūn al-Rashīd's Meccan

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate One. This [655]
is a document composed by the servant of God Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful, which Muḥammad son of Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful has written out in a state of soundness of mind and full exercise of his powers, willingly and unconstrainedly. The Commander of the Faithful has appointed me as his successor after him and has imposed acknowledgement of allegiance to me on the whole of the Muslims. He has appointed ʿAbdallāh the son of Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful as his successor and as caliph and as the one responsible for all the affairs of the Muslims after myself, with my full agreement and freely conceded by me, willingly and unconstrainedly. He has given responsibility for Khurāsān, its frontier regions and its districts, for the conduct of warfare there and its army, its land tax, its official textile workshops [ṭuruz],[675] its postal relay system, its public treasuries, its poor-tax, its religious tithe, the sums collected as tribute,[676] and all its administrative divisions, both during his own (i.e., Hārūn's) lifetime and afterwards.[677] I have accepted the settlement of AH 186/AD 802," in University of St. Andrews, School of Abbasid Studies, Occasional Papers 1, 55–79. His article has the merit of distinguishing clearly between the first stage of the Meccan settlement, based on mutuality of obligations between the two princes al-Amīn and al-Maʾmūn and dating from 186 (802), and the subsequent modifications of three years later, when al-Rashīd travelled eastwards to Khurāsān with his forces to investigate the unrest caused by ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān's exactions (the new Qarmāsīn and Baghdad settlement of 189 [205]; see Ṭabarī, III, 666–7 [below, 200]). Kimber is right to emphasize the clear worsening by then of al-Amīn's legal position as successor to his father, with the introduction of provision for the third brother al-Qāsim as al-Maʾmūn's successor should the latter favor this, effectively excluding the possibility of al-Amīn's progeny ever controlling the caliphate. His final conclusion, pace most modern historians who have seen in al-Rashīd's policy one of a deliberate division of the overextended empire into a western and an eastern wing, is that the Caliph gradually moved in the last years of his life toward a policy of making al-Maʾmūn in effect his sole heir. See also below, n. 677.

675. See on these, EI[1] s.v. Ṭirāz (A. Grohmann).

676. ʿUshrahā wa-ʿushūrahā, the latter possibly, in de Goeje's conjecture, the tribute collected from the Dhimmīs, see Glossarium, p. CCCLXIII.

677. As Gabrieli points out, "Successione," 347–8, that al-Maʾmūn, as governor of the East, should have total control of all military, administrative and financial affairs there, with complete freedom to nominate his own officials and district governors (as set forth below, 187) and to have total control over the judicial system (below, 188), was unprecedented in the grants to members of the ruling family by either the Umayyads or the early ʿAbbāsids, and must reflect al-Rashīd's doubts and fears about the future and his resolve to secure an unshakable position for his obligation laid on me by the servant of God Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful with my full agreement and a contented mind, that I will faithfully fulfill and hand over to my brother ʿAbdallāh b. Hārūn the right of succession, the executive power, the caliphate and the affairs of the whole of the Muslims, which Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful has granted to him after me. (I further undertake to hand over to him) the governorship of Khurāsān and the whole of its administrative divisions which the Caliph has made over to him, together with the grants of land [qaṭīʿah] which the Commander of the Faithful has assigned to him, or any revenue-yielding property or estate of his which he may have given to him or which he may have purchased, and together with whatever the Caliph has given him during his own lifetime and in his state of sound health, comprising money, ornaments of precious metal, jewels, possessions, clothing, residences, and riding-beasts, whether it be small or large: all this shall be handed over in its entirety to ʿAbdallāh the son of Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful. I have duly acknowledged this, item by item.

[656] If the accident of death should befall the Commander of the Faithful and the caliphate should pass (subsequently) to Muḥammad the son of the Commander of the Faithful, then it will be incumbent upon Muḥammad to give effect to what Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful has commanded him regarding the investiture of ʿAbdallāh son of Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful as governor of Khurāsān and its frontier regions and the appointment of those members of the Commander of the Faithful's family whom he (i.e., Hārūn) attached to his (i.e., ʿAbdallāh's) entourage at Qarmāsīn.[678] And if ʿAbdallāh son of the Commander of first-born son. Al-Ma'mūn's position was to be virtually that of an independent sovereign, only limited by a vague formula of obedience to al-Amīn (in Azraqī's version of al-Ma'mūn's document, Die Chroniken der Stadt Mekka, I, 166–7 = ed. Milḥas, I, 240) and by a more specific promise to furnish troops when required by al-Amīn to fend off enemy attacks (Ṭabarī, III, 661, below, 193). Such an attenuation of caliphal control was to facilitate the status of virtual autonomy soon to be achieved by the Aghlabids in Ifrīqiyah and then the Ṭāhirids in Khurāsān.

---

678. Gabrieli, op. cit., 349 n. 3, suggests that the mention of the members of the ʿAbbāsid family and the mention in Ṭabarī, III, 657 (below, 189), of the commanders sent to join al-Ma'mūn at Qarmāsīn or Kirmānshāh (on which town of western Persia see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 330–1; Le Strange, Lands, 186–8; Schwarz, 480–2;

the Faithful should proceed to Khurāsān and al-Rayy and the districts which the Commander of the Faithful enumerated, in whatever part of the Commander of the Faithful's military encampment 'Abdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful himself may be, or any others of those dependent on the Commander of the Faithful's authority or all those whom the Commander of the Faithful has attached to 'Abdallāh's side, [proceeding] wherever he wishes, from al-Rayy to the farthest administrative division of Khurāsān, then Muḥammad the son of the Commander of the Faithful must not transfer from 'Abdallāh's control any military commander or subordinate nor a single person from among those companions of his which the Commander of the Faithful attached to his side. Nor must he transfer 'Abdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful from the administrative charges which Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful has entrusted to him, namely, the frontier regions of Khurāsān and the whole of its component administrative divisions, from the region of al-Rayy bordering on Hamadhān to the farthest fringes of Khurāsān, its frontier regions, its districts and its dependencies. Nor must Muḥammad compel 'Abdallāh to come to him[679] [i.e., by forcible means, thus controlling and interfering with him], nor remove any single member of his entourage and military commanders from him, nor appoint anyone over him, nor despatch over his head, or over the heads of any of his own financial officials and executives, any agent purchasing taxes collected in kind [bundār],[680] accounting officer or financial official. Nor must he introduce any damaging element into any of 'Abdallāh's affairs, whether small or great. Nor must he interfere, with his own views

---

Barthold, An historical geography of Iran, 195–8; *EI*² s.v. Kirmānshāh [A. K. S. Lambton]] are two interpolations in the text referring to the events of 189 (805) at Qarmāsīn, in which al-Rashīd renewed the succession pledge to al-Ma'mūn and arranged that the whole of his weapons, war matériel, and wealth was to go to al-Ma'mūn on his own death (thus according to Ṭabarī, III, 666–7; in III, 765, cf. 772, the army commanders and troops were obviously included in the adjuration to travel from Iraq and join al-Ma'mūn in Khurāsān).

679. Reading instead of the text's wa-lā-shakhṣuhu ilayhi either the Cairo text's (VIII, 278) wa-lā yushkhiṣ-hu ilayhi or Gabrieli's ("Documenti relativi al califfato di al-Amīn in aṭ-Ṭabarī," 195 n. 1) wa-lā ishkhāṣuhu ilayhi.

680. For this (originally) Persian term, see Glossarium, pp. CXLI–CXLII, and Lokkegaard, 124, 244 n. 110.

and his own ways of proceeding, in any aspect of ʿAbdallāh's affairs here. Nor must Muḥammad molest or impede any person of those whom the Commander of the Faithful has attached to ʿAbdallāh's side, including his family, his companions, his judges, his financial [657] officials, his secretaries, his military commanders, his slaves, his mawlās, and his troops, by means of anything which aims at introducing an element of violence or unpleasantness for them, whether for themselves or for their kinsfolk, mawlās or progeny, which touches any part of their physical safety, sources of wealth, estates, houses, abodes, possessions, slaves, and mounts, whether it be a small or a grave matter; nor must any (other) person act thus on his (i.e., Muḥammad's) orders, or according to his judgment or arbitrary act of will, or according to any permission granted by him regarding that or any stratagem on his part in the affair, with any human being whatsoever. Neither Muḥammad nor any of his judges, financial officials or anyone connected with him, is to exercise any legal jurisdiction in any of their affairs (i.e., those of ʿAbdallāh's dependents) without the express authority and judgment of ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful or the judgment of his own judges.

Moreover, if any person out of those whom the Commander of the Faithful attached to ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful's side, from among the Commander of the Faithful's family, his companions, his military commanders, his financial officials, his secretaries, his slaves, his mawlās, and his troops, goes over to his (i.e., Muḥammad's) side and repudiates his due dependent status (literally, "his name"), his military obligations[681] and his position with ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful, displaying rebelliousness towards him or acting against his interests, then Muḥammad the son of the Commander of the Faithful must send him back to ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful in humiliation and ignominy, so that ʿAbdallāh may put into execution his decision and decree concerning him.

If Muḥammad the son of the Commander of the Faithful should attempt to remove ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the 681. maktabahu, cf. Glossarium, p. CDXVI "military status," apparently to be connected with the command of, or the place where is stationed, a katībah or military unit.

Faithful from his right of succession after himself (i.e., after Muḥammad), or if he should attempt to remove ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful from the governorship of Khurāsān, its frontier regions, its administrative divisions, its province which runs up to the boundaries adjacent to Hamadhān and the districts specifically named by the Commander of the Faithful in this document of his, or if he should attempt to dismiss any of his military commanders who came to Qarmāsīn and whom the Commander of the Faithful attached to ʿAbdallāh's side, or if he should attempt to deprive him of either a small or a great part of what the Commander of the Faithful has granted to him, in any [658] manner whatsoever or by any stratagem whatsoever, be it insignificant or momentous, then the caliphate after the Commander of the Faithful shall pass (directly) to ʿAbdallāh the son of Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful, and he shall come before Muḥammad the son of the Commander of the Faithful and be the one invested with power (immediately) after the Commander of the Faithful.

(In this case,) all the military commanders of the Commander of the Faithful Hārūn, comprising the men of Khurāsān and those in receipt of official stipends [ahl al-ʿaṭā'], and all the Muslims in all the army units and garrison cities, are to give their obedience to ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful. They are to stand by his side, combat those in rebellion against him, give aid to him and defend him whilst ever they have life. None of them, whoever he may be or wherever he may find himself, is to rebel against him, defy him or throw off obedience to him, nor is he to give any obedience to Muḥammad the son of the Commander of the Faithful in removing ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful (from the succession) and in diverting the succession after himself from ʿAbdallāh to anyone else, nor is he to deprive ʿAbdallāh of any single part of what the Commander of the Faithful Hārūn has granted to him during his lifetime and in full possession of his bodily health and has stipulated in the document written in his own hand which he required him to draw up in the Holy House[682] and in this present document; and ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful is the one whose word is accounted veracious.

682. I.e., the document written out by al-Ma'mūn, whose text now follows this present one written out by al-Amīn; cf. Gabrieli, op. cit., 196 n. 1.

You (i.e., the Muslims in general) are to be released from the oath of allegiance to Muḥammad the son of Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful which is at present incumbent on you if the latter diminishes any part of what the Commander of the Faithful Hārūn has made over to ʿAbdallāh; Muḥammad the son of Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful is to show himself submissive to ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful Hārūn and hand over to him the caliphate.

Muḥammad and ʿAbdallāh, the sons of the Commander of the Faithful Hārūn, are not to deprive al-Qāsim son of the Commander of the Faithful Hārūn of his rights (as third heir to the throne), nor are they to usurp his precedence in favor of anyone of their own children, kindred or indeed any member of the human race at all. However, when the caliphate passes to ʿAbdallāh the son of the
[659] Commander of the Faithful, then the choice will be open to him of putting into execution the succession arrangements which the Commander of the Faithful established in al-Qāsim's favor, or else of deflecting these from him in favor of one of his own (i.e., ʿAbdallāh's) children or brothers, as he may deem fit.[683] He may give preference over al-Qāsim to whomever he desires, and place al-Qāsim the son of the Commander of the Faithful after any other person to whom he has given preference over al-Qāsim; he may come to a decision regarding this according to his own preference and judgment.

O Muslims, you are to put into execution that which the Commander of the Faithful has laid down in this document of his, has stipulated for them (i.e., his three sons) and has commanded to be done. You are to give hearing and obedience to the Commander of the Faithful in the duties which he has prescribed and made incumbent upon you in regard to ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful, and upon you is laid the covenant of God and His agreement of protection, His messenger's agreement of protection and the agreements of protection of the Muslims, and 683. This possibility of choice for al-Ma'mūn regarding al-Qāsim's succession is confirmed in Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 328 = ed. Pellat, § 2530, and idem, Tanbīh, 345, tr. 444.

the covenants and solemn undertakings which God has made with the angels of His brought near to the throne [al-malā'ikah al-muqarrabīn],[684] the prophets and those sent with a message, and which He has imposed upon the believers and the Muslims. You are to fulfill faithfully towards the servant of God the Commander of the Faithful what he has laid down specifically, and towards Muḥammad, ʿAbdallāh and al-Qāsim the sons of the Commander of the Faithful what he has laid down specifically and prescribed in this document of his and made incumbent upon you, and which you have for your part agreed personally to accept. If you alter or change any part of it, or if you fail to fulfill your undertaking or go against what the Commander of the Faithful has commanded you and made incumbent upon you in this present document of his, then God's agreement of protection, the agreement of protection of His messenger Muḥammad and the agreements of protection of the believers and the Muslims, shall be null and void in respect of you. Moreover, all the wealth which each one of you possesses at this present moment, or will acquire up to a period of fifty years from now, shall be given in alms to the poor. Each one of you shall make the Pilgrimage on foot to God's Holy House at Mecca fifty times as a compulsory vow of expiation, whose fulfillment God will require absolutely from such a person. Every slave which each of you possesses, or will possess over the next fifty years, shall be set free. Every wife whom such a person has, shall be divorced with the threefold repudiation, definitively, the divorce of sinfulness [660] [ṭalāq al-ḥaraj][685] and the one which admits of no possibility of exception. God is the guarantor over you and curator regarding that, and He is sufficient as a reckoner (of men's virtues and sins)![686]

684. I.e., the cherubim; see *EI*² s.v. Malā'ika. 1. In the Ḳur'ān and Sunnī Islam (D. B. Macdonald).

685. Literally, "a divorce implying a sinful act, ḥaraj," in which the woman may resume the liaison; Gabrieli, op. cit., 197, translates con divorzio implicante peccato [ove la donna venga ripresa].

686. Tr. Gabrieli, op. cit., 193–7, who notes, however (p. 193) that the preciosity and floridity of the Arabic style of this and the following documents make absolute certainty in translation impossible. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 506–7, and Azraqī, in Die Chroniken der Stadt Mekka, I, 167–8 = ed. Milḥas, I, 238–9, add a list of those witnesses attesting the document.

Text of the Document Laying Down Conditions Which ʿAbdallāh Son of the Commander of the Faithful Wrote Out in His Own Hand in the Kaʿbah

This is a document composed by the servant of God Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful which ʿAbdallāh son of Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful has written out for him in a state of soundness of mind, full exercise of his powers, sincerity of intention in what he has set down in this document, and recognition of the excellence and soundness of its contents for himself, the members of his family and the whole community of Muslims:

The Commander of the Faithful Hārūn has designated me as successor in the caliphate and in all the affairs of the Muslims under his authority after my brother Muḥammad son of Hārūn. He has during his own lifetime appointed me governor of the frontier regions of Khurāsān, its districts and all its administrative and financial divisions, and he has stipulated to Muḥammad son of Hārūn that he should faithfully observe what he (i.e., Hārūn) has made over to me, comprising the caliphate and direction of the affairs of the people and the lands after him (i.e., after Muḥammad), and the governorship of Khurāsān and all its administrative and financial divisions. He is not to interfere with me nor contest with me over any part of the estates, revenue-yielding properties, and dwellings which the Commander of the Faithful has assigned to me or purchased for me, or which I have purchased from him, nor in regard to any of the material wealth, jewels, clothing, possessions, riding-beasts, slaves, and so forth, which the Commander of the Faithful has given to me. Nor is he ever to interfere with or molest me or any of my financial officials and secretaries on the pretext of making an audit or accounting, nor is he ever to pursue me or any of my officials over that, nor is he to perpetrate against me, against those officials, or against any of my retainers and persons in general whom I have called upon to assist me, any [661] unpleasant act involving person, blood, hair, or flesh (i.e., act of physical violence and bloodshed inflicted on the person), or involving questions of property or indeed any matter, great or small.

He (i.e., Muḥammad) has agreed to this and has acknowledged it, and has written out for him (i.e., Hārūn) a document in which he has bound himself to observe these conditions. The Commander of the Faithful Hārūn was pleased at this, accepted it, and recognized the sincerity of his intentions in this matter.

I, for my part, have undertaken to the Commander of the Faithful and have laid upon myself the obligation that I will hear and obey Muḥammad and not act rebelliously against him; that I will give him sincere advice and not deceive him; that I will fulfill the oath of allegiance to him and acknowledge his authority, and not betray him or break my oath; and that I will put into effect his official instructions and commands, will cheerfully give him help and combat his enemies within my own territories. (All this) in such a manner as will fulfill towards me the obligations which he undertook to the Commander of the Faithful to observe regarding me and which he listed specifically in the document which he wrote out (personally) for the Commander of the Faithful and with which the Commander of the Faithful was satisfied; and (in such a manner as) will not hound and discommode me in any of those matters and will not break any of the undertakings to which the Commander of the Faithful made him agree regarding me.

If ever Muḥammad the son of the Commander of the Faithful requires a military force and writes to me, ordering me to despatch it to him or to any region or against any of his enemies who may have rebelled against him or sought to impair any part of his authority or part of my own authority which the Commander of the Faithful has assigned to us and has given us official responsibility for it, then I undertake to carry out his commands and not oppose him or fall short in the performance of any matter about which he has written to me. If Muḥammad wishes to appoint as successor to the caliphate after me one of his own children, then he has the right to do so, provided that he has at the same time fulfilled to me the obligations towards me which the Commander of the Faithful laid upon him and stipulated as due to me from him and which he himself undertook to fulfill regarding me. I undertake to carry out all that and to fulfill that faithfully to him; I will not diminish or change or alter any part of it, and I will not give premier place over him to any of my own children nor to any close or distant person whatsoever, unless the Commander of the Faithful Hārūn should appoint any (other) one of his children as successor to the caliphate after me and then compel me and Muḥammad to give fidelity to him. [662]

I have taken upon myself the obligation of fidelity to the Commander of the Faithful and to Muḥammad according to what I have contracted to perform and have listed specifically in this document written out by me, as long as Muḥammad fulfills all the obligations towards me which the Commander of the Faithful has stipulated to me as incumbent upon him in my regard and all the items which the Commander of the Faithful has granted to me and which are specifically listed in this document which he wrote down for me.

I take upon myself (observance of) God's charge and covenant, together with the contractual agreements of my forefathers and those of all the believers, the most binding of the solemnly pledged charges and covenants which God has laid upon the prophets and messengers from all his creatures, and with the solemn oaths concerning which God has commanded fidelity and has forbidden their being broken or altered.

If I break a single item of what I have undertaken to observe and have specifically listed in this document of mine, or if I alter or change or fail to observe or act deceitfully (regarding it), then may I be cut off from God, He is exalted and magnified, from His protection and religion and from Muḥammad the Messenger of God, and may I meet God face-to-face on the Day of Resurrection as an unbeliever and polytheist. Every wife whom I have at this moment or may marry within the next thirty years, shall be divorced with the threefold repudiation, definitively, the divorce of sinfulness.[687] Every slave which I possess at this moment or may possess within the next thirty years shall be set free out of the love of God. I promise to make the Pilgrimage on foot to God's Holy House at Mecca thirty times, as a compulsory vow of expiation laid upon me, barefoot and walking, whose fulfillment God will require from me absolutely. All the wealth which I possess at this moment or may possess within the next thirty years shall be pledged as a gift intended for the Ka'bah. Everything which I have undertaken towards the Commander of the Faithful and have obligated myself in this document of mine to fulfill, is binding upon me, and I will not conceive in my mind or determine upon anything else. Sulaymān the son of the Commander of the Faithful, so-and-so and so-687. Gabrieli, op. cit., 199: col ripudio del peccato.

and-so have borne witness to this, and it has been written out in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 186 (December, 802).[688]

The Text of the Letter of Hārūn b. Muḥammad, al-Rashīd, to the Provincial Governors[689] [663]

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. As follows: God is the patron [walī] of the Commander of the Faithful, the patron of what he has endowed him with as ruler, the guardian of the caliphate and the authority which He has entrusted to his care and has honored him with, and the One who favors him in all the affairs of his which he initiates or relinquishes. He is the One who bestows upon him aid and succor in both the eastern and the western parts of the earth, the One who guards and protects and the One who is sufficient against the whole of His creation. He is the One who is to be praised for all His favors, the One responsible for the bringing to completion of the good things of His decrees which He has put into execution for the Commander of the Faithful and of His laudable customary actions for him; (He is likewise responsible for) the inspiring of what is agreeable to Him; and He makes incumbent upon him for the achievement of this the finest augmentation of His grace.

Among the favors of God, He is exalted and magnified, which He has vouchsafed to the Commander of the Faithful, to you and to the generality of Muslims, is what God has arranged with regard to Muḥammad and ʿAbdallāh the two sons of the Commander of the Faithful by His conveying to them the best of what the Muslim community has hoped for and has hastened eagerly towards. God has cast into the hearts of the mass of the populace love and affection for these two princes, peace of mind stemming from confidence in them and reliance upon them because of the firmness of their faith, the uprightness of their affairs, their mutual harmony and the rectitude of their mien. God has kept away from them fearful and unpleasant things making for disunity and di-688. Tr. Gabrieli, op. cit., 197–200. Again, Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 509, and Azraqī, in Die Chroniken der Stadt Mekka, I, 168 = ed. Milḥas, I, 241, note that the same witnesses who attested al-Amīn's document attested this one also.

689. Cf. Gabrieli, "Successione," 346–7; the text of this letter is not given in any other early source, i.e., one not repeating Ṭabarī's text.

visiveness, to the point that people have entrusted to the two of them the reins of power over themselves and have given to them their pledges of allegiance and solemnly sworn oaths by means of covenants, contractual agreements, and firm oaths strenuously impressed on them. God has expressed His will thus, and there is no one who can gainsay Him; he has put it into effect, and none of His creatures can controvert it or render it invalid, or can deflect Him from what He desires and wills or from what He has previously formed the intention in His mind of doing.

The Commander of the Faithful hopes for the completion of [664] beneficence upon himself and his two sons regarding that and upon the whole Muslim community; there is no one who can put back God's command, no one who can reverse His decree and no one who can set up a substitute for His ordinance.

Since the Muslim community agreed with one mind upon settling the succession on Muḥammad the son of the Commander of the Faithful after the Commander of the Faithful himself and then on ʿAbdallāh the son of the Commander of the Faithful after Muḥammad the son of the Commander of the Faithful, the Commander of the Faithful has continuously exercised his thought, judgment, mind, and powers of reflection[690] on what will give benefit to them both and to the whole of the subjects; will bring harmony to their discussions; will repair the disorder of affairs; will dispel those things making for disunity and divisiveness; will cut off short the wiles of the enemies of divine favor, comprising the infidels, the hypocrites, those harboring rancor and those sowing dissension; and will cut short the hopes of these last on every occasion when they hope to achieve these aims and seize appropriate opportunities against the two princes by impairing their just rights. The Commander of the Faithful asks God's blessing for all that and begs Him to grant him resolution of purpose for following the best course for the two princes and the whole Muslim community. (He asks Him for) strength in fulfilling God's command and His due rights; in reconciling their divergent notions and working out the best course for them mutually; and in preserving them both from the wiles of the enemies of divine favor, repelling their enviousness, deceitful stratagems, injuriousness, and endeavors to sow evil between the two of them.

690. Reading with the Cairo text, VIII, 284, rawiyyatihi for the Leiden text's ruʾyatihi.

Accordingly, God implanted in the Commander of the Faithful the determination to despatch them both to God's House; to take from them the oath of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful by hearing and obeying and by putting into effect his command; and to have written down the set of obligations upon each of them towards the Commander of the Faithful and towards each other by the strongest of covenants and agreements and the firmest of oaths and undertakings. (He also determined upon) requiring an undertaking from each one of them to the other regarding what the Commander of the Faithful sought to secure in the way of their mutual harmony, their mutual affection, their mutual accord, assistance to each other and protection for each other in conformity with a favorable regard for their own mutual interests and those of the Commander of the Faithful's subjects, whom he has entrusted to their care as rulers. (The Commander of the Faithful also sought to secure) unity for the furtherance of the religion of God, He is exalted and magnified, His book and the exemplary practices [sunan] of His Prophet; (to bring about) holy warfare [jihād] against the enemies of the Muslims, whoever and wherever they may be; and (to secure) the suppression of the ambitious schemes of every enemy who openly manifests hostility or secretly harbors it, of every hypocrite and deviant from the faith, of those persons holding heretical opinions who are themselves deluded and who delude others, who stem from a group which plots to bring about an evil stratagem between them and to bring about [665] discord between them. (He has also sought to secure the suppression of) that which God's enemies, the enemies of the divine favors and the enemies of His religion, seek to bring about—violence among the Muslim community, endeavors to wreak corruption in the earth and an invitation to unlawful innovations [bida'] and error. (All these endeavors come) from a solicitude on the part of the Commander of the Faithful for God's religion, His subjects and the community of His Prophet Muḥammad, from a policy of giving good counsel for the furtherance of God's interests and for all the Muslims, and from defending God's authority which he has prepared[691] and for which he has devoted himself solely in regard to the burden with which He has charged him (i.e., the caliphate). (God has also implanted in the Caliph a determination to make) strenuous endeavors in everything which brings nearness to God and by means of which His favor is achieved and access gained to His presence.

When he arrived in Mecca, he made manifest to Muḥammad and ʿAbdallāh his intention regarding this and what he envisaged for them in it. They both assented to everything which he called upon them to undertake in firmly binding themselves to its acceptance, and they wrote out for the Commander of the Faithful, in the heart of God's Holy House, in their own handwriting and in the assembly of those members of the Commander of the Faithful's family, his military commanders, his retainers, and his judges who were present for the Pilgrimage, and the doorkeepers of the Kaʿbah, and with their attestation to the two persons swearing (these obligations), two documents, which the Commander of the Faithful entrusted to the safekeeping of the doorkeepers and commanded that they should be hung up inside the Kaʿbah.

When the Commander of the Faithful had completed all this inside God's Holy House and the interior of the Kaʿbah, he commanded his judges, who had borne witness to them both and had been present at their writing out (i.e., the documents), that they should inform all those present for the Pilgrimage season, comprising those who had come to perform the Pilgrimage and the ʿUmrah and the delegations from the great cities, about the conditions which the two princes had taken upon themselves and which they had written out, and to which they (i.e., the judges) had borne witness. (He further ordered) the reading out of that to them (i.e., to the assembled people in Mecca) in order that they might comprehend it, keep it in their minds, come to know it, learn the texts by heart, and communicate it to their comrades and the people of their lands and cities. They accordingly did that, and the two contractual agreements were read out to them in extenso in the Holy Mosque. Then they went back. The reports about all this having been already widely disseminated among them, they confirmed its attestation and they realized the Commander of the Faithful's intention and his solicitude for their welfare, the prevention of bloodshed among them, the repairing of their disorder, and the extinguishing of the blazing brand of God's enemies and the enemies of His religion, His book and the whole community of Muslims, from among them. They offered up prayers for the Commander of the Faithful and thanks for what he had arranged in [666] respect of all this.

691. Translation here conjectural; the text's reading here qaddarahu is very dubious.

The Commander of the Faithful has transcribed for you those two contractual agreements which the Commander of the Faithful's two sons Muḥammad and ʿAbdallāh wrote down for him in the interior of the Kaʿbah, at the foot of this writing of his being the words:

So praise God, He is exalted and magnified, profusely for what He has wrought for Muḥammad and ʿAbdallāh, the two designated successors to rule over the Muslims, and give copious thanks to Him for His favor in regard to the Commander of the Faithful, to the two bearers of the succession for the Muslims, to you (i.e., the governor receiving the copy of this letter) and to the whole of the community of Muḥammad. Have the Commander of the Faithful's letter read out to the Muslims under your authority, make them understand it, take responsibility for it among them, have it set down firmly in the dīwān which is under your control and that of the military commanders of the Commander of the Faithful and his subjects under your charge, and write back to the Commander of the Faithful concerning anything which may take place regarding this, if God wills. God is our sufficiency, and how good a guardian of our interests! In Him is power and strength and might!

Ismāʿīl b. Ṣubayḥ wrote this on Saturday, the twenty-third of al-Muḥarram, 187[692] (January 21, 803).

He related: Hārūn al-Rashīd ordered 100,000 dīnārs to be given to ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn, and this sum was brought for him to Baghdad from Raqqah.

692. Read thus (as Gabrieli points out in op. cit., 347 n. 1) for the text's date of 186, which does not give the correct correspondence of day and date.

Al-Rashīd's Subsequent Renewal of the Succession Pledges to al-Ma'mūn and al-Qāsim at Qarmāsīn

He related: At a period of time after the killing of Ja'far b. Yaḥyā,[693] al-Rashīd went to al-Raqqah and then came to Baghdad, complaints about 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān having reached him continuously from Khurāsān and much adverse talk about 'Alī having come to his ears. Hence, he decided upon dismissing him from Khurāsān, and preferred to have 'Alī near him.[694] So when he went to Baghdad, he set out from there after a while towards Qarmāsīn; this was in the year 189 (805). He further despatched to Qarmāsīn a number of persons, comprising judges and others, and made them bear witness that the whole of what he had with him in his army—wealth, treasuries, weapons, horses and mules, and so forth, in its entirety—was to go to 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn, and that he would retain nothing of it for himself, small or great, for any motive or pretext. He renewed the succession pledge to al-Ma'mūn from [667] those who were with him, and he sent Harthamah b. A'yan, the commander of his guard, to Baghdad. Then he once again exacted the succession pledge to 'Abdallāh and al-Qāsim from Muḥammad the son of Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful and those in his circle, according to the terms of the document to which al-Rashīd had required his assent at Mecca. He relegated the question of al-Qāsim, whether he was to be removed from his designated role as third heir or confirmed in it, to 'Abdallāh's decision when the caliphate should pass to him.[695]

Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī recited concerning Hārūn's securing adhesion to the succession of his two sons in the Ka'bah,

The best of affairs for having a good conclusion and the most likely affair to achieve completion
Is an affair whose firm constituting the Merciful One has decreed in the Holy House.[696]

---

693. Actually, some two years later, the fall of the Barmakīs being in Ṣafar, 187 (January, 803).

694. This was the occasion of al-Rashīd's journeying to al-Rayy, where 'Alī b. 'Īsā's amassment of wealth for his master sufficiently impressed the Caliph to confirm 'Alī in his governorship; see Ṭabarī, III, 702–4 (below, 250–54).

695. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 173, 191; Gabrieli, op. cit., 349.

696. K. al-'Uyūn, 305.

The Events of the Year 187

(December 30, 802–December 19, 803)

Among the events taking place during this year was al-Rashīd's killing of Ja'far b. Yaḥyā b. Khālid and his swooping down on the Barmakīs.[697]

---

697. The other main sources for this celebrated episode of mediaeval Islamic history are as follows:

Jahshiyārī, 185–211; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 510–12; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 461–9; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 386–414 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2588–2618; Azdī, 304–6; K. al-'Uyūn, 305–9; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 175–80; Ibn Khallikān, I, 328–46, tr. I, 301–19 (Ja'far b. Yaḥyā), IV, 27–36, tr. II, 459–68 (al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā), VI, 219–29, tr. IV, 103–14 (Yaḥyā b. Khālid); Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 190–2, tr. 207–10.

However, virtually every chronicler of the caliphate touched on this topic, which clearly fascinated mediaeval Muslims as an example of overweening pride and immense riches brought low at a single stroke and as an object lesson in the dangers of servants endeavoring to rise above their masters in splendor of life and munificence. Special works were even composed on the episode, especially in the Persian cultural world, which was perhaps attracted to the subject through the Barmakīs' Persian origins and which may have been tempted to view the Barmakīs (as have some modern authors) as upholders of the Persian traditions of government and culture in the caliphate. Bouvat notes, e.g., two works of the eighth (fourteenth) century, the Indo-Muslim historian Ḍiyā' al-Dīn Baranī's Akhbār-i Barmakiyān and 'Abd al-Jalīl Yazdī's Ta'rīkh-i āl-i Barmak (Bouvat, 9–10; cf. C. A. Storey, Persian literature, a bio-bibliographical survey, I, 1082–3).

Modern writers have likewise been attracted by the enigmatic aspects of the

The Reason for al-Rashīd's Killing of Ja'far al-Barmakī, the Manner of His Killing, and What al-Rashīd Did to Him and the Members of His Family

Concerning the reason for al-Rashīd's anger against him, occasioning the Caliph's killing of him, there are varying accounts.[698] One of them is what is mentioned from Bukhtīshū' b. Jibrīl,[699] who had it from his father, that the latter related: I was sitting in al-Rashīd's court circle when Yaḥyā b. Khālid appeared. It had always been the practice previously that he should enter without seeking formal permission. Now, when he entered, drew near to al-Rashīd and greeted him, the latter returned only a perfunctory salutation. Yaḥyā then realized that their relationship (or: the position of the Barmakī family, amrahum) had changed.

He related: Then al-Rashīd came up to me and said, "O Jibrīl, does anyone enter upon your presence, without your permission, when you are in your house?" I replied, "No, and no one would presume to do that." He commented, "Why, then, should we have [668] to put up with intrusions upon us without permission?" Yaḥyā rose and explained, "O Commander of the Faithful, may God bring my term of life to an end before yours! By God, I haven't inaugurated this practice at this very moment, and it is no more than an honor with which the Commander of the Faithful has favored me and has thereby increased my prestige, to the extent that I used to come into his presence when he was in his bed, at times garmentless, or at other times just dressed in one of his loincloths. I did not realize that the Commander of the Faithful (now) disliked what he

---

Barmakīs' fall and the motives impelling al-Rashīd to such savagery against the family when he burst out of their tutelage. A bibliography of earlier studies can be found in Bouvat, 127–31, Appendix II. For subsequent works, see Bouvat's own monograph, 74–101, and now the profounder analysis of motives at work in the Caliph's mind, material and psychological considerations, by Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 151–81. See also Palmer, 81–106; Shaban, 35–9; Sourdel, in Cambridge history of Islam, I, 115–16; Kennedy, 127–9; *EI*² s.v. Barāmika (Sourdel).

698. As acknowledged by most of the sources, e.g., Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 510: "Most authorities hold divergent views about the causes of his anger against them."

699. Member of a celebrated Christian family of physicians from Jundīshāpūr, several members of which personally served the 'Abbāsid Caliphs and who died in 256 (870). His father, Jibrīl b. Bukhtīshū' b. Jurjīs, died in 212 (827), was physician to Ja'far b. Yaḥyā and, in the words of Jahshiyārī, 178, their protégé, ṣanī'at al-Barāmikah. See GAS, III, 226–7; *EI*² s.v. Bukhtīshū' (Sourdel).

used to approve. But now that I have realized it, in future I will take my place in the second or third rank of those seeking permission to enter, if my master so commands." He related: Al-Rashīd was thereupon ashamed—among all the Caliphs, he related, al-Rashīd had one of the mildest countenances—and he remained with his eyes to the ground, not looking upwards at Yaḥyā. Then he said, "I didn't intend anything to discomfit you, but people are talking." He related, I had the impression that al-Rashīd had not been able to think of a satisfactory reply on the spur of the moment, and hence had answered him thus. Al-Rashīd refrained from saying any more to Yaḥyā, and Yaḥyā departed.[700]

It has been mentioned from Aḥmad b. Yūsuf that Thumāmah b. Ashras said: The first occasion when Yaḥyā b. Khālid felt uneasy about his position was when Muḥammad b. al-Layth[701] presented an epistle to al-Rashīd in which he gave the Caliph a warning and mentioned that "Yaḥyā b. Khālid will not in any way absolve you of your responsibilities towards God. You have made him preeminent in matters which are between yourself and God alone. What will be your position when you stand before God (i.e., at the Last Judgement) and He asks you about what you have achieved among His servants and His lands, and you reply, 'O Lord, I committed the responsibilities of the affairs of Your servants entirely to Yaḥyā'? Do you imagine that you will be able to adduce a plea of extenuation acceptable to God?" (He said all this) in a speech full of blame and upbraiding.[702] Al-Rashīd accordingly sent for Yaḥyā, to whom news of the epistle had already arrived, and he said, "Do you know Muḥammad b. al-Layth?" Yaḥyā replied, "Yes." Al-Rashīd said, "What sort of a man is he?" He replied, "A man whose Islamic faith is suspect." Al-Rashīd thereupon commanded that Muḥammad b.

700. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 177; Palmer, 89–90.

701. Presumably, the official whom Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 483, lists as a minister of al-Mahdī's, known for his eloquence; cf. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 111–12, 143 n. 6, 176 n. 2. In Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 463, he is given the patronymic of Abū Rabī'ah and described as a popular ascetic and religious figure of al-Raqqah, and in his denunciation of the Barmakīs to the Caliph he accuses them of infidelity and atheism.

702. This is the moment when Ṭabarī gets to the explanation favored by so many of the sources, that the Barmakīs had arrogated to themselves executive and judicial powers proper to the Caliph only. See, e.g., Jahshiyārī, 164; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 510–11; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 190, tr. 207; Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, tr. F. Rosenthal, I, 30–2; Abbott, 193–5.

al-Layth should be incarcerated in the Maṭbaq prison indefinitely.[703] But when al-Rashīd's attitude towards the Barmakīs had changed for the worse, he remembered Muḥammad. He ordered him to be brought forth, and Muḥammad was set before him. Al-Rashīd said to him after a long speech, "O Muḥammad, do you love me?" He replied, "By God, O Commander of the Faithful, no!" He said, "You really mean this?" He replied, "Yes, certainly! You [669] have put fetters on my legs, and have come between me and my family (i.e., deprived me of contact with them), when I have committed no sin or grave crime, all on the word of an envious one who is plotting against Islam and the Muslims and who loves heresy and its practitioners. How can I possibly love you?" Al-Rashīd said, "You have spoken truly," and he ordered him to be set free. Then he asked, "O Muḥammad, do you love me now?" He replied, "By God, O Commander of the Faithful, no, although the hard feelings in my breast have gone away." So al-Rashīd ordered him to be given one hundred thousand dirhams. He was brought before him again, and al-Rashīd asked, "O Muḥammad, do you love me now?" He replied, "Now, at last, yes; you have been munificent and generous towards me!" Al-Rashīd said, "May God take vengeance upon the one who has wronged you, and may He take upon Himself the fulfillment of your just rights from the one who incited me against you!" He related: People started talking at length to the discredit of the Barmakīs, and this occasion was the first manifestation of the change in their fortunes.[704]

Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl b. Sufyān, the mawlā of Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far, transmitted the information to me, saying: Yaḥyā b. Khālid went into al-Rashīd's presence after this, and the slaves [al-ghilmān] stood up when he entered. But al-Rashīd told the eunuch Masrūr, "Give the slaves the order not to stand up in Yaḥyā's presence when he enters the palace." He related: Yaḥyā came in, and no one stood up in his presence; Yaḥyā became ashen faced at this. He related: Subsequently, when the slaves and doorkeepers

703. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 463.

704. The sources retail various stories concerning the Barmakīs' premonitions of al-Rashīd's changed attitude and his intention to overthrow them. See, e.g., the verses which al-Rashīd made a Kūfan storyteller repeat continually to him one night, the news of which alarmed Ja'far b. Yaḥyā, in Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 401–2 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 80–1.

saw him, they turned away from him. He related: Yaḥyā used on occasion to ask for a drink of water or something, and they would not give it to him; or rather, if it happened that they did in the end provide him with a drink, it was only after he had called for it several times.

Ja'far's Alleged Connivance with the Release of the 'Alid Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan

Abū Muḥammad al-Yazīdī[705]—and according to what is said, he was one of the persons most knowledgeable about the story of the Barmakīs—has mentioned, saying: "If anyone says that al-Rashīd killed Ja'far b. Yaḥyā for any other reason but over Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan, don't believe him!"[706] The story here is that al-Rashīd handed over Yaḥyā to Ja'far, who thereupon imprisoned him. Then, one night, Ja'far summoned Yaḥyā and interrogated him about some aspects of his affairs and position, and Yaḥyā gave him suitable answers, until he said, "Show piety towards God in my regard, and don't lay yourself open to the possibility that [670] Muḥammad may speak unfavorably against you in the future (i.e., on the Last Day), for by God, I have not introduced any heretical

705. Yaḥyā b. Mubārak, died in 202 (817), was a poet and later aspirant to al-Ma'mūn's court circle (see Ṭabarī, III, 1156–8), and a member of a well-known poetic family; see Sezgin, GAS, II, 610.

706. The adducing of such a reason as the prime one for the downfall of the Barmakīs is nevertheless farfetched; cf. Bouvat, 75, and Kennedy, 128. But it does seem that at various points in his career as commander and minister for al-Rashīd, al-Faḍl did not regard the 'Alids as mortal enemies and, following in the footsteps of al-Mahdī, favored a policy of conciliation toward them, ill according with al-Rashīd's violently anti-'Alid views; cf. his generosity toward the Imām Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, Ibn Ṭabāṭabā (Jahshiyārī, 151–2; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 185–6, tr. 201–2; Bouvat, 64; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 166) and his general attitude of leaving 'Alids in the remoter parts of the empire alone, as being less harmful there to the state, as is emphasized by Sourdel, op. cit., I, 164–6, idem, "La politique religieuse du calife 'abbaside al-Ma'mūn," REI, XXX (1962), 28–9, and Kennedy, 119–20. In Jahshiyārī, 194, Yaḥyā b. Khālid is accused by al-Rashīd of giving a financial subsidy to Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh in Daylam so that his strength might increase, and then al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā would have all the greater honor for suppressing the revolt—a puerile argument that Yaḥyā b. Khālid easily disposes of. In Abū al-Faḍl Bayhaqī, Ta'rīkh-i Mas'ūdī, 415, Yaḥyā acknowledges that he is suspect in al-Rashīd's eyes for his 'Alid sympathies, which may be a characteristic touch of the Persian sources on the Barmakīs and their fall.

innovations nor have I given shelter to any perpetrator of such misdeeds!" So Ja'far relented towards him and told him, "Go forth into wherever you like of God's lands!" But Yaḥyā replied, "How can I go forth, when I have no assurance that I shall not be arrested after a short while and sent back to you or someone else?" Hence, Ja'far sent along with Yaḥyā someone who could conduct him to a secure place for him. The news of this reached al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' through a spy of his within the inner circle of Ja'far's servants (or: eunuchs, khadamihi) whom he had over Ja'far.

Al-Faḍl made a full investigation into the matter; he found it to be perfectly true, and it was fully revealed to him. So he went into al-Rashīd's presence and informed him. The latter indicated to al-Faḍl ostensibly that he was uninterested in his information, and said, "What's the matter got to do with you, may you be deprived of your mother? For all you know, this may be at my express command!" At this, al-Faḍl was crushed. Ja'far now came to al-Rashīd. The latter called for food; the two of them ate together, and the Caliph began to put tasty morsels of food into Ja'far's mouth and to converse with him, until finally, at the end of their session together, al-Rashīd asked, "What has Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh been up to?" Ja'far replied, "He is just as he was before, O Commander of the Faithful, in a cramped prison cell, loaded with fetters." Al-Rashīd commented, "By my life!" At this, Ja'far—who had one of the acutest intelligences and soundest perceptions among all mankind—drew back, and realized within himself that the Caliph in fact knew something about the affair. So he then said, "Nay, by your life, my lord, in reality I set him free, having learnt that there was nothing to be gained by holding him and that he was completely harmless." The Caliph replied, "You did well! You have done exactly what was in my own mind!" (literally, "you have not gone beyond what was in my own mind"). But when Ja'far went out, al-Rashīd followed him with his gaze until Ja'far became almost hidden from his sight, and then he burst out, "May God [671] slay me with the sword of right guidance for having committed an erroneous act if I don't kill you!" What subsequently happened regarding him is well-known.[707]

707. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 464; K. al-'Uyūn, 306–7; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 176; Ibn Khallikān, I, 334–5, tr. I, 308–9; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 191, tr. 208; Ibn Khaldūn, tr. I, 31–2; Palmer, 85; Bouvat, 83; Abbott, 196–7.

Idrīs b. Badr has transmitted the information,[708] saying: A man presented himself before al-Rashīd (or: presented a petition to al-Rashīd, 'araḍa li-al-Rashīd) whilst the latter was engaged in a discussion with Yaḥyā (al-Barmakī), with the words, "O Commander of the Faithful, a word of advice (for you), so summon me before you!" Al-Rashīd said to Harthamah, "Take this man aside with you, and ask him about this piece of advice of his." Harthamah questioned him (about it), but he refused to tell him, saying, "It is a secret meant for the Caliph's ear alone." Harthamah informed al-Rashīd of what the man had said, and the Caliph replied, "Don't let him leave the palace gate until I have a chance to speak with him privately." He related: When it was midday, all those who had been with the Caliph departed, and the Caliph summoned the man. The man said, "Accord me complete privacy." So Hārūn turned to his sons and said, "Please go away, lads!" and they sprang up (and left). Khāqān and Ḥusayn remained standing by his head. The man looked at them. Al-Rashīd told them, "Retire from my presence," and they did so. Then al-Rashīd went up to the man and said, "Now tell me what is in your mind." The man replied, "Provided that you grant me a promise of personal security and safe conduct." The Caliph said, "I undertake to grant you such a promise of personal safety and to treat you well."

The man said, "I was at Ḥulwān, in one of the caravanserais there, when I realized that I was in the presence of Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh, who was wearing a coarse, open-fronted tunic [durrā'ah][709] of wool and a coarse, green-colored woolen cloak. He was accompanied by a group of persons who encamped whenever he encamped and who travelled on whenever he travelled on and who took up a position near him, (nevertheless) giving the impression to anyone who saw them that they did not know Yaḥyā although they were in reality his aides. Each one of them had a chit [manshūr][710] guaranteeing him safe-conduct, should he be stopped." Al-

708. There is a complete isnād for this story back to Idrīs b. Zayd in Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 309–10.

709. For this long gown, see Dozy, Dictionnaire détaillée des noms de vêtements chez les arabes, 177–81; Agius, 217–20.

710. See for this early use of the term (in later times a more grandiose document of appointment for officials), *EI*² s.v. Diplomatic. i. Classical Arabic. Section 3.c (h) (W. Björkman): a pass for peasants in Egypt, designed to impede movement away from the land.

Rashīd said, "Do you know Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh, then?" He replied, "I have known him for a long time, and it was this which made certain my recognition of him the other day." Al-Rashīd said, "Describe him to me." The man replied, "(He is) a man with an appearance of well-being, slightly swarthy in complexion, with receding hair at the temples, pleasant eyes, and a substantial paunch." Al-Rashīd retorted, "You have spoken truly, he is just like that," and went on to say, "What did you hear him say?" The man replied, "I [672] didn't hear him say anything, except that I saw him performing the worship. I also saw one of his slaves, whom I used previously to know, sitting at the gate of the caravanserai. When Yaḥyā had finished his act of worship, the slave brought him a freshly laundered robe. He threw it over Yaḥyā's shoulders and took away the woolen gown. After the sun began to decline from its zenith, he performed another act of worship which was, I think, the afternoon one [al-ʿaṣr]. I was meanwhile watching him closely, and he performed the opening sections of the two acts of worship in a protracted, measured fashion, but the closing sections of the two acts of worship in a light and speedy fashion."[711]

Al-Rashīd exclaimed, "May God bless your father! How excellently have you remembered all this! Yes indeed, that would be the afternoon worship, and that would be the appropriate time for it in the view of people in general. May God grant you a handsome reward and thank you appropriately for your efforts! But who exactly are you?" The man replied, "I stem from the progeny of the 'sons of the dynasty';[712] my family origin is from Marw and my birthplace is the City of Peace." The Caliph said, "Is your house, then, there?" He replied, "Yes." The Caliph remained silent, with his eyes to the ground, for a considerable period and then said, "How would you be able to endure an unpleasant experience, which you would have to suffer, as an act of obedience to me?" The man said, "I would undergo the unpleasantness of that inasmuch as the Commander of the Faithful wishes it." The Caliph said, "Stay where you are until I come back," and he darted quickly into

711. Following here the Cairo text, VIII, 290, al-ūlayayni and al-ukhrayayni, for the Leiden text's al-awwalatayni (sic) and al-ākhiratayni (presumably referring to the four rakʿahs which make up the ṣalāt al-ẓuhr and the ṣalat al-ʿaṣr).

712. I.e., from the Abnāʾ al-Dawlaḥ, the original backing of the ʿAbbāsids from the Arabs of the Khurāsānian garrison cities.

a chamber[713] which was just at his back and pulled out a purse containing two thousand dīnārs. He said, "Take this, and let me put into operation a plan which I have thought up concerning you." The man accordingly took the money and wrapped his robes over it. Then the Caliph called out, "O slave!" and Khāqān and Ḥusayn answered the call. He said, "Strike this son of a stinking, uncircumcised whore [ibn al-lakhnā']!" so the two of them punched him about a hundred times. Then the Caliph said, "Take him out to those who are still in the palace precincts, with his turban round his neck, and proclaim, 'This is the reward of the person who brings slanderous accusations against the Commander of the Faithful's courtiers and retainers!' " They did all that, and the people talked about the man and what had happened to him, but no one knew about the man's real role nor about what he had communicated to al-Rashīd until the fall of the Barmakīs eventually took place.[714]

The Barmakīs' Wealth and Ostentation as a Reason for Their Fall

Ya'qūb b. Isḥāq (al-Iṣfahānī)[715] has mentioned that Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī transmitted the information to him, saying: I visited Ja'far b. Yaḥyā in that palace of his which he had built. He said to me, [673]
"Aren't you astonished at Manṣūr b. Ziyād?"[716] He said: I replied, "In what connection?" He said, "I asked him whether he discerned any defect at all in my palace, and he replied, 'Yes, it doesn't contain any sun-dried brick or pine trunk (in its construction).' " Ibrāhīm related: I said, however, "What renders it faulty, in my view, is that you have expended on it around twenty million dirhams, and this is a thing concerning which I would not guarantee your personal security, at some future date, in the Caliph's eyes." He retorted, "He knows well that he has given me in presents more

713. Following the reading of the Addenda et emendanda, P. DCCCLXII, faṭafara fī ḥujrat[in].

714. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 309–11; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 164 n. 3.

715. Also mentioned as a rāwī by Ṭabarī, III, 759 (below, 328), 965.

716. Manṣūr's closeness to the Barmakīs (Ṭabarī, III, 613, above, 116, and n. 444) was such that just before their fall, the Caliph attacked them indirectly by mulcting Manṣūr of an enormous sum, with the penalty of death for nonpayment, which Manṣūr had to obtain from the Barmakīs. See Jahshiyārī, 175–7; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 172–3.

than that, and as much as that again, in addition to what he has left open for me to acquire [mā ʿarraḍanī lahu]." He related: I remarked, "An enemy has only to go to the Caliph over this with the intention of saying to him, 'O Commander of the Faithful, since he has been able to expend twenty million dirhams on a single palace, what about his ordinary expenditure? And all the gifts he bestows? And (provision against) all the eventualities and misfortunes which may assail him? Moreover, O Commander of the Faithful, what do you think about expenditure beyond all that? This is a sum which can speedily be disbursed, but getting oneself into a position to acquire it is difficult.'"[717] Jaʿfar replied, "If he hears anything (critical) about me, I shall respond, 'The Commander of the Faithful has bestowed many favors on people who have displayed ingratitude for these favors by concealing them or by outwardly displaying only a small part from a great number of these favors. I, on the other hand, am a man who has considered the Caliph's bounty to me; as a result, I have placed it on a mountain top and then instructed the people, "Come forth and gaze on it!"'"

The Barmakīs' Growing Fears of the Caliph's Threatening Intentions

Zayd b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. Zayd (al-ʿAlawī)[718] has mentioned that Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī transmitted the information to him that Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā said to him one day—Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā being Ibrāhīm's patron and sponsor [ṣāḥibahu] at al-Rashīd's court and the one who had brought him into the Caliph's circle of intimates—"I have begun to feel suspicious regarding this man's—he meant al-Rashīd's—attitude, and I have got the idea that this stems from some previous action of his which has affected me. Hence, I wished to examine that in the light of another person's opinion; now you are that person. So keep an eye on that point as you go about today's business, and let me know what you observe regarding him." He related: In the course of my day's activities, I did that. [674]

717. In Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 176, Jaʿfar's expenditure of twenty million dirhams on his palace is specifically adduced as one of the causes of al-Rashīd's vengeance on him.

718. Ḥusaynid rāwī and great-grandson of the Zayd b. ʿAlī killed at al-Kūfah in 121 (739), cited three times by Ṭabarī for events in al-Rashīd's reign, see also III, 692, 746 (below 235, 311).

When al-Rashīd rose up from his court session, I was the first of his companions to rise up and leave him. I then went along to a clump of trees along the road which I was wont to take and went inside it, together with my attendants, and ordered them to extinguish the candles. The Caliph's boon-companions began to pass by where I was, one by one. I could see them, but they could not see me. Finally, all of them had gone, when suddenly Ja'far appeared in view. When he came through the clump of trees he called out, "Come forth, my dear friend!" He related: So I came forth. He said, "Well, what information have you got?" I replied, "Not till you tell me how you knew I was here!" He said, "I was aware of your solicitude over what I am worried about and aware that you are not the sort of person who would go home without informing me of what you observed in him. I also know that you would not like to be seen standing about at this sort of hour. There is no better place for concealment along the road than this one, so I decided that you must be here in it." I said, "Yes, true." He said, "Now let's hear what you have learnt!" I replied, "I observed a man who jests when you speak seriously, and who becomes serious when you jest." He said, "That is exactly how he appears to me, so go homewards, my dear friend." He related: I then went home.[719]

He related: 'Alī b. Sulaymān transmitted the information to me, that he heard Ja'far b. Yaḥyā saying one day, "This present mansion of ours (i.e., our present life) is without defect, except that the owner has only a short spell of existence in it," alluding to himself.

It is mentioned from Mūsā b. Yaḥyā that he said: My father set out to make the circumambulation (of the Ka'bah) [al-ṭawāf] during the year in which disaster struck him, with myself, from among his children, accompanying him. He began to grip the coverings of the Ka'bah and repeatedly to utter supplications, saying, "O God, my sins are numerous and momentous; only You can number them and only You can know them. O God, if You punish me, then make my punishment in this present world, even if that punishment involves my senses of hearing and sight, my wealth and children, until You are fully satisfied, and do not make my punishment one in the next world!"

719. Cf. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 157. Various of the sources stress al-Rashīd's suspiciousness and vacillations.

He related: Aḥmad b. al-Ḥasan b. Ḥarb transmitted the information to me, saying: I saw Yaḥyā at a time when he had stood facing the (Holy) House and had gripped the coverings of the Ka'bah and [675] was saying, "O God, if it is Your good pleasure to deprive me of Your goodness vouchsafed to me, then deprive me! O God, if it is Your good pleasure to deprive me of my family and children, then deprive me, O God, but leave me al-Faḍl!" He related: Then he turned round in order to go on his way. When he drew near to the door of the mosque, he wheeled round rapidly and repeated his previous actions and began to say, "O God, it is unseemly for the like of myself to make supplication to You and then ask You to make an exception. O God, (take) al-Faḍl (also)!"[720]

He related: When they returned from the Pilgrimage, they encamped at al-Anbār, whilst al-Rashīd halted at al-'Umr,[721] accompanied by the two heirs to the throne, al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn. Al-Faḍl lodged with al-Amīn, whilst Ja'far lodged with al-Ma'mūn; Yaḥyā was in the same dwelling as his secretary Khālid b. 'Īsā;[722] Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā was in the same dwelling as Ibn Nūḥ, the head of the state embroidery workshops [al-ṭirāz]; whilst Muḥammad b. Khālid was with al-Ma'mūn at al-'Umr with al-Rashīd.[723]

He related: Al-Rashīd spent the nights in the sole company of al-Faḍl, then he bestowed robes of honor on him, gave him a jewelled collar and commanded him to set off homeward with Muḥammad al-Amīn. He sent for Mūsā b. Yaḥyā, and then displayed his favor to him. Previously, on the outward journey, at al-Ḥīrah, he had displayed anger at Mūsā because 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān had made him an object of suspicion in al-Rashīd's eyes in connection with the affairs of Khurāsān and had told the Caliph about the people of

720. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Palmer, 101–2.

721. The site of a monastery, the Dayr 'Umr Mar Yūnān, on the banks of the Euphrates, described by Shābushtī, 258–64, as extensive, with many monks, well-fortified like a castle and much-celebrated in verse as a pleasure haunt.

722. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 511, Yaḥyā lodged in the monastery of al-'Umr and was there shown, by one of the priests, a poetic inscription set up by the founder; when he read this, Yaḥyā derived from it an omen of impending doom, and found that the priest had disappeared into thin air.

723. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit.; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 394 = ed. Pellat, § 2596; K. al-'Uyūn, 305.

Khurāsān's sincere obedience to Mūsā and their love for him, and that he was in correspondence with him and making plans for slipping away to them and for mounting an attack on him (i.e., the Caliph) in collusion with them. All that made a profound impression on al-Rashīd's mind to Mūsā's detriment, and made the Caliph apprehensive of him. Mūsā was one of the great and courageous heroic leaders, so when ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā spread these calumnies about him, they found an immediate response in al-Rashīd and just a small part of them had an effect on him.[724]

At that point, Mūsā became liable for a debt and he concealed himself from his creditors. As a result of this, al-Rashīd imagined that he had gone to Khurāsān, as had been related to him. Hence, when al-Rashīd came to al-Ḥīrah on this Pilgrimage, Mūsā met him from Baghdad. Al-Rashīd then imprisoned him in the custody of al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā at al-Kūfah. This was the first impairment of [676] their position which the Barmakīs suffered. Al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā's mother rode forth to intervene in Mūsā's plight; al-Rashīd used never to refuse her anything. Al-Rashīd therefore said, "His father must stand guarantor for him, since accusatory reports about him have reached me." Yaḥyā accordingly stood as guarantor for him, and al-Rashīd handed Mūsā over to him. Then al-Rashīd showed his favor towards Mūsā and bestowed on him robes of honor. Before this, al-Rashīd had become angry and reproachful at al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā, and had found al-Faḍl's company uncongenial because al-Faḍl had given up drinking wine with him. Al-Faḍl used to say, "Even if I knew that water was detrimental to my manly honor [muruwwatī], I wouldn't drink it (i.e., wine)."[725] He was, however, passionately devoted to listening to music and singing [al-samāʿ]. He related: Jaʿfar used to take part in al-Rashīd's convivial sessions as a boon-companion, to the point that his father forbade him to participate further and ordered him to cease from familiar contacts with the Caliph; but Jaʿfar would brush aside his father's com-

724. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 177.

725. Jahshiyārī, 150. This last author also notes, 167, that the ʿAbbāsid prince ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ, whom al-Rashīd was later to imprison (Ṭabarī, III, 688–94, below, 230–38), was likewise generally refused admission to the circle of the Caliph's boon-companions because of his refusal to drink nabīdh, as did the Caliph; cf. A. S. Tritton, The Caliphs and their non-Muslim subjects, 193–4.

mand and would enthusiastically join the Caliph in whatever the latter invited him to.

It has been mentioned from Sa'īd b. Huraym that, when he was unable to exert any further efforts to dissuade Ja'far, Yaḥyā wrote to him, "I have only let you go on in your own way so that the passage of time might bring you into a difficult position which might make you realize what you are involved in, even though I strongly fear that this difficult position might be a far from trifling one." He related: Yaḥyā had already addressed these words to al-Rashīd, "O Commander of the Faithful, I disapprove, by God, of Ja'far's mingling intimately with you and your affairs, and I am not sure that the outcome of all this may not rebound on me through your agency. If only you would let someone else have a turn instead of him[726] and would restrict him to devoting himself to the important administrative tasks for you which he is undertaking, that would be much more in accordance with my own desires and make you feel more confident regarding me."[727] Al-Rashīd replied, "O my father, this is not your real reason; in reality, you merely wish to manoeuvre al-Faḍl into a superior position over Ja'far."[728]

The Alleged Misconduct between Ja'far and the Caliph's Sister 'Abbāsah

Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—I think from his paternal uncle Zāhir b. Ḥarb[729]—transmitted the information to me that the reason behind the destruction of Ja'far and the Barmakīs was that al-Rashīd could not bear to be away from the company of Ja'far and of his own sister 'Abbāsah bt. al-Mahdī.[730] He used to invite them both to be present when he had one of his drinking sessions, this being

726. Following the Leiden text's fa-law a'qabtahu; the Cairo text, VIII, 293, has fa-law a'faytahu "if only you would dismiss him."

727. Jahshiyārī, 178: "would make me feel more confident over his safety."

728. Ibid.

729. These two were possibly kinsmen of the rāwī Aḥmad b. al-Ḥasan b. Ḥarb mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 674 (above, 212).

730. Half-sister of al-Rashīd, being the daughter of al-Mahdī by a slave girl Raḥīm, and already three times married and widowed; she must accordingly have been middle-aged, rather than "in the vigor of youth," as Ṭabarī says, at the time of this alleged liaison with Ja'far. According to the Qāḍī Ibn al-Zubayr, 235, § 342, she died in 182 (798) and left behind a large fortune. See Abbott, 21, 156; *EI*² s.v. (J. Horovitz).

after he had told Ja'far how little able he was to endure Ja'far's and 'Abbāsah's absence from him. He said to Ja'far, "I will give her to you in marriage so that it will be licit for you to look on her when I [677] invite her to my court sessions," and he ordered him not to touch her (i.e., sexually) or do anything at all of what a man usually does with his wife. So al-Rashīd gave her to him in marriage on these conditions. He used to invite them both to his circle when he held a drinking session, then he would get up from the circle and leave the two of them together. They would then become intoxicated with the wine, and both of them being in the vigor of youth, Ja'far would make for her and copulate with her. Subsequently, she became pregnant by him and gave birth to a boy. She was afraid of her own safety from al-Rashīd, if he should get to know about that, so she sent the newly born child, accompanied by nurses for him from among her own slaves, to Mecca. The matter remained concealed from Hārūn until some bad blood arose between 'Abbāsah and a certain slave girl of hers, and this latter thereupon communicated the story of her affair and the matter of the child to al-Rashīd, informing him at the same time of the child's whereabouts, of the slave girls of 'Abbāsah who were looking after him, and of the ornaments with which his mother had adorned him. So when Hārūn performed this particular Pilgrimage, he sent to the place where the slave girl had told him the child was someone who would bring back to him the child and the nurses looking after him. When they were brought before him, he questioned the women who were caring for the child, and they told him substantially the same story which 'Abbāsah's delator had told him. It is alleged that he wanted to kill the child but then restrained himself from that.[731]

Now whenever al-Rashīd made the Pilgrimage, Ja'far used to 731. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 464–6; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 387–94 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2588–90; K. al-'Uyūn, 307–8; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 175; Ibn Khallikān, I, 332–8, tr. I, 306–8; Palmer, 83–5, 91–2, 98–9; Bouvat, 113–19; Abbott, 156–7, 196–7. This alleged reason for al-Rashīd's anger against Ja'far, which so caught the imagination of later chroniclers, does not appear in such early sources as Jahshiyārī and Ya'qūbī. Ibn Khaldūn, tr. I, 28–30, rejected its authenticity, and the words of the executioner Masrūr to an enquirer at a later time, in al-Mutawakkil's reign, indicate that "women's tales," amr al-mar'ah, were already circulating by then around the causes of the Barmakīs' fall (Jahshiyārī, 204; cf. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 158). Of modern writers, Bouvat, 70, 74, and Horovitz, EI[2] s.v. 'Abbāsa, regard it as legend, as does Sourdel, op. cit., I, 167; only Abbott, loc. cit., gives it credence.

organize a feast for him at 'Usfān,[732] in order to show him hospitality when he returned from Mecca and set off in the direction of Iraq. When the time came round in this year, Ja'far prepared the feast there, as was his wont, and then requested al-Rashīd to visit him (for the feast). But the latter adduced an excuse to him, and did not attend the feast. Ja'far (nevertheless) remained with him until he halted at his encampment at al-Anbār, and then there took place the events involving him and his father which I am about to relate, if God Most High wills.

The Killing of Ja'far

[678] Al-Faḍl b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī has mentioned that al-Rashīd performed the Pilgrimage in the year 186 (802), and that he returned homewards from Mecca and reached al-Ḥīrah in al-Muḥarram, 187 (December, 802–January, 803) on his return journey from the Pilgrimage. He stayed for a few days at the palace of 'Awn al-'Ibādī[733] and then set out by boat until he stopped at al-'Umr in the vicinity of al-Anbār. When it was the night of Saturday, the thirtieth of al-Muḥarram (the night of Friday-Saturday, January 27–8, 803), he sent the eunuch Masrūr,[734] together with Abū 'Iṣmah Ḥammād b. Sālim[735] and a detachment of troops. They encircled Ja'far b. Yaḥyā's (lodging) by night, and Masrūr burst in on him. Ja'far had with him (Jibrīl) Ibn Bukhtīshū' the physician and Abū Zakkār al-Kalwādhānī the blind singer,[736] and was engaged in a convivial session. Masrūr dragged him out roughly and hustled him along until he brought him to the lodging where al-Rashīd

732. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 121–2, this lay two stages away from Mecca; the modern village of this name is some thirty miles to the north-east of Mecca. See Bakrī, III, 942–3; Al-Wohaibi, 284–9.

733. 'Awn is mentioned in Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 305–6 = ed. Pellat, § 2511, as the governor or chief [ṣāḥib] of al-Ḥīrah who at one point entertained al-Rashīd in his residence there.

734. Abū Hāshim Masrūr, the eunuch employed by al-Rashīd as confidential agent and executioner, who died in al-Mutawakkil's reign; see Crone, 192–3.

735. Clearly not the Abū 'Iṣmah executed by al-Rashīd on his accession; see Ṭabarī, III, 602 (above, 95).

736. Described also in Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 395 = ed. Pellat, § 2596, as ṭunbūrī, player of the pandore, as well as a singer; his nisbah refers to the town of Kalwādhā situated on the Tigris to the southeast of Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 477–8; Le Strange, Lands, 32; *EI*² s.v. (Ed.).

was. He imprisoned him, bound him up with a rope used for hobbling asses, and informed al-Rashīd that he had arrested Ja'far and had brought him back. Al-Rashīd then ordered Ja'far to be beheaded, and Masrūr did that.[737]

It is mentioned from 'Alī b. Abī Sa'īd that Masrūr the eunuch communicated the information to him, saying: Al-Rashīd sent me to bring back to him Ja'far b. Yaḥyā when he had decided to kill him. I came to Ja'far, and he had with him Abū Zakkār the blind singer, who was at that moment singing the verse

Go not far away, for death will come upon every brave youth, whether by night or in the morning!

He related: I said to him, "O Abū al-Faḍl, what I have come for is indeed something of that kind (i.e., death); by God, it has come to you by night! Give an account of yourself to the Commander of the Faithful!"[738] He related: He raised his arms and fell at my feet, kissing them, and said, "(Give me some time) until I can go back into my lodging and make my last testament." I replied, "There's no possibility of your going back inside, but make your last dispositions (here and now) with whatever arrangements you wish." So he gave the appropriate orders in his testament for the effecting of his wishes, and freed his slaves. At that point, messengers came to me from the Commander of the Faithful urging me to deal with him speedily. He related: So I took Ja'far along with me to his lodging and informed him (about this). The Caliph said to me—being [679] himself at that moment in his bed—"Bring me his head!" I went back to Ja'far and told him that. He exclaimed, "O Abū Hāshim, O God, O God! By God, he wouldn't order you to do that if he were not drunk! Put off killing me till the morning, or else go and consult with him about me a second time!" So I went back to consult al-Rashīd. But when he heard my whispered words of intercession [ḥissī], he burst out, "O you who suck your mother's clitoris! Bring me Ja'far's head!" So I returned to Ja'far and told him. He thereupon said, "Go back to him on my behalf a third time!" I went back to al-

737. Ibn Khallikān, I, 336–7, tr. I, 310.

738. The incident of the verses foreshadowing Ja'far's violent death is given in Jahshiyārī, 187; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 466–7; Azdī, 304; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XI, 54–5 = ed. Cairo, XII, 191–2; K. al-'Uyūn, 305; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 177–8; Ibn Khallikān, I, 345, tr. I, 312; cf. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, loc. cit.

Rashīd, but he struck me with a staff and exclaimed, "May I be excluded from (the offspring of) al-Mahdī! If you come back to me and don't bring Ja'far's head, I shall certainly send to you someone who will first of all bring back to me your head and, secondly, Ja'far's!" He related: So I went forth and brought back to him Ja'far's head.[739]

He related: That same night, al-Rashīd ordered men to be sent who would seize Yaḥyā b. Khālid and all his children, mawlās, and everyone in any way connected with them; not one of those who were present there escaped. Al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā was removed by night and then imprisoned in a wing of one of al-Rashīd's residences. Yaḥyā b. Khālid was imprisoned in his own house.[740] He confiscated all the wealth, estates, possessions, and so forth, which they were found to have, [741] and the soldiers did not allow a single person (i.e., of the Barmakīs' households) to go forth to the City of Peace or anywhere else.[742] That same night, he despatched the eunuch Rajā' to al-Raqqah with orders to seize their wealth and possessions (there) and to arrest all their slaves, mawlās and retainers. He gave Rajā' complete charge in dealing with them. That same night, he sent out letters to all the governors and chief officials in the various regions and administrative divisions of the provinces (ordering them) to seize the Barmakīs' wealth and arrest their agents.[743]

When morning came, he sent Ja'far b. Yaḥyā's corpse with Shu'-

739. Jahshiyārī, 186–7; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 467–8; K. al-'Uyūn, 305–6; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Palmer, 94–8. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 395–8 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2596–9 (also in Ibn Khallikān, I, 338–9, tr. I, 312—13) has a somewhat fanciful version of this story in which the executioner of Ja'far is a eunuch called Yāsir al-Rikhlah, who is then himself killed by al-Rashīd. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, loc. cit., gives this account from Masrūr via another rāwī and adds that Abū Zakkār expressed a wish to die with his patron and benefactor Ja'far but was spared and rewarded by al-Rashīd; cf. Bouvat, 87, 90.

740. Presumably, the residence in the district of the Shammāsiyyah Gate quarter called Suwayqah, granted to Khālid b. Barmak by al-Mahdī, which Yaḥyā had built and which was known as the Qaṣr al-Ṭīn; see Jahshiyārī, 145.

741. The wealth which the various members of the Barmakī family were found to have is enumerated in Qāḍī Ibn al-Zubayr, 224–5, §§ 314–15.

742. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 510. Jahshiyārī, 188, cf. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 175 n. 2, relates that al-Rashīd had given al-Sindī b. Shāhik (see below) instructions a whole year previously secretly to appoint sequestrators [wukalā'] of the Barmakīs' palaces and possessions.

743. Jahshiyārī, 186–7.

bah al-Khaftānī, Harthamah b. Aʿyan and Ibrāhīm b. Ḥumayd al-Marwarrūdhī,[744] and he sent after them a number of his slaves and trusty retainers, including the eunuch Masrūr, to Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā's house; Ibrāhīm b. Ḥumayd and the eunuch Ḥusayn to al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā's house; Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān[745] and Rashīd the eunuch[746] to the house of Yaḥyā and Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā. He sent Harthamah b. Aʿyan with him (i.e., with Rashīd the eunuch) and ordered him to seize all their wealth, and he wrote to al-Sindī b. Shāhik[747] to send Jaʿfar's corpse to the City of Peace, to set up his head on the Middle Bridge and to cut up his body and gibbet each piece of it on the Upper and Lower Bridges.[748] Al-Sindī did that. The eunuchs performed the duties they had been sent to do. A number of the young children of al-Faḍl, Jaʿfar, and Muḥammad were brought to al-Rashīd, and he ordered them to be released. He ordered proclamation to be made regarding all the Barmakīs, that there would be no quarter for anyone sheltering them, apart from Muḥammad b. Khālid, his children, his family, and his retainers, whom he exempted from this order because of the manifestly good advice which Muḥammad had given him and because he recognized that Muḥammad had had no part in what the rest of the Barmakīs had been involved.[749] [680]

Before al-Rashīd set out from al-ʿUmr, he set Yaḥyā free,[750] but over al-Faḍl, Muḥammad and Mūsā the sons of Yaḥyā and over Abū al-Mahdī their relative by marriage he appointed custodians [ḥafaẓah], who were responsible to Harthamah b. Aʿyan until he should 744. Son of a commander who had fought under Qaḥṭabah in the ʿAbbasid daʿwah, and governor of Sīstān for al-Manṣūr; see Crone, 175.

745. On Abū Ṣāliḥ Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, described by Jahshiyārī, 135, as one of Yaḥyā b. Khālid's protégés, shortly after this to be appointed by al-Rashīd to take charge of the property confiscated from the Barmakīs, see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 142–3.

746. The role in all this of eunuchs, often employed for confidential missions, is notable here. It is not, however, known that there was any special enmity existing between the Caliph's body of eunuchs and the Barmakī family.

747. Following the suggested reading of the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXII.

748. Jahshiyārī, 186, 188, 190; K. al-ʿUyūn, 306; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 178. For the Tigris bridges, see Le Strange, Baghdad, index, s.v. "Bridge," and Lassner, Topography, index, s.v. "Jisr."

749. The fanciful account in Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 468, records a general massacre of all the Barmakīs with the exception of Muḥammad b. Khālid.

750. This release must have been only temporary.

bring them to al-Raqqah. Al-Rashīd ordered the execution of Anas b. Abī Shaykh[751] on the day he reached al-Raqqah, Ibrāhīm b. 'Uthmān b. Nahīk[752] being in charge of his killing; his corpse was then gibbeted. Yaḥyā b. Khālid, together with al-Faḍl and Muḥammad, was then kept in confinement in the Dayr al-Qā'im,[753] with custodians responsible to Masrūr the eunuch and to Harthamah b. A'yan set over them; he made no distinction in treatment between them and a number of their slaves, nor over necessities for them.[754]

[681] He despatched together with them Zubaydah bt. Munīr, al-Faḍl's mother, Yaḥyā's slave girl Danānīr,[755] and a number of their servants (or eunuchs, khadam) and slave girls. They were well treated until al-Rashīd grew angry with 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ; then, on account of his anger, they were all subjected to rough treatment. Al-Rashīd's suspicions against both him and them were reawakened, and as a result, he made their confinement more unpleasant.[756]

---

751. Secretary and favorite of Ja'far b. Yaḥyā's, whose corpse was also gibbeted. See Jahshiyārī, 189–91; Ibn Qutaybah, 382; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 154.

752. Ibrāhīm had been left in charge of al-Raqqah during al-Rashīd's Pilgrimage of 186 (802), see Ṭabarī, III, 651 (above, 179).

753. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 526, the Dayr al-Qā'im al-Aqṣā lay on the road from al-Raqqah towards Baghdad, on the banks of the Euphrates, and was so-called because there was there a lofty watchtower which had marked the Byzantine-Persian frontier; it is not mentioned by Shābushtī.

754. But cf. the words of Jahshiyārī, 191, cited below, n. 756.

755. The celebrated singer Danānīr al-Barmakiyyah, mentioned in several places in Iṣfahānī's Aghānī, who had been freed by Yaḥyā, whose arrest she now shared. See Bouvat, 52–4; Farmer, 135; Abbott, 138–40, 198 n. 75.

756. Jahshiyārī, 195 (followed by Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 562–4 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 326–8; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 405–13 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2609–15; Ibn Khallikān, IV, 33–4, tr. II, 464–5), states that al-Rashīd ill-treated the Barmakīs in an attempt to ferret out all their wealth and ordered Masrūr to flog al-Faḍl with two hundred lashes; cf. Bouvat, 92, and Sourdel, Vizirat, loc. cit. When first arrested, the children of Yaḥyā had been well-treated and well-supplied with food and clothing and had not been fettered like the Barmakīs' servants and retainers, according to Jahshiyārī, 191. This same author likewise states, 195–6, that al-Rashīd offered to release Yaḥyā and to allow him to live wherever he wished, but Yaḥyā chose to remain with his family—hence, in jail at al-Rāfiqah—until his death from natural causes in al-Muḥarram, 190 (November–December, 805), aged 64 (Jahshiyārī, 210; K. al-'Uyūn, 308; Ibn Khallikān, IV, 33, VI, 228; tr. II, 464, IV, 112; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 155). Al-Faḍl died from a paralytic stroke in jail at al-Raqqah in al-Muḥarram, 193 (October–November, 808), aged 45 (Jahshiyārī, loc. cit.; K. al-'Uyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn Khallikān, IV, 36, tr. II, 466; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 155–6). Jahshiyārī, 196 ff., gives several anecdotes about the Barmakīs in prison.

Al-Zuhayr b. Bakkār[757] has mentioned that Ja'far b. al-Ḥusayn al-Lahbī communicated the information to him that Anas b. Abī Shaykh was brought before al-Rashīd on the morning after the night in which Ja'far b. Yaḥyā was killed. Talk was bandied between them, and then al-Rashīd pulled out a sword from beneath the coverings he had been lying on and ordered Anas to be beheaded, at the same time reciting an appropriate verse which had previously been composed concerning Anas's killing,

The sword is eager with desire to taste (the blood of) Anas;
the sword looks on, whilst Fate is waiting (i.e., for his death).

He related: He was executed, and the blood spurted out before the sword had cut through. Al-Rashīd exclaimed, "May God have mercy on 'Abdallāh b. Muṣ'ab!"[758] People commented that the sword had belonged to al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām. Others have mentioned that 'Abdallāh b. Muṣ'ab had acted as an intelligence agent and spy over the people for al-Rashīd, and had denounced Anas to the Caliph as a heretic, for which Anas had killed him. He (i.e., Anas) was one of the Barmakīs' retainers.[759]

Muḥammad b. Isḥāq (al-Hāshimī) has mentioned that Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. Ḥakīm al-Kūfī communicated the information to him, saying that al-Sindī b. Shāhik had given him the information, saying: One day, I was sitting, when suddenly at my side there appeared a servant, who had arrived by the barīd service, and he handed me a slim letter. I broke open the seal, and lo, it was a letter from al-Rashīd, in his own handwriting, running as follows: "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. O Sindī, when you examine this letter of mine, if you happen to be sitting, then arise, and if are already standing, then don't sit down again until you come to me."

Al-Sindī related: I accordingly called for my riding-beasts and got [682]

757. Descendant of the Companion of the Prophet al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām mentioned below (see on him, EI[1] s.v. [A. J. Wensinck]); al-Zubayr b. Bakkār was a historian and genealogist, nephew of al-Muṣ'ab al-Zubayrī (see above, 75, n. 292) and like him author of a K. Nasab Quraysh, who died in 256 (870). See GAL, I[2], 146–7, SI, 215–6; GAS, I, 317–8.

758. The grandfather of the narrator al-Zubayr b. Bakkār, see his nasab in Sezgin, loc. cit.

759. See Ṭabarī, III, 680 (above, 220, and n. 751); Bouvat, 86.

on my way. Al-Rashīd was at that moment at al-ʿUmr. Al-ʿAbbās b. al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ (later) told me, "Al-Rashīd sat in his gondola [zaww][760] on the Euphrates awaiting you. A cloud of dust became visible, and he said to me, 'O ʿAbbās, that must be al-Sindī and his attendants!' I replied, 'O Commander of the Faithful, it is very likely he!'" He related, "Then you came in sight." Al-Sindī continued the story: I dismounted from my steed and stood there. Al-Rashīd sent a messenger for me, and I therefore went to him. I remained standing before him for a while. He told his servants who were with him to arise and go, which they did, so there only remained al-ʿAbbās b. al-Faḍl and myself. After an interval he said to al-ʿAbbās, "Go forth, and order the seatboards arranged in the boat to be lifted out," and he did that. Then he said to me, "Come near to me," so I drew near to him. He said to me, "You know why I sent the message to you?" I replied, "No, by God, O Commander of the Faithful." He said, "I have sent for you concerning an affair which, if the buttons of my own shirt knew about it, I would throw the shirt into the Euphrates! O Sindī, who is the most trustworthy of my commanders here within my entourage?" I replied, "Harthamah." He said, "You have spoken truly. Who, then, is the most trustworthy of my servants here within my entourage?" I replied, "Masrūr the Elder."[761] He said, "You have spoken truly! Get on your way immediately and ride flat out until you reach the City of Peace. Gather together your trusty retainers and watchmen and order them and their aides to get themselves ready. Then when the groups are ready, go off to the houses of the Barmakīs, station at every one of their gates one of the watchmen appointed to keep public order [ṣāḥib al-rabʿ].[762] Order him not to let anyone enter or leave—with the exception of the gate of Muḥammad b. Khālid—until my further orders reach you." He (i.e., Muḥammad b. Isḥāq) related: At this point of time, he had not yet moved against the Barmakīs (literally, "stirred them up," ḥarraka). Al-Sindī continued the story: I began to ride off furiously until I reached the City of 760. See Glossarium, p. CCLXXX; Kindermann, 36–7; al-Nukhaylī, 58–9. A possible etymology for the term is from Persian zūd "swift."

761. As factors in their trustworthiness, Harthamah was the Caliph's mawlā, whilst Masrūr was a black eunuch, totally isolated socially and hence very dependent on his master; see Ayalon, "On the eunuchs in Islam," 69–72.

762. See on this term, Glossarium, p. CCLVII.

Peace, and there I gathered my retainers together and did what he had commanded me. He related: Very soon Harthamah b. Aʿyan came up to me, accompanied by (the body of) Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā on the [683] back of a mule, without a pack-saddle, and with its head severed, and lo, there was the Commander of the Faithful's letter ordering me to chop Jaʿfar's body into halves and gibbet him on three bridges (i.e., with the head for the third bridge).[763] He related: I did what he commanded me.[764]

Muḥammad b. Isḥāq related: Jaʿfar's corpse remained gibbeted until al-Rashīd decided to set out for Khurāsān. I went along and looked at it. When al-Rashīd went to the eastern side (of Baghdad), by the Gate of Khuzaymah b. Khāzim,[765] he sent for al-Walīd b. Jusham[766] al-Shārī (i.e., the Khārijite) from prison, and gave orders to his executioner Aḥmad b. al-Junayd al-Khuttalī, and the latter beheaded al-Walīd. Then al-Rashīd turned to al-Sindī and said, "This"—meaning Jaʿfar's corpse—"must be burnt." When he had gone on his way, al-Sindī gathered together thorny brushwood and firewood for this purpose and burnt the corpse.[767]

Muḥammad b. Isḥāq related: When al-Rashīd executed Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā, someone said to Yaḥyā b. Khālid, "The Commander of the Faithful has killed your son Jaʿfar." He replied, "His own son will be killed likewise." He related: Someone also said to him, "Your dwellings have become desolate." He replied, "Their houses (i.e., those of the ʿAbbāsids) will become desolate."[768]

(Abū Ḥafṣ) al-Kirmānī has mentioned that Bashshār al-Turkī transmitted the information to him that al-Rashīd set out hunting, whilst he was at al-ʿUmr, on the day at whose close he had Jaʿfar executed. That day happened to be Friday, and Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā accompanied him, al-Rashīd having insisted on being alone with

763. I.e., the pieces of the corpse were to be exhibited on the Upper, Main, and Lower Bridges across the Tigris.

764. Jahshiyārī, 186, 188, 190; Azdī, 305.

765. The qaṭīʿah and palace of Khuzaymah (on whom see Crone, 180) were in the Mukharrim quarter of the East Bank; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 218, and Lassner, Topography, 171. Possibly the adjacent Bāb al-Ṭāq, at the Mukharrim end of the Main Bridge, is intended.

766. The "al-Walīd b. Ḥ.sh.m" of Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 515, should be read thus.

767. Jahshiyārī, 188; Dīnawarī, 391; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 514–15; Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 468; K. al-ʿUyūn, 306.

768. Jahshiyārī, 204; Azdī, 306; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 179.

him, without the presence of the heirs to the throne. He went along with Ja'far, having placed his hand on Ja'far's shoulder and having, a little while before that, anointed him with precious unguents with his own hand. He remained with Ja'far all the time, never leaving his side, until he went back at sunset (or: at the time of the sunset prayer). When he was about to enter his lodging, the Caliph clasped Ja'far to himself and told him, "If it were not for the fact that I shall be spending tonight with my womenfolk, I would not part from you. But you yourself, remain in your own house, drink wine too and enjoy entertainment so that you may have as pleasurable a [684] time as I shall be having." Ja'far replied, "No, by God, I only desire to do that in your company." Al-Rashīd told him, "By my life, (I beseech you) to drink."[769] Then he left him for his own residence. For hour after hour, al-Rashīd's envoys kept continuously coming to Ja'far with comestibles to accompany the wine [al-anqāl],[770] fragrant incense, and aromatic herbs, until the night was spent. Then he sent Masrūr to him. Ja'far was held prisoner in the Caliph's residence, and he ordered Ja'far's execution. He imprisoned al-Faḍl, Muḥammad and Mūsā, and sent Sallām al-Abrash as guard over Yaḥyā b. Khālid's gateway.[771] He did not, however, harm Muḥammad b. Khālid nor any of his children and retainers.[772]

He related: Al-'Abbās b. Bazī' communicated the information to me from Sallām, who said: When I went into Yaḥyā's presence at that time, his hangings and furnishings having all been torn open to the public gaze and his belongings piled up together, he said to me, "O Abū Salamah, it will be just like this on the Last Day!" Sallām related: I passed on these words to al-Rashīd after I had returned to him, and he thereupon became silent and downcast, wrapped in thought.[773]

---

769. lammā sharibta; on this use of lammā = illā in oaths and supplications, see above, 112, n. 427.

770. The Cairo text, VIII, 299, has al-anfāl "presents," whilst Jahshiyārī, 186, has al-alṭāf "presents." For nuql, pl. anqāl, "hors d'oeuvres," see Rodinson, "Recherches sur les documents arabes relatifs à la cuisine," 133, and Ahsan, 112–13.

771. Cf. Jahshiyārī, 186, 187. Eunuchs were not infrequently employed as guards and jailers; see Ṭabarī, III, 461, where Nuṣayr al-Waṣīf becomes jailer of the 'Alid al-Ḥasan b. Ibrāhīm b. 'Abd Allāh.

772. Jahshiyārī, 185–6; Azdī, 305.

773. Jahshiyārī, 187; Azdī, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

He related: Ayyūb b. Hārūn b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī communicated the information to me, saying: I used to have a relationship of ease and trustfulness with Yaḥyā.[774] When they all halted at al-Anbār, I went out to him and spent that evening with him which marked the end of their period of power. He had earlier gone to the Commander of the Faithful in his river craft [ḥarrāqah].[775] He entered his presence by the door for the intimates and nobility [ṣāḥib al-khāṣṣah] and he spoke with the Caliph about various requests and petitions from the people and other things, including the topics of putting the frontier regions with the Byzantines into a state of order and the mounting of raids by sea, and then he came out. He told the people waiting there, "The Commander of the Faithful has commanded that your requests be granted," and he sent to Abū Ṣāliḥ Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān giving him instructions to put those measures into effect. Then he engaged continuously in conversation with us about Abū Muslim and his sending of Muʿādh b. Muslim,[776] until he went into his own lodging after the sunset prayer. At dawn, the news of the killing of Jaʿfar and the fall of the Barmakīs' power reached us. He related: I wrote a letter of consolation to Yaḥyā (on Jaʿfar's death) and he wrote back to me, "I am content with God's decree and recognizant of His choice; God only punishes his servants for their own sins, 'Your Lord does not act unjustly towards (His) servants,'[777] and what God pardons is greater (than what He punishes), so praise be to God!"[778] [685]

He related: Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā was killed on the night of Saturday (i.e., the night of Friday-Saturday),[779] the first of Ṣafar, 187 (January

774. Doubtful reading, but apparently interpretable as sakanī, rather than the suknayya of the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXII, which would mean "my habitation, dwelling."

775. See Kinderman, 22–3, and al-Nukhaylī, 32–7, who point out that the meaning "fire-ship" (which the term certainly bears in the Crusading, Ayyūbid and Mamlūk periods) is clearly not appropriate here, where a light craft, not one used for war, is intended.

776. Possibly referring to the part of Muʿādh b. Muslim (on whom see Ṭabarī, III, 558, above, 25, n. 102) in the attack of the rebel Ustadhsīs on the Arab garrison of Marw al-Rūdh in 149 (766) (Ṭabarī, III, 354); this was long after Abū Muslim's death; otherwise, the reference seems obscure.

777. Qurʾān, XLI, 46.

778. Jahshiyārī, loc. cit.

779. The exact correspondence of the night the first of Ṣafar would have to be Saturday-Sunday night.

29, 187), when he was thirty-seven years old, their vizierate having lasted seventeen years.[780] Concerning this, al-Raqāshi[781] has said,

O Saturday, O worst of Saturdays in regard to its morning, and ill-omened Ṣafar, you have never brought a more inauspicious one (or: what you have brought is the most inauspicious possible)![782] Saturday has come with the momentous occurrence which has shattered our cornerstone, and in Ṣafar has come the catastrophe in a decisive fashion (literally, "like a blow which has penetrated as a sword does to the bone").

He related: It has been mentioned from Masrūr that he informed al-Rashīd that Ja'far had begged him just to see him, but al-Rashīd had said, "No, for he knows that if my eye falls on him, I will not be able to kill him."

Poetry Written on the Fall of the Barmakīs

Al-Raqāshi says concerning the Barmakīs (but it has also been mentioned that this poem is by Abū Nuwās[783]),

We have now come to rest, and our mounts have taken rest, and the camel which is urged along and the one who used to urge the camels along by his singing have now ceased doing this.[784]
So say to the camels, "You no longer have to travel through the 780. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 734; Jahshiyārī, 186; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

781. Al-Faḍl. b. 'Abd al-Ṣamad, mājin poet of Baghdad, who died before 207 (822) and whose verses were gathered into a dīwān by the Barmakīs; see GAS, II, 516.

782. Ṣafar was notoriously regarded in Arabic lore as the most inauspicious month of the year. Inter alia, it was held to be the month in which God expelled Adam from the Garden of Eden, whilst for the Shī'ah, various unpleasant events affecting the Imāms al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn took place in it; see Bess A. Donaldson, The wild rue, a study of Muhammadan magic and folklore in Iran, 123–5.

783. Abū Nuwās certainly endeavored to secure the patronage of the Barmakīs, but does not seem to have been particularly successful; see Wagner, Abū Nuwās, 52–9.

784. Jahshiyārī, 187, and the Cairo text, VIII, 300, have for this second hemistich "and he who lavishes gifts and he who used to seek gifts have been silenced" (i.e., yujdī and yajtadī here for the Leiden text's yuḥdā and yaḥtadī).

night
and traverse the deserts, desolate waste after desolate waste."
Say too to Death, "You have laid hold of Ja'far, and you will never after him lay hold of such a great leader!"
Say too to munificence, "After Faḍl, cease completely!" [686] and say to calamities, "Manifest yourselves anew every day!"
(You see) before you a Barmakī Indian sword, which has been shattered by a Hāshimite Indian sword![785]

He also speaks about them in a lengthy poem of his,

If perfidious Time betrays us, well, it has betrayed Ja'far and Muḥammad,
To the point that, when daylight gleamed bright, it revealed the killing of the noblest one who has ever perished and who had not yet been laid in his grave.
Were it not that the gleaming white blades were expressly commanded (to be brought into action), the cutting edge of one Indian sword would not have been notched by another Indian sword.
O house of Barmak, how many a gift and act of munificence of yours have there been, as abundant as grains of sand, given ungrudgingly!
It is very true that the Caliph was your brother (through foster-relationship), but he was not born of Barmakī stock.
You have disputed with him over being suckled together by the noblest of free women ever created from gems and chrysolite.
(You were) a wielder of power who had a hand ever-flowing with bounty, which was perpetually wont to be generous with newly acquired things and anciently inherited possessions alike.
It was a hand ever-disposed to bountifulness, until a decree of Fate fettered it, so that bountifulness was prevented from dispensing largesse.

785. Jahshiyārī, loc. cit.; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 402 = ed. Pellat, § 2603; Azdī, 305; K. al-'Uyūn, 308–9; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 179; Ibn Khallikān, I, 346, tr. I, 314.

[687] Sayf b. Ibrāhīm[786] says concerning them,

The stars of munificent gifts have set, the hand of bountifulness has dried up, and the seas of liberality have become scanty after the Barmakīs.
Stars of the sons of Barmak have set, by which the camel driver used to know the direction of the way (i.e., to the Barmakīs' liberality).[787]

Ibn Abī Karīmah[788] has said,

Every borrower who has had high rank lent to him is, after the noble youth of Barmak, in peril.
A blow from Fate has come down heavily upon him,
the same hand by means of which he himself came down on people!

Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-ʿAṭawī[789] has said,

By God, were it not for the denunciation of a slanderer and an eye of the Caliph's which never sleeps,
We would circumambulate the gibbet[790] on which you are nailed and kiss it, just as the pilgrims kiss the (Black) Stone!
Farewell to the whole world and its inhabitants, and to the period of power of the Barmakī house![791]

Abū al-ʿAtāhiyah[792] has said concerning the killing of Jaʿfar,

---

786. Unidentified.

787. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 403 = ed. Pellat, § 2605, attributes these two verses to Salm al-Khāsir; Azdī, loc. cit., to a "certain poet." Von Grunebaum notes the two lines in this "Three Arabic poets of the early Abbasid age. V. Salm al-Ḥāsir," 72, no. XXXVI = Shuʿarāʾ ʿAbbāsiyyūn, 108, no. 36, but states that Ṭabarī's attribution to (the otherwise unknown) Sayf b. Ibrāhīm must be correct, since Salm died before the fall of the Barmakīs (actually in 186 [802]).

788. In his K. al-Ḥayawān, II, 367–73, Jāḥiẓ quotes at length an ode by Aḥmad b. Ziyād b. Abī Karīmah on hunting with dogs and with cheetahs.

789. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-ʿAṭawī was a poet of al-Baṣrah and a Muʿtazilī theologian, who died in 240 (854); see GAS, II, 518.

790. I.e., as if making the ṭawāf round the Kaʿbah in the Pilgrimage.

791. These two verses are attributed in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XV, 36 = ed. Cairo, XVI, 249, followed by Ibn Khallikān, I, 346, tr. I, 314, to al-Raqāshī also.

Say, ye twain, to the one who hopes for (enduring) life, is there not a warning example in Ja'far and Yaḥyā?
They were the two ministers of God's Caliph, Hārūn;
do you know who they were? They were his two close friends!
Now, here is Ja'far, (secured) by a worn piece of rope, with his head and the two halves (of his body) up in a high place,
While as for the shaykh Yaḥyā, the minister, he (i.e., the Caliph) has banished him from his presence and sent him far away.
Their compact position has been scattered into pieces after being [688] solidly united,
and they have wandered off confusedly through the lands.
In this way, God recompenses the person who angers God by doing what pleases the servant (i.e., pleases himself, to the exclusion of God).
All praise to the One to whom rulers give submission;
I bear witness that there is no God but He!
A happy lot for the one who turns to God after being heedless, and who repents before death, happy is he![793]

He related: In this year, factional strife raged in Damascus between the partisans of Muḍar and Yaman. Hence, al-Rashīd despatched Muḥammad b. Manṣūr b. Ziyād,[794] and the latter arranged peace between them.[795]

In this year, al-Maṣṣīṣah[796] was struck by an earthquake. Part of its wall collapsed, and the inhabitants' water supply disappeared into the earth for a period during the night.[797]

---

792. Ismā'īl b. al-Qāsim, together with Bashshār b. Burd and Abū Nuwās the most celebrated poet of the early 'Abbasid period. See GAS, II, 534–5; EI[2] s.v. (A. Guillaume).

793. Abū al-'Atāhiyah, ash'āruhu wa-akhbāruhu, ed. Shukrī Fayṣal, 667; Azdī, 305–6.

794. Son of Manṣūr b. Ziyād, Yaḥyā b. Khālid's confidant; see Ṭabarī, III, 613 (above, 116, n. 444).

795. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 189.

796. Town in Cilicia, the classical Mopsuestia. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 144–5; Le Strange, Palestine, 505–7; idem, Lands, 130–1; EI[2] s.v. (Honigmann).

797. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

In this year, ʿAbd al-Salām rebelled at Āmid[798] and proclaimed Khārijite doctrines [ḥakkama]. Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd al-ʿUqaylī (subsequently) killed him.[799]

In this year, Yaʿqub b. Dāwūd died at al-Raqqah.[800]

In this year, al-Rashīd sent his son al-Qāsim to lead the summer expedition (against the Byzantines). He devoted him to God's service, made him an offering and means of access to God's favor, and he gave him charge of the frontier fortresses [al-ʿawāṣim].[801]

In this year, al-Rashīd became angry with ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ and imprisoned him.[802]

Al-Rashīd's Anger against ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ and His Consequent Imprisonment

Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm b. Ismāʿīl[803] has mentioned that ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ had a son called ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, who was one of the leading figures among the people of the time and from whom ʿAbd 798. The chief town of Diyār Bakr and the modern city of that name, classical Amida. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 56–7; Le Strange, Lands, 108–11; Canard, H'amdânides, 79–81; *EI*² s.v. Diyār Bakr. iii (Canard and Cahen).

799. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

800. Chief minister, hence, a proto-vizier, to al-Mahdī, but later imprisoned by him. See Ibn Khallikān, VII, 19–26, tr. IV, 352–9; E. Kōcher, "Yaʿqūb b. Dāʾūd," Mitteilungen des Instituts für Orientforschung, III (1955), 378–420; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 103–11; Omar, "Some observations on the reign of the Abbasid Caliph al-Mahdī 775–785 A.D.," in ʿAbbāsiyyāt, 97–8; *EI*² s.v. Abū ʿAbd Allāh Yaʿḳūb (Moscati).

801. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 734; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 742. These events are dealt with in more detail by Ṭabarī at III, 694–5 (below, 238–39).

742. These events are dealt with in more detail by Ṭabarī at III, 694–5 (below, 000).

802. On this episode in general, see Jahshiyārī, 211–12; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 735; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 513–14; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 302–5 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2509–10; K. al-ʿUyūn, 328; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 180–4; Kennedy, 74–5, 118. As Kennedy notes, ʿAbd al-Malik's father Ṣāliḥ had taken over most of the former Umayyad lands in Syria and had built up a powerful position there. ʿAbd al-Malik represented the "Syrian interest" at al-Rashīd's court, which he was later, on that Caliph's death, able to bring over to al-Amīn's side (see Ṭabarī, III, 841 ff.; K. al-ʿUyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 257–8), and was the supporter of al-Qāsim's claims ultimately to share in his father's inheritance, just as Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā al-Barmakī was al-Maʾmūn's supporter. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 513, makes the specific accusation against ʿAbd al-Malik that he was allegedly in treacherous correspondence with the tribal leaders in Syria and al-Jazīrah who were intending to mount an insurrection against the Caliph, but this does not seem to be supported in other sources.

803. See Ṭabarī, III, 597, and above, 85, n. 338.

al-Malik derived his patronymic. This son of his ʿAbd al-Raḥmān had a speech impediment and stuttered over the letter fāʾ. In [689] complicity with Qumāmah,[804] he set himself up in hostility to his father, and the two of them denounced him to al-Rashīd and told him that ʿAbd al-Malik was seeking after and avidly aspiring to the caliphate.[805] Hence, al-Rashīd arrested ʿAbd al-Malik and had him imprisoned in the custody of al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ. It has been mentioned that ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ was brought before al-Rashīd when the latter became angry against him, and al-Rashīd said to him, "(Is this) out of ingratitude for beneficence and (interpretable as) a rejection of outstanding favors and honorable treatment?" He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, in that case, I would have acknowledged the need for contrition and would have exposed myself to the just necessity of punishment; but all this is nothing but the unjust accusation of an envious one who has contended with me before you over the bonds of affection stemming from kinship and over the appointments to positions of authority. O Commander of the Faithful, you are the successor of the Messenger of God over his community and his faithful trustee of the interests of his own family. The obligation of obedience and the provision of sincere advice to you are incumbent upon them (i.e., the community of subjects); in turn, you have the obligation of meting out justice among them fairly, of patiently investigating the accidents of fate which may come upon them and of forgiving their sinful acts." Al-Rashīd said to him, "Are you calming me

804. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 513, adds to this name ". . . b. Yazīd," but Jahshiyārī, 211–12, 214, has the correct form ". . . b. Abī Yazīd." According to Jahshiyārī, 211–12, Qumāmah was a mawlā of the ʿAbbāsid Sulaymān b. ʿAlī and a noted stylist, whose family had been in the service of the ʿAbbāsids since their residence at al-Ḥumaymah. He now took ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ's place as secretary and tutor to al-Qāsim b. al-Rashīd; see Jahshiyārī, 214, and Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 188 n. 5.

805. The later Persian writer on the Barmakīs, Yazdī (see above, 201, n. 697), states that Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā had supported pretensions to the caliphate not of ʿAbd al-Malik but of his son ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. There seems to be no evidence whatsoever for this, and as Sourdel suggests, Vizirat, I, 168–9, it seems to be an aspect of the evolution of the "Persian" version of the fall of the Barmakīs influenced by Jaʿfar's alleged tenderness to the ʿAlid Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh (see Ṭabarī, III, 669–70, and above, 205, n. 706). That there was deep hostility between ʿAbd al-Malik and his son is shown by the fact that in the Civil War shortly afterwards, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was in Marw with al-Maʾmūn and became one of his commanders (Ṭabarī, III, 772; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 223), whilst his father brought Syria behind al-Amīn.

down with your tongue, whilst rising up against me in your heart? This is your secretary Qumāmah, who is giving information about your secret hatred and the evilness of your intentions, so listen to his words!" ʿAbd al-Malik replied, "He has given you something which he has no competence to provide; it may well turn out that he is unable to slander me and revile me over something which he has not in fact known me to commit."

Qumāmah was then summoned. Al-Rashīd said to him, "Speak out fearlessly and without feeling overawed." Qumāmah said, "I assert that he is bent on acting treacherously towards you and on setting himself up in opposition to you." ʿAbd al-Malik said, "Is it really like that, O Qumāmah?" Qumāmah replied, "Yes, you have planned to deceive the Commander of the Faithful." ʿAbd al-Malik said, "How should he not tell lies about me behind my back, when [690] he slanders me directly to my face?" Al-Rashīd said to him, "This, moreover, is your own son ʿAbd al-Raḥmān who is providing information to me about your disobedience and the evilness of your intentions; if I wanted to adduce against you any argument, I could not find a juster one than (the testimony of) these two persons against you. On what grounds, then, do you reject their accusations against you?" ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ said, "Either he is acting under someone else's orders or else he is an ingrate towards his parents, driven on by an idée fixe [ʿāqq majbūr[806]]. If the first, then he can be excused; but if he is rebellious against his parents, then he is an ungrateful evildoer, whose hostile attitude God, He is magnified and exalted, has mentioned and against whom He has given a warning when he says, 'Among your wives and children, there is an enemy to you, so beware of them.'"[807] He related: Al-Rashīd then arose, at the same time saying, "This affair of yours has now become clear, but I shall not act precipitately until I know what God's good pleasure will be regarding you, for He is the supreme arbiter between you and me." ʿAbd al-Malik replied, "I am satisfied with God as arbiter and with the Commander of the Faithful as judge, for I know that he will prefer the Book of God over his own inclinations and God's command over his own personal satisfaction."[808]

806. Alternatively, one might read with ms. C, majnūn "mentally deranged."
807. Qur'ān, LXIV, 14.
808. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit.; Palmer, 131–3.

He related: Sometime after that, the Caliph held another court session. ʿAbd al-Malik greeted the Caliph with the taslīm when he entered, but the Caliph did not return the salutation. So ʿAbd al-Malik said, "This is not a day for me to indulge in legal pleading or to contend with an adversary or opponent." The Caliph enquired, "Why is that?" He replied, "The opening has not gone according to the Sunnah, hence, I am fearful of its latter part." The Caliph said, "How was that?" ʿAbd al-Malik said, "You didn't return my salutation to you; act in the correct way here, just as the mass of people do." The Caliph said "Peace be upon you!" in conformity with the Sunnah, choosing the just way and using the accepted practice for a greeting, then he turned towards Sulaymān b. Abī Jaʿfar and recited, addressing himself to ʿAbd al-Malik with his words,

I desire his (long) life, but he desires my being killed . . .
(and so on to the end of the verse).[809]

Then he continued, "Well then, by God, it is as if I were looking at a heavy rainstorm (i.e., extensive bloodshed) which has fallen, whose clouds have shown forth lightning flashes; and it is as if I were in the presence of a threat (of punishment) which has kindled [691] a rapidly spreading fire and has then let fall fingerjoints without wrists and heads without necks. So gently, gently (O Hāshimites[810])! For by God, it is through me that the rough ground has been made smooth for you and the turbid waters have become clear for you, and the power of conducting your own affairs has been given to you. So guard yourselves, guard yourselves, before an overwhelming disaster comes down (upon you), striking the ground with its forefeet, galloping with its hindfeet raised in the air!"

ʿAbd al-Malik retorted, "Fear God, O Commander of the Faithful, in regard to the power which He has entrusted to you and in regard to the subjects whom He has asked you to watch over! Do not set ingratitude in the place of thankfulness, or punishment in the place of reward! I have given you disinterested advice and have

809. The second hemistich of this verse, "(this is) your requiter for your friend from Murād," completes the verse allegedly uttered by ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib when he saw his future assassin Ibn Muljam; it is given in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 182, and Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, 90, tr. 96.

810. This vocative phrase added in Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 303 = ed. Pellat, § 2509, and Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

vouchsafed to you sincere obedience. I have strengthened the sacred rights of your royal power with what is firmer than the two bastions [ruknay] of Yalamlam,[811] and I have left your enemy preoccupied with affairs (i.e., and thus unable to attack you). So I adjure you by God not to sever the bonds of kinship with your family, after you have made them close, through suspiciousness, whose calumny the (Holy) Book has made explicit for me,[812] or through the wrongful accusation of an evilwisher which gnaws the flesh and laps up the blood. By God, I have made smooth for you the rough places, and I have made affairs tractable for you, and I have brought together the hearts in people's breasts into obedience of you. Through how many complete nights have I endured hardships on your behalf, and in how many narrow places have I stood firm for you! (I have endured these trials) just as the member of the tribe of Ja'far b. Kilāb has said,[813]

Out of how many a narrow place of battle have I fought a way, with my hand (literally, "fingertips") and my tongue and fierceness in battle!

[692] If the elephant or its driver were to take up their position, they would run swiftly from a battle-place like mine and retreat.[814]

He related: Al-Rashīd said to him, "By God, if it were not for sparing the blood of the Hāshimites, I would cut off your head!"[815]

---

811. Yalamlam was a place in the lowlands of Yemen, mentioned several times by Hamdānī, and described by him, 326, as "the meeting-place of the people of the Tihāmah" (i.e., the rendezvous for the Pilgrims). There is clearly here a reference to some popular proverb about hardness and firmness (the editor here, in n. g, compares it with Maydānī, Majma' amthāl al-'Arab, tr. Freytag, I, 271), strengthening the idea that Yalamlam was also the name of a hill or rock; cf. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 441.

812. I.e., in the Qur'ānic quotation above.

813. I.e., the pre- and early Islamic poet Labīd b. Rabī'ah, as stated specifically in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 183.

814. Dīwān, ed. Brockelmann, text 16, German tr. 29.

815. Jahshiyārī, 211–12; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 513–14; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 303–4 = ed. Pellat, § 2509, giving this story on the authority of Aṣma'ī, who was present at the court session in question; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 181–3; Palmer, 133–4. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, and Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., add that 'Abd al-Malik was then sent back to his prison cell. In the version of this episode in Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 546–7 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 302–4, al-Rashīd repents of his suspicions of 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ.

Zayd b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn al-ʿAlawī has mentioned, saying: When al-Rashīd imprisoned ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ, ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik [al-Khuzāʿī], who was at that moment al-Rashīd's commander of the police guard, came into the Caliph's presence and said, "May I have leave to speak?" He replied, "Speak on!" ʿAbdallāh said, "Nay, by the Almighty God, O Commander of the Faithful, I only know ʿAbd al-Malik as a faithful counsellor; why then have you imprisoned him?" He replied, "Woe upon you! Something reached me about him which disquieted me, and I did not trust him not to stir up dissension between these two sons of mine"—he meant al-Amīn and al-Maʾmūn—"but if you have come to the opinion that we should release him from prison, we will set him free." He said, "Since you have thus imprisoned him, O Commander of the Faithful, I don't think it wise to release him in the immediate future; but I do consider that you should keep him in custody in an honorable fashion, as befits someone of your position imprisoning someone of his status." The Caliph replied, "I will certainly do that." He related: Al-Rashīd then summoned al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ and said, "Go to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ in his prison cell and ask him, 'Think about what you have need of in your prison cell, and then give orders for it, so that it may be arranged for you.'" ʿAbd al-Malik accordingly mentioned his requests and what he sought.[816]

He related: Al-Rashīd said to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ one day, in the course of some conversation he had with him, "You're not descended from Ṣāliḥ!" He enquired, "Who am I descended from, then?" The Caliph said, "From Marwān al-Jaʿdī." He replied, "I don't care which of these two notable warriors is more prominent in my ancestry."[817] Al-Rashīd had him imprisoned in the custody of al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ, and he remained there until al-Rashīd died.

---

816. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 183.

817. Ibid.; Palmer, 134–5. Jahshiyārī, 212, explains that ʿAbd al-Malik's father, Ṣāliḥ, took over a slave girl from Marwān b. Muḥammad, the last Umayyad Caliph, when the latter was killed in Egypt, and she became ʿAbd al-Malik's mother; but some people said that she was at that time pregnant by Marwān, so that ʿAbd al-Malik's real father was the Umayyad. As well as having the by-name of al-Ḥimār "the wild ass," Marwān had the further laqab of al-Jaʿdī from his mawlā Jaʿd b. Dirham, allegedly a pioneer exponent of the doctrine of the createdness of the Qurʾān; see Watt, The formative period of Islamic thought, 242–3, and Madelung, "The origins of the controversy concerning the creation of the Koran," Orientalia hispanica sive studia F. M. Pareja octogenario dicata, I/1, 505–6.

Muḥammad (al-Amīn) then released him and appointed him governor of Syria; he used to have his residence at al-Raqqah. He gave Muḥammad a solemn undertaking and covenant, sworn upon God, that if Muḥammad were killed and he himself were still alive, he would never give his obedience to al-Ma'mūn. But in fact, he died
[693] before Muḥammad,[818] and was buried in one of the buildings of the complex of government headquarters [dār min dūr al-imārah]. When al-Ma'mūn set out with the intention of raiding the Byzantine lands, he sent an order to one of 'Abd al-Malik's sons, "Take your father away from my residence!" Hence, his bones were disinterred and transferred (elsewhere). 'Abd al-Malik had told Muḥammad, "If you are fearful about anything, seek refuge with me, for by God, I will certainly protect you!"[819]

It has been mentioned that one day, al-Rashīd sent to Yaḥyā b. Khālid the following message: "'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ has planned to rebel and to contest with me my royal authority, and you are fully aware of this. So tell me everything you know about him (or, about the affair), for if you are completely frank with me, I will restore you to your former elevated state." He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, I have not learned anything of that sort about 'Abd al-Malik, and if I had learned something (and had not informed you), then I would have become his confederate to the exclusion of my loyalty to you.[820] For your royal authority has been my royal authority and your power my power, and the good and bad elements in it have been my responsibility and attributable to me. How then, can it be possible for 'Abd al-Malik to have designs on the power with my assistance? Moreover, if I did do that on his behalf, could he do more for me than you yourself have done? I beg you to seek refuge in God from harboring this sort of suspicion about me! It is simply that he is a patient and forbearing man, and it gives me joy that there should be a person like him in your family. You appointed him to office because you admired his conduct (or: his way of thinking, madhhabihi), and you showed 818. According to Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 437 = ed. Pellat, § 2644, in 197 (812–13), but according to Ṭabarī, III, 846, and Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 259, in 196 (811–12).

819. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 183.

820. 'Abd al-Malik is mentioned as having close relations with Ja'far (Jahshiyārī, 167–8), but not with Yaḥyā.

him favor because of his learning and his patience and forbearingness."[821]

He related: When the messenger went back to al-Rashīd with this reply, al-Rashīd sent a further message to him with the threat, "Unless you affirm as being true these intentions of his, I shall kill your son al-Faḍl."[822] He told him, "You have complete authority over us, so do what you will—but with the proviso that if there is anything in this accusation, then the fault is mine, so how can al-Faḍl come into it?" The messenger said to al-Faḍl, "Arise, for I must execute the Commander of the Faithful's orders regarding you." Al-Faḍl was certain that al-Rashīd was about to have him killed. So he bade farewell to his father and said, "Are you displeased with me?" He replied, "On the contrary, I am indeed pleased, and God is pleased with you." Al-Rashīd then kept them apart from each other for three days, but when he was unable to find any substance for his accusations against Yaḥyā, he brought them together again as they had been before.[823]

Meanwhile, there kept coming to them from al-Rashīd messages couched in the harshest possible terms, because the Barmakīs' enemies were carrying slanderous accusations concerning them to al-Rashīd about the affair. When Masrūr took al-Faḍl's hand for the purpose which he had informed him about (i.e., to kill him), Yaḥyā was carried away by distress, and he blurted out what [694] was in his mind, telling Masrūr, "Say to the Caliph, 'Your own son will be killed just like al-Faḍl.'" Masrūr related: When al-Rashīd's anger abated, he said, "How did Yaḥyā express himself?" I then repeated the words to him. He commented, "By God, I have become fearful at his words, because Yaḥyā has rarely told me anything without my (ultimately) experiencing its full import."[824]

It has been related that al-Rashīd was once engaged on a journey,

821. Jahshiyārī, 212, mentions 'Abd al-Malik's eloquence, gravity, and high seriousness; his asceticism in refraining from wine-drinking, contrasted with al-Rashīd's bibulousness and hedonism, emerges from the anecdote in ibid., 166–7, and from the fact of al-Rashīd's normal exclusion of 'Abd al-Malik from the circle of his boon-companions.

822. The Cairo text, VIII, 306, has for this last phrase, "you will bring about the death of your son."

823. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 183–4; Palmer, 135–6; Bouvat, 97.

824. Jahshiyārī, 204; Palmer, 101.

with ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ in his travelling retinue, when a hidden voice [hātif][825] suddenly cried out to him from the unseen, at a precise moment when he was rising in ʿAbd al-Malik's company, and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, bring low his pride in his noble qualities,[826] tighten the bridle on him and make the bits firm in his mouth, for unless you do these things, he will make his region disaffected against you." Al-Rashīd turned to ʿAbd al-Malik and asked, "What do you say this is, O ʿAbd al-Malik?" The latter replied, "(It is) the speech of a person seeking to injure me and the insinuation of an envious one." Hārūn said to him, "You have spoken truly. These people are of inferior worth, and you have risen above them in eminence; they have remained behind, and you have pressed ahead of them until your outstripping them all has become apparent. Hence, these others have had to renounce the attempt to come up to your level, so that in their breasts are the burning brands of second-rateness and the feelings of uneasiness in their hearts over their own inferiority." ʿAbd al-Malik said, "May God not extinguish them (i.e., their self-torturing feelings) and may He kindle their flames against themselves until they bring them continuous and perpetual grief!"

Al-Rashīd said to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ when they had passed by Manbij, where ʿAbd al-Malik's residence and seat of power [mustaqarr] was, "Is this your dwelling?" ʿAbd al-Malik replied, "It is yours, O Commander of the Faithful, and then mine through your favor!" Al-Rashīd said, "What is the dwelling like?" He replied, "Not as fine as the edifice of my kinsfolk (i.e., al-Rashīd's own one), but superior to the rest of the dwellings of Manbij." Al-Rashīd said, "What are the nights like at Manbij?" ʿAbd al-Malik replied, "Like permanent dawn!"[827]

Al-Qāsim's Raid into the Byzantine Lands

In this year, al-Qāsim b. al-Rashīd entered the Byzantine lands in the month of Shaʿbān (July–August, 803). He halted before Qur-

825. On the hātif, see Fahd, 170–1, and idem, *EI*² s.v.

826. The Cairo text, loc. cit., has ishrāfihi "his eagerness, keenness" for the Leiden text's ashrāfihi.

827. Balādhurī, 132; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 205–6; cf. Kennedy, 75, noting the very extensive Syrian properties acquired by Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī. According to Balādhurī, loc. cit., ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ erected extensive buildings at Manbij when he arrived there as governor in 173 (789–90).

rah[828] and then laid siege to it, and he sent forward al-ʿAbbās b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, who then halted before the fortress of Sinān,[829] and they made strenuous attacks. The Byzantines sent messages to him offering to hand over 320 Muslim captives if he would depart from them. He agreed to these terms, and fell back from Qurrah and the fortress of Sinān according to the terms of the peace treaty.[830] ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā[831] died on this raid into the Byzantine lands whilst accompanying al-Qāsim.[832] [695]

In this year, the Byzantine Emperor broke the peace agreement concluded between his predecessor and the Muslims and withheld the tribute which the preceding monarch had undertaken to pay the Muslims.

The Correspondence between the Byzantine Emperor Nicephorus and al-Rashīd on the Occasion of the Former's Breaking the Peace Agreement, and the Caliph's Punitive Measures against the Byzantines

The reason for the Byzantines' breaking that peace agreement was that there had been a peace agreement in operation between the Muslims and the ruler of Byzantium, their ruler being at that time Irene [Rīnī] (we have already mentioned previously the occasion of the peace agreement which existed between her [or, between the Byzantines, al-Rūm] and the Muslims). Then the Byzantines turned on Irene and deposed her, and raised to power in her place Nicephorus [Niqfūr].[833] The Byzantines mention that this Nice-

828. A fortress of Cappadocia, in the district of the Maṭāmīr (see Ṭabarī, III, 646, above, 165–66, and n. 603), classical Koron, possibly to be identified with the modern Turkish village Küre; see Honigmann, 45, 47.

829. Unidentified, cf. Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 742. n. 139.

830. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 734; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 512, 522.

831. Son of the excluded heir to the caliphate after al-Manṣūr, ʿIsā b. Mūsā, and at an earlier date governor of Medina.

832. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 184; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 742.

833. Niqfūr b. Istabrāq "son of Stauracius," as Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 337 = ed. Pellat, § 757, calls him; in fact, Stauracius was Nicephorus's son, whom Nicephorus made Co-Emperor in 803 and who was briefly his successor in 811. See Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 352 = ed. Pellat, § 770; Vasiliev, I, 271; Anastos, in Cambridge medieval history, IV/1, 91, 95–6.

phorus was a descendant of Jafnah of the house of Ghassān[834] and that, before achieving royal power, he had been in charge of the exchequer. Then, five months after the Byzantines had deposed her, Irene died. It has been mentioned that when Nicephorus had achieved royal power and had received the obedience of all the Byzantines, he wrote to al-Rashīd thus:

From Nicephorus, ruler of the Byzantines, to Hārūn, ruler of the Arabs. As follows: The queen who was my predecessor set you up in the position of a rook (i.e., in chess), and herself as merely a pawn, and she paid over to you from her treasuries the amount whose equivalent you should by right have handed over to her; but that (arose from) the weakness and deficient sense of women. Now, when you have perused my letter, send back what you received of the money which she sent, and ransom yourself by (disgorging) what you are receiving by means of exaction; if not, then the sword will inevitably be set between us!

He related: When al-Rashīd read the letter, violent anger took hold of him, so that there was no one who dared to look at him, much less speak to him. His boon-companions dispersed, fearful lest they let slip any further words or actions. The vizier's power of judgement was too paralyzed either for him to offer the Caliph any advice or to leave him to make up his own mind unilaterally. The Caliph then sent for an inkstand and wrote on the back of the letter, [696] In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, from Hārūn the Commander of the Faithful to Nicephorus the dog of the Byzantines: O son of an infidel woman, I have read your letter, and the reply is what you will see, without you having to hear it. Farewell![835]

Then he set off immediately and travelled on until he halted before the gates of Heraclia,[836] and then captured it; he took plunder, he selected the best items for himself, he slaughtered

834. Jafnah b. 'Amr b. Muzayqiyā' being regarded as the founder in pre-Islamic times of the royal house of the Ghassānid Arab chiefs in southern Syria. See Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 99; Nöldeke, "Die ghassânidischen Fürsten aus dem Hause Gafna's," AKAk. Berlin (1887), Abt. II, 5–6.

835. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVII, 44 = ed. Cairo, XVIII, 239; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 337 = ed. Pellat, § 757; K. al-'Uyūn, 309–10; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 184–5; Palmer, 75–6; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 742–3.

836. Arabic Hiraqlah, a fortress on the frontier between the Arabs and the Byzan-people, he destroyed, he burnt and he extirpated. Hence, Nicephorus sought to make peace, on the basis of an annual tribute, and al-Rashīd agreed to this. When he returned from this expedition of his, and reached al-Raqqah, Nicephorus broke the agreement and went back on the covenant. The weather was extremely cold; hence Nicephorus was confident that al-Rashīd would be unable to march back against him. The news arrived of Nicephorus's reneging on his undertaking, but no one was disposed to inform al-Rashīd about this out of solicitude for his feelings and for themselves (at the thought of) returning at a time like that. So a subterfuge was employed to let him know, through the agency of a poet from the people of Juddah[837] called Abū Muḥammad ʿAbdallāh b. Yūsuf, or, it is said, called al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf al-Taymī.[838] He recited, Nicephorus has broken the agreement which he gave to you and the strokes of destruction are already hovering round him.

Convey glad tidings to the Commander of the Faithful, for it is indeed an occasion for great plunder which God has brought you!
The people have announced to each other with joy that an envoy and messenger has arrived with (the news of) the breaking of the agreement,
And they have become hopeful that your right hand will speedily launch an expedition which will reanimate souls and whose place of battle (or, whose lofty fame) will be long remembered.
He paid over to you his stipulated tribute and lowered his cheek (i.e., was humble and submissive) tines in southwestern Anatolia, the modern Eregli. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 398–9; Le Strange, Lands, 149; *EI*² s.v. Ereğli (J. H. Mordtmann-F. Taeschner).

---

837. Text J.n.dah, but the reading of the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXII, is followed here in the light of Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVII, 45, 47 = ed. Cairo, XVIII, 240, 244, which has Juddah and the information that Abū Muḥammad was a poet of Mecca who used to live at Juddah on the Red Sea coast. Jandah indeed exists as a place in the Sawād of Iraq between al-Nīl and al-Nuʿmāniyyah; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 170. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 185, has min ahl jundihi "from among his troops."

838. Also thus in Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; but the editor of the Leiden text, n. d, conjectures, in the light of the section in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVIII, 115–25 = ed. Cairo, XX, 44–60, that the correct form should be Abū Muḥammad ʿAbdallāh b. Ayyūb al-Taymī, a poet subsequently known as the eulogist of al-Amīn and al-Maʾmūn; see Ziriklī, Aʿlām, IV, 199.

out of caution against the sharp-edged swords,[839] for death is a thing feared,
So you gave him protection against their onslaught, and it was as if they were in our hands firebrands of a conflagration flying upwards!
[697] And you sent back, with your power, the armies, returning homewards from him, for the person to whom you grant protection is secure and happy.
O Nicephorus, when you act treacherously because the Imām has become absent, you are foolish and deluded!
At the time when you played the traitor, did you imagine that you would escape?
May your mother lose you, her son! What you imagined is pure delusion.
Your destruction has hurled you into the swollen waters of its sea, and swiftly running horses have hastened against you from the Imām.
Certainly, the Imām has the superior force to constrain you, whether your lands be near at hand or far away.
Even though we may be heedless, the Imām is not neglectful of what he rules over and directs with his firm management.
A ruler who has devoted himself whole-heartedly to the holy war, hence his enemies are always destined to be overcome by him.
O you who desire God's approbation through your efforts, the secrets of men's hearts are never hidden from God!
No counsel is ever of use from a person who gives false advice to his Imām, but counsel from sincere advisers to him always merits thanks.
Good counsel to the Imām is an obligation on mankind, and for those fulfilling this obligation, a means of expiation and an act of cleansing.[840]

---

839. Following the vocalization of the Cairo text, VIII, 308, ḥadhara al-ṣawārimi.

840. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVII, 45 = ed. Cairo, XVIII, 241–2, and Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 338–40 = ed. Pellat, § 759, give extended texts of the poem, whilst K. al-'Uyūn, 310, and Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 186, have odd verses of it.

Abū al-ʿAtāhiyah Ismāʿīl b. al-Qāsim says concerning this expedition,

O Imām of right guidance, you have become completely concerned with religion, and you have supplied every person asking for rain with plentiful moisture (i.e., have supplied every seeker after bounty with munificence).
You have two names, derived from right direction and divine guidance, for you are the one who is called "rightly directed" [rashīd] and "divinely guided" [mahdī].[841]
Whenever you become angered at something, it becomes an object exciting the ire of all;
but if you are pleased with something, it becomes an object of general approbation.
For our benefit, you have extended the hand of noble acts over East and West, and you have thereby enriched both the dweller in the East and the dweller in the West.
You have embellished the face of the earth with munificence and liberality, so that the face of the earth has become adorned through copious rain (i.e., with gifts and presents).
God has decreed that Hārūn's royal power has become clear and bright, [698] and God's decree is something which is always accomplished among His creation.
The whole earth has flowed with compliance to Hārūn, and Nicephorus has accordingly become bound in a relationship of submission and inferiority [dhimmiyyā] to Hārūn.[842]

Al-Taymī also said,

The cords of death attached themselves to Nicephorus, mockingly,

841. I.e., from his name ". . . b. al-Mahdī."

842. Abū al-ʿAtāhiyah, ashʿāruhu wa-akhbāruhu, 674–5, no. 296; Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 337–8 = ed. Pellat, § 758; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVII, 45 = ed. Cairo, XVIII, 240.

when they saw that he had trifled unconcernedly with the lion's covert.
For he who visits the lion's covert will inevitably experience fear, even if he escapes its fangs and its deep-piercing claw.
He behaved falsely over his covenants, and whoever breaks these has split up and dissolved his own self and not his enemies.
The Imām, whose acts of munificence are hoped for, has made him taste the fruits of the strength of purpose which he (i.e., the Imām) inherited,
And he has gone back on his state of friendliness (i.e., with Nicephorus) after his wives became bent down and enfeebled, weeping over him with dishevelled hair.

When he had finished declaiming this, al-Rashīd exclaimed, "Has Nicephorus done this, then?" and he realized that his ministers had used a stratagem with him over that. He turned round in a state of great heaviness of heart and strong feeling of troubledness, until he halted before his (i.e., Nicephorus's) territory (literally, "his courtyard," finā'ihi), and did not depart until he was satisfied and had achieved his aim.[843] Abū al-'Atāhiyah has said,

Has not Heraclia announced publicly its own destruction, at the hands of a monarch who is divinely favored with the correct mode of action?
Hārūn thunders with threats of approaching death, and hurls lightning with trenchant deeds of violence.
[699] How many banners, in which victory is always inherent, pass along (through the air) like wisps of cloud!
O Commander of the Faithful, you have gained the victory, so feel secure, and rejoice at the booty gained and the prospect of returning home![844]

---

843. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 337–52 = ed. Pellat, §§ 757–69; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVII, 44–8 = ed. Cairo, XVIII, 239–46; K. al-'Uyūn, 309–10; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 185–6; Palmer, 76–8; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 743–4; Canard, in Cambridge medieval history, IV/1, 707.

844. Abū al-'Atāhiyah, ash'āruhu wa-akhbāruhu, 491–3; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 350–1 = ed. Pellat, § 768, and Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVII, 46 = ed. Cairo, XVIII, 242, both adding further poetry on this occasion of al-Rashīd's Heraclia campaign.

In this year, according to what al-Wāqidī says, Ibrāhīm b. ʿUthmān b. Nahīk was killed; but as for the other authorities, they place it in the year 188 (803–4).[845]

Al-Rashīd's Killing of Ibrāhīm b. ʿUthmān b. Nahīk

It has been mentioned from Ṣāliḥ al-Aʿmā, who lived in proximity to Ibrāhīm b. ʿUthmān, that he said: Ibrāhīm b. ʿUthmān used often to mention Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā and the Barmakīs, and would weep profusely out of grief over them and love for them, to an extent that he passed beyond the stage of weeping for them and arrived at the stage of those who seek vengeance and who nurse inveterate hatred. When he was alone with his slave girls and drank wine, and the nabīdh brought him into a state of intoxication, he would say, "O slave, (bring me) my sword Dhū al-Maniyyah"—he had named his sword Dhū al-Maniyyah (literally, "bearer of death")—and his slave would then bring him the sword, and he would unsheathe it and then say, "Alas for Jaʿfar! Alas for my master! By God, I will certainly kill your slayer and take vengeance for your blood in the near future!" When these actions of his had been repeated several times, Ibrāhīm's son ʿUthmān went to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ and informed him about Ibrāhīm's words. Al-Faḍl went in and told al-Rashīd. The latter said, "Bring him (i.e., ʿUthmān) in!" So ʿUthmān came in, and al-Rashīd said, "What's this al-Faḍl has related from you?" So ʿUthmān informed him about what his father had said and done. Al-Rashīd said to him, "Did anyone else who was with you hear these words?" He replied, "Yes, his eunuch Nawāl." So he secretly summoned Ibrāhīm's slave and interrogated him. The latter replied, "He has said that more than once, indeed, more than twice." Al-Rashīd said, "It would not be lawful for me to kill one of my own retainers on the word of a youth and a eunuch; the two of them may have conspired together to say this because of the son's eagerness to gain his father's privileged rank and status (i.e., in the Caliph's confidence) and because of the slave's hostility engendered by lengthy contact and service (i.e., from disillusion-

845. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 734, Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522–3, and Ibn al-Athīr, 186–7, all place this event in the year 187 (803).

ment or weariness with his master]";[846] hence, he dropped the matter for a few days.

Then he decided to put Ibrāhīm b. ʿUthmān to the trial by means of a test which would dispel the doubt from his heart and the suspicious thoughts from his mind. Hence, he summoned al-Faḍl [700] b. al-Rabīʿ and said, "I intend to put Ibrāhīm b. ʿUthmān to the test regarding the accusation which his son has brought against him. So when the spread of food is removed, call for wine and tell him, 'Respond to the Commander of the Faithful's invitation, for he wants you as his companion because of the elevated position which you enjoy with him.' Then when he drinks wine, slip away, and leave me and him alone together." Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ did that; Ibrāhīm sat down to drink wine, and then sprang up when al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ got up to go, but al-Rashīd told him, "Stay in your place, O Ibrāhīm!" so he sat down again.

Now when Ibrāhīm's mind became set at rest, al-Rashīd made a sign to his slaves, and they withdrew from his presence. Al-Rashīd then said, "O Ibrāhīm, how are you, and what are your innermost thoughts?" He replied, "O my master, I am merely like the most devoted of your slaves and the most dutiful of your servants." Al-Rashīd said, "There is a matter within my mind which I would like to entrust to your keeping; my breast has become straitened because of it and I have been kept awake by it at night." Ibrāhīm replied, "O my master, in that case, it will never go back to you again from me (i.e., I will never refer to it again), and I will conceal it from my own person lest it let it out, and from my inner self lest it divulge it abroad." Al-Rashīd said, "Good for you! I have repented violently of my killing Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā to an extent that I cannot easily describe. I would like to abandon my royal power, and I wish he were still alive with me, for I have never experienced the savor of sleep since I parted from him nor the sweetness of life since I killed him." He related: When Ibrāhīm heard this, he shed profuse tears and wept copiously and said, "May God have mercy on Abū al-Faḍl (i.e., Jaʿfar) and forgive his offences! By God, you erred, O my master, in killing him, and you were led into a dubious affair regarding him! Where in the whole world is his like to be found? He was the nonpareil among the entire people in regard to piety!" But al-Rashīd thereupon said, "Arise now, may God's curse be upon you, O son of a stinking, uncircumcised whore!" He arose, hardly conscious where he was treading.

846. Cf. on such motives, Ayalon, "On the eunuchs in Islam," 80.

Then he went off to his mother and said to her, "O mother, by [701] God, I have as good as lost my life!" She replied, "Surely not, if God wills; how is that, my dear son?" He said, "The reason for that is that al-Rashīd put me to a test; by God, if I had a thousand lives, I would not escape with one of them!" And indeed, only a few nights passed between this event and his son's coming to him and hacking him with his sword until he died.[847]

In this year, ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī led the Pilgrimage.[848]

---

847. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 734; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522–3; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 186–7; Palmer, 105–6; Bouvat, 96. There is a garbled reference to this episode in Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 592 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 367.

848. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 189; but according to Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38, al-Rashīd himself led the Pilgrimage this year.

The Events of the Year 188

(December 20, 803–December 7, 804)

Among the events taking place during this year was Ibrāhīm b. Jibrīl's leading the summer expedition and his invading the Byzantine lands by the pass [darb] of al-Ṣafṣāf. Nicephorus marched out to confront him, but some event took place at his rear which deflected him from encountering Ibrāhīm. Hence, he turned back, but came into contact with a Muslim force; he suffered three wounds personally and was put to flight. According to what has been mentioned, 40,700 of the Byzantine troops were killed and 4,000 riding beasts captured.[849]

In this year, al-Qāsim b. al-Rashīd stationed himself ready for frontier warfare [rābaṭa][850] at Dābiq.[851]

In this year, al-Rashīd led the Pilgrimage. He made his way there 849. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 735.

850. See for this term, Balādhurī, Glossarium, 42.

851. Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 744. According to Dīnawarī, 391, al-Qāsim was made governor of Syria in this year. On Dābiq, situated to the north of Aleppo and famed as a concentration point for ghāzīs and troops marching against the Greeks, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 416–17; Le Strange, Palestine, 426, 503; Canard, H'amdânides, 225; EI[2] s.v. (Sourdel).

(i.e., to Mecca), via Medina, and gave its inhabitants half a full pay allotment [niṣf al-ʿaṭāʾ]. This Pilgrimage was the last one undertaken by al-Rashīd, according to what al-Wāqidī and other authorities assert.[852]

852. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit., adding that this was the last occasion when any Caliph made the Pilgrimage; Dīnawarī, loc. cit., with details of al-Rashīd's return via Qaṣr al-Luṣūṣ to Baghdad and al-Raqqah; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 301–2 = ed. Pellat, § 2507. Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ was in charge of the arrangements for this Pilgrimage, according to Jahshiyārī, 218.

The Events of the Year 189

(December 8, 804–November 26, 805)

Among the events taking place during this year was the Commander of the Faithful Hārūn al-Rashīd's setting off for al-Rayy.[853]

[702]

Al-Rashīd's Journeying to al-Rayy in Order to Investigate Complaints against the Governor of Khurāsān, ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān, and His Confirmation of ʿAlī in Office

It has been mentioned that al-Rashīd had sought Yaḥyā b. Khālid's advice regarding the appointment to the governorship of Khurāsān of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān, and Yaḥyā had advised him not to do it. But al-Rashīd rejected his advice over this plan of his, and appointed ʿAlī as governor over Khurāsān. When ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā went off to Khurāsān, he tyrannized over its people and treated them harshly. He gathered together an immense sum of money, and out of it sent to Hārūn presents, including horses, slaves, clothing, musk, and wealth, whose like had never been seen before.[854]

853. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 514; Dīnawarī, loc. cit.; Azdī, 307; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 191–2.

Hārūn was seated on an elevated bench [dukkān murtafi'] at al-Shammāsiyyah[855] when what 'Alī had sent to him arrived. Those presents were brought in and were spread out before him; they appeared as a splendid sight in his eyes, and he was impressed by their great value. At that precise moment, Yaḥyā b. Khālid was at al-Rashīd's side, and the latter said to him, "O Abū 'Alī, this is the person whom you advised us not to appoint as governor over this frontier region, but we rejected your advice concerning him and a blessing has come out of opposing your advice! (He was speaking to him, as it were, jestingly at the moment.) You may now see what has been the result of our judgment regarding him, and how little would have resulted from your opinion!"

Yaḥyā replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, may God make me your ransom! Even if I might have liked to have been correct in my judgment, and guided towards what was right in my advice, I much prefer the Commander of the Faithful's judgment to be superior, his foresight more penetrating, his learning greater than my learning, and his intuitive knowledge on a higher level than mine. How excellent this (i.e., the array of 'Alī b. 'Īsā's presents) is and how extensive it is, if it were not that there lay behind it what the Commander of the Faithful would abhor and what I pray God to preserve him and keep him safe from its evil consequences and unpleasant results!" Al-Rashīd said, "And what is that?" So Yaḥyā told him, saying, "That is because I believe that these presents cannot have been gathered together for 'Alī b. 'Īsā without his having oppressed the leading members of the community [al-ashrāf] and without his having taken the greater part of them by tyranny and wrongdoing; and were the Commander of the Faithful [703] to command me, I could immediately bring to him double the 854. These presents are described in great detail in Abū al-Faḍl Bayhaqī, Ta'rīkh-i Mas'ūdī, 417. Shaban, 37–8, regards 'Alī b. 'Īsā's fiscal policies in Khurāsān as a deliberate attempt to reverse the Barmakīs' advantageous financial treatment of the eastern provinces.

855. The quarter of East Baghdad lying to the northeast of al-Ruṣāfah; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 199–216; presumably, the Caliph was at this time in one of the palaces there which had belonged to the Barmakīs; see ibid., 200–1.

amount from a certain merchant (or, from certain merchants) of al-Karkh."[856]

Al-Rashīd said, "How is that?" Yaḥyā replied, "We recently bargained with ʿAwn[857] over a casket which he brought to us full of jewels; we offered him seven million (dirhams) but he refused to sell it. I can now send to him immediately my chamberlain, who will order him to send the casket back to us so that we might examine it afresh; then when he brings it back, we can deny ever having received it, and we will thereby gain seven million (dirhams). Then we can follow the same procedure with two others of the leading merchants. For this will be safer in regard to its consequences and a more discreet procedure than ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's dealings over these presents with their original owners. Thus, I shall gather together for the Commander of the Faithful, in three hours, more than the value of these presents, with less effort, a simpler procedure and a more suitable way of levying taxation[858] than what ʿAlī has gathered together in three years."[859] This made a profound impression on al-Rashīd's mind; he kept it in his memory and refrained from mentioning ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā in Yaḥyā's presence.

Now when ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā had wrought damage in Khurāsān, persecuted the leading figures there, seized their wealth, and treated the menfolk there with contempt, a group of the prominent men and leaders of Khurāsān wrote to al-Rashīd, and a group from the various regions of Khurāsān wrote to their kinsfolk and friends[860] complaining about ʿAlī's evil conduct, his corrupt way of life, and the viciousness of his behavior, and asking the Commander of the Faithful to change him in the governorship of Khurāsān for any other of his competent officials, aides, supporters of the ʿAbbāsid régime, or military commanders whom he wished. So al-Rashīd summoned Yaḥyā b. Khālid and sought his advice regarding the case of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā and the matter of his dismissal, saying, "Advise

856. The district of Baghdad to the south of the Round City, with an existence of its own (as its name, of Aramaic origin, "fortified town," indicates) in pre-ʿAbbāsid times. See EI[2] s.v. (Streck-Lassner).

857. Clearly a well-known merchant and jeweller of Baghdad.

858. Or possibly: "a way of levying taxation which gives a greater yield" (ajmal jibāyat[in]).

859. Cf. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 470.

860. Presumably, to members of the Abnāʾ al-Dawlah now settled in Baghdad who retained their Khurāsānian connections.

me in the choice of a man whom you can approve as governor of that frontier region, who will set right the corruption which this evildoer has wrought and repair the breaches which he has made." Yaḥyā accordingly recommended the appointment of Yazīd b. Mazyad; but al-Rashīd did not accept his advice.[861]

Someone had reported to al-Rashīd that ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā was contemplating rebellion against him. Because of this, al-Rashīd set out for al-Rayy as soon as he had got back from Mecca. He encamped at al-Nahrawān on the seventeenth of Jumādā I (April 21, 805), having with him his two sons ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn and al-Qāsim. Then he journeyed towards al-Rayy. When he reached Qarmāsīn, he had sent to him a group of judges and others, and he made them bear witness that everything belonging to him in that army encampment of his, comprising money, treasuries, weapons, horses, and so forth, was to go to ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn, and he himself was to retain no share in it whatsoever, great or small. He also renewed the oath of allegiance to al-Maʾmūn by those accompanying him. He despatched the commander of his guard, Harthamah b. Aʿyan, to Baghdad, and he had Muḥammad b. Hārūn al-Rashīd and those in his court circle once again give their oath of allegiance to ʿAbdallāh and al-Qāsim; and he laid the responsibility for dealing with al-Qāsim, whether he was to be removed from the succession or confirmed in it, on ʿAbdallāh when the caliphate should pass to him.[862] [704]

Then, when Harthamah had got back to him, al-Rashīd proceeded to al-Rayy. He stayed there about four months, until ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā came to him from Khurāsān bringing wealth, presents, and precious and rare items, comprising furnishings, musk, jewels, gold and silver vessels, weapons, and riding-beasts;[863] and after all that, he gave presents to the whole of those who had accompanied al-Rashīd, including his children, the members of his family, his secretaries, his eunuchs and his military commanders, according to their status at court and their official positions. Al-Rashīd saw, 861. Abū al-Faḍl Bayhaqī, Taʾrīkh-i Masʿūdī, 418–20; cf. Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr., loc. cit.

862. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 191; cf. Gabrieli, "Successione," 349, 353.

863. According to Qāḍī Ibn al-Zubayr, 19, § 25, these amounted to thirty million dīnārs' worth.

from ʿAlī's actions here, the reverse of what he had suspected of him and the opposite of what had been said about him. He therefore showed his approval of ʿAlī and sent him back to Khurāsān. ʿAlī set out, with the Caliph at the same time accompanying him (i.e., on the initial stage of his journey, as a mark of respect and commendation).[864]

It has been mentioned that the oath of allegiance was taken to al-Ma'mūn and to al-Qāsim as successor to the throne after his two brothers Muḥammad and ʿAbdallāh, and al-Qāsim given the honorific of al-Mu'taman, when Hārūn despatched Harthamah to the City of Peace for that purpose, on Saturday, the eleventh of Rajab of this year (June 13, 805).[865] Concerning this event, al-Ḥasan b. Hāni'[866] has written,

May the One who directs affairs through His knowledge be extolled, and may He make Hārūn superior to all other Caliphs!
[705] We remain in a fortunate state whilst ever we retain the fear of God in our hearts, and whilst ever the father of trusted ones[867] directs our earthly affairs.[868]

Al-Rashīd Receives the Allegiance of the Local Rulers of the Caspian Provinces and Daylam, and Appoints Various Governors in Western Persia and Eastern Arabia

In this year, when al-Rashīd went to al-Rayy, he sent the eunuch Ḥusayn[869] to Ṭabaristān. He wrote out for him three letters, comprising a letter containing a guarantee of safe-conduct for Sharwīn,[870] the father of Qārin; a second one containing a guarantee of 864. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Palmer, 109; Kennedy, 130.

---

865. Actually a Friday.

866. I.e., Abū Nuwās.

867. Abū al-umanā', with paronomasia on the names al-Ma'mūn, al-Amīn and al-Mu'taman, all derived from the verb amina "to be secure, safe."

868. Dīwān, I, ed. Wagner, 120.

869. Again, the role of eunuchs as confidential envoys is notable; cf. also Ṭabarī, III, 716, 720–1 (below, 272, 278).

870. Ispahbadh or Prince of the Bāwandid family; see *EI*² s.v. Bāwand (R. N. Frye).

safe-conduct for Windā(d)hurmuz,[871] Māzyār's grandfather; and a third one containing a guarantee of safe-conduct for Marzubān b. Justān,[872] the ruler of Daylam. The latter came to al-Rashīd, and the Caliph gave him presents and robes of honor, and sent him back home.[873] Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī came to him with four hundred stout warriors from Ṭabaristān, who then became converts to Islam at al-Rashīd's hands. Windā(d)hurmuz came forward and accepted the Caliph's guarantee, and undertook in return to give full obedience and to pay tribute, and undertook on Sharwīn's behalf a similar obligation. Al-Rashīd accepted this from him and sent him back home. He sent Harthamah to accompany him, and Harthamah took Windā(d)hurmuz's son and Sharwīn's son as a pledge for good behavior.[874] Khuzaymah b. Khāzim, the governor of Armenia, also came to his court at al-Rayy and offered (to him) numerous presents.

In this year, Hārūn appointed 'Abdallāh b. Mālik governor of Ṭabaristān, al-Rayy, al-Rūyān, Dunbāwand, Qūmis and Hamadhān.[875] Abū al-'Atāhiyah has recited concerning this expedition of Hārūn's (Hārūn had been born at al-Rayy), Piety has deflected the faithful trustee of God over His creation towards his own birthplace,

So that he might bring order to al-Rayy and its dependent regions, and that he might shower down on them beneficence from his hand.[876]

Whilst en route, Hārūn gave Muḥammad b. al-Junayd charge of the road connecting Hamadhān and al-Rayy. He also appointed [706]

871. Corruptly written in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 514, as Bundā (perhaps for Bundādh, the New Persian form of Windād) Hurmuz. For this ancient Iranian name, see above, n. 53, and for Windādhurmuz's family, *EI*² s.v. Ḳārinids (M. Rekaya).

872. On this Daylamī family of princes, the Justānids or Jastānids, see Aḥmad Kasrawī, Shahriyārān-i gumnām, 22–34; Madelung, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 208, 223.

873. Azdī, 307.

874. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Faqīh, Mukhtaṣar Kitāb al-Buldān, 304; Ibn Isfandiyār, tr. 141–3; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 191–2.

875. Azdī, 307.

876. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 193–4. I have not been able to find these verses in the printed edition of the Dīwān.

ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān[877] as governor of ʿUmān, and the latter crossed the sea in the vicinity of Jazīrat Ibn Kāwān,[878] capturing one fortress there and besieging another. Ibn Makhlad al-Azdī[879] suddenly attacked him, using deceit and trickery, but ʿĪsā captured him and brought him back to ʿUmān in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (November, 805).

Al-Rashīd's Return to Iraq

A few days after ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's departure from Khurāsān, al-Rashīd set off from al-Rayy. The time of the Festival of Sacrifice [al-aḍḥā] came round when he reached Qaṣr al-Luṣūṣ,[880] so he performed the rites of the Festival there, entering the City of Peace on Monday, the twenty-seventh of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (November 24, 805). When he passed by the bridge, he ordered the corpse of Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā to be burnt.[881] He passed through Baghdad, but did not stay there and left immediately, heading for al-Raqqah, halting for the night at al-Saylaḥūn.[882]

It has been mentioned from one of al-Rashīd's military commanders that, when he came to Baghdad, al-Rashīd said, "By God, I am passing through a city, and no city more secure or with greater ease of life than it has ever been constructed in East or West. For it is indeed my home, the home of my forefathers and the ʿAbbāsids' center of power whilst ever they endure and keep close control of it. None of my forefathers has ever experienced there any evil or ill-fortune from it, and none of them has ever been injured or wronged there. What an excellent seat of power it is! But I am

877. Great-grandson of ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh, hence, a second cousin once removed of al-Rashīd.

878. I.e., the island of Qishm adjacent to the Straits of Hurmuz (see *EI*² s.v. [J. B. Kelly]), this form of its name apparently being a corruption of the Iranian name Abarkāvān. See Le Strange, Lands, 261; Bosworth, in A. J. Cottrell et alii (eds.), The Persian Gulf states, a general survey, Baltimore and London 1980, p. xxiii.

879. Presumably, a descendant of the Makhlad b. al-Ḥasan al-Azdī mentioned as being in Khurāsān in 129 (746–7), see Ṭabarī, II, 1767.

880. I.e., the town of Kangawār in Jibāl. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 363–4; Le Strange, Lands, 188–9; *EI*² s.v. Kinkiwar (R. M. Savory).

881. See Ṭabarī, III, 683 (above, 223).

882. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; Dīnawarī, 391; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 192. Al-Saylaḥūn was a place near al-Ḥīrah and al-Qādisiyyah, mentioned in the accounts of the Arab conquests of Iran. See Balādhurī, 246, 250; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 298–9.

going off now to install myself in a region of people of dissension and hypocrisy, who hate the Imāms of divine guidance and who love the accursed tree, the Umayyads, in addition to the religious deviants, the brigands and those who terrorize the roads there.[883] If it were not for that, I would never leave Baghdad or set foot outside it as long as I lived."[884] Al-Abbās b. Aḥnaf[885] has said concerning al-Rashīd's rapid passage through Baghdad,

We only halted in order to depart, hence were making no clear distinction between halting and departing.
They asked us how we were when we arrived, and we then coupled together simultaneously our saying farewell to them with the questioning.[886]

In this year, there took place an exchange of captives between the Muslims and the Byzantines. As a result, according to what has been mentioned, not a single Muslim remained unransomed [707] in the Byzantine lands.[887] Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah has said concerning that,

Through you have been freed captives for whom were built prisons wherein no kinsman or friend could visit them,
At a time when the Muslims had been unable to secure their release and had said, "The polytheists' prisons will be their tombs!"[888]

In this year, al-Qāsim stationed himself ready for frontier warfare at Dābiq.[889]

---

883. I.e., in al-Jazīrah and Syria.

884. Al-Rashīd had already, ten years previously, stigmatized the Syrian troops as a crowd of mischief-makers, jund sū'; see Ibn 'Asākir, quoted in Salibi, 37.

885. Amatory poet of Baghdad and favorite of al-Rashīd, who died towards the end of that Caliph's reign. See GAL, I², 73, S I, 114; GAS, II, 513–14; EI² s.v. (R. Blachère).

886. Dīwān, ed. 'Ātikah al-Khazrajī, 231, no. 462 (not in the ed. of Beirut 1385 [1965]); Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

887. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 193. Al-Qāsim b. al-Rashīd's agent here was the eunuch Abū Sulaymān Faraj, and 3,700 Muslims were freed, according to Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 189, tr. 255–6. On these exchanges of captives, see EI² s.v. Lamas-Ṣū (= the river on whose banks the exchanges were made) (Huart).

888. Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 189, tr. 256; Munierah al-Rasheed, 131, no. 92; Shi'r Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah, 61, no. 40; Harley, "Abu's-Simṭ Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah," 86–7.

889. Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 744, XVI (1901), 87. According to Balādhurī, 171,

In this year, al-'Abbās b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā led the Pilgrimage.[890]

---

the Byzantines attacked al-Kanīsah al-Sawdā' whilst al-Qāsim was stationed here and took many captives.

890. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 38–9; Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 736; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 522; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year 190

(November 27, 805–November 16, 806)

Among the events taking place during this year was the appearance of Rāfiʿ b. Layth b. Naṣr b. Sayyār[891] at Samarqand, rebelling against Hārūn, throwing off his allegiance and abandoning obedience to him.

The Reason behind Rāfiʿ b. Layth's Revolt

According to what has been mentioned to us, the reason for that was that Yaḥyā b. al-Ashʿath b. Yaḥyā al-Ṭāʾī married one of the daughters, who was famed for her richness,[892] of his paternal uncle Abū al-Nuʿmān. Yaḥyā stayed in the City of Peace, and left her at

891. Possibly the grandson of the last Umayyad governor of Khurāsān. His father was presumably the Layth "mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful" sent in al-Manṣūr's reign as an envoy to the Turkish ruler of Farghānah. See Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 465–6; Barthold, Turkestan, 201. Balādhurī, quoted in Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 471, states that Rāfiʿ was a commander in the garrison of Samarqand.

892. Thus in the Cairo text, VIII, 319 and in parallel sources, dhāt yasārin, which fits in well with the rest of the story. The Leiden text has here, less plausibly, dhāt lisānin "eloquent."

Samarqand. When his stay in Baghdad became protracted, and she received the news that he had taken several slave concubines and had had children by them, she sought some means of obtaining her release from him; but she did not manage to achieve this. News of her plight reached Rāfiʿ. He cast covetous eyes on her and on her money, so he sent someone secretly to her, who told her that there was no way of securing release from her husband except by renouncing belief in God's unity (i.e., renouncing Islam), for which she had to summon a body of professional witnesses [ʿudūl] and uncover her hair publicly before them, and then repent of her [708] action, so that she would then be allowable to (fresh Muslim) husbands.[893] She did that, and Rāfiʿ then married her.

The news reached Yaḥyā b. al-Ashʿath, and he raised a complaint about the matter to al-Rashīd. The latter therefore wrote to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā ordering him to impose a separation between the two and to punish Rāfiʿ, have him flogged with the number of stripes prescribed by the Sharīʿah [yajlidahu al-ḥadd[a]], have him fettered, and have him paraded through the city of Samarqand, in irons and set on a donkey, as a warning to others. Sulaymān b. Ḥamīd al-Azdī, however, did not inflict on Rāfiʿ the ḥadd punishment, but merely mounted him on a donkey, in fetters, till he divorced her. Then he imprisoned him in the Samarqand jail. But Rāfiʿ escaped by night from imprisonment in the custody of Ḥamīd b. al-Masīḥ, who was at that time head of the police guard in Samarqand, and reached ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā at Balkh. He sought a guarantee of personal safety, but ʿAlī refused him this, and was about to execute him. However, ʿAlī's son ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī interceded with his father for him; Rāfiʿ repeated afresh his divorcing of the woman and was given permission to return home to Samarqand. So he went back to Samarqand, where he attacked ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's governor there, Sulaymān b. Ḥamīd, and killed him. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā sent his son against Rāfiʿ, but the local people gave their support to Sibāʿ b. Masʿadah and made him chief over themselves. Sibāʿ pounced on Rāfiʿ and put him in fetters, but then the local people suddenly turned on Sibāʿ, 893. I.e., her apostasy from Islam, albeit temporary and based on a technicality, thereby released her from marriage to a Muslim, since a Muslim male may marry a wife from the Protected Peoples but not an idolator or polytheist (Qur'ān, V, 7/5, II, 220; cf. EI[1] s.v. Nikāḥ [Schacht]).

putting him in irons, appointing Rāfiʿ as their chief, and giving him their allegiance. All the people of Transoxania combined with him. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī went forth to encounter him; Rāfiʿ met him in battle and put him to flight. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā then began to levy troop contingents and to prepare for war.[894]

Various Campaigns by al-Rashīd against the Byzantines and Diplomatic Exchanges with the Emperor Nicephorus

In this year, al-Rashīd led the summer expedition (against the Byzantines). He left behind his son ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn as his deputy at al-Raqqah and entrusted affairs to him. He wrote letters to the (governors in the) farthermost parts of the empire ordering them to give al-Maʾmūn full obedience, and he handed over to him [709] al-Manṣūr's seal ring so that he might benefit from its auspiciousness; this was his personal seal ring, on which was engraved the motto "God is my trusted patron, in His hands I have placed my security."[895]

In this year, al-Faḍl b. Sahl became a convert to Islam at the hands of al-Maʾmūn.[896]

In this year, the Byzantines sallied forth against ʿAyn Zarbah and Kanīsat al-Sawdāʾ.[897] They raided and took captives, hence the 894. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 737; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 515 (bare mention of the fact of the revolt); Dīnawarī, 391; Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr., IV, 471–2; Gardīzī, 80, 132; Abū al-Faḍl Bayhaqī, Taʾrīkh-i Masʿūdī, 421; Narshakhī, Taʾrīkh-i Bukhārā, 90, tr. Frye, 76; K. al-ʿUyūn, 311–12; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 195; Palmer, 110–11; Barthold, Turkestan, 201; Shaban, 37–8; Daniel, 172–3. Whether there is any foundation for the amusing story of the marriage with the woman of Samarqand as the reason for Rāfiʿ's original revolt is dubious; an early source like Yaʿqūbī does not mention it. Gardīzī attributes the expedition against Rāfiʿ to the latter's withholding, as governor in Samarqand, the taxes due to the central government. Dīnawarī attributes the revolt to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's general oppression of the people of Khurāsān, as does also, by inference, Abū al-Faḍl Bayhaqī. It seems clear that Rāfiʿ utilized a general resentment in Khurāsān and Transoxania against ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's rule.

---

895. Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 346, tr. 444–5; Azdī, 308; K. al-ʿUyūn, 312; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 197–8; Gabrieli, "Successione," 350.

896. Jahshiyārī, 182; Azdī, loc. cit.; K. al-ʿUyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 197; Palmer, 114.

897. ʿAyn Zarbah is the Byzantine Anabarza. Both fortresses lay in Cilicia. See Le Strange, Lands, 128–9; Honigmann, index, s.vv.; Canard, Hʿamdānides, 280.

people of al-Maṣṣīṣah (subsequently) sought to recover what was in the Byzantines' hands.[898]

In this year, al-Rashīd conquered Heraclia and sent out contingents of troops and detachments of cavalry to spread through the land of Byzantium. According to what has been said, he entered it with a force of 135,000 regularly paid troops [murtaziq], in addition to camp-followers, volunteers, and those not registered on the stipends list [dīwān]. ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik (al-Khuzāʿī) halted at Dhū al-Kulāʿ,[899] and sent forward Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā[900] with 70,000 men to range about within the land of Byzantium. Shurāḥīl b. Maʿn b. Zāʾidah[901] captured Ḥiṣn al-Ṣaqālibah[902] and Dabasah,[903], and Yazīd b. Makhlad captured al-Ṣafṣāf and Malāqūbiyah.[904] Al-Rashīd's conquest of Heraclia took place in Shawwāl (August–September, 806). He reduced it to ruins and enslaved its people after a thirty days' siege of the town. He gave charge of the Levant coastlands of the eastern Mediterranean as far as Egypt to Ḥumayd b. Maʿyūf (al-Ḥajūrī). Ḥumayd raided as far as Cyprus, where he razed buildings, burnt property, and enslaved 16,000 of its people. He despatched them to al-Rāfiqah; the judge Abū al-Bakhtarī took charge of selling them, and the bishop of Cyprus fetched two thousand dīnārs. Al-Rashīd set out for the Byzantine lands on the twentieth of Rajab (June 11, 806).[905] He adopted a cap [qalansuwah] on which was written the words "Warrior for the 898. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 736 (under the year 189); Balādhurī, 171; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 198; Brooks, EHR, XVI (1901), 87.

899. Literally, "the stronghold, fortified place," possibly the Byzantine town of Sideropolis in Cappadocia. See Balādhurī, 150, 170; Le Strange, Lands, 138–9; Brooks, EHR, XVI (1901), 86; Honigmann, 46–7.

900. Second cousin of al-Rashīd, and subsequently, in 193 (809), governor in Mecca and Medina for al-Amīn.

901. Son of the famous general of the last Umayyads and early ʿAbbāsids; see Crone, 169.

902. "The fortress of the Slavs," which lay just north of the Cilician Gates and was possibly the modern Turkish Anasha Qalʿesi; see Canard, Hʿamdânides, 284.

903. Byzantine Thēbasa in Cappadocia. See Le Strange, Lands, 136; Honigmann, 47.

904. Byzantine Malakopea, modern Melegob. See Le Strange, Lands, and Honigmann, loc. cit.

905. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 519 (according to whom, al-Rashīd had previously been concerned at Manbij with negotiations for the settlement of a revolt by the people of Ḥimṣ), 523; Dīnawarī, 391; K. al-ʿUyūn, 312; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 196.

faith, Pilgrim" [ghāzī, ḥājj], and used to wear this.[906] Abū al-Ma'ālī al-Kilābī[907] said,

Whoever seeks to encounter you or wishes a meeting [710] must do this either in the Two Holy Places [al-Ḥaramayn] or on the farthest frontier regions.
Hence, in the enemy's territory, on a frisky horse, and in the land of easy and pleasant life, on a camel saddle.
Out of all creation, you are the only one who has gained control of the frontier regions, from among all those who have acquired successively power over affairs (i.e., previous Caliphs).

After this, al-Rashīd went on to al-Ṭuwānah[908] and encamped there. Then he travelled away from there, and left behind over it 'Uqbah b. Ja'far (al-Khuzā'ī),[909] ordering him to build a residence there. Nicephorus sent to al-Rashīd tribute and poll-tax [al-kharāj wa-al-jizyah], the latter for his own head, that of his designated successor and those of his nobles [baṭāriqah] and the rest of the people of his realm, a total of fifty thousand dīnārs, at a rate of four dīnārs on his own head and two dīnārs on that of his son Istabrāq (i.e., Stauracius). Nicephorus also sent a letter, via two of his most prominent nobles, concerning a slave girl from among the captives from Heraclia, and its text was as follows:

To the servant of God Hārūn, Commander of the Faithful, from Nicephorus, ruler of the Byzantines, greetings! As follows: O King, 906. At Ṭūs, at the time of his last illness, al-Rashīd is described as wearing a tall qalansuwah. See Jahshiyārī, 221; Sourdel, "Questions de cérémoniale 'abbaside," 133–4, pointing out that the qalansuwah ṭawīlah rusāfiyyah (the latter adjective indicating a material originally made in al-Ruṣāfah) became the characteristic personal headgear of the 'Abbāsids, one possibly adopted in imitation of the Achaemenids of ancient Persia. According to Ṭabarī, III, 371, al-Manṣūr made people wear excessively high *qalansuwah*s which had to be supported by an internal framework of cane.

---

907. Unidentified.

908. Classical Tyana, a town lying to the north of the Taurus mountains and to the west of modern Niğde; it was subsequently captured and fortified by al-Ma'mūn. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 45–6; Le Strange, Palestine, 547; idem, Lands, 139; Canard, H'amdânides, 285.

909. Grandson of the 'Abbāsid deputy naqīb Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, his father being al-Rashīd's ṣāḥib al-shurṭah; see Crone, 185.

I have a request to make of you which will not cause any damage either to your faith or to your temporal welfare and which is a trifling and insignificant matter: that you grant to my son a slave girl, one of the maidens of Heraclia whom I had sought in marriage for my son. If you deem it expedient to fulfill for me the object of my requirement, then I would be grateful if you would do it. Peace be upon you, and God's mercy and blessing!

Nicephorus also sought from him presents of perfume and one of his (royal) tents [surādiqātihi].[910]

Al-Rashīd ordered the slave girl to be sought out; she was brought back, adorned with finery and installed on a seat in the tent in which he himself was lodging. The slave girl and the tent, together with its contents—vessels and fittings—were handed over to Nicephorus's envoy. He also sent to Nicephorus the perfume which he had requested, and he further sent to him dates, dishes of khabīṣ,[911] raisins and healing drugs (or: opium, tiryāq). Al-Rashīd's envoy handed over all these to Nicephorus. The latter, in return, gave al-Rashīd a load of Islamic dirhams on the back of a [711] chestnut-colored hack [birdhawn], amounting to fifty thousand dirhams, one hundred satin brocade garments, two hundred garments of fine brocade [buzyūn],[912] twelve falcons, four hunting dogs, and three hacks. Nicephorus further contracted not to destroy Dhū al-Kulā', Ṣumālū[913] or Ḥiṣn Sinān, whilst al-Rashīd guaranteed not to resettle and fortify Heraclia—this on the basis that Nicephorus would hand over three hundred thousand dīnārs [annually].[914]

---

910. For this loan word from Persian, probably a pre-Islamic borrowing, see Fraenkel, 29.

911. A kind of jellied dessert dish made with sesame oil or syrup; it was regarded as a typically Persian dish. See Dozy, Supplément, I, 349a–b; Rodinson, "Recherches sur les documents arabes relatifs à la cuisine," 103, 148, 150; Ahsan, 100.

912. The Arabic geographers (e.g., Iṣṭakhrī and Ibn Ḥawqal) mention the fame of the Byzantine and Armenian buzyūn brocades, and state that Trebizond was a great mart for their export; see Serjeant, 63 ff.

913. Text ṣ.m.l.h, which the editor takes to stand for Ṣumāluh = Ṣamālū, a place mentioned by Balādhurī, 170, and Ṭabarī, III, 497, 499, as having been already attacked by al-Rashīd in the campaign of 163 (780). Cf. Shābushtī, 341–2, Annex 4.

914. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 737; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr., IV, 471; Azdī, 308–9; K. al-'Uyūn, 312; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 196; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 745–6; Kennedy, 130–1;

In this year, a rebel [khārijī][915] from the tribe of ʿAbd al-Qays, called Sayf b. Bakr, raised a revolt. Al-Rashīd despatched against him Muḥammad b. Yazīd b. Mazyad [al-Shaybānī],[916] who killed him at ʿAyn al-Nūrah.[917]

The people of Cyprus broke their agreement, hence Maʿyūf b. Yaḥyā raided them and carried off captives from its people.[918]

In this year, ʿĪsā b. Mūsā al-Hādī led the Pilgrimage.[919]

Shaban, 38–9, who regards al-Rashīd's preoccupation with the reasonably stable Anatolian front as having been a waste of effort.

915. Here, apparently, used in a general sense, since when a rebel from the Khārijite sect is specifically intended, terms like al-shārī or al-muḥakkim or al-ḥarūrī are often used.

916. The son of Maʿn b. Zāʾidah's nephew Yazīd b. Mazyad; see Crone, 169.

917. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 197. ʿAyn al-Nūrah, literally, "place where pitch bubbles up through the ground," does not seem to be mentioned by the geographers, but was possibly in Lower Iraq or Kurdistan. Azdī, 309, has "ʿAyn al-Baqarah"; ʿAyn al-Baqar was, according to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 176; cf. Le Strange, Palestine, 330–2, at Acre in Palestine; hence, Azdī's reading seems wrong, unless a different place is meant.

918. Azdī, 310; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 746.

919. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 39; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 737; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522; Azdī, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year 191

(November 17, 806–November 5, 807)

Among the events taking place during this year was the outbreak of a rebel [khārijī] called Tharwān b. Sayf in the district of Ḥawlāyā,[920] who was then transferring his activities to the Sawād. Ṭawq b. Mālik was sent against him, and Ṭawq put him to flight and wounded him, killing also the greater part of his followers. Ṭawq was under the impression that he had killed Tharwān, and so wrote a letter announcing his victory; Tharwān (in fact) fled, wounded.[921]

In this year, Abū al-Nidā' rebelled in Syria, so al-Rashīd sent Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh (b. Muslim al-Dhuhlī) in pursuit of him and appointed Yaḥyā governor of Syria.[922]

---

920. A village in the neighborhood of al-Nahrawān; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 322–3.

921. Azdī, 311 (with the same Marwān for Tharwān); Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 205.

922. Ibid. Yaḥyā was the son of a Khurasanian mawlā, who served al-Rashīd and al-Ma'mūn in various governorships, and brother of Ḥusayn, a foster-brother of al-Hādī (see Ṭabarī, III, 586, above, 67); he died in 206 (821–2), see Crone, 184. Previously, Mu'ādh had been al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā's deputy in the governorship of Khurāsān; see Ḥamzah Iṣfahānī, 165.

In this year, snow fell in the City of Peace.

In this year, Ḥammād al-Barbarī seized Hayṣam al-Yamānī.[923] [712]

In this year, the affair of Rāfiʿ b. Layth at Samarqand became serious.

In this year, the people of Nasaf[924] wrote to Rāfiʿ giving him their obedience and asking him to send to them forces who would aid them in killing ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī. So Rāfiʿ despatched the local ruler of Shāsh[925] with his force of Turks and one of his own commanders. They came upon ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī, surrounded him and killed him in Dhū al-Qaʿdah (September–October, 807), but did not offer any violence to his retainers.[926]

In this year, al-Rashīd appointed Ḥammawayh al-Khādim over the postal system of Khurāsān.[927]

Various Raids into the Byzantine Lands, and Measures against the Protected Peoples

In this year, Yazīd b. Makhlad al-Hubayrī (al-Fazārī)[928] raided the Byzantine lands with a force of ten thousand men. The Byzantines 923. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit. On Ḥammād, see Ṭabarī, III, 649 (above, 173 and n. 632). According to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 498–9, Ḥammād had been appointed governor of Yemen in 179 (795), but his tyranny drove the local people into rebellion, led by al-Hayṣam b. ʿAbd al-Majīd al-Hamdānī. Warfare between the two sides continued for nine years (thus placing the beginning of the revolt in 182 [798]) until al-Hayṣam was captured and executed by the Caliph. Ḥammād was subsequently removed by al-Rashīd after further complaints by the oppressed people of Yemen and after a thirteen years' governorship (thus placing his dismissal in 192 [808], if we follow Yaʿqūbī's chronology; according to Ṭabarī, III, 649, Ḥammād had been appointed governor of Mecca and the Yemen in 184 [800], but this may only mean that it was in this year that he added Mecca to his existing governorship of Yemen). Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 743, does not give the date of Ḥammād's appointment but says that he continued till al-Rashīd's death.

924. A town of Soghdia, situated on the Khūshk Rūd, and also called Nakhshab or (in post-Mongol times) Qarshī. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 276; Le Strange, Lands, 470–1; Barthold, Turkestan, 136–7; EI[1] s.v. Nakhshab (Minorsky).

925. The region of Transoxania to the east of the Syr Darya, in which is situated the modern Tashkent. See Le Strange, Lands, 480–3; Barthold, Turkestan, 169–75.

926. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 738; K. al-ʿUyūn, 313; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Barthold, Turkestan, 200; Daniel, 173.

927. Mawlā of al-Mahdī, obviously a eunuch, and according to Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 252, tr. 38, owner of a qaṭīʿah or land grant on the eastern bank of the Tigris at Baghdad; see Crone, 191.

928. Descendant of the family of ʿUmar b. Hubayrah and Yazīd Ibn Hubayrah who served the later Umayyads in Iraq and al-Jazīrah; see Crone, 107.

seized the defile against him, and then killed him when he was with a force of fifty men at two stages' distance from Tarsus, the remainder of the force escaping.[929]

In this year, al-Rashīd appointed Harthamah b. A'yan to take charge of the summer expedition (against the Byzantines) and provided him with a force of thirty thousand troops from the army of Khurāsān.[930] He was accompanied by Masrūr al-Khādim, who was responsible for the commisariat plus all other affairs except the actual military leadership. Al-Rashīd himself proceeded to Darb al-Ḥadath,[931] stationed there 'Abdallāh b. Mālik, and stationed Sa'īd b. Salm b. Qutaybah at Mar'ash. The Byzantines raided it, seized some of the Muslims as captives and then withdrew homewards, Sa'īd b. Salm meanwhile standing fast there. Al-Rashīd sent Muḥammad b. Yazīd b. Mazyad to Tarsus. Al-Rashīd remained at Darb al-Ḥadath for three days of the month of Ramaḍān (July–August, 807), and then returned to al-Raqqah.[932]

In this year, al-Rashīd ordered the churches in the frontier re-
[713] gions to be demolished, and he wrote to al-Sindī b. Shāhik ordering him to compel the Protected Peoples [ahl al-dhimmah] in the City of Peace to distinguish their general appearance from the Muslims in matter of their dress and their mounts.[933]

In this year, al-Rashīd dismissed 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān from the governorship of Khurāsān and appointed (in his stead) Harthamah.[934]

The Reason for al-Rashīd's Dismissal of 'Alī b. 'Īsā and His Anger against Him

Abū Ja'far (i.e., al-Ṭabarī) has related: We have already mentioned previously the reason for 'Alī b. 'Īsā's son's demise and how he was 929. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit.; K. al-'Uyūn, 312; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 746–7.

930. This use of Khurāsānian troops, to supplement what were normally armies of Syrian troops in these frontier campaigns, is notable; see von Sievers, "Military, merchants and nomads," 219.

931. See for this, Ṭabarī, III, 568 (above, 39, n. 156).

932. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 523; K. al-'Uyūn, 312–13; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 206; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 747.

933. Azdī, 311; Tritton, 117–18; A. Fattal, Le statut légal des non-musulmans en pays d'Islam, 100–1; EI[2] s.v. Ghiyār (M. Perlmann).

934. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit.; Dīnawarī, 391; Azdī, loc. cit.; K. al-'Uyūn, 313–15; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 203–4.

killed. When his son ʿĪsā was killed, ʿAlī set off from Balkh and arrived at Marw, fearing that Rāfiʿ b. al-Layth would march against it and take control of it. Now his son ʿĪsā had buried a huge hoard of money in the garden of his house at Balkh, reportedly amounting to thirty million (dirhams) in value. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā did not know about the money, and no one had any knowledge about that matter except one of his slave girls. When ʿAlī set out for Balkh, the slave girl revealed the matter to a certain slave (or: to certain slaves), and people talked about it. The Qurʾān readers[935] and prominent persons of Balkh gathered together and then entered the garden, plundering it and throwing it open to spoliation by the general masses of people. The news of this reached al-Rashīd and he said, "ʿAlī has left Balkh against my orders and has left behind a sum of money like this, and at the same time he alleges that he has been reduced to utilizing his womenfolk's ornaments for his expenditure on the warfare against Rāfiʿ!" He thereupon dismissed him, and appointed Harthamah as governor. He appropriated all ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's wealth, and this amounted to eighty million dirhams.[936]

It has been mentioned from a certain mawlā that he related: We were in Jurjān with al-Rashīd at the time when he was heading towards Khurāsān. The treasuries of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā which had been confiscated for him arrived at that point, on the backs of fifteen hundred camels. As well as all this (i.e., this wealth collected by oppressive means), ʿAlī had humiliated the most prominent of the Khurasanians and their nobles. [714]

It has been mentioned that Hishām b. Farr-Khusraw[937] and al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣʿab[938] went into ʿAlī's presence one day. They gave him the salutation of peace, but he said to al-Ḥusayn, "May God

935. Following the Leiden editor's text, qurrāʾ ahl Balkh (also in the Cairo text, VIII, 325), but ms. A has ahl qurā Balkh, thus giving possible support to the idea put forward by Shaban, 23, 50–1, and G. H. A. Juynboll, in JESHO, XVI (1973), 113–27, that ahl al-qurā is the original expression of the early Islamic sources (= "villagers," i.e., participants in the early Arab campaigns in Iraq, new converts from the desert who were settled in "villages" in the environs of towns like Medina, al-Baṣrah, and al-Kūfah) and that these were later given a religious guise and turned into qurrāʾ "Qurʾān readers."

936. K. al-ʿUyūn, 313; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 203; Daniel, 173–4.

937. Unidentified, but from what follows, clearly a local poet and panegyrist.

938. The father of Ṭāhir Dhū al-Yamīnayn, subsequently governor of Khurāsān for al-Maʾmūn; al-Ḥusayn is described below by Ṭabarī, III, 771, as one of the leading men in Khurāsān.

not grant you peace, O heretic son of a heretic! By God, I know full well your position as an enemy of Islam and your impugning of religion! I am only awaiting the Caliph's permission for it before putting you to death, for God has made shedding your blood licit, and I only hope that God will let it be shed at my hands in the near future, and that He will speedily consign you to His punishment! Are you not the person who stirred up trouble against me in this very own house of mine after you had become intoxicated with wine, and asserted that letters had reached you from the City of Peace intimating my dismissal? Go forth, to God's wrath, may God curse you, for soon you will be one of those accursed ones!" Al-Ḥusayn replied to him, "I seek refuge in God for the Amīr, that he should accept the sayings of a slanderer or the insinuations of an evilwisher, for I am innocent of what I have been suspected!" ʿAlī said, "You have lied, may you have no mother! I have acquired ample evidence that you became intoxicated with wine and spoke words for which you have merited the most severe punishment, and it may well be that God will speedily inflict on you His violence and His retribution! Get out of my presence, unrespected and without anyone to escort you forth!" The doorkeeper then came up, gripped him by the arm, and ejected him.[939]

ʿAlī also said to Hishām b. Farr-Khusraw, "Your house has become a meeting place in which irresponsible elements [al-sufahāʾ] congregate around you and slander the ruling authorities [al-wulāt]. May God spill my own blood, if I do not shed yours!" Hishām replied, "May I be made the Amīr's ransom! By God, I am a person who has been wronged and is deserving of compassion! By God, I have exerted every possible effort and have not omitted a single eulogy of the Amīr, nor any praiseworthy description of him, without specifically attributing it to him and reciting it about him. If, then, when I have recited words of approbation, evil slanders have been carried back to you, what recourse do I have?" He said, "You have lied, may you be deprived of your mother! I know full well from your own children and family what your heart is really concealing, so get out, for I shall be rid of you very shortly!"[940] [715]

939. M. Kaabi, "Les origines ṭāhirides dans la daʿwa ʿabbāside," Arabica, XIX (1972), 159–62, sees ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's violent words here to al-Ḥusayn as only explicable in the light of a long-standing rivalry and hatred between the two Khurāsānian families of Māhān and Ruzayq—though both were affiliated to the same Arab tribe of Khuzāʿah—going back to the time of the ʿAbbāsid Revolution and the respective roles of ʿĪsā b. Māhān and the sons of Ruzayq, i.e., Ṭalḥah and Muṣʿab. In support of this view, he cites ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's alleged ill treatment, according to Shābushtī, 142–3, of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn at one point, Ṭāhir's alleged initial support for the revolt in Samarqand against ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā of Rāfiʿ b. Layth, and Ṭāhir's readiness in 194 (809–10) to combat in Khurāsān, on behalf of al-Maʾmūn, al-Amīn's representative ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā.

Hishām went away. When it was the latter part of the night, he sent for his daughter ʿĀliyah, the eldest of his children, and said to her, "O my dear daughter, I wish to tell you about a matter which, if you blazon it abroad, will bring about my death, but if you keep it to yourself, will allow me to survive safe and sound, so choose your father's preservation rather than his death!" She replied, "What is this, may I be made your ransom?" He said, "I am fearful of my life from this evildoer ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, so I have decided to let it be known publicly that I have been struck down by a paralytic stroke. When day breaks, gather your slave girls together and go to my bed and shake me. Then when you see that my power of movement has been affected and my limbs made heavy, you and your slave girls must break out in cries of lamentation. Also, send to your brothers and give them the news about my illness. But beware strenuously of letting any single one of God's creatures, whether close to you or unconnected, learn that my body is, in reality, perfectly sound."

She accordingly did this, being an intelligent and sagacious woman. He remained laid out on his bed for a period of time, unable to move except when someone else moved his limbs. It is related that not a single person in Khurāsān knew about ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's dismissal, by any channel of information, except for Hishām, who surmised his dismissal as likely, a surmise that turned out to be correct. It is further related that he went forth on the day when Harthamah arrived in order to meet Harthamah, and one of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's commanders saw him on the road. The commander said, "Your body has recovered now?" Hishām replied, "Praise be to God, it's never lost its health!" Another authority states, however, that, on the contrary, it was ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā who saw Hishām and said, "Where are you off to?" He replied, "I'm going to meet our Amīr

940. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

Abū Ḥātim [i.e., Harthamah]." ʿAlī said, "Weren't you ill?" Hishām replied, "Yes, indeed; but God has given me health." God removed the tyrant in a single night.[941]

As for al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣʿab, he set off for Mecca seeking al-Rashīd's protection against ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, which the Caliph accorded to him.[942]

Al-Rashīd's Letter Dismissing ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā and His Charge to Harthamah

When al-Rashīd resolved on the dismissal of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, he sent for Harthamah b. Aʿyan—according to the reports which have reached me—and saw him privately. He said, "I have not consulted any-[716] body about your appointment, nor have I informed anybody of my secret intentions regarding you. The frontier regions of the eastern lands have become restive against my power, and the people of Khurāsān have become discontented with ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's rule, since he has disobeyed the charge which I gave him and has cast it behind his back. He has now written to me asking for reinforcements and additional troops, and I am writing to him and shall tell him that I am sending you to him as reinforcement and despatching to him with you supplies of money, weapons, means of strength, and equipment which will set his heart at rest and satisfy his soul's desire. I will write out a letter to accompany you, in my own hand; do not break the seal or peruse its contents until you reach the town of Naysābūr. Then when you halt there, do what it says in the letter and obey its instructions, but don't exceed them, if God wills. I intend also to despatch as your companion Rajāʾ al-Khādim with a letter to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā which I will write out in my own hand, so that he may know what to expect at the hands of yourself and Rajāʾ. [In regard to Rajāʾ,] treat this affair concerning ʿAlī as of little importance, don't reveal it to him and don't let him know what I have decided upon. Now prepare for the journey, and give out to

941. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 204.

942. Ibid.; cf. Kaabi, "Les origines ṭāhirides," 162–3, who conjectures that, by the time al-Ḥusayn reached al-Rashīd in Iraq, the nature of Rāfiʿ b. Layth's revolt as anti-ʿAbbāsid as well as anti-Māhānid had become apparent, so that al-Ḥusayn might well have discouraged his son Ṭāhir from giving any further support to the rebel.

your close colleagues and to people in general the ostensible information that I am despatching you as a reinforcement and as aid to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā."[943]

He related: He then wrote out, in his own hand, a letter to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān, whose text was as follows:

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. O son of an adulteress, I have exalted your status and have raised your fame, I have caused the leaders of the Arabs to follow at your heels and have made the descendants of the kings of the Persians your slaves and followers. Yet my recompense (for this) is that you have disobeyed my charge (to you) and have cast my command to you behind your back, to the point that you have wrought mischief in the land and have ill-treated the subjects; you have aroused God's ire and that of His Caliph with your evil conduct, your vicious behavior, and your blatant treachery. I have appointed my mawlā[944] Harthamah b. Aʿyan over the frontier region Khurāsān and have ordered him to treat you harshly, together with your sons, your secretaries, and your financial officials, and have ordered him not to leave in your possession (literally, "behind your backs") a single dirham or legal claim due to any Muslim or person in covenant relationship (i.e., Dhimmī, muʿāhad) without securing redress from you for it, until you give it back to its rightful owner. If you, or [717] your sons, or your financial officials refuse to do this, then he has full permission to inflict punishment on you, to rain down upon you a hail of floggings, and to visit upon you what is customarily visited upon those who break covenants, alter, change, act rebelliously, oppress, act tyrannically, and inflict wrong, as vengeance due to God, He is magnified and exalted, in the first place; to His Caliph, in the second place; and to the Muslims and the persons in covenant relationship, in the third place. Do not lay yourself open to what has no permanence, and relinquish your

943. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 515; Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr., IV, 472–3; K. al-ʿUyūn, 3131; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 204.

944. Mawlā seems here to signify the close relationship of Harthamah to the Caliph, as a trusted free retainer rather than any legal or social dependence, clientage, or former slave status. Harthamah seems to have come from the Arab community of Khurāsān; see Crone, 75, 78.

duties (i.e., your office as governor) either willingly or else as one constrained![945]

He also wrote out the contract of appointment for Harthamah in his own hand:

This is what the Commander of the Faithful Hārūn al-Rashīd has written out as a contract of appointment to Harthamah b. A'yan when he appointed him governor over the frontier region Khurāsān, its administrative dependencies and its land tax. The Caliph commands Harthamah to keep in mind the fear of God, to obey Him and to show concern for and watch over God's interests. He should make the Book of God a guiding example in all he undertakes and, accordingly, make licit what is legally allowable according to it and prohibit what is not allowable. When he is faced with anything doubtful and uncertain, he should pause and consult those with a systematic training and acquaintanceship with God's religion and those knowledgeable about the Book of God; or alternatively, he should refer it to his Imām so that God, He is magnified and exalted, may make manifest to him His judgment in the matter and so that he may execute it according to His right guidance. The Caliph also commands Harthamah to secure a firm hold of the evildoer 'Alī b. 'Īsā, his sons, his financial officials, and his secretaries, and to treat them harshly, come down on them with severity and make them disgorge all the monies—the Commander of the Faithful's land tax and the income from the conquered lands meant for the Muslims' allowances [fay']—for which they are accountable. When he has exacted everything of these revenues which they hold and for which they are responsible, he is to look into the question of the rights of the Muslims and the people in covenant relationship [al-mu'āhadīn], and he is to require them to fulfill the rights of every person entitled to a right until they have fulfilled it for them. If their responsibility for any rights due to the Commander of the Faithful and for any of them due to the Muslims is validly established, but they evade them and refuse to acknowledge them, then he is to release upon them the lashings of God's punishment and the painfulness of His retribution, so that he brings them into the position where, if he goes beyond it with the lightest stroke of punishment, their souls will perish and their spirits cease to be without any blood-wit or retaliation being exacted. If they transgress beyond the bounds of the obedience due from every subject, he is to despatch them, if God wills, to the Commander of the Faithful's gate in exactly the same way as rebels are despatched—with harsh treatment, rough food and drink, and coarse clothing, in the custody of trusted members of his retinue. [718]

945. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr., IV, 473; K. al-'Uyūn, 313–14.

O Abū Ḥātim, act according to the charge which I have laid upon you, for I have preferred God and my faith over my personal inclinations and will; so let your own course of action be thus and let your own conduct be on the same basis. Handle the financial officials of the districts with whom you come into contact during the course of your journeying (to Khurāsān, or, as part of your gubernatorial duties) in such a way that they do not as a result feel a need for recourse to an affair which might (consequently) disquiet them or an evil opinion which might instill fear into them.[946] Enlarge the hopes of the people of that frontier region, and increase their freedom from fear and the attainment of their desires. Then act in accordance with what will make God, His Caliph, and those over whom God has appointed you governor, pleased with you, if God wills. This is my covenant and my letter, written in my own hand, and I call to bear witness God, His angels, those who bear His throne, and the denizens of His heavens; God is sufficient as a witness! The Commander of the Faithful has written this with his own hand, with no one present but God and His angels.[947]

Then he ordered that the letter of Harthamah to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā concerning Harthamah's giving aid to ʿAlī, reinforcing his power, and strengthening his position should be written out. This was accordingly done, and Harthamah's mission of reinforcement to ʿAlī made public. Letters from Ḥammawayh had reached Hārūn to the effect that Rāfiʿ had not abandoned his allegiance or thrown off the official ʿAbbāsid insignia of black, nor had his followers; their

946. Translation here uncertain; the florid style of this document makes absolute certainty over its translation impossible.

947. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr., loc. cit.; K. al-ʿUyūn, 314.

sole aim was to secure the dismissal of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, who had imposed on them unpleasant things.[948] [719] In this year, there took place Harthamah b. Aʿyan's departure for Khurāsān as governor there.

What Befell Harthamah in the Course of His Journey to Khurāsān, and What Happened to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā and His Sons

It has been mentioned that Harthamah went on his way on the sixth day after the one on which al-Rashīd wrote for him his contract of appointment. Al-Rashīd accompanied him on the first part of his journey and gave him a charge concerning what he required Harthamah to do. Harthamah did not pause for any reason en route, and publicly sent on to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā money, weapons, robes of honor, and aromatic substances, until the point when he halted at Naysābūr and then gathered together a group of his own trusty retainers and the senior and experienced persons from among these. He summoned each one of them privately and had a confidential talk with him, and then he made them accept covenants and undertakings that they would keep his plans hidden and conceal his secret. He appointed each man of them over an administrative region, roughly on the basis of the man's standing in Harthamah's estimation. Thus, he made appointments to Jurjān, Naysābūr, al-Ṭabasayn,[949] Nasā and Sarakhs, and he ordered each one of them, after he had given him his letter of appointment, to proceed to the administrative charge to which he had just nominated him, under the most covert and discreet conditions and adopting the guise of ordinary travellers in journeying to the administrative regions and then staying there until the moment which he had indicated to them. He appointed Ismāʿīl b. Ḥafṣ b. Muṣʿab[950] governor of Jurjān at al-Rashīd's express command.

He then proceeded onwards till, when he reached a point just 948. Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr. IV, 472; Palmer, 111–12.

949. The two oasis towns in the Great Desert of eastern Persia, Ṭabas Gīlakī, and Ṭabas Masīnān. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 20; Le Strange, Lands, 359–63; Barthold, An historical geography of Iran, 134–5.

950. Possibly a grandson of the ancestor of the Ṭāhirid governors in Khurāsān, Muṣʿab b. Ruzayq.

one stage away from Marw, he summoned a group of his trusty retainers, and wrote down for them the names of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's sons, the members of his family, his secretaries and others, on sheets of writing material [riqāʿ], and handed over to each man a sheet with the name on it of the person whom Harthamah was to consign to his retainer's custody when he himself, Harthamah, entered Marw in order to dispossess ʿAlī, for fear lest they should flee when Harthamah's purpose became known. Then he sent a message to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, "If the Amīr—may God make him noble—would like to send his trusty retainers to take charge of the wealth which I have with me here, then let him do so; for if the money goes on [720] ahead of me, that will give the Amīr greater power and will have a more weakening effect on his enemies' strength. Moreover, I should not be confident of its safety if I were to leave it behind me, lest someone who aspires to getting hold of it should cast greedy eyes on it, to the point that he might get his hands on part of it for himself and seize the opportunity of our being distracted when we enter the city."

ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā accordingly sent his bankers [jahābidhah] and stewards to take charge of the money. Harthamah told his own treasurers, "Keep them distracted tonight, and adduce an excuse to them about transporting away the money, one which will accord with their own desires and dispel any doubt from their minds." They did that; the treasurers said to them (i.e., to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's agents), "(Leave the money here) until we consult[951] with Abū Hātim regarding horses and mules to convey the money." Then Harthamah travelled on towards the town of Marw. When he was two miles away from it, ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā came out to meet him with his sons, members of his family and his commanders, with a most splendid and friendly welcome. When Harthamah's eye fell on ʿAlī, he bent his leg in order to dismount from his horse, but ʿAlī cried out to him, "By God, if you dismount, then I shall dismount too." Hence, he remained in his saddle, and each one drew near to the other and then embraced each other. They travelled along together, with ʿAlī questioning Harthamah about al-Rashīd's affairs, his present state and appearance, and the state of his courtiers, his commanders and the supporters of his dynasty's power.

951. The Cairo text, VIII, 329, has "until you (pl.) consult."

Harthamah, meanwhile, was answering his questions, until they came to a bridge which only one horse could cross at a time. Harthamah held back his horse's reins and said to ʿAlī, "You go first, with God's blessing," but ʿAlī replied, "No, by God, I won't do that until you yourself go onwards first." Harthamah said, "By God, in that case I won't go onwards, for you are the Amīr and I am only the aide [wazīr]." So ʿAlī went forward and Harthamah followed him till they both entered Marw.[952]

They proceeded to ʿAlī's house. Rajāʾ al-Khādim used never to leave Harthamah's side by night or day, riding or sitting. ʿAlī called for food, and the two of them ate, with Rajāʾ al-Khādim also eating with them. ʿAlī was determined that Rajāʾ should not eat with them, but Harthamah made a sign to him (i.e., to Rajāʾ) and commented, "Eat, for you are hungry, and one cannot get sound judgment from a man who is hungry or who is suffering through having to hold his urine back!"[953] When the food was cleared away, ʿAlī told Harthamah, "I have given orders that a palace on the banks of the Māshān should be made available for you, so if [721] you wish to go there, please do so!"[954] Harthamah said to him, "I have with me certain things, and it is no longer possible to put off a perusal of their contents," and then Rajāʾ al-Khādim handed al-Rashīd's letter to ʿAlī and delivered to him the Caliph's message.

When ʿAlī broke the letter's seal and looked at the very first word of it, he was stricken with remorse and confusion, and he realized that what he was fearing and expecting had indeed come home to him. Then Harthamah ordered him, his sons, his secretaries, and his financial agents all to be put in irons—he had made his journey (to Khurāsān) accompanied by a load of leg and neck irons. When Harthamah had made completely sure of him, he went along to the Friday mosque.[955] He made a speech and raised people's hopes (i.e., 952. According to Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, 166, Harthamah entered Marw on Monday, the twentieth of Rabīʿ II, 192 (February 22, 808), remained there for forty-five days and went on to Balkh for four days.

953. This sounds like a proverbial saying.

954. The Māshān or Mājān was one of the many canals connected with the Murghāb river and flowing through the centre of Marw; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 42, and Le Strange, Lands, 398–9. The suburb of Mājān included the great square or maydan of Marw, the New Friday Mosque and the Dār al-Imārah, all laid out by Abū Muslim.

955. Presumably, the New Mosque, of Marw's three Friday mosques, as being in the administrative area of the town; see the preceding note.

for a better and juster régime) to a high level, announcing that the Commander of the Faithful had appointed him governor over their frontier regions because of what had reached him concerning the evildoer ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's vicious conduct, and (announcing) what al-Rashīd had commanded him to do with ʿAlī, his financial agents and his minions. (He further announced) that he was going to put this into effect, to mete out justice to the lower and upper classes alike and to set about restoring to them their rights to the utmost possible extent of those rights. He ordered the document investing him with office to be read out to them. As a result, they evinced great joy at that, their hopes became enlarged, their expectations for the future grew great, their voices were raised in takbīrs and tahlīls,[956] and numerous prayers were sent up wishing the Commander of the Faithful long life and a goodly recompense.[957]

Then Harthamah went back and sent for ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, his sons, his financial agents, and his secretaries. He then said, "Relieve me of the burden of you, and allow me to dispense with the necessity of taking unpleasant measures against you," and he made a proclamation among those who had had entrusted to their keeping any possessions of theirs (i.e., of ʿAlī's and of his agents'), that there would be no guarantee of protection (i.e., from punishment) for anyone who had in his keeping any possession deposited by ʿAlī or by any one of his sons, secretaries, and financial agents, and who concealed it and did not reveal it. So people brought to him what had been deposited with them, with the exception of one of the natives of Marw who was a Zoroastrian [min abnāʾ al-Majūs]. This man employed continuous stratagems in order to procure access to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā until he managed to get to him. He told ʿAlī secretly, "I have some wealth belonging to you in my possession, and if you have need of it, I will bring it to you in installments. I have endured on your behalf the threat of death, preferring to keep faith and seeking after handsome praise; or if you have no need of it at this moment, I will keep it stored away for you until you decide what to [722] do with it." ʿAlī was amazed at this and said, "If only I had in my entourage a thousand men like you, neither the Sultan[958] nor Satan

956. I.e., the cries "God is most great" and "There is no god but God."

957. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 515; Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr., IV, 473–5; K. al-ʿUyūn, 315; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 204–5.

958. Although in early Arabic, sulṭān is normally an abstract noun meaning would ever have been avid to lay hold on me." Then 'Alī asked the man what was the value of the wealth deposited with him, and he mentioned to him that 'Alī had entrusted to him money, clothing, and musk, and that he did not know the value of that except that what he had entrusted to him on his (i.e., 'Alī's) own written instructions was safely stored away with no part of it having been removed. 'Alī told him, "Leave it where it is, and if its whereabouts become publicly known, then hand it over and save your own skin; and if I escape safe and sound with it, I will decide then what to do." 'Alī wished him a handsome recompense, thanked him most profusely for that action of his, promised him a requital for it and showed kindness towards him. The man's fidelity became proverbial. It has been mentioned that nothing of 'Alī's wealth remained concealed from Harthamah except for what 'Alī had entrusted to the keeping of this man, whose name was al-'Alā' b. Māhān.[959]

Harthamah appropriated every single item which they (i.e., 'Alī and his followers) had concealed, even to their womenfolk's personal ornaments. His agent would enter a house and then seize everything in it, to the point that, when there was nothing left in the house except a scrap of woollen cloth or piece of wood or what was valueless, the man would say to a woman, "Hand over the ornaments you're wearing," and she would then say to the man when he came up to her to snatch off her ornaments, "O fellow, if you are of good character, avert your gaze from me, for by God, I promise not to leave anything on myself of what you are seeking without handing it over to you." Then if the man did not wish to commit a sinful act by approaching her, he would agree to her plea, so that very often she would cast off to him her seal ring, her ankle ornaments, and what might be worth ten dirhams. But if the man were of the opposite character to this, he would say, "I shan't be satisfied until I examine you closely in order to make sure that you haven't concealed any item of gold, or pearls, or rubies," and he would run his hands into the folds of her body, such as the armpits "governmental power," its use here in parallel with Satan seems to indicate the actual holder of such authority, the Sultan, here the Caliph.

959. Could this man have been a kinsman of 'Alī's? But if he was, it is strange that the narrator of the tradition does not mention any relationship or that Harthamah had not already arrested him with the rest of 'Alī's family.

and groins, in order to seek out in there what he suspected she had hidden from him.

Then, when Harthamah believed that he had done all this thoroughly, he sent ʿAlī forward on a camel, with no saddle-blanket beneath him, a chain round his neck, and heavy fetters on his legs, of such a weight that he could neither stand up nor prop himself up.[960] [723]

It has been mentioned from someone who witnessed Harthamah's mode of action that it was as follows. When Harthamah had completed the process of extracting the wealth which (rightfully) belonged to the Commander of the Faithful from ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, his sons, his secretaries, and his financial agents, he stood them in front of the people for the latter to raise complaints of injustice and ill treatment. Whenever a man had a legal claim established as due against ʿAlī or any other one of his entourage, Harthamah would say, "Release to the man his due right, and if you don't, then I shall stretch out (my hand) against you (i.e., punish you)." ʿAlī would thereupon say, "May God grant the Amīr righteousness! Grant me a delay of a day or two." At this, Harthamah would say, "That is up to the person claiming the right; if he wishes, he may do so." Then Harthamah would go up to the man and ask him, "Are you agreeable to cease pressing him (for the moment)?" If the man assented, Harthamah said to him, "Go home, in that case, and come back to him (later)." ʿAlī would send to al-ʿAlāʾ b. Māhān and instruct him, "Settle up, on my behalf, the obligation to so-and-so for such-and-such a matter at such-and-such a rate, or on whatever basis you think fit"; al-ʿAlāʾ would then come to an agreement with the man and finally settle his claim.[961]

It has been mentioned that a man stood before Harthamah and said, "May God grant the Amīr righteousness! This miscreant took from me forcibly a precious[962] shield of hide, whose like no one else ever possessed, and bought it from me, constrainedly and 960. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; K. al-ʿUyūn, 314; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit. According to Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, loc. cit., Harthamah despatched ʿAlī to Baghdad on Monday, the twenty-second of Jumādā I (March 22, 808).

961. Palmer, 112–13.

962. The variants give support for the Leiden editor's suggestion (Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXIII) that one might possibly read yatīmah "unique" for the text's thamīnah.

against my will, for three thousand dirhams. Hence, I went to his steward seeking the purchase money but he refused to give me anything. I remained for a whole year awaiting this miscreant's riding forth, and when he did in fact ride forth, I presented myself in his way and cried out to him, "O Amīr, I am the owner of the shield and to this very day I haven't received its price," but he merely said opprobrious things about my mother [qadhafa ummī],[963] and would not give me my due. So take for me (from him) what is legally my due, both for the money owed and also for his insulting my mother's honor." Harthamah said, "Do you have proof of this?" The man replied, "Yes, a group of people were present when he spoke those words." Harthamah therefore summoned these witnesses and made them testify to the man's claim. (After this,) Harthamah said to ʿAlī, "You have incurred the Sharīʿah punishment [ḥadd] upon yourself." ʿAlī said, "How is that?" Harthamah replied, "Because of your insulting this man's mother's honor." ʿAlī retorted, "Who gave you instruction in the religious law and taught you this point of the juridical and theological sciences?" Harthamah replied, "This is the religious law of the Muslims." ʿAlī said, "I bear witness that the Commander of the Faithful has impugned your lineage more than just once or twice, and I bear witness that you yourself have impugned the lineage of [724] your own sons innumerable times, on occasion Ḥātim and on other occasions Aʿyan. Now who will exact from you the Sharīʿah penalty required for them? And who will exact it for you from your master (i.e., the Caliph)?"[964] Harthamah turned to the owner of the shield and said, "I think that the best course for you is to pursue your claim with this devil for your shield or its price, but to give up pursuing him for the insult to your mother's honor."

Harthamah's Letter to al-Rashīd Announcing the Successful Completion of His Mission

When Harthamah sent ʿAlī, mounted, on his journey to al-Rashīd, he wrote a letter to the Caliph informing him of what he had done, its text being in the following terms:

963. Qadhf is a technical term of Islamic law meaning "an accusation of illicit sexual relations, zinā," incurring a ḥadd penalty when falsely brought, as is implied a few lines below here; see EI[2] s.v. Ḳadhf (Y. Linant de Bellefonds).

964. I.e., ʿAlī implies that accusations of sexual misconduct made as impreca-

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. As follows: God, He is exalted and magnified, has not ceased to shower down on the Commander of the Faithful the most extensive and most perfect of favors in regard to everything which He has entrusted to him as His Caliph, and everything involving the concerns of His servants and His lands which he has committed to his care. God has not ceased to instill into him, in everything near at hand or far of his affairs, personal and general, of minor significance or important, the most complete capability and the finest powers of governing. God has not ceased to grant him, in all that, the best of desires, nor has He ceased to bring him, in the course of this, to the farthest bounds of his aspirations, thereby according him of His favors and keeping safe what He has vouchsafed to him and what will guarantee his own exalted status and that of his retainers and the people with obligations to him and owing him obedience. We ask God to complete (for us) the highest degree of sufficiency and capability in what He has habitually given and has habitually bestowed on us in everything which He entrusts to us, and we ask Him to grant us success for our fulfilling what is incumbent upon us of His rightful due by studying His command and conforming ourselves to His way of thinking.

I myself—may God exalt the Commander of the Faithful—have not ceased, since I left the Commander of the Faithful's army camp, following closely the order which he gave me concerning the course of action which he had made me undertake; I do not go beyond that, I do not stray outside it for any other purpose, and I seek knowledge of neither prosperity nor good fortune except in fulfilling his command. (This I did) until I halted at the nearmost limits of Khurāsān, all this while guarding carefully to myself the orders which the Commander of the Faithful had enjoined me to keep safe and secret, not communicating them either to any single one of my intimates or to any single one of the people in general. I made it my policy to write to the people of Shāsh and Farghānah, to wean them from their connections with the treacherous one (i.e., Rāfiʿ b. Layth) and to put a stop to the covetous designs of Rāfiʿ and his partisans on those two groups of people. I also wrote tions or exclamations in the course of spirited conversation, rather than as legal accusations, should not be taken into account.

---

to those at Balkh in the same terms as I had written and explained clearly to the Commander of the Faithful.

Then when I halted at Naysābūr, I directed my efforts to the [725] matter of the administrative regions which I had just traversed. I issued letters of appointment as governors to those whom I had appointed over these regions before I passed through them, such as Jurjān, Naysābūr, Nasā, and Sarakhs. I was not remiss in taking careful precautions over that and in choosing capable people, reliable and sound persons from my own trusty retainers. I ordered them to keep the whole of the matter concealed and hidden, and I required them to take oaths of obedience in regard to that. I gave each man of them a letter of investiture for his governorship, and I commanded them to proceed to the regions of which they were to have charge, under the most secret and clandestine conditions and adopting the guise of ordinary travellers in their journeying to their administrative regions and their staying there, until the time which I laid down for them, this being the day when I calculated that I would arrive in Marw and would meet with ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā. I made it my policy to assign responsibility [istikfā'ī][965] for Jurjān to Ismāʿīl b. Ḥafṣ b. Muṣʿab in accordance with what I had previously written to the Commander of the Faithful. Those governors then put into execution my commands, and each man of them assumed responsibility for his administrative charge and extended his firm control over his particular district at the time which had been indicated to him. Thus, God relieved the Commander of the Faithful of the burden of that through His finely executed design.

When I reached just one stage before the town of Marw, I chose a number of trusty retainers, and I wrote out on sheets of writing material the names of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's sons, his secretaries, his family, and others, and I handed over to each man a sheet with the name of the person whom I would assign to his safe custody when I entered the town. If I had not taken these measures or delayed putting them into effect, I would not have been able to guarantee that those designated persons (i.e., those destined to be arrested) would not have disappeared into hiding or dispersed when the news became publicly known and widely disseminated. My agents put that into execution, and I myself travelled from my halting-place towards the town of Marw.

965. For this sense, see Dozy, Supplément, II, 479a.

When I reached a point two miles from it, ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā came out to meet me with his sons, members of his family and his commanders, and I met him in a most splendid manner. I treated him in a friendly fashion and exerted myself in magnifying him and extolling him and seeking to dismount before him the first time I saw him to an extent which made him increase in feeling at ease [726] and in confidence in the impression which he had previously relied upon from my letters which had been reaching him; for indeed, these had been continuously full of my extolling and magnifying him and my seeking to dispel any evil opinion away from him, lest any idea should occur to his mind which might spoil what the Commander of the Faithful had planned to have done with him and what the Commander of the Faithful had ordered me to do regarding that. But God, He is blessed and exalted, was the One who alone took charge of relieving the Commander of the Faithful of the affairs of ʿAlī, to the point that ʿAlī brought myself and himself together in his court session and I went to eat with him. When we had finished that, he set about asking me to proceed to a lodging which he had sought out for me. At that point, I told him about the things which I had with me and which could not wait any longer for a close perusal. Rajāʾ al-Khādim then handed over the Commander of the Faithful's letter and delivered to him the Caliph's message. At that, ʿAlī realized that the matter by means of which he had injured his own self and which his own two hands had procured—in that the Commander of the Faithful's ire had been aroused, the Commander of the Faithful's view of him had been changed through his going against the Commander of the Faithful's command, and his exceeding the due bounds in his conduct—had now befallen him.

Then I set about putting him into custody and proceeded to the Friday mosque. I opened wide the hopes of the people who were present, and I began by explaining how the Commander of the Faithful had charged me to journey to them, and I informed them how gravely disquieted was the Commander of the Faithful by the reports, which had reached him and which had become clear to him, about ʿAlī's evil conduct. (I further informed them) about what the Commander of the Faithful had commanded me to do with him, his financial agents, and his minions, and (told them) that I was going to put all this into effect, to mete out justice to the masses and the élite alike and to set about restoring to them their rights to the utmost possible extent. I ordered the document investing me with office to be read out to them, and I informed them that that document was my pattern and exemplar, and that I was imitating its counsels and molding my conduct on it; and if I were to abandon one single aspect of that policy, then I would have injured myself and brought down on myself that which befalls those who rebel against the Commander of the Faithful's judgment and command. The people evinced great joy and rejoicing at that, their voices were raised in *takbīr*s and *tahlīl*s, and numerous prayers were sent up by them for the Commander of the Faithful's long life and his receiving a goodly recompense.

I next turned my attention to the place of court sessions and [727] assembly where ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā was, and set about loading him, his sons, members of his family, his secretaries, and his financial agents with irons, and securing firmly the whole lot of them. I commanded them to bring forth to me the wealth which they had appropriated for themselves, comprising the Commander of the Faithful's wealth and the revenue [fayʾ] for the Muslims, and (I told them that if they did that,) I would dispense with employing harsh measures against them and beatings. I made a proclamation among those people who had had entrusted to their keeping any possessions of ʿAlī and his partisans, summoning them to disgorge what they were holding. They brought these holdings along to me until I had listed for the Commander of the Faithful a respectable portion of silver and gold coinage. I hope that God will give aid in exacting the whole of what they have in their keeping and in extracting to the last farthing what they have secretly stored away. (I hope too that) God will render easily available from that the best of what He has never ceased to accord habitually to the Commander of the Faithful, that is, in undertaking to bring about matters like this with which he is concerned, if God Most High wills.

Nor did I omit, once I arrived at Marw, to give orders for the despatch of messengers and the issuing of trenchant letters, going as far as possible in providing possible excuses, giving warning, providing clear explanation, and offering right guidance, to Rāfiʿ (b. Layth) and the people of Samarqand owing him obedience and to those at Balkh—all this because of my favorable opinion regarding the likelihood of their responding favorably and their adopting the course of obedience and uprightness. Whatever reports, about the people's either responding favorably or else adopting a hostile attitude, which my messengers bring back to me, O Commander of the Faithful, I shall follow a policy appropriate to their attitude and I shall write about that to the Commander of the Faithful, exactly according to what is right and truthful. I hope that God will communicate to the Commander of the Faithful in regard to that something of the excellence of His work and the grace of His sufficiency, which has never ceased to be His habitual procedure towards him through His munificence, power, and might. Farewell!

Al-Rashīd's Answer to Harthamah's Letter

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. As follows: There has reached the Commander of the Faithful your letter mentioning your arrival in Marw on the day which you have specified and in the circumstances which you have described and which you have set forth in explanation; what ruses and subterfuges you employed before you reached Marw, what measures you adopted in regard to the administrative regions which you named and in regard to the appointment of your nominees as governors over those regions before you yourself passed beyond their boundaries, and what subtle measures you used in the matter which brought about the favorable circumstances which you sought in the affair of the traitor ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, his sons, the members of his family, and those of his financial agents and district governors who fell into your hands. [There has also reached him news of] your following exactly, in all this, what the Commander of the Faithful delineated to you as the way to proceed and what he rendered possible for you. The Commander of the Faithful has understood everything which you have written, and he has given profuse praises to God for that, for His guiding you aright and for what He helped you to accomplish through His divine aid, until you brought to pass the Commander of the Faithful's will, attained to his desire, performed well the matters about which he had been very anxious and had been dogged with worry, which he was [728] wanting firmly to accomplish through you and at your hands. May He reward you with beneficence for your wise counsel and your capability, and may God not deprive the Commander of the Faithful of the finest of conduct which he has experienced from you in everything which he has summoned you to undertake and for which he has relied upon you!

The Commander of the Faithful orders you to increase your efforts and determination in ferreting out the wealth of the traitor ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, his sons, secretaries, financial agents, stewards, and bankers, just as he has commanded you, and in investigating how they have swindled the Commander of the Faithful over his wealth and how they have oppressed the subjects in regard to their wealth. (He likewise commands you to redouble your efforts) in pursuing and in bringing to light this illicit wealth from the suspected hiding places and caches which ʿAlī took under his control and from the hands of those custodians of possessions to whom they had entrusted that (ill-gotten) wealth. You are to use a mixture of softness and harshness in all that, so that you are even-[729] tually able to extract what they have hidden. Do not spare yourself any effort over that, nor in meting out justice to the people in regard to their rights and their complaints of tyranny against ʿAlī and his followers, until no cause of complaint against them remains for any person seeking redress without your having employed all your efforts[966] on his behalf concerning that, and have set both the wrongdoer and the injured parties on the way of right and justice in regard to this grievance. When you have employed the greatest possible amount of firm measures[967] and zeal over that, send on the traitor, his sons, the members of his family, his secretaries, and his financial agents to the Commander of the Faithful in bonds and in the conditions of affliction [taghyīr][968] and exemplary punishment which they have merited by what

966. Thus according to the Leiden and Cairo texts, istaqḍayta; but the Glossarium, p. CDXXVII, suggests the possible reading istaqṣayta "(without) your having fully investigated. . . ." Again, the great floridity of the Arabic style here makes precise translation uncertain.

967. Reading, with the Cairo text, VIII, 336, al-iḥkām for the Leiden text's al-aḥkām.

968. For this sense, see Dozy, Supplément, II, 233b.

their hands have wrought for them. "God does not act wrongfully to his servants."[969]

Then embark upon what the Commander of the Faithful has commanded you to do, in proceeding to Samarqand and in using stratagems and blandishments with regard to the partisans of the obscure one [khāmil][970] and with those people of the districts of Transoxania and Ṭukhāristān[971] who have followed him in showing forth rebelliousness and defiance, by summoning them to return and revert to their allegiance and to the all-embracing offer of the Commander of the Faithful's guarantee of safe-conduct which he has charged you with offering to them. If they accept and consent to that and return to what is your own hope for them, and if they disband their forces, then this is what the Commander of the Faithful desires for them—to treat them by overlooking their misdeeds and pardoning them. For they are his subjects, and it is incumbent upon the Commander of the Faithful to treat them thus, since he answers their requests, reassures their fearful hearts, relieves them of rule by governors whose régimes they have hated, and commands that justice should be meted out to them in respect of their due rights and their complaints of oppression. But if they oppose the Commander of the Faithful's views, summon them to judgment before God, since they have rebelled and wrought evil, and have shown their aversion from the way of salvation and have rejected it. Indeed, the Commander of the Faithful has already decreed his course of action; hence, he has plunged people into affliction, inflicted exemplary punishment, dismissed people from office, substituted one person for another, overlooked the deeds of the person who has introduced an heretical innovation and pardoned the man guilty of a crime. He brings God to witness against them after that for any act of disobedience should they deliberately choose it and any act of rebelliousness should they manifest it. God is sufficient as a witness; there is no power and strength

969. Qur'ān, VIII, 53/51.

970. Contemptuous antiphrasis on the part of al-Rashīd for Rāfi' (literally, "the exalted one"), as is explicitly pointed out later by Ṭabarī, III, 734 (below, 298).

971. The region lying to the south of the upper Oxus, in what is now northern Afghanistan, Balkh being its mediaeval centre. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 23; Le Strange, Lands, 426–7; Barthold, Turkestan, 66–8; EI[1] s.v. Ṭokhāristān (Barthold).

except in God, the Exalted, the Mighty; he (i.e, the Caliph) reposes his trust in Him and returns to Him in repentance. Farewell!

Ismā'īl b. Ṣubayḥ wrote (this) in the Commander of the Faithful's presence.

[730] In this year, al-Faḍl b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī led the Pilgrimage, he being at that time governor of Mecca.[972]

After this year, the Muslims did not mount a summer expedition (against the Byzantines) until the year 215 (830–1).[973]

---

972. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 39; Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 738; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 738; Azdī, 312; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 206.

973. Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 747.

The Events of the Year 192

(November 6, 807–October 24, 808)

Among the events taking place during this year was the exchange of captives between the Muslims and the Byzantines arranged by Thābit b. Naṣr b. Mālik (al-Khuzāʿī).[974]

Al-Rashīd's Preparations for His Journey to Khurāsān

In this year, al-Rashīd arrived from al-Raqqah by boat at the City of Peace, intending to set out for Khurāsān and attack Rāfiʿ. His arrival at Baghdad was on Friday, the twenty-fourth of Rabīʿ II (February 26, 808).[975] He appointed as his deputy in al-Raqqah his son al-Qāsim, giving him as support Khuzaymah b. Khāzim. Then he set out from the City of Peace on the evening of Monday (i.e., the Sunday evening), the fifth of Shaʿbān (June 4, 808), after the 974. Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 190, tr. 256–7; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 208; Brooks, loc. cit.; *EI*² s.v. Lamas-Ṣū (Huart). This exchange, the fidāʾ Thābit b. Naṣr, the second one enumerated by the sources, took place at the Budandūn river, as specified by Ṭabarī, III, 732 (below, 295).

975. Actually, a Saturday.

afternoon worship and from al-Khayzurāniyyah.[976] He passed the night in the Garden of Abū Ja'far,[977] and then set off the next evening for Nahrawān. He encamped there, and sent back Ḥammād al-Barbarī to his administrative charges and appointed his son Muḥammad as his deputy in the City of Peace.[978]

It has been mentioned from Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn[979] (i.e., from al-Faḍl b. Sahl) that he said: When al-Rashīd decided to set out from Khurāsān in order to attack Rāfi', I said to al-Ma'mūn, "You don't know what's going to happen to al-Rashīd whilst he is en route for Khurāsān, which is your governorship; Muḥammad is your superior, and the most favorable way in which he is likely to treat you is to deprive you of the succession (after him), for he is the son of Zubaydah, his maternal uncles are the Hāshimites, and Zubaydah [731] and all her wealth (will be an added reinforcement for him).[980] So request al-Rashīd to let you go forth with him." Al-Ma'mūn accordingly asked al-Rashīd for permission to accompany him, but the latter refused. So I said to al-Ma'mūn, "Tell him, 'You are ill, and I only wished to render you service, and I shan't be a burden upon you in any way.'" So al-Rashīd allowed him to accompany him, and he departed.[981]

Al-Rashīd's Serious Medical Condition and His Premonitions of Death

Muḥammad b. al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Ṭabarī has mentioned that his father accompanied al-Rashīd on the opening stages when he set out for Khurāsān. He went with him as far as al-Nahrawān, and al-Rashīd 976. The quarter of Baghdad either owned by or named after al-Rashīd's mother. See Ibn Abī Ṭāhir Ṭayfūr, 2; Abbott, 120–1.

977. I.e., of the Caliph al-Manṣūr.

978. Jahshiyārī, 214–15; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 520; Dīnawarī, 391; Azdī, 312; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr., IV, 475; K. al-'Uyūn, 315; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 207; Abbott, 202; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 188; Kennedy, 132.

979. This title, "Possessor of the two commands," i.e., military and civil, was conferred on al-Faḍl subsequent to this period, in 196 (812), by al-Ma'mūn; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 201, 203 n. 2.

980. The text here, and in the corresponding passages in the K. al-'Uyūn and Ibn al-Athīr, is evidently defective; the editor of the Leiden text suggests, in n. g, the supplying of the phrase rid'un lahu, followed for the translation here.

981. Jahshiyārī, 215; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr., IV, 475–6; K. al-'Uyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Palmer, 113–14; Gabrieli, "Successione," 350; Abbott, loc. cit.

began to talk with him along the road until he said to him, "O Ṣabbāḥ, I don't think you will ever see me again." He related: I replied, "Nay, God will bring you back hale and hearty; He has rendered you victorious, and has displayed to you the realization of your hopes in regard to your enemies." The Caliph said, "O Ṣabbāḥ, I don't think you know what I am suffering." I replied, "No, by God!" He said, "Come here, and let me show you." He related: He went aside from the road to a distance of a hundred cubits. He sheltered in the shade of a tree, and made signs to his personal eunuchs [khadamihi al-khāṣṣah],[982] and they thereupon withdrew. Then he said, "O Ṣabbāḥ, (I promise you) the protection of God if you will conceal my secret." I replied, "O my master, I am your humble servant; you are addressing me as one addresses one's child!"

He related: He bared his abdomen, and lo, he had a silken bandage round it.[983] He said, "This is a morbid condition which I conceal from everyone. Each one of my sons has an observer over me—Masrūr being al-Ma'mūn's observer, Jibrīl b. Bukhtīshū' being al-Amīn's one," and he named a third one whose name I have forgotten, "and every single one of them is only counting my very breaths, numbering my days and considering my life as going on too long. If you want to know this for sure, then summon a horse this very instant, and they will bring me an emaciated hack which [732] goes with short steps, so that it makes my affliction worse." I replied, "O my master, I can't make any answer to these words, nor regarding the heirs to your succession, except that I say, May God make as a sacrifice instead of you those persons—jinn and men, close relatives and distant ones—who are showing hatred towards you, and may He consign them to that (i.e., death) before you! May God never let us see anything unpleasant happening to you! May He make Islam flourish through you, and may He, through your continued preservation, support its columns and strengthen its flanks! May God bring you back victorious and successful to the fullest extent of your hopes regarding your enemies and (grant you) what you hope from your Lord!" Al-Rashīd said, "As for you, you have shown yourself as detached from either of the two parties (i.e., the supporters of al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn, respectively)." He related: Then al-Rashīd called for a horse, and they brought him one just as he had described. He looked at me, and then he rode off on it, saying, "Go back, without having been properly bid farewell, for you have many responsibilities and preoccupations." Accordingly, I merely said goodbye to him, and that was the last time I ever saw him.[984]

982. It is not clear whether these were a formally constituted group within the general body of the eunuchs, but these khadam al-khāṣṣah are again mentioned as existing under al-Amīn, in Ṭabarī, III, 969.

983. In the editor's n. f, Ibn al-Jawzī's detailed description of ulcers is given; cf. Abbott, 203 n. 92. According to the Qāḍī Ibn al-Zubayr, 97, § 114, al-Rashīd had for some time suffered from hemorrhoids.

Various Items of Information

In this year, the Khurramiyyah became active in the region of Azerbaijan, so al-Rashīd sent 'Abdallāh b. Mālik against them with a force of ten thousand cavalry; 'Abdallāh took (male) prisoners and captured (the enemy's women and children), and met up with al-Rashīd at Qarmāsīn. Al-Rashīd then ordered the male prisoners to be killed and the captured women and children to be sold into slavery.[985]

In this year, the judge 'Alī b. Ẓabyān died at Qaṣr al-Luṣūṣ.[986]

---

984. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 207–8; Palmer, 120–1; Gabrieli, loc. cit.; Abbott, 203.

985. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 739; Dīnawarī, 391–2; Azdī, 313; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 208.

986. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit.

987. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; the outbreak of his revolt was noted in Ṭabarī, III, 711 (above, 266).

988. Commander who was to be prominent under al-Ma'mūn and his successors as a military leader and provincial governor.

989. Min abnā' al-shī'ah, one of the designations for the Abnā'; see Ṭabarī, III, 572 (above, 46, n. 183).

990. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Daniel, 174.

991. Apparently a local rebel in Egypt, not to be confused with the 'Abbāsid prince of the same name later active as a supporter of the rival Caliph Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī and executed by al-Ma'mūn, see Ṭabarī, III, 1073, 1075–6.

992. On the Ḥawf or Aḥwāf, see Ṭabarī, III, 629 (above, 141, n. 516).

993. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Brooks, EHR, XV (1900), 747. On Maṭmūrah, see Ṭabarī, III, 646 (above, 165–66, n. 603).

994. See on this exchange, Ṭabarī, III, 730 (above, 291).

995. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 739, according to whom Tharwān killed Salm (?) b. Salm b. Qutaybah; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit. The Ṭaff ("edge, fringe, shore") was the edge of the cultivated land lying along the Euphrates in Iraq; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 35–6.

996. According to Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit., Maqdisī, 114, and other geograph-

In this year, Yaḥyā b. Muʿādh brought (the Syrian rebel) Abū al-Nidāʾ to al-Rashīd whilst the latter was at al-Raqqah, and al-Rashīd had him killed.[987]

In this year, ʿUjayf b. ʿAnbasah[988] and al-Aḥwaṣ b. Muhājir, together with a number of members of the earlier supporters in Khurāsān of the ʿAbbāsids,[989] deserted Rāfiʿ b. Layth's side and went over to Harthamah.[990]

In this year, Ibn ʿĀʾishah,[991] together with a number of persons from the Aḥwāf of Egypt,[992] was brought in.

In this year, he (i.e., the Caliph) appointed Thābit b. Naṣr b. Mālik governor of the frontier regions (i.e., of the Byzantine marches). He led raids and then captured Maṭmurāh.[993]

In this year, there took place the exchange of captives at al-Budandūn.[994]

In this year, Tharwān al-Ḥarūrī became active and killed the government's financial agent in the Ṭaff of al-Baṣrah.[995]

In this year, ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā was brought to Baghdad and then imprisoned in his own house.

In this year, ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar (b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr) died in Ṭabaristān or, it is said alternatively, at Daskarah, whilst he was en route to join al-Rashīd.[996] [733]

In this year, al-Rashīd had al-Hayṣam al-Yamānī killed.[997]

In this year, al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh[998] b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr led the Pilgrimage.[999] ical sources, ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar died in Ṭabaristān; according to Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., at Daskarah (probably the Daskarat al-Malik one stage from the town of al-Nahrawān on the high road to Khurāsān; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 455; Le Strange, Lands, 62; and EI[2] s.v. [A. A. Duri]).

---

997. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 499; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 209.

998. Thus, correctly for the text's ʿUbaydallāh.

999. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 39; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit.; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 522.

The Events of the Year 193

(October 25, 808–October 14, 809)

The Illness and Death of al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā al-Barmakī

Among the events taking place during this year was the death of al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak in prison at al-Raqqah in al-Muḥarram (October–November, 808). According to what has been mentioned, the onset of his illness was marked by a paralytic stroke affecting his tongue and a side of the body. He had previously been wont to say, "I don't want al-Rashīd to die (before me)," and people used to say to him in reply, "Don't you want God to grant you deliverance (i.e., release from existence in prison)?" But he would answer, "My fate is linked with his fate." He remained under medical treatment for several months and then recovered. He began to talk once again, but then became severely ill once more. His tongue and his side became paralyzed in their functions, and he moved inexorably towards death. He remained in that state on Thursday and Friday, and died during the call for the dawn prayer (on Saturday), five months before al-Rashīd's own death and at the age of forty-five. The people displayed their grief over him, and his brothers prayed over him in the palace where they were lodged before al-Faḍl's body being brought forth (from his prison). Then his corpse was brought forth, and the people performed the worship over his funeral bier.[1000]

In this year, Sa'īd al-Ṭabarī, known as al-Jawharī, died.[1001]

Al-Rashīd's Journey from Jurjān to Ṭūs

In this year, Hārūn reached Jurjān in Ṣafar (November–December, 808), and there met him in Jurjān the treasuries of 'Alī b. 'Īsā, conveyed on the backs of fifteen hundred camels.[1002] After this, he set out from Jurjān, according to what has been mentioned, in Ṣafar, in a sick state, to Ṭūs, where he remained till he died. He became suspicious of Harthamah, so he sent his son al-Ma'mūn twenty- [734] three nights before he died to Marw, accompanied by 'Abdallāh b. Mālik, Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh, Asad b. Yazīd b. Mazyad, al-'Abbās b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, al-Sindī b. al-Ḥarashī,[1003] and Nu'aym b. Ḥāzim, with Ayyūb b. Abī Sumayr[1004] to act as his secretary and vizier. Then Hārūn's suffering grew worse until he became too weak to travel.[1005]

Al-Rashīd's Vengeance on Rāfi' b. Layth's Brother Bashīr

In this year, there took place a battle campaign between Harthamah and Rāfi''s partisans, in the course of which Harthamah conquered Bukhārā and took prisoner Rāfi''s brother Bashīr b. al-Layth.[1006] He then sent the latter to al-Rashīd at Ṭūs. It has been mentioned from Ibn Jāmi' al-Marwazī, from his father, who said: I 1000. Jahshiyārī, 210–11, with the exact date of death as Saturday, the twenty-fifth of al-Muḥarram (November 18, 808); Azdī, 316; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 210; Ibn Khallikān, IV, 436, tr. II, 467; Bouvat, 100; Abbott, 199–200.

1001. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

1002. According to Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr. IV, 476, these treasuries amounted to eighty million dirhams in specie plus the textiles.

1003. Maqrīzī, in Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXIII, has "al-Sindī and Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī."

1004. Ayyūb shared with al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' the duty of presenting ['arḍ] petitions and requests to the Caliph, according to Jahshiyārī, 215, and later acted as chief secretary-vizier to al-Ma'mūn. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 184, 198.

1005. Jahshiyārī, 214–15; K. al-'Uyūn, 317; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 212; Gabrieli, "Successione," 350; Kennedy, 132.

1006. Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr., IV, 477; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 210; Daniel, 174.

was one of those who brought Rāfi'ʿs brother to al-Rashīd. He related: Bashīr went into al-Rashīd's presence, when the Caliph was lying on a bed [sarīr],[1007] elevated above the ground by the length of the bone of the forearm, with a coverlet over him hanging down the same amount—or, he related, longer—and with a mirror in his hand with which he was regarding his face. He related: I heard him saying, "Indeed we belong to God and to Him we return!" and he looked at Rāfi'ʿs brother and said, "By God, indeed, O son of a stinking uncircumcised whore, I certainly hope that the obscure one [khāmil]"—he meant Rāfi'—"will not escape me, just as you have not escaped me!" Rāfi'ʿs brother said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, I have been an enemy of yours, and God has rendered you victorious over me. Hence, do what God approves (i.e., show clemency), and I will be a man at peace with you; it may also be that God will soften Rāfi'ʿs heart for you when he learns that you have shown benevolence towards me!" But al-Rashīd grew enraged and said, "By God, if I had no more life left to me than the ability to form a single word with my lips, I would say, 'Kill him!'" Then he summoned a butcher and told him, "Don't sharpen your knives, leave them as they are, dismember this evildoer son of an evildoer and be quick about it! I don't want death to come upon me whilst two of his limbs remain on his body!" So the butcher dismembered him until he left him a pile of chopped-up limbs. The Caliph said, "Count up the pieces of his body." I [735] counted the pieces, and lo, they came to fourteen pieces. He raised his hands toward heaven and cried, "O God, just as you have given me power to exact vengeance for you and power over your enemy, and I have now done it to your satisfaction, grant me likewise power over his brother." Then he lost consciousness, and those present dispersed.[1008]

In this year, Hārūn al-Rashīd died.

1007. See on this piece of furniture, Sourdel, "Questions de cérémoniale 'abbaside," 130–2; Sadan, 32–51.

1008. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VI, 357–8 = ed. Pellat, § 2555; Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr., loc. cit.; K. al-'Uyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 212; Palmer, 124; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 225. In Jahshiyārī, 221–2, the brother of Rāfi'ʿs executed in this horrible fashion, together with others of Rafi'ʿs kindred, is named as Marwān.

The Occasion of al-Rashīd's Death and the Place Where He Died

It has been mentioned from Jibrīl b. Bukhtīshūʿ that he said: I was with al-Rashīd in al-Raqqah, and I used to be the first to come in to him each morning, and I would thereby learn (or: so that I might thereby learn) how he had passed the night. If he had experienced something unpleasant, he would describe it, and then he would become more relaxed and would talk to me about what his slave girls were doing, and what he had done in his court session, the amount he had drunk and the amount of time he had spent in session, and then he would ask me for news about the activities of the common people and their conditions of life. Hence, one morning I went into his presence and greeted him, but he hardly raised his glance, and I saw that he was frowning, was sunk in thought, and was preoccupied. I stood there before him for a considerable while of the daylight, whilst he remained thus. When that continued for a long time, I stepped forward towards him and said, "O my master—may God make me your ransom!—why are you like this? Is it some illness? (If so,) tell me about it, and I may have in my possession the appropriate medicine for it. Or has something calamitous struck someone whom you love? (If this latter,) then that is something which cannot be warded off and there is nothing to be done regarding it except resignation and grieving, and there is no redress possible for it. Or has some breach occurred in the fabric of your royal power? (If so,) well, all monarchs are liable to that sort of thing. (In any case,) I am the most suitable person to whom you can pass on the news and in whom you can seek consolation through asking for advice."

He replied, "Alas, O Jibrīl, my grief and sadness are not on account of any of the things you have mentioned, but because of a dream which I had during this last night and which has terrified me, filled my breast (with foreboding), and weighed heavily on my heart." I said, "You have dispelled my fears, O Commander of the Faithful!" and I drew near him and kissed his foot, and I said, "Is all this grief because of a mere dream? Dreams only come from [736] some fancy within the mind, or from unpleasant vapors, or some bogey arising from a fit of melancholy; they are only 'tangles of dreams,'[1009] after all this." He replied, "Let me recount it to you. I saw, in my dream, as if I were seated on this bed of mine, when from below me, a forearm and a hand, both of which I recognized but did not know the name of the owner, appeared. In the hand was a fistful of red earth. Then someone, whose voice I could hear but not see his person, said, 'This (is) the earth in which you are going to be buried.' I said, 'Where is this earth?' The voice replied, 'At Ṭūs,' and the hand and arm disappeared from view, the voice was cut off, and I woke up." I said, "O my master, by God, this is a farfetched and confused dream! I think that you went to your bed and then started thinking about Khurāsān, the wars there and the problem of the political disintegration of part of it which has presented itself to you." He said, "It may have been that." He related: I said, "As a result of your pondering over that, these things have entered into your sleep and have given rise to this dream, so don't worry about it—may God make me your ransom!—and let this grief be followed by joy, which will dispel it from your head and not give rise to any sickness!" He related: I kept on soothing his mind with various kinds of devices until he found consolation and his spirits rose; he ordered the preparation of various things which he liked, and that day he carried his diversion and enjoyment to a high degree.[1010]

The days went by, and both he and we forgot that dream and it never came into the mind of any of us. Then al-Rashīd decided upon his journeying to Khurāsān when Rāfiʿ rebelled. When he was some way along the road, the onset of illness struck him and it got continuously worse until we reached Ṭūs. We halted at the residence of al-Junayd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (al-Murrī)[1011] in an estate of his (i.e., of al-Rashīd's) called Sanābādh.[1012] Whilst he was lying ill in a garden of his in that palace, he suddenly remembered that dream. He rose up with difficulty, standing upright for a 1009. Qur'ān, XII, 44.

1010. K. al-ʿUyūn, 316–17; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 211–12; Palmer, 122–3.

1011. A commander prominent under the later Umayyads, inter alia as governor of Sind and then in 112 (730) of Khurāsān; see Crone, 98. On the varied accounts in the sources concerning the house where al-Rashīd spent his last hours, see EI[1] s.v. Meshhed (Streck).

1012. Subsequently, this village was to have the graves of both al-Rashīd and the Eighth Imām of the Shīʿah, ʿAlī al-Riḍā; on this site grew up the later town of Mashhad. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 259; Le Strange, Lands, 388; Streck, op. cit.

moment and then collapsing. We gathered round him, all of us saying, "O my master, how are you feeling and what's happened to you?" He replied, "O Jibrīl, you recall my dream at al-Raqqah concerning Ṭūs?" Then he raised his head towards Masrūr and said, "Bring me some of the earth from this garden." So Masrūr went along and came back with a handful of earth, having pulled [737] back his sleeve from his forearm. Then when al-Rashīd looked at me, he said, "By God, this is the forearm which I saw in my dream; by God, this is the very same hand; and by God, this is the red earth, you haven't omitted anything!" and he began to weep and lament volubly. Then, by God, he died in that spot three days later and was buried in that garden.[1013]

A certain authority has mentioned that Jibrīl b. Bukhtīshū' had made a mistake regarding al-Rashīd's illness in some treatment he prescribed for him which was, in fact, the cause of his death. Al-Rashīd had therefore decided, the night in which he died, to put Jibrīl to death and to have his limbs dismembered just as he had had Rāfi''s brother dismembered. He sent for Jibrīl b. Bukhtīshū' in order to inflict that on him, but Jibrīl said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, grant me a respite till tomorrow morning, for you will then find yourself restored to health." Then he died that same day.[1014]

Al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī al-Raba'ī has mentioned that his father transmitted the information to him from his own father—who was a camel driver with a hundred camels—who related that he conveyed al-Rashīd to Ṭūs. He related: Al-Rashīd said, "Dig me a grave before I die," so they dug one for him. He related: I conveyed him in a covered litter [qubbah], leading him along, until he was able to see it (i.e., the grave). He related: Then he said (to himself), "O son of Adam, you are moving towards this destination!"

A certain authority has mentioned that, when his illness became

---

1013. K. al-'Uyūn, 316; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 212. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVII, 49–50 = ed. Cairo, XVIII, 249, has a variant of this story of al-Rashīd being shown in a dream a handful of earth from his own tomb.

1014. Ibn Abī Uṣaybi'ah, I, 128–30; Abbott, 203. In Ṭabarī-Bal'amī, tr., IV, 476–7, it is said that the Indian physician Mankah (see Ṭabarī, III, 747–8, below, 313–14) was summoned from India at this juncture to treat the Caliph and foretold that al-Rashīd would die before he could inflict vengeance on Jibrīl for his faulty treatment; but A. Müller, "Arabische Quellen zur Geschichte der indischen Medizin," 496–7, pointed out that this is most improbable.

severe, he gave orders for his grave, and it was dug in one spot of the residence where he was lodging, in a place called al-Muthaqqab in the residence of Ḥumayd b. Abī Ghānim al-Ṭā'ī.[1015] When he had completed having his grave dug, he got a group of people to descend into it, and they recited there the whole Qur'ān until they reached the end of it, al-Rashīd being meanwhile in a litter on the edge of the grave.[1016]

Muḥammad b. Ziyād b. Muḥammad b. Ḥātim b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah[1017] has mentioned that Sahl b. Ṣā'id[1018] transmitted the information to him, saying: I was with al-Rashīd in the house where he was overtaken by death and at the moment when he was near the point of death. He called for a thick coverlet, and drew up his legs to his body and wrapped it round them, and he began to [738] suffer dreadfully. I rose up, but he said to me, "Sit down, O Sahl," so I sat down again and remained thus for a long time, without either him speaking to me or I to him, and with the coverlet meanwhile slipping down and his wrapping it round himself once more. When this had gone on for a considerable while, I got up, but he said to me, "Where are you off to, O Sahl?" I replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, my heart cannot endure watching the Commander of the Faithful suffer thus terribly from his illness; if only, O Commander of the Faithful, you would lie down, that would give you greater relief." He related: Al-Rashīd laughed as a healthy man might laugh and then said, "O Sahl, I recall, in this present state of mine, the words of the poet,

---

1015. Streck, EI[1] s.v. Meshhed, notes that Ḥumayd b. Abī Ghānim must in fact be the deputy naqīb in the 'Abbāsid Revolution Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah, governor of Khurāsān 152–9/769–76 (see Crone, 188), and the disparity between the mentions of the houses of al-Junayd and Ḥumayd as the scene of the Caliph's death is easily explicable by the latter having taken over the former's residence whilst governor, the whole estate perhaps passing into the hands of the 'Abbāsid family after Ḥumayd's death.

1016. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 213.

1017. Descendant of the Prophet's Companion Abū Bakrah, of mawlā origin, and of his son the Umayyad commander 'Ubaydallāh; see Crone, 140, and EI[2] s.v. Abū Bakra (M.Th. Houtsma and Pellat).

1018. Mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 772–3, as being steward of al-Ma'mūn's household ['alā qahramatihi] in Marw at this time and as being one of al-Ma'mūn's two trusted envoys sent immediately after his father's death to the army of Iraq at Ṭūs to dissuade them from breaking their bay'ah to al-Rashīd and returning to Iraq with al-Amīn; cf. Gabrieli, "Successione," 353–4.

Indeed, I come from a noble tribe, whom adverse circumstances only increase in refractoriness and endurance of hardship.[1019]

It has been mentioned from Masrūr al-Kabīr that he said: When the end of al-Rashīd's allotted span was nigh and he felt the onset of death, he ordered me to lay out the pieces of silk brocade and then bring to him the finest and most expensive garment I could find there. I did not in fact find all these qualities in a single garment, but I did find two garments which were the most costly ones imaginable; I found that they[1020] were similar in value, except that one was slightly more expensive than the other and that one garment was red and the other green. I brought them both to him. He looked at them, and I explained to him about their respective value. He said, "Use the finest one as my shroud, and put the other back in its place."

According to what has been mentioned, he expired in a spot called al-Muthaqqab in the residence of Ḥumayd b. Abī Ghānim in the middle of the night, on the night of Saturday (i.e., the night of Friday-Saturday), the third of Jumādā II of this year (March 24, 809). His son Ṣāliḥ prayed over him, and al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ and Ismāʿīl b. Ṣubayḥ, and from among his eunuchs Masrūr, Ḥusayn, and Rashīd, were actually present at his death.[1021] His caliphate lasted for twenty-three years, two months, and eighteen days, beginning on the night of Friday (i.e., Thursday-Friday), the sixteenth of Rabīʿ I, 170 (September 15, 786) and ending on the night [739] of Saturday (i.e., Friday-Saturday), the third of Jumādā II, 193.[1022]

Hishām b. Muḥammad (i.e., Ibn al-Kalbī) has said: Abū Jaʿfar

1019. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.; Palmer, 124–5.

1020. Reading with the Cairo text, VIII, 345, wajadtuhumā.

1021. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 521; Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr., IV, 477–8; K. al-ʿUyūn, 318; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 213–14; Abbott, 203.

1022. The sources are very much at variance here regarding the date of al-Rashīd's death. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, 39, has either the first or the third of Jumādā II. Jahshiyārī, 223, does not specify the actual day of Jumādā II. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 740, Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 521, Azdī, 316–17, and K. al-ʿUyūn, 318, have the night of Saturday-Sunday the first of Jumādā I (but this date was actually a Tuesday). Dīnawarī, 392, has Saturday, the fifth of Jumādā II (March 26, 809). Shābushtī, 227, and Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 345–6, tr. 444, have Saturday, the fourth of Jumādā II (March 25, 809).

Hārūn b. Muḥammad al-Rashīd was hailed as Caliph on the night of Friday (i.e., the night of Thursday-Friday), the fourteenth of Rabīʿ I, 170 (September 13, 786),[1023] when he was twenty-two years old and he died on the night of Sunday (i.e., the night of Saturday-Sunday), the first of Jumādā I, 193 (February 20, 809),[1024] when he was forty-five years old, and he reigned for twenty-three years, one month, and sixteen days.[1025] It has also been said that, on the day he died, he was forty-seven years, five months, and five days old, his birthday being the twenty-sixth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 145 (March 17, 763) and the day of his death being the second of Jumādā II, 193 (March 23, 809).[1026] He was handsome, with a comely face, pale complexion and curly hair which had become white.[1027]

The Governors in the Provincial Capitals in Hārūn al-Rashīd's Reign

The governors of Medina: Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī; ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī; Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh; Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā; Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm; ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā; Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm; ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab al-Zubayrī; Bakkār b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab; Abū al-Bakhtarī Wahb b. Wahb.

The governors of Mecca: al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm; Sulaymān b. Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān; Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā; ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm; ʿAbdallāh b. Qutham b. al-ʿAbbās; Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm; ʿUbaydallāh b. Qutham; ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿImrān; ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm; al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā; ʿAlī b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā; Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-ʿUthmānī; Ḥammād al-Barbarī; Sulaymān b. Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān; Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAlī; al-Faḍl b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad. [740]

The governors of al-Kūfah: Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā; Yaʿqūb b. Abī Jaʿfar; Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā; al-ʿAbbās b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā; Isḥāq b.

1023. Actually, a Wednesday.

1024. Actually, a Tuesday.

1025. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, loc. cit.; Shābushtī, loc. cit.; Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, IV, 478; K. al-ʿUyūn, loc. cit.

1026. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 214. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, loc. cit., makes him forty-six at his death.

1027. Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 346, tr. 444; Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr., IV, loc. cit.; K. al-ʿUyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Kindī; Ja'far b. Ja'far b. Abī Ja'far; Mūsā b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā; al-'Abbās b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā; Mūsā b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā.

The governors of al-Baṣrah: Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī; Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far; 'Īsā b. Ja'far b. Abī Ja'far; Khuzaymah b. Khāzim; 'Īsā b. Ja'far; Jarīr b. Yazīd; Ja'far b. Sulaymān; Ja'far b. Abī Ja'far; 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī; Mālik b. 'Alī al-Khuzā'ī; Isḥāq b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī; Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far; 'Īsā b. Ja'far; al-Ḥasan b. Jamīl, mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful; Isḥāq b. 'Īsā b. 'Alī.

The governors of Khurāsān: Abū al-'Abbās al-Ṭūsī; Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath; al-'Abbās b. Ja'far; al-Ghiṭrīf b. 'Aṭā'; Sulaymān b. Rāshid, over the land tax (only); Ḥamzah b. Mālik; al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā; Manṣūr b. Yazīd b. Manṣūr; Ja'far b. Yaḥyā, his deputy there being 'Alī b. al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah; 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān; Harthamah b. A'yan.[1028]

Some Aspects of al-Rashīd's Conduct and Mode of Life

Al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad has mentioned from his father, who had it from al-'Abbās, who said: Al-Rashīd used to perform one hundred (supererogatory) bowings [rak'ahs] per day as part of his daily sessions of worship until he departed this life, unless he happened to be ill, (in which case) he used to give as voluntary alms [kāna yataṣaddaqu], out of his own money, one thousand dirhams for each day, on top of what he gave as the obligatory poor- [741] tax [zakāt].[1029] When he performed the Pilgrimage, there performed it with him a hundred legal scholars and their sons; and when he could not perform it personally, he sent (in his stead) three hundred men on the Pilgrimage with generous expense allowances and a splendid covering for the Ka'bah [kiswah].[1030]

He used consciously to follow in the footsteps of al-Manṣūr and used to endeavor to model his own conduct on that, except in regard to the expending of money,[1031] for no Caliph before him had 1028. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 741–8; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 214–15.

1029. Cf. Ibn Khaldūn, tr. I, 33.

1030. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 217. For the kiswah, see EI[2] s.v. Ka'ba (Wensinck-J. Jomier).

1031. Al-Manṣūr had put the newly established 'Abbāsid caliphate on a firm financial footing by his careful stewardship, earning for himself the nickname of ever been known as more lavish in distributing money, and then al-Ma'mūn after him (was likewise lavish). He would never let anyone's good action go neglected by him, nor would he put off recognition of that action as soon as it merited reward.[1032]

He used to like poets and poetry, and have a penchant for literary persons and those learned in the religious law; but he used to dislike disputes over religious matters, saying that it was a profitless exercise and that, very probably, there was no (heavenly) reward for it. He used to love panegyric poetry, especially that of an eloquent poet, and he would purchase this at a high price. Ibn Abī Ḥafṣah has mentioned that Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah went into al-Rashīd's presence on Sunday, the third of Ramaḍān, (1)81 (October 29, 797), and recited to him the poem of his in which he says,

Through Hārūn, the frontier gaps were closed up, and the rope strands of the Muslims' affairs made secure through him.
His banner has not ceased to be raised in victory;
he has an army, from which other armies are shattered into splinters.
Every monarch of Byzantium has paid tribute to him unwillingly, out of hand constrainedly, in a state of humiliation.[1033] Hārūn has left al-Ṣafṣāf ("the Willow Fortress") a plain razed level [ṣafṣaf],[1034] as if no person had ever left there traces of his own presence and his animals.
[742] He halted before al-Ṣafṣāf until he sacked and threw it open for plundering, and then a most tenacious one, one vying for superiority,

Abū al-Fulūs "Father of farthings." See Tha'ālibī, Laṭā'if, 22, tr. 50, and on these accusations and denials of his stinginess, Sadan, "The division of the day and programme of work of the Caliph al-Manṣūr," Studia orientalia memoriae D. H. Baneth dedicata, 256 n. 3.

1032. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

1033. Echoing Qur'ān, IX, 29, in which it is said that the People of the Book (which would here, by extension, include the Byzantines) are to be combatted till they pay the poll-tax, in a state of humiliation [wa-hum ṣāghirūn].

1034. Cf. Ṭabarī, III, 646 (above, 165) for a rajaz-verse using the paronomasia (here, technically, jinās al-ishtiqāq).

contended with him (i.e., the Byzantine Emperor) for possession of it among the frontier fortresses.
All eyes are raised to his face, whereas all other eyes gazing on people have never been raised to the like of Hārūn.
You see all around him the rich masters of the house of Hāshim, just as the shining stars surround the full moon.
The noble ones of Quraysh urge along his hands, and both of these hands are a swollen sea (i.e., of bounty) to the people.
When the people lack clouds (i.e., of largesse), there come down successively on them, through the agency of your two hands, thick clouds bearing rain.
Quraysh entrusted their affairs (i.e., in the matter of the caliphate) to you with full confidence, just as the traveller throws down his staff (i.e., he arrives and halts at his final destination, and hence can dispense with his staff), Affairs handed down as the inheritance of the Prophet, of which you have taken control, and which you, with your firm resolution, keep concealed or divulge.
They have finally reached you, and have then come to rest (in you); and it is only to those who are worthy of it (i.e., of the Prophet's inheritance) that the end of affairs finally reaches.
You have left us as your successor one who is divinely guided in justice and liberality, and the virtue of kindness is not one to be belittled nor is the decision an unjust one.
The sons of ʿAbbās are light-giving stars;
when one star disappears from view, another shining one comes into sight.
O progeny of the one who provided water for the pilgrims (i.e., Hāshim),[1035] [743] the first installments and the latter ones of your generosity have come upon me successively, 1035. See on Hāshim's right of siqāyah, Ṭabarī, III, 631 (above, 144, and n. 532).

So that I have become quite certain that I cannot give adequate thanks for your beneficence, although I am truly thankful.
The people are just like a man who goes down to your cisterns to drink, and who goes away from them with thirst quenched with water.
The arms of the children of 'Abbās, in every straitened place of fighting,
(are) the foremost parts of spear shafts and sharp-edged swords.
Hence, on one occasion they brandish trenchant swords and spears[1036] while on another, the sceptres and staffs of royal authority are waved in their hands.
In the hands of those who are powerful in conferring benefits and wreaking harm, which never become tired for them in conferring gifts, even when death is pressing hard.
May the royal power, whose throne and pulpits have become through you proudly exalted, bring joy to you!
Your forefather (i.e., al-'Abbās) was the helper of the Chosen One, and not Hāshim,[1037] even though the haughty noses (i.e., the pride) of those who envy you may be brought low![1038]

Al-Rashīd then gave him five thousand dīnārs, and Marwān took possession of it on the spot; he gave him his own robe as a token of honor, ordering him to be given ten Greek slaves, and he provided him with a horse from his choicest mounts.[1039]

It has been mentioned that Ibn Abī Maryam al-Madanī was one of al-Rashīd's companions, and he was full of fun with the Caliph, full of stimulating conversation, and cheerful company. Al-Rashīd could not bear to be without him and never got tired of talking 1036. Following the emendation suggested by Von Kremer, in Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXIII, and the Cairo text, VIII, 348, makhāṣir, instead of the text's maḥāḍir "judicial decrees."

1037. Thus, implicitly excluding the family of 'Alī, descendents of al-'Abbās's brother Abū Ṭālib.

1038. Munierah al-Rasheed, 122–3, no. 68; Shi'r Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah, 53–4, no. 34; Harley, "Abu's-Simṭ Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah," 84.

1039. Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

with him. He was one of the persons who combined these last qualities with knowledge of stories about the Ḥijāzīs, the nicknames of the noble Arabs, and the ruses of the dissolute persons and scoffers [mujjān]. Ibn Abī Maryam's intimacy with al-Rashīd grew so close that the latter established him in a lodging in his own palace, and let him mingle with his womenfolk, his intimates, his mawlās and his slaves. Al-Rashīd went along one night, when Ibn Abī Maryam was asleep, although the dawn had started to gleam and he himself had got up to perform the worship, and found Ibn Abī Maryam asleep. So he pulled the coverlet off from his back and then said to him, "How are you this morning?" Ibn Abī Maryam replied, "O you there, I don't yet know how I feel this morning, go away, and get on with your work." Al-Rashīd said, "Shame on you! Get up for the worship!" He replied, "This is the time for the morning worship according to Abū al-Jārūd,[1040] whereas I am a follower of the judge Abū Yūsuf."[1041] So al-Rashīd went on his way and left him sleeping. Al-Rashīd got ready for the worship. Then Ibn Abī Maryam's slave came to him and said, "The Commander of the Faithful has gone along for the preliminary stages of the worship."[1042] So Ibn Abī Maryam got up, threw over himself his robes, and proceeded towards him, and lo, there was al-Rashīd reciting the Qur'ān in the dawn worship. He came up to him when he was reciting the words, "And why should I not worship the One who created me?"[1043] and Ibn Abī Maryam said, "By God, I don't know!" Al-Rashīd could not prevent himself from bursting into laughter in the midst of the worship. Then he turned to Ibn Abī Maryam, as if he were angry, and said, "O Ibn Abī Maryam, you even jest in the middle of the worship?" Ibn Abī Maryam replied, "O you there, and what have I done?" Al-Rashīd said, "You've interrupted the thread of my act of worship." He replied, "By God, I haven't done that. I merely heard some words [744]

1040. Abū al-Jārūd Ziyād b. al-Mundhir was a legal scholar and commentator who supported the Fifth Imām of the Shī'ah Muḥammad al-Bāqir's son Zayd and consequently founded the Jārūdiyyah subsect of the Zaydīs. See Van Arendonck, 78–80; Madelung, Der Imām al-Qāsim, 44 ff.; GAS, I, 528, 552.

1041. See Ṭabarī, III, 609 [above, 109 and n. 417].

1042. I.e., for the iqāmah, the second call to worship which begins the ṣalāt proper; see EI[2] s.v. Iḳāma [T. W. Juynboll].

1043. Qur'ān, XXXVI, 21/22.

from you which disturbed me when you said, 'And why should I not worship the One who created me?' so I said, 'By God, I don't know!'" Then he went back. Al-Rashīd laughed, but he added, "Take care not to joke about the Qur'ān and religion; but apart from those two topics, you can say what you like."[1044]

A certain one of al-Rashīd's eunuchs has mentioned that al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad[1045] presented al-Rashīd with a valuable compound of perfumes [ghāliyah].[1046] He went into his presence, having brought it with him, and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, may God make me your ransom! I have brought you some ghāliyah whose like no one else possesses; its musk is from the navels of choice Tibetan musk-oxen [al-kilāb al-tubbatiyyah];[1047] its amber is from the amber of the Sea of Aden; its olibanum comes from so-and-so al-Madanī, famed for the excellent way he pre-[745] pares it; and the man who compounds it is a man in al-Baṣrah who is knowledgeable about blending it together and expert at compounding it. If the Commander of the Faithful thinks fit to be gracious to me by accepting it, then I hope he will do so." Al-Rashīd said to Khāqān al-Khādim, who was standing by his head, "Khāqān, bring in the ghāliyah." So Khāqān brought it in, and lo, it was in a large silver jar [burniyyah] with a spoon in it. He uncovered the top. Ibn Abī Maryam happened to be present and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, give me this!" The Caliph said, "Take it for yourself." At this, al-'Abbās grew irate and flamed up with anger, saying, "Shame upon you! You have tried to get your hands on something which I denied myself and chose to present to my lord, and now you have taken it!" Ibn Abī Maryam replied, "May my mother be a whore, if I smear any part of my body with it except my anus!"

He related: Al-Rashīd laughed. Then Ibn Abī Maryam sprang up; he threw the fringe of his tunic over his head, put his hand in the jar

---

1044. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 217–18; Ibn Khaldūn, tr. I, 33–4; Palmer, 171–2.

1045. Unidentified; clearly not, on chronological grounds alone, the senior 'Abbāsid prince al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī, see Ṭabarī, III, 547 (above, 7, and n. 19).

1046. Although highly valued, not every ruler liked the use of ghāliyah; cf. the anecdote concerning al-Mu'taṣim's detestation of it, in Hilāl al-Ṣābi', 32–3, tr. Salem, 30–1.

1047. Tibet was famed as the producer of the finest musk; see Tha'ālibī, Laṭā'if, 224, 238, tr. 142, 146.

and began to extract from it as much as his hand could hold, and began to smear it on his anus in the first place, and in the second place on his groins and armpits. Then he smeared it on his face, head, and extremities, until he had covered all his limbs. He said to Khāqān, "Bring in my slave to me!" Al-Rashīd said, hardly able to think straight for laughing, "Summon the slave!" so he summoned him. Ibn Abī Maryam said to the slave, "Go and take the remainder of this to so-and-so," meaning his wife, "and tell her, 'Smear this on your vulva, until I come home and copulate with you.' " The slave took it and went off, while al-Rashīd was in uncontrollable transports of laughter. Then Ibn Abī Maryam went up to al-ʿAbbās and said, "By God, you are a stupid old man. You come to God's Caliph and you praise ghāliyah in his presence. Do you not realize that everything which the heavens shower down and everything which the earth brings forth is his? Likewise, everything which is in this present world is the possession of his hand, beneath his seal ring and in his grasp! Even more remarkable than this is the fact that the Angel of Death has been instructed, 'Look at everything which this person (i.e., the Caliph) asks you to do, and do it,' and then a fellow like this has popped up in his presence, praising the ghāliyah and orating at great length in describing it, as if he were a grocer, or druggist, or date-merchant!"[1048] He related: At this, al- [746]
Rashīd laughed till he almost choked to death, and he gave Ibn Abī Maryam on that day one hundred thousand dirhams.

It has been mentioned from Zayd b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. Zayd b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib,[1049] who said: One day, al-Rashīd intended to drink some medicine, so Ibn Abī Maryam said to him, "What about making me your doorkeeper tomorrow, when you take the medicine, and everything which I get we'll share between us." He said, "I agree!" So he sent a message to the (permanent) doorkeeper, "Stay at home tomorrow, for I have appointed Ibn Abī Maryam to the office of doorkeeper (temporarily)." Ibn Abī Maryam went along the next morning, and the (doorkeeper's) seat was put in place for him. Al-Rashīd took the medi-1048. The thinking seems here to be that al-Rashīd's power is so mighty that even the Angel of Death hastens, on God's express instructions, to carry out his desires; so why should he have to suffer being harangued about a mere pot of ghāliyah?

1049. See on him Ṭabarī, III, 673 (above, 210, and n. 718).

cine. The news reached the circle of his intimates. Hence, there came along Umm Jaʿfar's messenger, enquiring how the Commander of the Faithful was and about the medicine he had taken. Ibn Abī Maryam had him introduced into his own presence; he learned about the Caliph's condition and returned home with the answer. Ibn Abī Maryam said to the messenger, "Inform the noble lady how I managed to get you in before all the other people." So the messenger informed Umm Jaʿfar, and she sent him (i.e., Ibn Abī Maryam) a large sum of money. Then Yaḥyā b. Khālid's messenger came along, and he did the same with him. Then the messenger of Jaʿfar and al-Faḍl came along, and he did likewise. Each one of the Barmakīs sent him a handsome present. Then al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ's messenger came along, but he sent him away and would not allow him to enter. The messengers of the military commanders and the great men came along, but he would not facilitate the admission of any of them unless he sent him a handsome present. Before the time of the afternoon worship, sixty thousand dīnārs had already rolled in to him. When al-Rashīd recovered from his indisposition and his system was purged of the medicine, he sent for Ibn Abī Maryam and said to him, "What have you been doing today?" He replied, "O my master, I have earned sixty thousand dīnārs." Al-Rashīd was astonished at the size of the sum and said, "And now, where is my share?" He replied, "Set aside (for you)." Al-Rashīd said, "We have granted our own share to you, but present us with ten thousand apples (instead)!" Ibn Abī Maryam did that; he was the most financially successful person with whom al-Rashīd ever did business.

It has been mentioned from Ismāʿīl b. Ṣubayḥ, who said: I went [747] into al-Rashīd's presence, and lo, there was a slave girl by his head with a bowl in one of her hands and a spoon in the other, and she was feeding him with it in successive spoonfuls. He related: I saw a thin, white substance and had no idea what it was. He related: He realized that I was eager to know what it was, so he said, "O Ismāʿīl b. Ṣubayḥ!" and I answered, "Here I am, O my lord!" He said, "Do you know what this is?" I replied in the negative. He said, "It's a kind of gruel [jashīsh] made from rice, wheat, and the water in which the bran in white flour has been steeped.[1050] It's beneficial for contorted limbs and contraction of the tendons, it makes the skin clear, dispels red blotches on the face, puts fat on the body, and clears away impurities." He related: When I returned homewards, the sole thought in my mind was to summon the cook. I said to him, "Set before me each morning a dish of jashīsh." He replied, "What's that?" So I described to him the recipe I had heard. He said, "You'll be fed up with it on the third day." However, he made it on the first day, and I found it good; he made it on the second day, and it became less appetizing; he brought it on the third day and I told him, "Don't offer it (to me) any more!"

1050. Jashīsh or dashīsh was a porridge-like dish; see Dozy, Supplément, I, 442b.

It has been mentioned that al-Rashīd once fell ill. The physicians gave him treatment, but he did not recover at all from his sickness. So Abū 'Umar al-A'jamī said to him, "There is a physician in India called Mankah, to whom they accord preeminence, as I have observed, over all others in India. He is one of their devout ascetics and philosophers. If therefore the Commander of the Faithful were to send for him, it might well be that God would vouchsafe for him a cure at his hands." He related: Hence, al-Rashīd sent someone who would provide him with a mount, and he sent him a sum of money for his travel expenses. He related: Mankah arrived; he prescribed for al-Rashīd and the latter was cured of his illness through Mankah's treatment. So al-Rashīd allotted to him a substantial allowance and a comfortable amount of wealth.

One day, Mankah was passing by al-Khuld when he found himself in the presence of a man from the Manichaean sect [min al-Māniyyīn[1051]], who had spread out his cloak and displayed on it numerous drugs and simples. He stood there describing a remedy which he had in the form of an electuary [ma'jūn], and in his [748] description stated that "This is a remedy effectual for continuous fever, fever occurring on alternate days, quartern and tertian fever; for curing aches in the back and knees, hemorrhoids and flatulence; for pain in the joints and in the eyes; for pain in the abdomen, headache and neuralgia; for incontinence of urine, hemiplegia and trembling in the limbs and body,"[1052] and he did not 1051. Thus in both the Leiden and Cairo texts (VIII, 352); but the editor of the Leiden text suggests, n. e, following A. Müller, the possibility of the reading min al-mā'inīn "one of the quacks, charlatans."

1052. Irti'āsh, perhaps something like Parkinson's disease.

omit a single illness of the human body without mentioning that remedy as a cure for it. Mankah said to his interpreter, "What is this man saying?" The interpreter conveyed to him what he had heard. At this, Mankah smiled and said, "On all counts, the ruler of the Arabs is a fool [jāhil]. For if the state of affairs is as this quack alleges, why did he transport me from my land, cut me off from my family, and incur heavy expenses on my behalf, when he could find this fellow in front of his eyes and right before his face? And if the state of affairs is not as this quack says, why doesn't the ruler have him killed? For the Sharī'ah has declared the shedding of his blood licit, and the blood of those like him, because if he is killed, it is a case of many people being preserved alive through the killing of a single soul. Whereas if the ruler leaves this ignoramus untouched, he will bring about someone's death every day, and indeed, it is very likely that he will be the death of two or three or four each day. This indicates poor control over affairs and is a weakness in the state."[1053]

It has been mentioned that Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak appointed a man to one of the posts involving collection of the land tax in the Sawād. He went into al-Rashīd's presence to say farewell to him, and the Caliph happened to have with him Yaḥyā and Ja'far b. Yaḥyā. Al-Rashīd said to Yaḥyā and Ja'far, "Give him some suitable advice!" Yaḥyā told the man, "Make economies in expenditure,[1054] and render the land prosperous and populous"; Ja'far said to him, "Mete out justice for others and be just with yourself"; and al-Rashīd said to him, "Act with equity and kindness!"[1055]

It has been mentioned concerning al-Rashīd that he once became angry with Yazīd b. Mazyad al-Shaybānī, but then once more showed him his favor, and gave him permission to come to his court session. Yazīd accordingly came into his presence and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, praise be to God who has made

---

1053. Ibn Abī Uṣaybi'ah, II, 33–4; Müller, "Arabische Quellen zur Geschichte der indischen Medizin," 480–3, 496–7.

1054. This meaning of the imperative waffir seems to fit best here, as is likewise advocated in the Glossarium, pp. DLXI–DLXII, instead of the other, apparently opposing sense of "expand, stimulate growth." As with so many of the aḍdād or words with contrary meanings in Arabic [see on them EI[2] s.v. [G. Weil]], the contradiction in meaning is more apparent than real; the basic meaning is "to take care lest something diminish, to maintain something integrally."

1055. Echoing Qur'ān, XVI, 92/90; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 218.

easy for us the way of liberality, who has brought down to us beneficence through proximity to you and who has removed from us the tendency towards anxiety through your heaping munificence upon us! So may God recompense you, in your condition of anger, with the favor accorded to those who repent and turn to God, and in your condition of approval, with the reward of those who confer beneficence, accord their favor and distribute munificence! For God—and to Him be praise—has placed you in a position so that you relent, thus avoiding sin, when you are carried away by anger, so that you bestow lavishly benevolence, and so that you overlook wrongdoing, granting as a favor your forgiveness!" [749]

Muṣʿab b. ʿAbdallāh al-Zubayrī[1056] has mentioned that his father ʿAbdallāh b. Muṣʿab related to him that al-Rashīd once said to him, "What's your view about those who have impugned ʿUthmān?" I replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, one group of people have impugned him, whilst another group have defended him. Now as for those who have impugned him and who then have diverged from him, they comprise various sects of the Shīʿah, heretical innovators and various sects of the Khārijites; whereas in regard to those who have defended him, these are the mainstream Sunnī community [ahl al-jamāʿah] up to this present day." Al-Rashīd told me, "I shan't need ever to ask about this again after today."[1057] Muṣʿab related: My father said: He further asked me about the status [manzilah] which Abū Bakr and ʿUmar enjoyed in regard to the Messenger of God. I told him, "Their status in regard to him during his life was exactly the same as at the time of his death." Al-Rashīd replied, "You have provided me with a completely satisfactory answer for what I wanted to know."

He related: Sallām (al-Abrash) or else Rashīd al-Khādim—one of the eunuchs of the Caliph's close entourage—was appointed administrator of al-Rashīd's estates in the Byzantine frontier region and the districts of Syria. Letters arrived continuously bringing news of his excellent conduct, of his economical administration,[1058] and of the people's praise for him. Hence, al-Rashīd ordered him to be summoned to the court and to be handsomely rewarded, and he added, as seemed good to him, the estates in al-Jazīrah and Egypt to his responsibilities. He related: So the man in question arrived and came into the Caliph's presence whilst the latter was eating a quince which had been brought from Balkh, peeling it and eating sections of it. Al-Rashīd said to him, "O so-and-so, what excellent reports have been reaching your master about you! You can have from him whatever you wish! I have already ordered you to be given such-and-such an amount, and have given you charge of such-and-such, so now ask whatever personal request you have!" He related: So the man spoke, and [750] mentioned his own excellent conduct, and said, "By God, O Commander of the Faithful, I have caused them to forget the conduct of the two 'Umars!" He related: Al-Rashīd grew angry and flared up, and took his quince and threw it at him, saying, "O son of a stinking uncircumcised whore! (You keep on saying) the two 'Umars, the two 'Umars, the two 'Umars! Granted that we have conceded it for 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, are we then to concede it for 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb?"[1059]

1056. See Ṭabarī, III, 591 (above, 75, and n. 292).

1057. See, for discussions on these attitudes to the first caliphs, Watt, The formative period of Islamic thought, 9–12, 163, 166 ff., and on one aspect of the Shīʿī attacks on them, Goldziher, "Spottnamen der ersten Chalifen bei den Schiʿiten," WZKM, XV (1901), 321–34 = Gesammelte Schriften, IV, 295–308.

'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb has mentioned that Abū Bakr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz transmitted the information to him from al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh and spoke well of him, saying: One of the sons of 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-'Azīz related to me, saying: Al-Rashīd said, "By God, I don't know what I should do about this al-'Umarī (i.e., 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-'Azīz)![1060] I don't want to approach him personally, since he has progeny whom I detest. I would very much like to hear something about his mode of life and his way of thinking, but I haven't got anyone trustworthy whom I might send 1058. Following the reading of the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXIII, and of the Cairo text, VIII, 353, tawfīrihi; see also n. 1054 above.

1059. Clearly expecting the answer, No! Al-Rashīd's exasperation at continually having to listen to the praises of his predecessors recalls the exasperation of the Athenians leading to the exiling of Aristides the Just.

1060. This al-'Umarī was a noted ascetic and descendant of the Caliph 'Umar I, who lived in the desert outside Medina and died there in 182 (798) or 184 (800). See Ibn Qutaybah, 186; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, III, 138 = ed. Pellat, § 990, idem, Index, VII, 474.

to him." 'Umar b. Bazī' and al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' said, "Then send us, O Commander of the Faithful!" He replied, "All right, you two then." Hence, they set out from al-'Arj[1061] to a spot in the desert called Khalṣ,[1062] taking with them guides from the people of al-'Arj, until when they reached 'Abdallāh in his dwelling, they came upon him in the early morning and lo, 'Abdallāh was in his oratory. They, and those of their escort who were accompanying them, made their camels halt and kneel to allow them to descend. Then they came to 'Abdallāh in the guise of monarchs, having pleasant perfume, fine clothes, and fragrant substances, and the two of them sat down before him, he being in an oratory of his.

They said to him, "O Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, we are envoys from the people of the East whom we have left behind and who say to you, 'Fear God, your Lord, and if you are so disposed, rise up (in rebellion)!'" He came up close to them and said, "Woe upon you both! Regarding whom have you come, and for whom are you seeking?" They replied, "You!" He said, "By God, I wouldn't like to meet God even with just a cupping-glass full of the blood of a man from the Muslims, and as for myself, I have at my disposal whatever the sun rises upon." When they despaired of getting him implicated, they said, "We have with us something which you [751] would find useful for all your life." He replied, "I have no need of it, I am perfectly well off without it." They told him, "It's twenty thousand dīnārs." He retorted, "I have no need of it." They said, "Give it then to whomsoever you like." He replied, "You two, you give it to whomsoever you consider fit; I'm not your servant or minion." He related: When they had given up all hope of interesting him (in these worldly gains and ambitions), they rode off on their camels until they reached the Caliph in the morning at al-Suqyā[1063] at the second stage (i.e., from Mecca) and found him awaiting them. When they went into his presence, they related 1061. A settlement in the Ḥijāz, in the territory of Hudhayl, on the road from Mecca to Medina. See Bakrī, III, 930–1; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 98–9; Al-Wohaibi, 52–7.

1062. A wadi also lying between Mecca and Medina, known as Khalṣ of Ārah. See Bakrī, I, 91, II, 507; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 382–3; Al-Wohaibi, 122–3.

1063. A stage on the road northward from Mecca and al-Juḥfah to Medina. See Bakrī, III, 742–3; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 228; al-Wohaibi, index, s.v.

to him what had taken place between them and ʿAbdallāh. The Caliph thereupon said, "After this, I don't care what I do!"[1064]

Then ʿAbdallāh made the Pilgrimage in that same year. Whilst he was standing by one of those traders there, buying something for his children, behold, Hārūn appeared, making the saʿy between al-Ṣafā' and al-Marwah on a horse. At that point, ʿAbdallāh interposed himself before Hārūn, leaving off what he was about to do, and he went up to the Caliph till he gripped his horse's bridle. The troops and guards pounced on him immediately, but Hārūn brushed them away from ʿAbdallāh, and then the latter spoke with him. He related: I saw Hārūn's tears, and they were running down on to his horse at the place where the mane grows; then he turned away.

Muḥammad b. Aḥmad, the mawlā of the Banū Sulaym, has mentioned, saying: Al-Layth b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Jūzjānī, who was one who had come into Mecca from outside[1065] and had been settled there [kāna mujāwir^{an}] for forty years, transmitted the information to me that a certain doorkeeper (of the Kaʿbah) transmitted the information to him that, when al-Rashīd made the Pilgrimage, he entered the Kaʿbah and he stood on his tiptoes (i.e., in order to reach as high as possible) and said, "O You who are master of the requests of those making petition and who know the hearts of those who remain silent, You have a ready rejoinder and an answer at hand for every petition made to You, and for everyone who remains silent before You, You have an all-encompassing knowledge which gives expression to Your sincere promises, Your outstanding favors and Your all-extending mercy. Grant blessings to Muḥammad and his house, forgive us our sins and pardon our misdeeds! O You whom sins do not harm, from whom no faults are hidden and whose power the forgiveness of offences does not diminish! O You who have spread out the earth over the waters, have filled up the air with the heavens, and have chosen the (Most Beautiful) Names for Yourself, grant blessings to Muḥammad and 1064. I.e., the Caliph now feels secure and relieved that no danger is to be expected from ʿAbdallāh.

1065. Presumably, from the region of Jūzjān or Gūzgān in what is now northern Afghanistan. See Le Strange, Lands, 423; Barthold, An historical geography of Iran, 32–5; EI^{2} s.v. Djūzdjān (R. Hartmann).

choose for me the best course in all my affairs. O You before whom voices speak with submissiveness and with all kinds of utterances laying before You their petitions, one of my petitions to You is that You may grant me forgiveness when You bring my term of life to an end and when I am laid in my sepulchral niche and my family and children have all gone away from me. O God, praise be to You, a praise which is superior to all other praise just as You Yourself are superior to all creation! O God, grant blessings to Muḥammad in a way which will indicate approval for him, and grant blessings to Muḥammad in a way which will be a source of protection for him, and reward him with the finest and most complete reward of the afterlife for what he has done for us. O God, grant us life as fortunate ones, fulfill our term of life as martyrs, and make us fortunate ones provided with sustenance, and not wretched and deprived ones!"[1066] [752]

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad (al-Madāʾinī) has mentioned from ʿAbdallāh, saying, al-Qāsim b. Yaḥyā related to me, saying: Al-Rashīd sent a message to Ibn Abī Dāwūd and those who look after the tomb of al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī at al-Ḥayr.[1067] He related: They were brought along. Al-Ḥasan b. Rashīd looked at Ibn Abī Dāwūd and said, "What's happened to you?" He replied, "This man"—he meant al-Rashīd—"has sent a message to me and summoned me to his presence, and I don't trust him with my personal safety." Al-Ḥasan b. Rāshid told him, "Now, when you enter his presence and he questions you, tell him, 'Al-Ḥasan b. Rāshid has appointed me to that position.'" So when he entered the Caliph's presence, he repeated these words. Al-Rashīd said, "That this confusion has been caused by al-Ḥasan's meddling is just what I would have expected! Summon him here!" He related: When al-Ḥasan was present, al-Rashīd said, "What impelled you to appoint his man in al-Ḥayr?" He replied, "May God have mercy on the one who appointed him in al-Ḥayr! Umm Mūsā ordered me to appoint him there and to assign to him thirty dirhams a month." He said, "Send him back to al-Ḥayr and assign to him the same as Umm Mūsā

1066. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 218–19.

1067. I.e., al-Ḥāʾir (literally, "the enclosure"). See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 208; Le Strange, Lands, 79; *EI*² s.v. Karbalāʾ (Honigmann).

did." (Umm Mūsā[1068] was the mother of al-Mahdī and the daughter of Yazīd b. Manṣūr.)

'Alī b. Muḥammad has mentioned that his father transmitted the information to him, saying: I went into al-Rashīd's presence in the house of 'Awn al-'Ibādī,[1069] and there he was with summer [753] arrangements in an open pavilion, with no carpet or covering in the place at all, on a low seat by a door in the right-hand side of the pavilion. He was wearing a thin shift [ghilālah][1070] and a Rashīdī[1071] loincloth, with ornamented borders and dyed a deep red color.[1072] He did not use to have the pavilion where he sat cooled down by artificial means for bringing in fresh air [lā yukhayyishu al-bayt[a]] because it used to discommode him, but the cool air created by the khaysh arrangements[1073] used to reach him, even though he was not actually sitting in it. He was the first person to cause to be made a second, internal roof [saqf dūna saqf][1074] for the pavilion where he took his siesta in summer. This arose from the fact that, when he heard the information that the former Persian emperors used to have the outer surfaces of their pavilions plastered with mud each day, from the outside, in order to keep the 1068. I.e., Arwā, wife of al-Manṣūr, whose father Yazīd b. Manṣūr (also in the sources, simply Manṣūr) al-Ḥimyarī was governor for the Caliph of al-Baṣrah and the Yemen and who claimed descent from the ancient kings of South Arabia. See Ibn Qutaybah, 379; Abbott, 15–16.

1069. See on this, Ṭabarī, III, 678 (above, 216, and n. 733).

1070. Here, clearly a very thin, cool garment, like an undershirt, rather than the "cloak" rendered thus by Serjeant, 62 n. 11. Ghilālah was also used for a thin, often transparent women's undergarment; see Ahsan, 41, and EI[2] s.v. Libās. 1. In the central and eastern Arab lands (Yedida K. Stillman), at V, 737.

1071. Obviously some kind of thin linen material, conceivably from the town in the Nile delta al-Rashīd (Rosetta), since Egypt was famous for its linens, as suggested in the Glossarium, pp. CCLXIII–CCLXIV. Serjeant, 62 n. 11 (cf. Ahsan, 35), suggests that the Caliph al-Rashīd may himself have popularized the material or that it may have had tirāz or embroidered borders with his name.

1072. Shadīd al-tadrīj, thus interpreted by the editor of the Cairo text, VIII, 356; but the phrase could also bear the meaning "laid wide open" in reference to the slit down the front of the shift.

1073. Khaysh, literally "coarse linen or canvas (sheet)," i.e., one which could be hung up and moistened in order to create a supply of cooled air in the intense heat of the Iraqi summer, and thence any kind of arrangement, such as a fan or punkah, to achieve this effect; see Agius, 229–33, and EI[2] s.v. (Pellat). The use of a moistened sheet is said to have been introduced under al-Manṣūr; see Ṭabarī, III, 418, and Tha'ālibī, Laṭā'if, 19–20, tr. 48–9.

1074. Presumably, some kind of false ceiling, the space between the roof and this ceiling acting as an insulation layer.

heat of the sun away from themselves,[1075] he himself adopted the use of a (second, internal) roof next to the main roof of the pavilion where he used to take his siesta.

ʿAlī (further) related from his father: I was informed that, on every day of scorching summer heat, al-Rashīd used to have a silver urn [tighār][1076] in which a perfume merchant used to make up a mixture of fragrant perfume, saffron, aromatic substances, and rose water. He would then go into the pavilion where he took his siesta and there would be brought in with him seven Rashīdī shifts of fine linen material [qaṣab],[1077] of feminine cut, and these last would then be dipped into that aromatic mixture. Each day, seven slave girls would be brought in; each girl would have her dress taken off and then a shift would be given to her, and she would sit down on a seat which was pierced with holes and the shift would be unloosed and draped over the seat so that the shift covered it over. Then it was fumigated with perfumed vapor from beneath the seat, with aloes wood conjoined with amber, for a certain period of time, until the garment should dry on her. He used to follow that practice with the slave girls, and this procedure would take place in the pavilion where he took his siesta; as a result, the pavilion would become permeated with the fragrant incense and the perfume.

ʿAlī b. Ḥamzah has mentioned that ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib said: Al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan told me: Al-Rashīd said to me, "I notice that you talk a great deal about Yanbuʿ[1078] and its characteristic features, so describe it to me in a concise fashion." I said, "In ordinary speech, or in verse?" He replied, "In both." He related: I said, "Its [754] special quality lies basically in its luscious date clusters, and its luscious date clusters make up its easeful nature."[1079] He related: Al-Rashīd thereupon smiled, and I then recited to him,

---

1075. The wet mud acting by evaporation as a cooling agent.

1076. See Dozy, Supplément, I, 147b, and Fraenkel, 69, for its previous Aramaic form (also found in Arabic as ṭinjīr).

1077. This plain linen (and possibly also silk) material was often woven or decorated with gold or silver thread. See Serjeant, 37; Agius, 264–5.

1078. The port on the Red Sea coast of the Ḥijāz. See Bakrī, IV, 1402; Al-Wohaibi, 53 ff.; EI[1] s.v. (A. Grohmann).

1079. I.e., its fine dates provide an easy life for those residing there and resorting to there.

O watercourse of the palace, what a fine palace and watercourse, with the features of a residence in the settled lands, if you prefer it, or those of the desert!
You see its long ships, with the whitish-fawn camels halted there, and the lizard, the fish, the boatman, and the camel driver![1080]

Muḥammad b. Hārūn has mentioned from his father, who said: I was once in al-Rashīd's presence, and al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, I have summoned Ibn al-Sammāk[1081] just as you commanded me to do."[1082] He said, "Bring him in!" So Ibn al-Sammāk entered and al-Rashīd said to him, "Deliver to me a piece of spiritually edifying advice [ʿiẓnī]!" He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, fear God, the Unique One who has no partner, and know that on the morrow you will be standing before God your Lord, and then consigned to one of the two future states—there is no third one—either paradise or hell-fire." He related: Hārūn wept until his beard became damp with tears. Al-Faḍl went up to Ibn al-Sammāk and said, "God forbid, does anyone have any possible doubt that the Commander of the Faithful will be consigned to paradise, if God wills, through his efforts to uphold God's rights, his justice among his subjects and his benevolence?" He related: Ibn al-Sammāk took no notice of al-Faḍl's words and did not turn towards him; instead, he went up to the Commander of the Faithful and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, this fellow"—he meant al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ—"will not, by God, be with you or at your side, on that day, so fear God and look to yourself!" He related: At this, Hārūn wept until we were afraid for his well-being. Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ was rendered speechless, and did not say a word until we all went out.

1080. These verses are stated in other sources to refer to a palace constructed by the ʿAbbāsid prince Muḥammad b. Sulaymān at al-Baṣrah (see Ṭabarī, III, 607–8, above, 105–7), e.g., by Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 291–2 = ed. Pellat, § 2497, attributing the verses to the poet Ibn Abī ʿUyaynah al-Muhallabī; by Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 361–2, referring to a palace of ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān at al-Ḥarbiyyah of Baghdad, attributed to the same poet; and in Bakrī, II, 659, merely recited, as in Ṭabarī, in reference to Yanbuʿ.

1081. I.e., Muḥammad b. Ṣubayḥ or Ṣubḥ, Kūfan traditionist and frequent preacher [wāʿiẓ] at al-Rashīd's court, who died in 183 (799). See al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, V, 368–73, no. 2895, and further references in Masʿūdī-Pellat, Index, VII, 648.

1082. Cf. Ibn Khaldūn, tr. I, 33.

He related; Ibn al-Sammāk went into al-Rashīd's presence one day. Whilst he was there with him, the Caliph called for a drink of water. So an earthenware pitcher of water was brought in. But when he tipped it up to his mouth in order to drink from it, Ibn al-Sammāk said to him, "Gently now, O Commander of the Faithful, by your relationship to the Messenger of God! If this drink of water were to be withheld from you, how much would you purchase it for?" He replied, "For half my kingdom." He said, "Drink, may God render it wholesome for you!" When the Caliph had drunk it, Ibn al-Sammāk said to him, "I ask you, by your relationship to the Messenger of God, if you were prevented from passing that drink of water from out of your body, how much would you purchase that for?" He replied, "For the whole of my kingdom." Ibn al-Sammāk said, "A kingdom whose value is only a drink of water isn't, indeed, worth aspiring to (or: contending over, allā yunāfasa fīhi)!" At this, Hārūn wept. Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' then made a sign to Ibn al-Sammāk to depart, so the latter left.[1083] [755]

He related: 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-'Umarī[1084] addressed a spiritually edifying discourse to al-Rashīd. The latter received his words with "Yes indeed, O my uncle!" and when 'Abdallāh turned away to depart, al-Rashīd sent after him two thousand dīnārs, in a purse, with al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn. The two of them confronted al-'Umarī with the money and said, "O uncle, the Commander of the Faithful says to you, 'Take this and use it for your own benefit, or else distribute it (among the deserving).'" He replied, "The Caliph knows best to whom he should distribute it," but then he took just one dīnār from the purse and said, "I don't want to add an unpleasant action to an unpleasant word." After that incident (i.e., on a subsequent occasion), al-'Umarī set off towards the Caliph at Baghdad, but al-Rashīd was apprehensive about his coming to the capital, and he gathered together the members of the 'Umarī family. He then told them, "What's happened to the relationship between myself and the son of your uncle? I could endure him in the Ḥijāz, but he has now made his way to the seat of my power and is seeking to subvert my followers! Make him go back from my court!" But they replied, "He won't accept that from us!" Hence,

1083. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 219–20.
1084. Cf. Ibn Khaldūn, tr. I, 33, n. 87, on this ascetic.

al-Rashīd wrote to Mūsā b. ʿĪsā,[1085] (asking him) to approach al-ʿUmarī in a circumspect and diplomatic manner in order to make him go back. So ʿĪsā summoned for approaching al-ʿUmarī a young lad of only ten years' age who knew by heart sermons and pious homilies. The boy spoke to al-ʿUmarī at great length and addressed to him pious exhortations, the like of which al-ʿUmarī had never before heard, and he warned off al-ʿUmarī from approaching and troubling the Commander of the Faithful. Al-ʿUmarī took off his sandal and stood there, repeating, "So they shall confess their sin; hence cursed be the companions of hell-fire!"[1086]

[756] A certain person has mentioned that he was with al-Rashīd at al-Raqqah after he had set out from Baghdad. He went out hunting with al-Rashīd one day, when an ascetic appeared before him and addressed him, "O Hārūn, fear God!" The Caliph said to Ibrāhīm b. ʿUthmān b. Nahīk, "Take this man with you, until I get back." When he returned, he called for his midday meal. Then he gave orders for the man to be fed with the choicest of his food. When he had eaten and drunk, he summoned him and said, "O fellow, treat me fairly when you deliver your sermons and make your intercessions!" The man replied, "That is the least which is due to you." The Caliph said, "Tell me now, am I an evil and most wicked person, or a Pharaoh (i.e., a tyrant)?" The ascetic replied, "Nay, a Pharaoh." The Caliph quoted, "I am your Lord, the Most High,"[1087] and the man responded, "I know no god for you except myself."[1088] The Caliph said, "You have spoken truly; now tell me, who is better, you yourself or Moses, son of ʿImrān?" He replied, "Moses is the one who spoke with God and was His chosen one, whom He took as his protégé and upon whom He relied for delivering His inspired revelations, and He singled him out to speak with Him out of all His creation." The Caliph said, "You have spoken truly; are you not aware that when He sent Moses and his brother to Pharaoh, He said to them, 'Speak to him gently, perhaps he will take heed or show fear.'[1089] The Qur'ānic commentators have 1085. At this time (ca. 192 [808]) governor of Mecca, see Ṭabarī, III, 739 (above, 304).

1086. Qur'ān, LXVII, 11.

1087. Ibid., LXXIX, 24.

1088. Ibid., XXVIII, 38.

1089. Ibid., XX, 46/44. This and the two preceding quotations all allude to the mentioned that He ordered the two of them to call Pharaoh by his patronymic, this (daring move[1090]) being done when Pharaoh was in his status of arrogance and overweening pride, as you have well known. Yet you have come to me at a moment when I am in this position of which you are aware! I fulfill the greater part of the prescriptions which God has imposed upon me as obligatory, and I worship none but Him. I obey the most important of the limits against transgression laid down by God, His commands and His prohibitions. But you have harangued me with the most violent and unseemly words, and the roughest and foulest of speech; you have not been schooled in the practice of God's praiseworthy discipline nor have you adopted the good qualities of the righteous ones! So what has been making you feel confident that I shall not come down heavily upon you? If this last is in fact the case, you will have laid yourself open to what was a quite unnecessary risk!" The ascetic replied, "I have made a mistake, O Commander of the Faithful, and I ask your pardon." He replied, "God has already pardoned you," and ordered him to be given twenty thousand dirhams. However, the ascetic refused to accept it and said, "I don't need the money at all, I am an ascetic who wanders round [rajul sā'iḥ[1091]]." Harthamah spoke to him and looked at him askance, [757]

"You boorish fellow, are you hurling back the Commander of the Faithful's present in his face?" But al-Rashīd said, "Leave him alone," and then told the ascetic, "We didn't offer you the money because you are in need of it, but simply because it is our custom that no one who is neither one of the Caliph's entourage nor one of his enemies ever addresses him without the Caliph giving him a present and rewarding him. So accept what proportion you like of our gift, and spend it how you please!" The man took two thousand dirhams from the sum of money and divided it out among the doorkeepers and those present at the court.

---

stories of Pharaoh (the archetypal tyrant in the Qur'ān, see *EI*² s.v. Fir'awn [Wensinck and G. Vajda]) and Moses.

1090. Because the use of the kunyah, a designation of respect, implies equality of status and familiarity; see *EI*² s.v. (Wensinck). Schwally, in Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, 190 n. 1, notes that the Caliph never addressed his ministers by their kunyah but only by their ism or given name.

1091. Sā'iḥ or sayyāḥ was a frequent designation for wandering dervishes.

Al-Rashīd's (Free) Wives Who Were Endowed with Substantial Dowries [al-mahā'ir]

It is said that he married Zubaydah, that is, Umm Ja'far bt. Ja'far b. al-Manṣūr, and consummated the marriage with her (a'rasa bihā, literally "he had her conducted to him in marriage") in the year 165 (781–2) during al-Mahdī's caliphate, at Baghdad and in the residence of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān. She subsequently (i.e., after al-Rashīd's death) went to live with al-'Abbāsah and then with al-Mu'taṣim billāh. She gave birth for al-Rashīd to Muḥammad al-Amīn, and died at Baghdad in Jumādā I, 216 (June–July, 831).[1092]

He also married Umm Muḥammad, the daughter of Ṣāliḥ al-Miskīn, and consummated his marriage with her at al-Raqqah in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 187 (November–December, 803). Her mother was Umm 'Abdallāh the daughter of 'Īsā b. 'Alī and mistress of (or: owner of, ṣāḥibah) the residence of Umm 'Abdallāh in al-Karkh, at which were the date-juice makers [aṣḥāb al-dibs]. She had been married to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī, but then she was repudiated by him and al-Rashīd married her.[1093]

He also married al-'Abbāsah, the daughter of Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far and consummated his marriage with her in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 187 (November–December, 803); both she and Umm Muḥammad, the daughter of Ṣāliḥ, were brought to him (in that same year).[1094]

He also married 'Azīzah, the daughter of al-Ghiṭrīf (b. 'Aṭā').[1095] She had previously been married to Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far, but he divorced her, and al-Rashīd then married her in the second instance. She was the daughter of al-Khayzurān's brother.

[758] He also married al-Jurashiyyah al-'Uthmāniyyah, the daughter of 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, called al-Jurashiyyah because she was born at Jurash in the Yemen.[1096] Her father's grandmother was Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, and her father's paternal uncle was 'Abdallāh b.

1092. See EI[1] s.v. Zubaida (K. V. Zetterstéen) and Abbott, 137 ff., Part II. Zubaidah.

1093. Cf. Abbott, 137.

1094. Ibid.

1095. Hence, niece of al-Khayzurān; see Abbott, 29, 68, 137.

1096. Abbott, 137. For the town of Jurash, see Hamdānī, 255–8; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 126–7.

Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, may God be pleased with them.

Al-Rashīd died leaving behind four of these noble, highly dowried wives: Umm Jaʿfar; Umm Muḥammad, the daughter of Ṣāliḥ; ʿAbbāsah, the daughter of Sulaymān; and al-ʿUthmāniyyah.[1097]

Al-Rashīd's Children

Of male children, al-Rashīd had Muḥammad the Elder (i.e., al-Amīn), by Zubaydah; ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn, by a slave concubine mother [umm walad] called Marājil;[1098] al-Qāsim al-Muʿtaman, by a slave concubine mother called Qaṣif; Abū Isḥāq Muḥammad al-Muʿtaṣim, by a slave concubine mother called Māridah; ʿAlī, by Amat al-ʿAzīz; Ṣāliḥ, by a slave concubine mother called Riʾm;[1099] Abū ʿĪsā Muḥammad, by a slave concubine mother called ʿIrābah;[1100] Abū Yaʿqūb Muḥammad, by a slave concubine mother called Shadhrah; Abū al-ʿAbbās Muḥammad, by a slave concubine mother called Khubth;[1101] Abū Sulaymān Muḥammad, by a slave concubine mother called Rawāḥ; Abū ʿAlī Muḥammad, by a slave concubine mother called Duwāj; and Abū Aḥmad Muḥammad, by a slave concubine mother called Kitmān.[1102]

Of female children, al-Rashīd had Sukaynah, by Qaṣif, and hence the sister of al-Qāsim; Umm Ḥabīb, by Māridah, and hence the sister of Abū Isḥāq al-Muʿtaṣim; Arwā, by Ḥalūb; Umm al-Ḥasan,

---

1097. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 216.

1098. A gloss from Maqrīzī's Kitāb al-Muqaffā, in Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCCLXIII, adds the explanation, "a slavegirl who was called Marājil, thus nicknamed by her fellow-concubines because she had beautiful hair, and was always busy combing it [tarjīlihi] and looking after it."

1099. The Cairo text, VIII, 360, has R.th.m, possibly Rathim, literally, "having a white mark on the nose or upper lip (of a horse)"; but the Leiden text's Riʾm "white gazelle" is more appropriate and is, moreover, well-attested as a woman's name till the present day.

1100. Literally, "foul, obscene talk," and hence applied by antiphrasis.

1101. Literally, "foulness, wickedness," again by antiphrasis; in various places of Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, we have Khinth, literally "fold of cloth, interior of the cheek," more feasibly to be vocalized as Khanith, Khunuth "delicate, languid (of a woman)."

1102. Ṭabarī-Balʿamī, tr., IV, 478. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 521, and K. al-ʿUyūn, 319, list twelve sons, the extra one being Abū Ayyūb; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., also lists twelve sons, the extra one being Abū Muḥammad. Ibn Qutaybah, 383, merely names a selection of eight children.

by ʿIrābah; Umm Muḥammad, that is, Ḥamdūnah; Fāṭimah, by Ghuṣaṣ,[1103] whose (other) name was Muṣaffā; Umm Abīhā, by Sukkar; Umm Salamah, by Rahīq; Khadījah, by Shajar, and hence [759] the sister of Karīb;[1104] Umm al-Qāsim, by Kh.z.q; Umm Jaʿfar Ramlah, by Ḥaly; Umm ʿAlī, by Anīq; Umm al-Ghāliyah, by Samandal; and Rayṭah, by Zīnah.[1105]

More Aspects of al-Rashīd's Conduct and Mode of Life

Yaʿqūb b. Isḥāq al-Iṣfahānī has mentioned, saying: al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad al-Ḍabbī[1106] said: Al-Rashīd sent for me, and I had no idea what it was about except that the messengers came to me at night and said, "Respond to the Commander of the Faithful's summons!" So I went out until I came to him, this being on a Thursday, and behold, the Caliph was reclining, propped on his elbow, with Muḥammad b. Zubaydah on his left and al-Maʾmūn on his right. I greeted him and he motioned to me, so I sat down. Then he said to me, "O Mufaḍḍal!" I replied, "Here I am at your service, O Commander of the Faithful." He said, "How many names of persons are indicated in the word fa-sa-yakfīkahumu ("and He [i.e., God] will suffice you regarding them")?[1107] I replied, "Three names of persons, O Commander of the Faithful." He said, "What are they, then?" I replied, "The letter kāf (i.e., the pronoun suffix -ka) refers to the Messenger of God, the hāʾ and mīm (i.e., the pronoun suffix -humu) refer to the unbelievers, and the yāʾ (i.e., the verbal prefix ya-) refers to God, He is magnified and exalted." The Caliph commented, "You have spoken correctly;

1103. Literally, "death rattles," and hence by antiphrasis; but according to Ibn al-Sāʿī, Nisāʾ al-khulafāʾ, 53, Ḥamdūnah's mother had the (orthographically very similar) name of Ghaḍīḍ. Now in the light of the mention in al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, III, 392, no. 1513, of Muḥammad b. Yūsuf b. al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Ghaḍīḍī "who used to have charge of the affairs of Ḥamdūnah bt. Ghaḍīḍ, the umm walad of Hārūn al-Rashīd, and thus acquired this nisbah," it would seem that Ghaḍīḍ rather than Ghuṣaṣ is in fact correct.

1104. Thus in the Cairo text, loc. cit., for the apparently barely legible reading of the Leiden editor's manuscript.

1105. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 216–17. All these daughters were by slave mothers.

1106. Celebrated Kūfan philologist, author inter alia of a collection of proverbs and of a poetical anthology, the Mufaḍḍaliyyāt; he died ca. 170 (786–7). See GAL, I², 118–19, S I, 36–7, 179; GAS, II, 32, VIII, 115–16; *EI*¹ s.v. (Ilse Lichtenstaedter).

1107. Qurʾān, II, 131/137.

this shaykh"—he meant al-Kisā'ī[1108]—"has given us the same interpretation." Then he turned to Muḥammad and asked him, "Did you comprehend, O Muḥammad?" He replied, "Yes." The Caliph said, "Repeat the problem to me just as al-Mufaḍḍal interpreted it," and he repeated it. Then he turned to me and said, "O Mufaḍḍal, do you have any knotty problem which you would like to ask us about in the presence of this shaykh (i.e., al-Kisā'ī)?" I replied, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful." He asked, "What is it?" I said, "The words of al-Farazdaq,

We have seized the far horizons of the heavens against you, their two moons and their rising stars are ours.[1109]

He said, "An unnecessary question; this shaykh provided us with the interpretation of this on a previous occasion before you came. By 'their two moons are ours' he means the sun and moon, just as one says 'the Sunnah of the two 'Umars,' (meaning) 'the Sunnah of Abū Bakr and 'Umar.'" He related: I said, "May I now proceed further with my query?" He said, "Carry on!" I said, "Why do people consider this a neat expression?" He said, "Because when two nouns of the same kind come together, and one of them is lighter on the tongues of those uttering it, they make that lighter one of the two names prevail over the other and refer to the other by it.[1110] Now when 'Umar's reign proved longer than Abū Bakr's [760] one, and 'Umar's conquests became more numerous and his name was lighter on the tongue, they made his name the dominant one, and referred to Abū Bakr by his (i.e., 'Umar's) name. God, He is magnified and exalted, has said, 'the distance between the two Orients,'[1111] and this means the Orient and the Occident." I said, "There has remained a further point in the question." He (al-

1108. Philologist and authority on the "readings" of the Qur'ān. He had been tutor to the young al-Rashīd, and the Caliph in turn made him tutor to his sons al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn and took him as one of his own boon-companions; he died in 189 (805). See GAL, I², 117–18, S I, 177–8; GAS, VIII, 117, IX, 127–31; *EI*² s.v. al-Kisā'ī, Abu 'l-Hasan 'Alī (R. Sellheim).

1109. Naqā'iḍ Jarīr wa-al-Farazdaq, ed. Bevan, II, 700; Sharḥ Dīwān al-Farazdaq, ed. al-Ṣāwī, II, 519.

1110. This is the phenomenon which the Arabic grammarians called taghlīb, giving one term in a pair "predominance"; see Wright, Arabic grammar, I, 189–90.

1111. Qur'ān, XLIII, 37/38.

Rashīd?) then said (to al-Kisā'ī?),[1112] "Is there anything more regarding this question than what we have already said?" He replied, "This is the fullest extent of what they say, and the whole of the explanation according to the Arabs." He related: Then he turned to me and he said, "What else remains?" I said, "There remains the topic of the aim towards which the vaunting poet was tending in the poem of his." He said, "What's that?" I replied, "By 'the sun' he meant Ibrāhīm (i.e., Abraham)[1113] and by 'the moon' he meant Muḥammad, and by 'the stars' the Rightly Guided Caliphs from your own pious forefathers."

He related: The Commander of the Faithful lifted up his head and said, "O Faḍl b. al-Rabī', convey one hundred thousand dirhams to him in order to satisfy his debts; see what poets there are at the gate, and then let them be allowed in." And behold, (there turned out to be at the gate) al-'Umānī[1114] and Manṣūr al-Namarī, so he allowed them both to enter. The Caliph said, "Bring the shaykh (i.e., al-'Umānī) to me," and he approached the Caliph, at the same time reciting,

Say to the Imām, whose rightful course is to be followed,[1115]
"Qāsim is not inferior to the son of his mother (i.e., al-Rashīd's mother, meaning al-Rashīd himself) in extent of qualities."
We have become content with him, so arise and nominate him (as successor to the caliphate)!

Al-Rashīd said, "You're not content to call for the oath of allegiance as successor to be made to him whilst I am still sitting down, but you want me to arise and proclaim it standing (i.e., to give it greater forcefulness)!" He said, "An act of standing indicat-1112. The Cairo text, VIII, 361, has here explicitly "Then he turned to al-Kisā'ī and said . . . ," whereas the Leiden text is ambiguous; cf. n. b.

1113. Echoing the leading role accorded in Islamic lore to Abraham as the first ḥanīf or worshipper of the One God and as the founder of the millat Ibrāhīm which Muḥammad claimed to have rediscovered and to have restored; see *EI*² s.v. Ibrāhīm (R. Paret).

1114. I.e., Muḥammad b. Dhu'ayb al-Ḥanẓalī, rajaz poet of al-Baṣrah and eulogist of the 'Abbāsids; he died in the reign of al-Rashīd. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVII, 78–82 = ed. Cairo, XVIII, 311–21; Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 160; GAL, S I, 91–2; GAS, II, 464.

1115. Following in Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXIII (as also in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Cairo, XVIII, 315, and *Lisān al-'Arab*¹, XV, 398), al-muqtadā bi-ammihi.

ing intention, O Commander of the Faithful, not one for promulgating a fully decided decree!" The Caliph said, "Let al-Qāsim be brought in," so he was brought in. Al-ʿUmānī recited his rajaz poem in a low murmur. Al-Rashīd then said to al-Qāsim, "This shaykh has called for allegiance to be given to you (as my successor), so bestow a generous gift on him." He replied, "As the Commander of the Faithful ordains!" Al-Rashīd said, "I've had enough of this![1116] Bring forward al-Namarī!" so al-Namarī came up to him and recited to him,

No grief of ours, nor agitation of soul, dies away . . .

until he reached the words, [761]

How excellent were the days of youth, and how enduring is the sweetness of remembrance of it which remains!
I was not able to fulfill for my youth the highest point of its choicest part, before it vanished away, and lo, the present world is a mere sequel (i.e., an anticlimax)![1117]

Al-Rashīd said, "There is nothing good in the present world; the garment of youth is not called to mind in it."[1118]

It has been mentioned that Saʿīd b. Salm al-Bāhilī came into al-Rashīd's presence. He greeted the Caliph; al-Rashīd motioned to him and he sat down. Then Saʿīd said, "O Commander of the Faithful, there is a Bedouin from the tribe of Bāhilah standing at the Commander of the Faithful's gate, and I've never seen anyone more poetically eloquent than he!" He said, "Indeed, have you not made these two poets"—he meant al-ʿUmānī and Manṣūr al-Namarī, who were both present in his court at that moment—"lawful plunder, aiming your stones at them?" (i.e., not taking them into consideration).[1119] Saʿīd replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, 1116. This anecdote continues from here briefly and with a divergent ending in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVII, 80 = ed. Cairo, XVIII, 315.

---

1117. Shiʿr Manṣūr al-Namarī, 95–6, no. 24; Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 376 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 43.

1118. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XII, 19 = ed. Cairo, XIII, 145.

1119. The text here, and especially the words istabaḥta . . . nuhbā, is conjectural and the translation accordingly uncertain.

they are making me a gift to you (i.e., committing him to the Caliph's protection, so that the two of them will not attack him); so may the Bedouin now be permitted to enter?" Permission was accordingly given to him, and lo, there appeared a Bedouin in a silken gown and a Yemeni cloak, who had tucked it up round his waist and then folded it over his shoulder, and a turban which he had tied round his two cheeks and had let one end hang loose.

He appeared in front of the Commander of the Faithful, and seats were laid out. Al-Kisā'ī, al-Mufaḍḍal, Ibn Salm and al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' all then sat down, and Ibn Salm said to the Bedouin, "Start eulogizing the Commander of the Faithful's ancestral nobility." So the Bedouin embarked on his poetry. The Commander of the Faithful said to him, "I hear you, as one who finds the poetry good, but I have a guarded view of you, being suspicious about you (i.e., suspicious that he was not the true author of the poetry which he had just declaimed). If this poetry really is your own and you have indeed recited it from your own poetic inventiveness, then recite to us a couple of verses on these two"—he meant Muḥammad and al-Ma'mūn, who were standing on each side of him. The Bedouin [762] replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, you have imposed on me as an ineluctable decree (or: on the spur of the moment, 'alā al-qadar) and without any warning, the awesomeness of the caliphate, the splendor of poetic inspiration, and the intractableness of the rhymes from adequate consideration. If the Commander of the Faithful will grant me a pause for thought, the refractory rhymes will all fall into place for me and my agitation of mind will be quietened down." The Caliph said, "I have granted you a period for reflection, O Bedouin, and have substituted your being allowed to put forward your excuses in place of putting you to the test." He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, you have removed the cord which was strangling me and have made easy the forum for hypocrisy! (i.e., for poetic exaggeration). Then he began to recite,

The two of them—may God grant them blessing!—are its two supporting ropes (i.e., of the caliphate, likened here to a tent), and you, O Commander of the Faithful, are its supporting pole.

You have constructed, with 'Abdallāh, after Muḥammad, the protective shelter of the cupola of Islam, and its trunk has thereby grown upwards healthily!

The Caliph said, "As for you, O Bedouin, may God grant you blessing! Now ask us (for a gift), and don't let what you ask be below the value of your excellent achievement!" He replied, "A herd of one hundred camels, O Commander of the Faithful!" He related: The Commander of the Faithful smiled, and ordered him to be given one hundred thousand dirhams and seven robes of honor.

It has been mentioned that al-Rashīd said to his son al-Qāsim, on an occasion when al-Qāsim had come into his presence and at a time before al-Rashīd had proclaimed his succession rights, "You are connected with al-Ma'mūn through part of this flesh[1120] of yours." Al-Qāsim added, "(And also) through part of his good fortune!"[1121]

One day, before the succession oath was made to al-Qāsim, al-Rashīd said to him, "I have entrusted your interests to al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn." Al-Qāsim replied, "For your part, O Commander of the Faithful, you have assumed personal responsibility for the two of them, yet you have entrusted my interests to someone else!"

Muṣ'ab b. 'Abdallāh al-Zubayrī related: Al-Rashīd came to the city of the Messenger of God (i.e., Medina), accompanied by his two sons Muḥammad al-Amīn and 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn. There, he gave out numerous gifts and in that year distributed among the men and women of the city three rounds of gifts, these three rounds of gifts which he distributed to them amounting to one million and fifty thousand dīnārs. During that year, he also made payments to five hundred of the leading mawlās of Medina, and to some of them he gave payments at the highest rate [fī al-sharaf[1122]], including Yaḥyā b. Miskīn, Ibn 'Uthmān and Mikhrāq the mawlā of the Banū Tamīm, who used to act as Qur'ān reciter in Medina. [763]

Isḥāq the mawlā has related: When al-Rashīd had homage made to his sons as successors in the caliphate, among those who gave 1120. Following the Cairo text, VIII, 363, here, laḥmika.

1121. Following ibid., here, ḥazzihi.

1122. I.e., they received payment at the highest level, that of sharaf al-'aṭā', the level of the stipends paid to the aristocracy of early Islam; see Balādhurī, Glossarium, 57.

homage was 'Abdallāh b. Muṣ'ab b. Thābit b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr.[1123] When he came forward to offer homage, he recited,

May the two of them not fall short in it (i.e., in the task of upholding the caliphate), but may it not reach them both (yet), so that your own period of power in it may be protracted!

Al-Rashīd found the quotation which 'Abdallāh had adduced neat and apposite, and gave him an appropriately rich reward. He related: The actual verse is by Ṭurayḥ b. Ismā'īl,[1124] who recited it in regard to (the Caliph) al-Walīd b. Yazīd and his two sons.

Abū al-Shīṣ recited,[1125] elegizing Hārūn al-Rashīd,

A sun has sunk in the East, and because of this, two eyes flow with tears.
We have never seen a sun which has set in the same place as it rises.[1126]

Abū Nuwās al-Ḥasan b. Hāni' has recited,

Maidens have hurried in bringing reports of both good fortune and ill luck, and we are in states of mourning at a funeral and of a wedding celebration.
The heart is weeping whilst the teeth gleam in laughter, and we are in states of both sadness and conviviality.
The one who has assumed control of the state, al-Amīn, moves us to joyous mirthfulness, whilst the death of the Imām just recently makes us weep.
Two full moons: one moon has appeared clearly in Baghdad, at al-Khuld, whilst the other moon is at Ṭūs in a grave.[1127]

1123. Probably governor of al-Madīnah (see Ṭabarī, III, 739, above, 304) at this time of the promulgation of the "Meccan documents," i.e., in 186 (802).

1124. A poet of Thaqīf, eulogist of the last Umayyads and then of al-Manṣūr, who died in 165 (782). See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, IV, 74–86 = ed. Cairo, IV, 302–29; GAS, II, 452.

1125. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Razīn al-Khuzā'ī, eulogist of al-Rashīd and al-Amīn, who died in 196 (812) or shortly afterwards. See GAL, I², 83, S I, 133; GAS, II, 532–3; *EI*² s.v. Abu 'l-Shīṣ (A. Schaade-Pellat).

1126. Ash'ār Abī al-Shīṣ wa-akhbāruhu, ed. 'Abdallāh al-Jubūrī, 78, no. 36; Azdī, 317. In Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, ed. Būlāq, XVII, 50 = ed. Cairo, XVIII, 249, these two verses are attributed in Ashja' al-Sulamī. The allusion to the sun rising and setting in the same place is, of course, to the Caliph's birth and now death at Ṭūs.

1127. K. al-'Uyūn, 318–19. These verses are translated by Wagner in his Abū

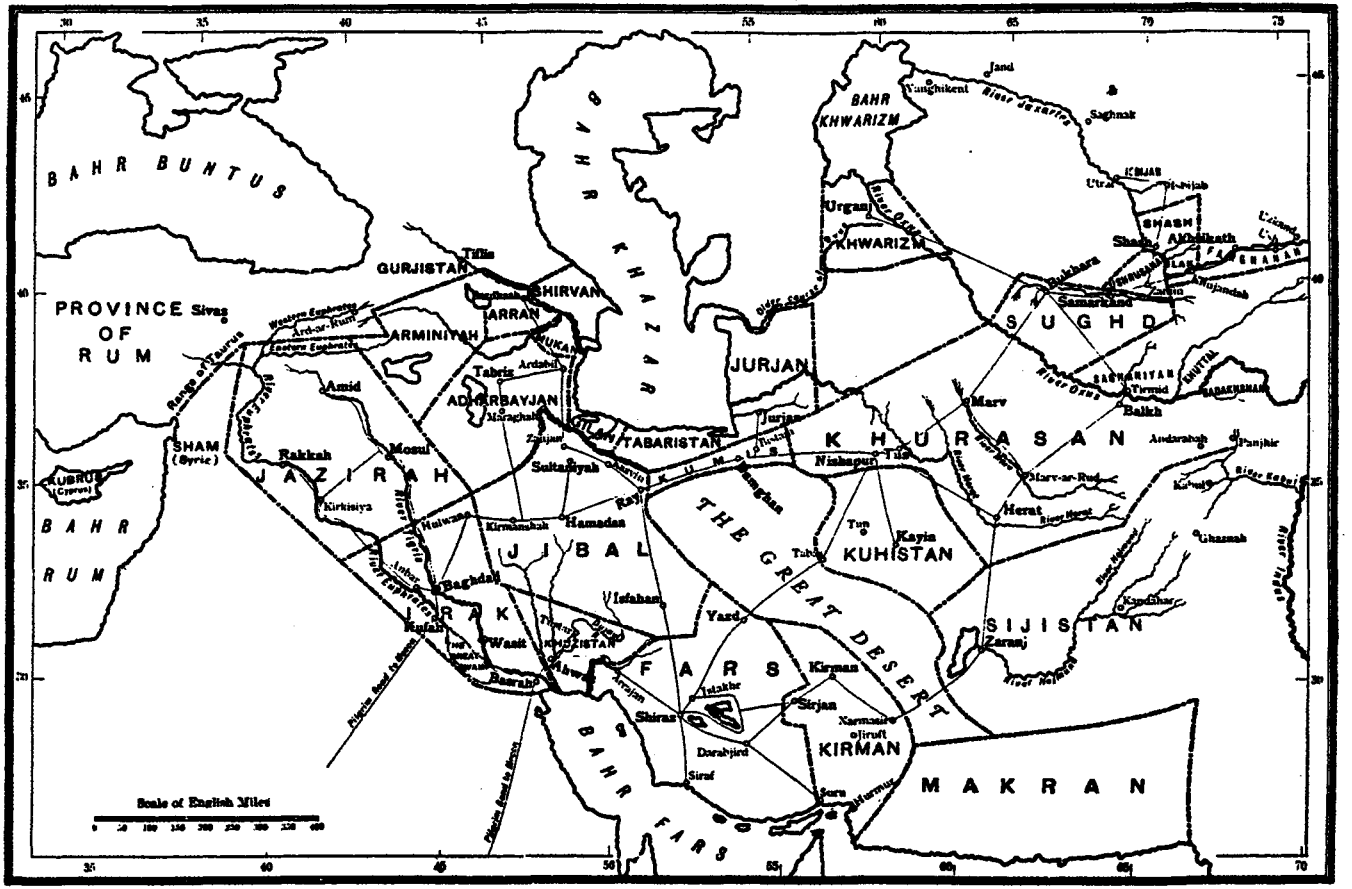
It has been said that when Hārūn al-Rashīd died, there were nine hundred million odd (dirhams) in the state treasury.[1128] [764]

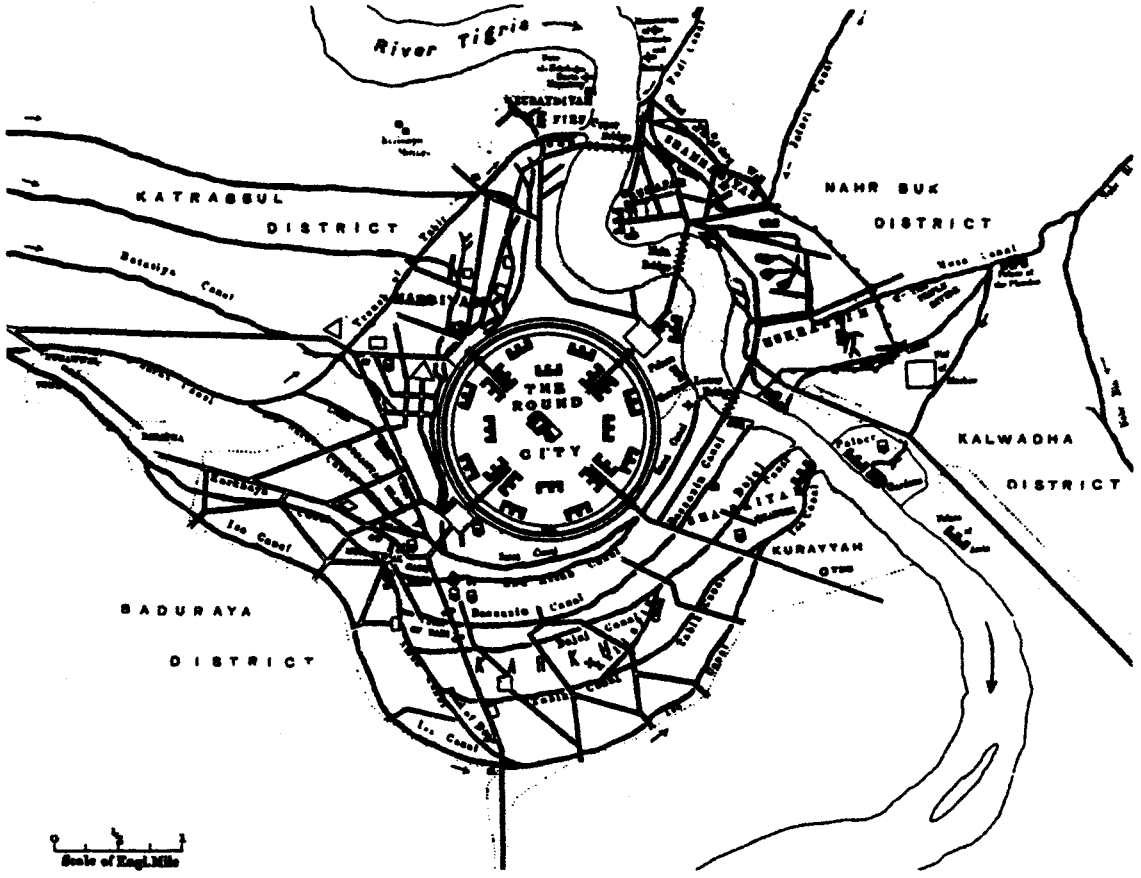
Nuwās, 352–3, from a text, with variants, in Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi's al-'Iqd al-farīd but attributed by him to Abū al-Shīṣ. The verses are not included in the part of the Dīwān of Abū Nuwās so far published by Wagner and G. Schoeler. Uncertainty about the correct authorship of these verses is shown by the fact that the literary critic Ibn Abī 'Awn attributes them—implausibly, from their light tone—to Abū al-'Atāhiyah.

1128. Azdī, 317; Qāḍī Ibn al-Zubayr, 213, 299.

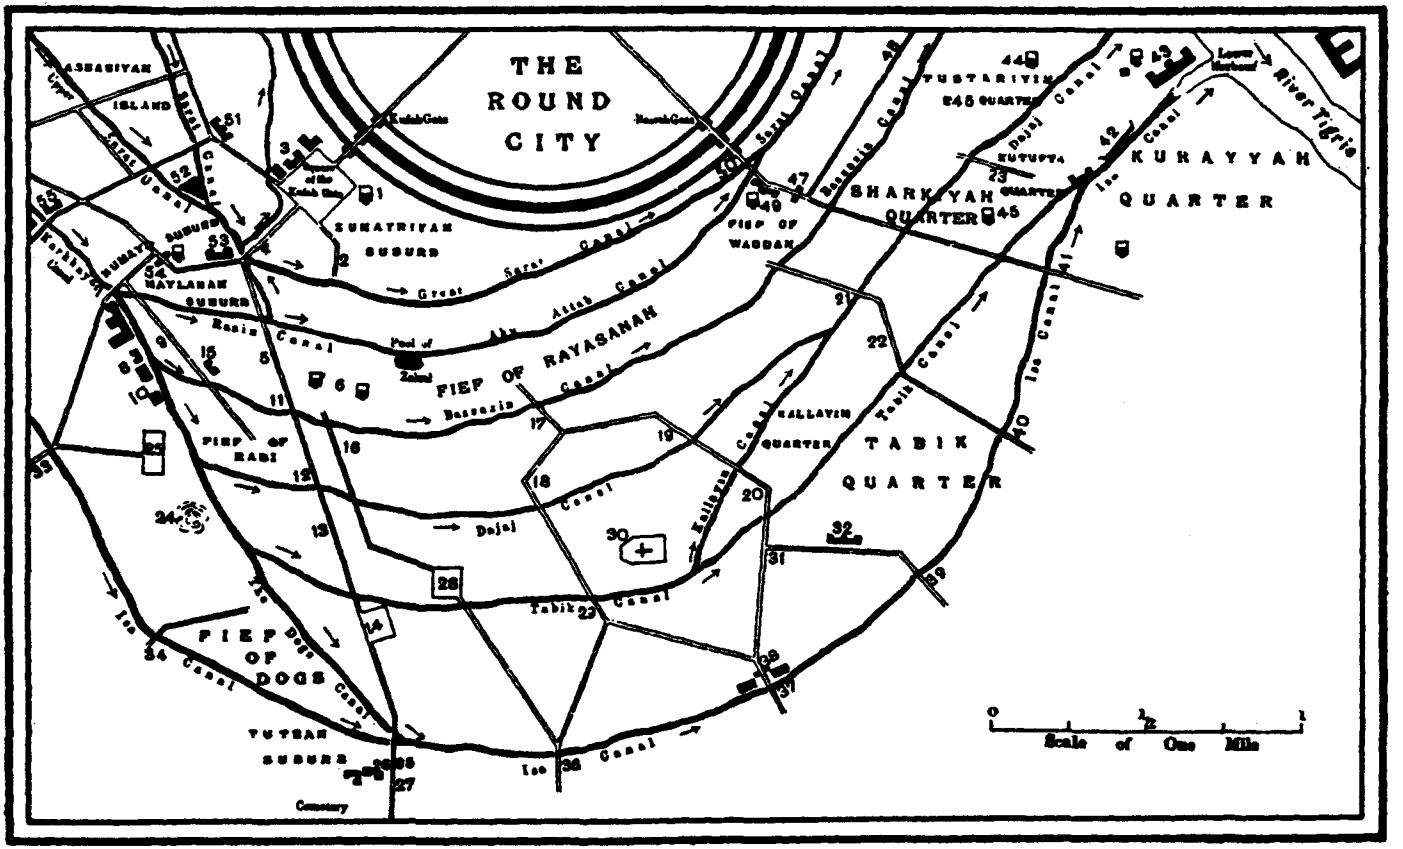


The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXXI

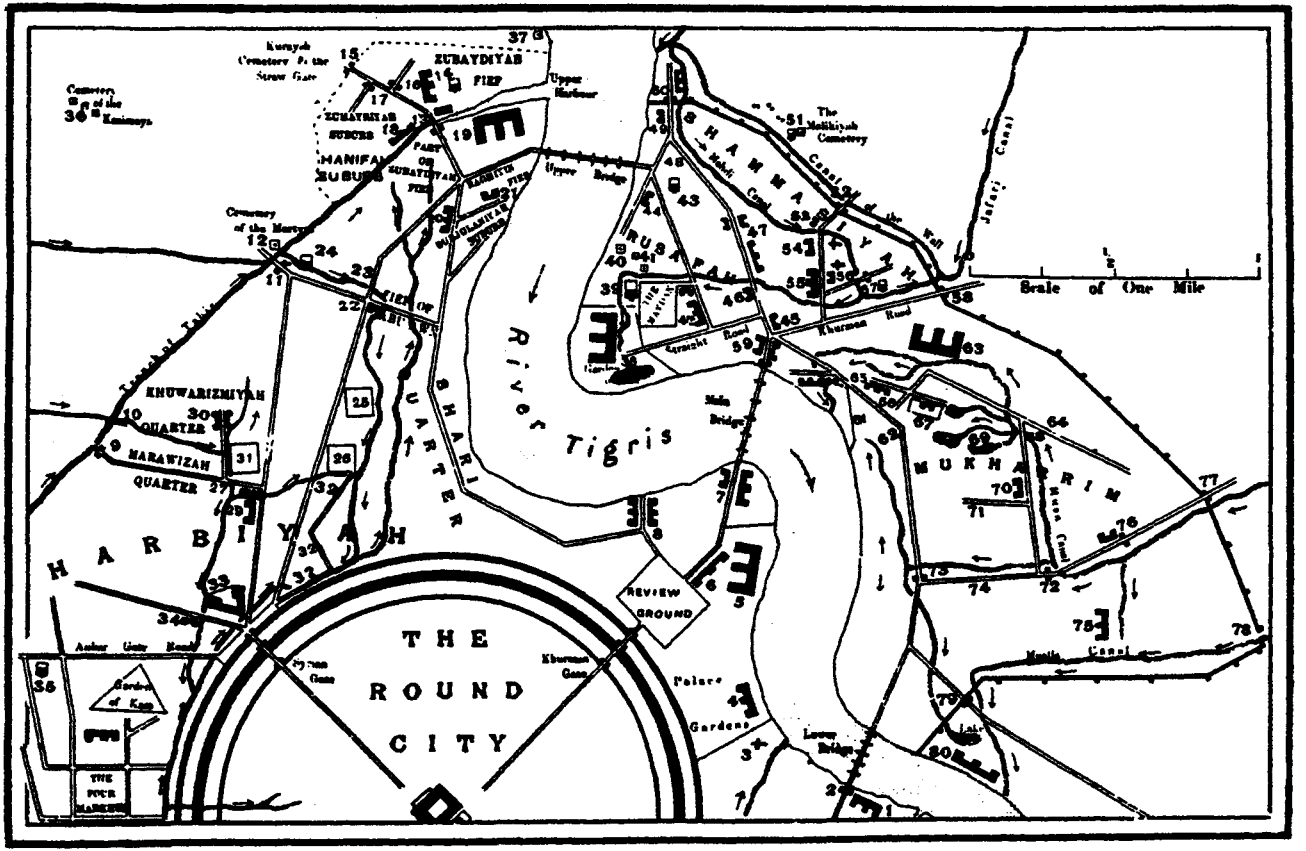


The War between Brothers



TRANSLATED BY MICHAEL FISHBEIN

Map 1. The Eastern Lands of the Caliphate. After G. Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate



Map 2. Baghdad between A.H. 150 and 300. After G. Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate

Map 3. Al-Karkh and Neighboring Suburbs. After G. Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate

1. Mosque of Musayyib with the tall minaret
2. Market of 'Abd al-Wāḥid
3. Fief of the Gatekeepers, Dīwān of the Ṣadaqah (Office of the Poor Tax), stables, and dromedary house
4. Old Bridge
5. Market of Abū al-Ward
6. Mosque of Ibn Raghbān and Mosque of the Anbārīs
7. Hospital Bridge and Old Hospital (Bīmāristān)
8. Darrabāt and Mill of Abū al-Qāsim
9. Quarter of the Wāṣitīs
10. Al-Khafqah (the Clappers)
11. Gate of Karkh
12. Gate of the Coppersmiths
13. Market of Ghālib
14. Square of Suwayd
15. Road of the Painter and House of Ka'b
16. Market of the Clothing Merchants (Sūq al-Bazzāzīn)
17. Butchers' quarter
18. Poultry market
19. Soap boilers' quarter
20. Canal diggers' quarter
21. Reed weavers' quarter
22. Road of the pitch workers
23. Cooks' quarter
24. Mound of the Ass
25. Quadrangle of the Oil Merchant
26. Shrine of Junayd and Sarī al-Saqaṭī, the Ṣūfī convent
27. Tuesday market
28. Quadrangle of Ṣāliḥ
29. Sawwāqīn
30. Fief of the Christians and Monastery of the Virgins
31. Road of Bricks
32. Cotton House
33. Bridge of the Oil Merchants
34. Alkali Bridge
35. Thorn Bridge
36. Pomegranate Bridge
37. Maghīd Bridge and mills
38. Gate of the Mills
39. Garden Bridge
40. Ma'badī Bridge
41. Banū Zurayq Bridge
42. Myrtle Wharf and Melon House (fruit market)
43. Palace of 'Īsā, Mosque of Ibn al-Muṭṭalib, and Tomb of Caliph al-Mustaḍī
44. Shrine of 'Alī (Mashhad al-Minṭaqah)
45. Great mosque of al-Sharqiyyah quarter
46. Shrine of Ma'rūf al-Karkhī and cemetery of the Convent Gate
47. Ḥarrānī archway
47–41. Baṣrah Gate road
47–48. Road to the Lower Bridge, called Barley Street
49. Palace and Mosque of al-Waḍḍāḥ
50. New Bridge and booksellers' market
51. Palace and Market of 'Abd al-Wahhāb
52. Patrician's Mill
53. Palace in the Fief of 'Īsā
54. Muḥawwal Gate and Mosque
55. Bridge of the Greeks and House of the Farrāshes

...Mashriyyah with the Three Quarters of al-Ruṣāfah, al-Shammāsiyyah, and al-Mukharrim.

...Abbasid Caliphate

1. Palace of Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Ḥamid
2. Barley Gate (Bāb al-Sha'īr)
3. Old convent at Ṣarāt Point
4. Palace of Zubaydah, called al-Qarār
5. Al-Khuld Palace
6. Royal stables
7. Office of bridge works and hall of the police chief
8. Palaces of Princes Sulaymān and Ṣāliḥ, sons of al-Manṣūr, on Darb Sulaymān
9. Iron Gate and Bridge, leading to Dujayl Road
10. Water conduit ('Abbārat al-Kūkh)
11. Al-Ḥarb Gate and Bridge, leading to al-Ḥarb Gate Road
12. Tomb of Ibn Ḥanbal
13. Qaṭrabbul Gate and Bridge of Umm Ja'far's Mill
14. Palace and mosque of Umm Ja'far Zubaydah
15. Straw Gate (Bāb al-Tibn)
16. Gate of the Fief
17. Little Gate (Bāb al-Ṣaghīr)
18. Palace of 'Umārah
19. Palace of the Ṭāhirid Ḥarīm
20. Slaves' House (Dār al-Raqīq) and Fief of the Pages (ghulāms)
21. Palace of Ḥafṣ b. 'Uthmān in Darb Siwār
22. Palace of Ibn Abī 'Awn
23. Bridge of the Straw Merchants (Qanṭarat al-Tabbānīn)
24. Al-Ḥarbiyyah mosque
25. Quadrangle of Abū al-'Abbās
26. Quadrangle of Shabīb
27. Abū al-Jawn Bridge
28. Palace of Sa'id al-Khaṭīb
29. Orphan school
30. Dukkān al-Abnā' (Persian shops)
31. Quadrangle of the Persians, with the suburbs of Rushayd, Zuhayr, and 'Uthmān b. Nuhayk
32. Arcades of 'Akki, Ghiṭrīf, and Abū Suwayd
33. Prison of the Syrian Gate
34. Road and Palace of Hānī
35. Bukhārī mosque
36. Kāẓimayn shrines: tombs of Zubaydah, Caliph al-Amīn, and the Būyid princes
37. Tomb of 'Abdallāh son of Ibn Ḥanbal
38. Palace of al-Mahdī in al-Ruṣāfah
39. Al-Ruṣāfah mosque
40. Shrine of Abū Ḥanīfah in Khayzurān cemetery
41. Tombs of the caliphs
42. Palaces of Umm Ḥabīb and al-Faḍl on the road of the Maydān
43. Khuḍayriyyah quarter and mosque; Khuḍayr market
44. Palace of al-Waḍḍāḥ on the Road of the Skiffs
45. Market of Yaḥyā and Bridge Road
46. Palace of Faraj
47. Palaces of Dūr and Ja'far al-Barmakī
48. Market of Ja'far and Mahdī Canal Road
49. Market of Khālid and Qaṣr al-Ṭīn (Mud Castle)
50. Al-Shammāsiyyah Gate and Palace of Mūnis
51. Three Gates suburb, Place of Vows, and Chapel of the Festival
52. Baradān Gate
53. Baradān Bridge and Palace of Abū Naṣr
54. Palace of Ibn al-Ḥuṭam
55. Barmakid fief and palaces
56. Dār al-Rūm (House of the Greeks) and Nestorian and Jacobite churches of the Christian quarter, with the patriarch's house
57. Market of al-Naṣr, mosque, and Iron Gates
58. Khurāsān Gate of East Baghdad
59. Bāb al-Ṭāq (Archway Gate) and palaces of Khuzaymah, Prince 'Ubaydallāh, and Princess Asmā'
60. Street of 'Amr the Greek
61. Garden of Zāhir at the mouth of the Mūsā canal and Palace of Ibn Muqlah
62. Great Road
63. Palace of al-Mu'taṣim
64. Long Street
65. Palace of Ibn al-Furāt and Street of the Vine Tendril
66. Thirst Market (Ṣūq al-'Aṭsh)
67. Palace, quadrangle, and market of al-Ḥarashī
68. Al-Anṣār Bridge
69. Tanks of the Anṣār, Haylānah, and Dāwūd
70. Palace of Ibn al-Khaṣīb in the Road of Sa'd al-Waṣīf
71. Market of al-Ḥajjāj
72. Great Pitched Gate
73. Al-Mukharrim Gate and Bridge of al-'Abbās
74. Hay market and booths
75. Palace of Banūjah
76. 'Ammār Gate and Palace of 'Umārah
77. Gate of the Horse Market
78. Abraz Gate
79. Gate of the Tuesday Market
80. Firdaws Palace and lake

... Le Strange. Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate

1. Palace of Sa'īd al-Khaṭīb and orphan school
2. Prison of the Syrian Gate
3. Road and Palace of Hānī
4. Bukhārī mosque
5. Shrine of Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī
6. Al-Anbār Gate and Bridge
7. Garden Gate
8. Dār al-Qazz (Silk House) and Street of Ghāmish
9. Palace and Market of 'Abd al-Wahhāb
10. Patrician's Mill and Bridge of the Mills
11. Palace in the Fief of 'Īsā
12. Al-Muḥawwal Gate and Mosque
13. China Bridge
14. Bridge of al-'Abbās
15. Bridge of the Greeks
16. House of the Farrāshes
17. Bridge of the Greek Woman
18. Palace of Ka'yūbah
19. Houses of the Persians
20. Bridge and Street of Rocks
21. Al-Kunāsah Gate and Place of the Sweepings, where beasts of burden were tied
22. Gate of Abū Qabīsah and Jews' Bridge (Qanṭarat al-Yahūd)
23. Al-Yāsiriyyah Gate, Bridge, and Quarter
24. Place of the tanners
25. Palace of al-Mu'taṣim at the town of al-Muḥawwal

The Events of the Year

193 (cont'd)

(October 25, 808–October 14, 809)

The Succession of Muḥammad al-Amīn as Caliph

In this year, allegiance was sworn to Muḥammad al-Amīn b. Hārūn as caliph at the camp of al-Rashīd.[1] 'Abdallāh b. Hārūn (al-Ma'mūn) was in Marw at the time.[2] According to what has been mentioned, Ḥammawayh[3] the mawlā[4] of al-Mahdī, the [764]

1. At the time of his death, the caliph Hārūn al-Rashīd was leading an army raised in Iraq to fight the rebel Rāfi' b. Layth in Khurāsān province. He had left Baghdad on 5 Sha'bān 192 (June 4, 808) and died at Ṭūs (see note 6) on 3 Jumādā II 193 (March 24, 809). His sons 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn and Ṣāliḥ had accompanied him; Muḥammad al-Amīn had remained in Baghdad. Cf. Ṭabarī, III, 730, 738; EI[2] s.vv. al-Amīn (Gabrieli), Hārūn al-Rashīd (Omar), and al-Ma'mūn (Rekaya). Parallel accounts: Ya'qūbī, II, 524; Dīnawarī, 388; Fragmenta, 320; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 152; Mas'ūdī, VI, 415.

2. Marw (Marv, modern Mary in the Turkmen S.S.R.) was the chief city of the second quarter of Khurāsān province. It was often called Marw al-Shāhijān or Great Marw to distinguish it from Marw al-Rūdh or Little Marw. See Le Strange, Lands, 397–403; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v. Marw al-Shāhijān; EI[2] s.vv. Marv al-Shāhidjān (Yakubovskii) and Khurāsān (Bosworth). During al-Rashīd's final illness, al-Ma'mūn had been sent ahead to Marw with most of the leading commanders of the army to assist Harthamah b. A'yan, the governor and commander actually entrusted with the task of subduing Rāfi'. Cf. Ṭabarī, III, 733–34.

3. Ḥammawayh, according to Ṭabarī, III, 712, was a eunuch (khādim; see note 7 on the term) and had been appointed postmaster of Khurāsān in 191/806–7 by postmaster[5] at Ṭūs,[6] wrote to Abū Muslim Sallām, his mawlā and deputy at Baghdad in charge of the post and information, informing him of the death of al-Rashīd. (Abū Muslim) came before Muḥammad, offered him condolences, and congratulated him about [his succession to] the caliphate. He was the first person to do so. Then Rajā' the eunuch (khādim)[7] came to him on Wednesday, the 14th of Jumādā II (April 4, 809),[8] having been sent to him with the news by Ṣāliḥ b. al-Rashīd—some say that this occurred during the night before Thursday, the middle of Jumādā II. The news was made public on Friday; it had been kept secret for the rest of the day and the night [after it was received], while the people spoke confusedly about the matter. When Ṣāliḥ's letter announcing the death of al-Rashīd reached Muḥammad al-Amīn by way of Rajā' the eunuch, (al-Amīn), who was staying in his palace at al-Khuld,[9] moved to the Palace al-Rashīd. See also Abbott, Two Queens of Baghdad, 144–45; and Crone, Slaves on Horses, 191. For an account of how he obtained an appointment to a seven-year charge of "war and taxes" in Fārs, see Aghānī, XV, 79–80.

---

4. The closest English equivalent of mawlā (pl. mawālī) is "client." A mawlā (often, but not always, a person of non-Arab origin) was bound to his Arab patron by a formal social and legal relationship and obtained protection and something of the patron's social status. See EI^{2} s.v. Mawlā (Crone); Bosworth, 'Abbāsid Caliphate in Equilibrium, 4 n. 4.

5. Ṣāḥib al-barīd, "master of post and intelligence": "To make sure that he was well informed about affairs in all corners of the empire and... that the representatives of the central government were behaving properly, the caliph appointed his own independent agents who reported directly to him every day, even on such mundane matters as food prices in their respective areas. The official title of such an agent was ṣāḥib barīd, postmaster, but more important and to emphasize his direct relationship to the ruler he was also given the honorary status of mawlā Amīr al-Mu'minīn"; Shaban, Islamic History, II, 9. See also Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 32; EI^{2} s.v. Barīd (Sourdel).

6. Ṭūs (ruins about 25 km north of Mashhad in northeastern Iran) was the second city of the Nishāpūr quarter of Khurāsān province. See Le Strange, Lands, 388–91; EI^{1} s.v. Ṭūs (Minorsky).

7. Khādim literally means "servant." Arabic has an explicit term (khaṣī) for eunuch, but khādim was used as a euphemism. After a proper name as part of the person's title, it is generally not ambiguous. See EI^{2} s.v. Khaṣī (Pellat); Bosworth, 'Abbāsid Caliphate in Equilibrium, 24 n. 100.

8. This represents an average speed of 150 km (94 miles) a day for the 1,900 km (1,188 miles) between Ṭūs and Baghdad. See Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 33.

9. This palace (its name means "The Palace of Eternity"), overlooking the Tigris amid extensive gardens outside the walls of the Round City, had been of Abū Ja'far[10] in the city. He commanded the people to be present on Friday. They came, and he led them in worship. Having finished his worship, he ascended the pulpit. He praised and extolled God, announced the death of al-Rashīd to the people, and consoled himself and the people. He promised them prosperity, enlarged their hopes, and promised protection[11] to all and sundry. The chief members of his family, his courtiers (khāṣṣah),[12] his clients (mawālī), and his military commanders (quwwād)[13] swore allegiance to him. Then he returned home. He deputed his father's paternal uncle, Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far, to receive the oath of allegiance from those remaining [among the chief people], and the latter did so. He commanded al-Sindī[14] to receive the oath of allegiance from all the [other] people—that is, the military commanders and the rest of the army (jund). [765] He ordered twenty-four months' pay (rizq) for the troops who were in the City of Peace,[15] as well as the same months [of pay] for his closest courtiers.

In this year the discord between al-Amīn Muḥammad and his brother al-Ma'mūn began. Each of them determined to oppose the other in what their father, Hārūn, had enjoined them to carry out in the document[16] that we have mentioned that he drew up as an obligation for them and between them.

---

built by al-Manṣūr in 158/774. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 101–2; Lassner, Topography of Baghdad, 55, 60.

10. The Palace of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, also called the Palace of the Golden Gate or the Palace of the Green Dome, was located at the center of the Round City. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 31–33.

11. Amān: "safety, protection," in military contexts "safe-conduct, quarter." See EI^{2} s.v. Amān (Schacht).

12. On the formal distinction between courtiers (khāṣṣah) and commoners ('āmmah) see EI^{2} s.v. al-Khāṣṣah wa 'l-'Āmmah (Beg).

13. See the discussion of the role and political importance of these army commanders in Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 82.

14. Al-Sindī b. Shāhak was an important mawlā at court. Under al-Rashīd he had been instrumental in the fall of the Barmakids and had been in charge of security in Baghdad. See EI^{2} s.v. Ibrahim b. al-Sindī (Pellat); Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 128; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 194–95.

15. Madīnat al-Salām was the name given to the original round city of Baghdad laid out by al-Manṣūr in 145/763.

16. This was the so-called Covenant of the Ka'bah, drawn up in 186/802 to settle the question of the succession. Under its terms al-Amīn, al-Rashīd's younger son by the 'Abbāsid princess Zubaydah, was given the succession,

Causes of the Discord between al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: We have already mentioned that al-Rashīd, when he left for Khurāsān, renewed the oath of allegiance to al-Ma'mūn by the military commanders who were with him. He made the commanders, the remaining troops, and the others who were with him witness that all the soldiers who were with him were to be attached to al-Ma'mūn and that all money, weapons, equipment, and other things that were with him were to be al-Ma'mūn's.[17] When al-Rashīd's son Muḥammad learned that his father's illness had worsened and that he was going to die, he sent someone to bring him a report about him every day. He sent Bakr b. al-Mu'tamir and wrote letters [to be taken] with him, placing them in the hollowed legs of chests that he covered with cowhide and saying: "Do not let the Commander of the Faithful [al-Rashīd] or anyone in his camp find out anything about your business and intention or about what you have with you, even if you are killed, until the Commander of the Faithful dies. When he dies, give each of the men his letter." When Bakr b. al-Mu'tamir reached Ṭūs, Hārūn, having learned of his coming, summoned him and asked him, "What has brought you?" Bakr said, "Muḥammad sent me to find out news about you for him and to bring it to him." Hārūn said, "Do you have a letter with you?" "No," he replied. Hārūn gave orders that what Bakr had with him was to be searched, but they found nothing with him. Hārūn threatened him with blows, but he confessed nothing; so Hārūn ordered him to be [766] imprisoned and bound. During the night in which he died, Hārūn

---

and al-Ma'mūn, the slightly older son by the slave Marājil, was to have autonomy over the eastern half of the empire during his brother's lifetime, with the right of succession to the caliphate after al-Amīn. See Ṭabarī, III, 654–63; discussion in Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 343–51; Kimber, "Hārūn al-Rashīd's Meccan Settlement"; and Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 123–27. El-Hibri, in his recent article "Harun al-Rashid and the Mecca Protocol of 802," rejects the text of the protocols as a work of "Ma'munid propaganda."

17. As becomes clear later (p. 13), most of these men had families in Baghdad. Thus their attachment to al-Ma'mūn was an unusual action that al-Rashīd took pains to confirm before leaving for Khurāsān (Ṭabarī, III, 666, 704). Ibn al-Athīr, V, 152, adds that this arrangement "was distressing to al-Amīn."

ordered al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'[18] to go to the place where Bakr b. al-Mu'tamir was being confined and make him confess. He was either to confess or be beheaded. Al-Faḍl went to Bakr and tried to make him confess, but he confessed nothing. Then Hārūn lost consciousness, and the women cried out; so al-Faḍl held back from killing Bakr and went to attend on Hārūn. Hārūn regained consciousness, but he was weak and distracted from thinking about Bakr or anyone else by his sense of [approaching] death. Then he lost consciousness in an attack that they thought was the end. An outcry arose, whereupon Bakr b. al-Mu'tamir sent a note from himself to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' by way of 'Abdallāh b. Abī Nu'aym, asking him that they not be hasty in any affair and informing him that he had with him things that they needed to know about. Bakr was being confined in the house of Ḥusayn the eunuch (khādim). When Hārūn died—at the very time at which he died—al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' immediately summoned Bakr and asked him about what he had. Bakr denied having anything—he feared for himself that Hārūn might be alive. But, when Hārūn's death was confirmed to him, and [al-Faḍl] took him into his presence [to see the body], he told him that he had with him letters from the [new] Commander of the Faithful, Muḥammad, but that it was not possible for him to produce them while he was in a state of being bound and confined. Ḥusayn the eunuch refused to release him until al-Faḍl released him; Bakr then gave them the letters that he had. They were in the cowhide-covered legs of the kitchen [chests]. He gave each person his letter. Among the letters there was one from Muḥammad b. Hārūn to Ḥusayn the eunuch in Muḥammad's own hand, commanding Ḥusayn to release Bakr b. al-Mu'tamir and set him free. [Bakr] gave it to him. There was a letter to 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn, and [Bakr] retained al-Ma'mūn's letter with him, so that he might send it to al-Ma'mūn in Marw. They sent for al-Rashīd's son Ṣāliḥ, who had been with his father in Ṭūs, he having been the oldest of Hārūn's children [767] in attendance on him. He came to them immediately and asked them about his father, Hārūn. When they told him [of Hārūn's death], he showed intense grief. Then they gave him the letter from his brother Muḥammad that Bakr had brought. Those who had been present at the death of Hārūn were the ones who attended to him, washing him, and preparing him [for burial]. His son Ṣāliḥ prayed [the funeral prayer] over him.

18. Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' was Hārūn's vizier. See EI[2] s.v. [Sourdel]; Sourdel, Vizirat 'abbāside, I, 183–94; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 103; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 194.

The Letter of Muḥammad al-Amīn to His Brother 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn[19]

If your brother's letter—may God protect him from the loss of you—reaches you on the occurrence of that which can be neither averted nor repelled, it being a thing that departed nations and past ages have bequeathed and transmitted one to another,[20] [console yourself][21] with that whereby God has consoled you. Know that God, whose praise is exalted, has chosen for the Commander of the Faithful the better of two dwelling places and the more abundant of two lots.[22] God has taken possession of him clean and pure. He has rewarded his effort and forgiven his sin, God willing. Take up your affairs like a man of discretion and resolution, one who looks out for his brother, himself, his government, and the generality of Muslims. Take care that grief does not master you; for it annuls the reward [of a deed] and brings a heavy burden [of sin] as its consequence. May God's blessings be upon the Commander of the Faithful in life and in death. Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return![23]

---

19. Cf. the Italian translation by Gabrieli, "Documenti relativi al califfato di al-Amīn in aṭ-Ṭabarī," 200–1.

20. The text is difficult. The translation follows the suggestion in ed. Leiden, Glossarium, DXII. Ed. Cairo adds the word fī ("in") and can be translated: "according to what has been left behind and transmitted among departed nations and past ages." Gabrieli, ibid., translates, "all' avento di ciò che non si può respingere nè allontare, che ha fatto succedersi e passare dall' uno all' altro i popoli passati e i secoli trascorsi."

21. The bracketed text [Arabic: fa-'azzi nafsaka] from ed. Cairo, following Ms. Ahmet III, 2929 [A], renders the syntax comprehensible.

22. I.e., heaven.

23. Qur'ān 2:156, traditionally said in time of misfortune.

Have those who are with you—your military commanders, army, courtiers, and commons—swear allegiance to your brother [Muḥammad], then to yourself, and then to al-Qāsim, the son of the [late] Commander of the Faithful, according to the stipulation that the Commander of the Faithful set for you concerning its being annulled or confirmed for the latter.[24] For this you have the mandate of God and His caliph. Make known to those who are with you that my intention is to do them good, satisfy their needs, and be generous to them. As for anyone whom you reject when he swears allegiance or whose obedience you suspect, send me his head with a report of him! Take care that you do not release him, for hellfire is most fitting for him! Write to the financial agents ('ummāl) of your frontier regions and the commanders of your armies about the affliction that has befallen you concerning the Commander of the Faithful. Tell them that God, not satisfied with this [768] world as a reward for him, has taken him to His mercy, His rest, and His Paradise—in a state to be envied and praised, and as a leader into Paradise for all his successors, God willing. Command them to have their armies, courtiers, and commoners swear allegiance in the same way as I have commanded you to have those who are with you swear it. Instruct them to secure their frontiers and to be strong against their enemy. I will acquaint myself with their circumstances and set aright whatever is disordered with them, and will be generous to them. I will not be slow to strengthen my armies and helpers. Let your letters to them be public letters, to be read out to them, because that will set them at ease and enlarge their hopes. Act on the basis of what you[25]

24. That is, al-Qāsim. According to the succession arrangements, al-Ma'mūn could, on succeeding to the caliphate, either confirm al-Qāsim as his own heir or nominate someone else (one of his own children or another brother). See Ṭabarī, III, 658–59.

25. Following the reading of ed. Cairo (ta'muru). In the manuscript used by ed. Leiden, the initial letter of the word was left undotted, and the editor restored the word as na'muru, "we command." The Cairo reading makes better sense:

command regarding your troops near or far from you, according to what you deem best and perceive; for your brother knows the excellence of your decisions, the soundness of your judgment, and your foresight. He prays that God will keep you and asks God to strengthen his hand through you and gather his affairs into unity through you; and God is gracious to what He will.[26] Written by Bakr b. al-Mu'tamir in my presence and at my dictation in Shawwāl of the year 192 (July–August 808).[27]

The Letter of Muḥammad al-Amīn to His Brother Ṣāliḥ[28]

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate: If this letter of mine reaches you at the occurrence of what God has foreknown—His Decree that He has executed in regard to His viceroys[29] and His friends, and His established ordinance in regard to the prophets, the apostles, and the angels stationed near Him (so that He has said, "All things perish, except His Face; His is the Judgment, and unto Him you shall be returned"[30])—praise ye God for that to which the Commander of the Faithful has gone: (God's) great reward and the companionship of His prophets, may God's blessings be upon them! To Him we return.[31] We ask Him to render the

---

Al-Amīn begins with praise of al-Ma'mūn's wisdom and concedes him the independence envisaged in the succession settlement.

26. Qur'ān 12:100.

27. Note that the letter is dated in the second month after al-Rashīd's departure from Baghdad, some seven or eight months before his death.

28. Cf. the Italian translation by Gabrieli, "Documenti relativi al califfato di al-Amīn in aṭ-Ṭabarī," 202–4.

29. Khulafā', pl. of khalīfah: Cf. Qur'ān 2:30, where God announces to the angels, on the creation of Adam: "I am setting in the earth a viceroy." Cf. also Ṭabarī, I, 974, where the kings of Israel are called khulafā'.

30. Qur'ān 28:88. The syntax is loose. Instead of "so that He has said," ed. Cairo reads "so say." The Cairo text yields the following sense: "If this letter of mine reaches you..., say: 'All things perish... and unto Him you shall be returned; praise ye God....'"

31. See note 23.

caliphate prosperous for the community of His Prophet Muḥammad—may God bless him and give him peace!—for He has been to them a defense and a shelter, and to them He has been gentle and compassionate. Be vigorous in your enterprise. Take care that you do not sit with [769] your hands folded; for your brother has chosen you for what he has sent you to perform and will have an eye out for any places in which you are found wanting.[32] Prove his opinion to be true! We ask God for success. Have the children of the Commander of the Faithful, his family, his mawālī, his courtiers, and his commoners who are with you swear allegiance to Muḥammad, Commander of the Faithful, then to ʿAbdallāh, the son of the [late] Commander of the Faithful, and then to al-Qāsim, the son of the [late] Commander of the Faithful, according to the stipulation that the Commander of the Faithful—may God's blessings be upon him!—set concerning its being annulled for al-Qāsim or confirmed. Happiness and prosperity are to be found in upholding his pact and proceeding on his paths. Inform the courtiers and commoners who are with you that I intend to treat them well, to relieve their grievances, to inquire of their conditions, and to pay them their provision allowances (arzāq) and stipends (aʿṭiyāt). If any troublemaker stirs up mischief or if any unruly person causes a commotion, fall upon him so as to make him "a punishment exemplary for those present and for those to come, and an admonition to such as are God-fearing."[33] Attach to the fortunate man, son of the fortunate man—al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ—the children, servants, and family of the Commander of the Faithful. Command him to travel with them, along with those who are with him, his soldiers, and his horse guards (rawābiṭ).[34] Commit the

32. The text may be corrupt; the reading is conjectural.

33. Qur'ān 2:66.

34. That is, to return to Baghdad. The command for a large part of the army assigned to al-Ma'mūn to return to Baghdad was bound to cause friction. See pp. 13–14, below. The exact meaning of rawābiṭ (pl. of rābiṭah) is unclear. Lane, Lexicon, III, 1014, explains the term as synonymous with murābiṭah: "a camp and its policing (aḥdāth)[35] to 'Abdallāh b. Mālik,[36] who is trustworthy in what he undertakes and is favorably received by the regular troops. Attach to him all the police force (jund al-shuraṭ)—both horse guards and others—in addition to his soldiers who are with him. Command him to exert himself, be vigilant, and use good judgment in all his affairs night and day; for those who harbor hostility and hypocrisy toward this government (sulṭān) will take advantage of an affliction such as this. Confirm Ḥātim b. Harthamah[37] in his post. Command him to guard what the palaces of the Commander of the Faithful contain. He is a man of known and proven obedience, by God's mandate, in accordance with traits of character that were also known to be typical of his father, who was praised in the court of the caliphs. Command the servants to bring their squadrons of horse [770] guards: by means of them and by means of their soldiers the weak spots of your camp will be closed up, for they are one of your strengths. Entrust your vanguard to Asad b. Yazīd b. Mazyad[38] and your rear to Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh[39] and his soldiers. Command the two of them to report to you each night. Stay on the Great Road. Do not exceed the stages; that will be easier on you. Command Asad b. Yazīd to select someone from his family or one of his commanders to join his vanguard and precede him to prepare the camp sites or part of the road. If some company of horsemen having their horses tied at the frontier in preparation for the enemy." Dozy, Supplément, I, 502, notes that the term could be used in the general sense of "mounted guard" or "night watch."

35. For a discussion of the origins of this term, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 258.

36. 'Abdallāh b. Mālik b. al-Haytham al-Khuzā'ī was a leading military figure in al-Ma'mūn's entourage. Cf. Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 80–81; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 181–82. Note that he had already gone ahead with al-Ma'mūn to Marw (p. 14, below).

37. He was the son of Harthamah b. A'yan al-Ḍabbī, who had replaced 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān as governor of Khurāsān under al-Rashīd. See Ṭabarī, III, 713–29; EI[2] s.v. Ḥātim b. Harthama (Lewis); Crone, Slaves on Horses, 177–78.

38. Asad was the son of Yazīd b. Mazyad al-Shaybānī (d. 185/801), who had been an important military leader with roots in al-Jazīrah (northern Mesopotamia), rather than Khurāsān. See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 169–70.

39. Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh b. Muslim was of Khurāsānian origins. See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 184.

of those I have named are not present with you in your camp, choose in their stead people whose obedience, loyalty, and respect in the eyes of the populace you trust; God willing, you will not lack such among your commanders and aides. Take care lest you carry out any plan or conclude any affair without the decision of your elder (shaykh) and the best minister of your fathers, al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ. Confirm all the servants in charge of the money, weapons, stores, and other things now in their hands. Do not remove any of them from what he is in charge of until you come to me. I have committed to Bakr b. al-Muʿtamir a matter of which he will inform you; act in it according to what you perceive and deem best. If you order pay (ʿaṭāʾ) or provision allowance (rizq) for the people of your camp, let al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ be the person in charge of paying it to them according to registers that he keeps for himself in the presence of the keepers of the registers. Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ has always followed such procedures in important affairs. When this letter of mine reaches you, send Ismāʿīl b. Ṣubayḥ[40] and Bakr b. al-Muʿtamir to me on their post horses. There should be for you no staying or delay at the place where you are until you bring me your camp, with the money and stores that are in it, God willing! Your brother asks God to defend you. He prays to God on your behalf that you may be well strengthened through His mercy. Written by Bakr b. al-Muʿtamir in my presence and at my dictation in Shawwāl of the year 192 (July–August 808). [771]

When Hārūn was buried, Rajāʾ the eunuch left, carrying the seal, the scepter, the mantle,[41] and the announcement of Hārūn's

40. A secretary who served al-Rashīd and al-Amīn; see Sourdel, Vizirat ʿabbāside, I, 122, 190.

41. The seal (khātam), scepter (qaḍīb), and mantle of the Prophet (burdah) were insignia of the caliphate. For the story of how the mantle that the Prophet gave to the poet Kaʿb b. Zuhayr was bought by the caliph Muʿāwiyah, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 67. Lane, Lexicon, I, 184, s.v. burdah, gives a description of the garment. See also, Sourdel, "Questions de cérémoniale ʿabbaside," 135; EI[2] s.v. Marāsīm (Sanders).

death. He reached Baghdad the eve of Thursday—some say on Wednesday. The report I have mentioned previously then took place.

Some have said: When the announcement of al-Rashīd's death reached Baghdad, Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī [b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās] ascended the pulpit.[42] Having praised and extolled God, he said, "The man whose loss is greatest and whose survivor is best—we have been afflicted with [his] loss.[43] No one has been afflicted with loss like ours; yet we have been compensated—and who has compensation such as ours?" Then he announced his death to the people and urged the people to obedience.

According to al-Ḥasan the Chamberlain (al-Ḥājib)—al-Faḍl b. Sahl:[44] The dignitaries of Khurāsān went to meet al-Rashīd. Al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣʿab[45] was among them. [Continuing, al-Faḍl]

---

42. Al-Yaʿqūbī, II, 525, gives a version of this khuṭbah by a senior ʿAbbāsid prince with significant textual variants.

43. The text is difficult. The manuscript used by ed. Leiden (Köprülü 1041) reads, "The man whose loss is greatest and whose survivor is best—we have been afflicted by loss of the Messenger of God." The Leiden editor deleted the words "the Messenger of God." In Addenda, DCCLXII, he added this note: "Yaʿqūbī, II, 525, also has 'We have been afflicted with loss of the Messenger of God.' Afterwards, however, Yaʿqūbī has 'and we have been compensated by his successor, his son.'" He added that one perhaps should read, "the Caliph of the Messenger of God." Thus his conjectured reconstruction was, "The man whose loss is greatest and whose survivor is best—we have been afflicted with loss of the Caliph of the Messenger of God. No one has been afflicted with loss like ours; yet we have been compensated by his successor, his son—and who has compensation such as ours?" Ed. Cairo reads (but gives no textual note): "The man whose loss is greatest and whose survivor is best is our loss (ruzʾunā). No one has been afflicted. . . ." The original reading of Köprülü 1041 may be correct. As prologue to the announcement of al-Rashīd's death, the speaker may have begun with a reference to how the Muslim community's greatest calamity, the death of Muḥammad, did not mean disaster.

44. On the career of al-Faḍl b. Sahl b. Zadhānfarūkh, the vizier of al-Maʾmūn and perhaps the man most responsible for the war between the two brothers, see EI[2] s.v. (Sourdel). Note that al-Faḍl b. Sahl had been responsible for having al-Maʾmūn accompany al-Rashīd to Khurāsān. Foreseeing that al-Maʾmūn might be in danger of being deprived of his rights if al-Rashīd were to die while both heirs were in Baghdad, he had counseled al-Maʾmūn to accompany his father to the province that had been assigned to him. See Ṭabarī, III, 730–31.

45. Al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣʿab al-Khuzāʿī was the father of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, who was to become al-Maʾmūn's main commander in the civil war. On the family and its rise to prominence, see M. Kaabi, "Les Origines ṭāhirides dans la daʿwa ʿabbāside."

said: He met me and said to me, "Al-Rashīd is going to die today or tomorrow. The position of Muḥammad b. al-Rashīd is weak. The affair belongs to your master [al-Ma'mūn]. Stretch out your hand." He then stretched out his hand and swore allegiance to al-Ma'mūn as caliph. A few days later, he came to me with al-Khalīl b. Hishām and said, "This is my brother's son. He is someone you can trust. Receive his oath of allegiance."

Al-Ma'mūn had already left Marw for the castle of Khālid b. Ḥammād, a farsakh[46] from Marw, intending to go to Samarqand.[47] He had commanded al-'Abbās b. al-Musayyab[48] to bring out the troops and go to the camp. Isḥāq the eunuch (khādim) passed by the latter, carrying the announcement of al-Rashīd's death. His coming grieved al-'Abbās, who then went to al-Ma'mūn and informed him. Al-Ma'mūn returned to Marw, entered the Government House,[49] the house of Abū Muslim, and announced the death of al-Rashīd from the pulpit.[50] He rent his garment and descended. He commanded that money be given to the men and had the oath of allegiance to Muḥammad and then to himself administered. He gave the soldiers twelve [772] months' provision allowance (rizq).

When the commanders, soldiers, and children of Hārūn who had received Muḥammad's letters in Ṭūs read them, they took counsel together about joining Muḥammad.[51] Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' said, "I will not foresake a present king for another whose future position is unknown." He ordered the men to depart, and they did so out of a desire to rejoin their families and homes in Baghdad. Thus they abandoned their obligations to al-Ma'mūn.

---

46. A farsakh, from Persian farsang, originally was the distance that could be covered on foot in an hour's march. In Islamic times it was standardized at three Arab miles—5.985 km or 3.717 miles. See EI^{2} s.v. (Hinz).

47. Samarqand (modern Samarkand in the Uzbek S.S.R.) was the chief city of the district of Sughd (ancient Sogdiana), which included the fertile lands between the Oxus (Jayḥūn, modern Amu Darya) and Jaxartes (Sayḥūn, modern Syr Darya) rivers. See Le Strange, Lands, 460–67; EI^{1} s.v. Samarḳand (Schaeder).

48. Al-'Abbās b. al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr al-Ḍabbī commanded a group of shurṭah troops. See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 187.

49. The Dār al-Imārah, or "House of the Government," on the central square of Marw had been built by Abū Muslim, the great partisan of the 'Abbāsids. See Le Strange, Lands, 399.

50. The text of al-Ma'mūn's words on the occasion is given in Dīnawarī, 388.

51. Parallel versions: Ibn al-Athīr, V, 153; Fragmenta, 320–21.

When word of their action reached al-Ma'mūn in Marw, he gathered his father's military commanders who were with him. They included 'Abdallāh b. Mālik, Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh, Shabīb b. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah,[52] al-'Alā' the mawlā of Hārūn,[53] al-'Abbās b. al-Musayyab b. Zuhayr (who was in charge of his police [shurṭah]), and Ayyūb b. Abī Sumayr[54] (who was in charge of his correspondence). Of the members of his household 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ[55] and Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn[56] were with him—the latter was one of the men most in his esteem and closest to him. He asked their advice and told them the news. They urged him to overtake the men with a detachment of 2,000 horsemen and turn them back. Men were named for this.[57] Then Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn came before him and said to him, "If you do what they have urged upon you, you will have made these men a gift to Muḥammad.[58] The wisest plan is for you to write them a letter and send them a messenger, reminding them of the oath of allegiance, asking them to fulfill it, and warning them about oath breaking and its consequences for them in the present world and the hereafter." [Continuing, al-Faḍl b. Sahl] said: I said to him, "Your letter and your messengers will stand in your stead, so that you will search out what the people think. You [773] should send Sahl b. Ṣā'id"—he was his chief steward. "He puts his hope in you and expects to attain his hope, and so he will never flag in his loyalty to you. You should also send Nawfal the eunuch (khādim), the mawlā of Mūsā [al-Hādī], the

52. He was the grandson of Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb al-Ṭā'ī, next to Abū Muslim the most important general of the 'Abbāsid revolution. See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 189.

53. He held the post of chamberlain (ḥājib). See Ibn al-Athīr, V, 153.

54. See Sourdel, Vizirat 'abbāside, I, 184, 198.

55. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās was a member of the 'Abbāsid family.

56. That is, al-Faḍl b. Sahl. The title means "possessor of two primacies"—i.e., primacy in civil affairs and primacy in military affairs. It is an anachronism here, for it was not conferred on al-Faḍl b. Sahl by al-Ma'mūn until 196/812. See pp. 101–2, below.

57. That is, to stop al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' by force. Cf. Fragmenta, 321: "He acted in accordance with this opinion and named men to travel with him." In other words, the first plan was for al-Ma'mūn himself to accompany the detachment.

58. Cf. Fragmenta, 321, and Ibn al-Athīr, V, 154: "these men will make you a gift to Muḥammad." The word for "gift" (hadiyyah) can also mean "sacrificial animal."

Commander of the Faithful, who is judicious." So he wrote a letter and sent the two messengers, who overtook the men in Naysābūr.[59] They had already traveled three stages.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Abī Sa'īd—Sahl b. Ṣā'id, who said: When I delivered his letter to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī', he said to me, "I am one of them."[60] [Continuing, al-Ḥasan] said: Sahl said to me: 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jabalah assaulted me with a spear and made it pass along my side. Then he said, "Tell your master [al-Ma'mūn], 'By God, if you were present, I would put the spear into your mouth!' This is my answer." Then he defamed al-Ma'mūn. I returned with the news.

According to al-Faḍl b. Sahl: I said to al-Ma'mūn, "Enemies—now you have been relieved of them! But mark what I am saying to you. This dynasty (dawlah)[61] was never more powerful than it was in the days of Abū Ja'far;[62] yet al-Muqanna' rebelled against him, claiming divinity.[63] Some said he was seeking vengeance for Abū Muslim.[64] The army was shaken by his revolt in Khurāsān, but God averted the trouble from [Abū Ja'far]. After him Yūsuf al-Barm[65] rebelled—in the sight of some

59. Naysābūr (Persian Nīshāpūr) was the chief city of the westernmost of the four quarters into which Khurāsān province was divided. See Le Strange, Lands, 382–88.

60. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr's gloss (V, 156): "I am only one of the soldiers (jund)."

61. Dawlah literally means "turning" or "revolution" (in its etymological sense). The 'Abbāsid caliphs used the term to make an ideological claim justifying their rule as "a turn of fortune which had eliminated the Umayyad usurpers, avenged the Prophet's family, restored the rightful dynasty, and filled the earth with justice"; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 65.

62. That is, al-Manṣūr, the second 'Abbāsid caliph, who ruled from 136/754 to 158/775. See EI[2] s.v. al-Manṣūr (Kennedy).

63. Hāshim b. Ḥakīm, known as al-Muqanna' ("the Veiled One") because he wore a green cloth over his face continuously and asserted that mere mortals could not bear the light of his countenance, led a revolt in Khurāsān that had extended into the reign of al-Mahdī. He is said to have declared himself an incarnation of the deity and to have preached the transmigration of souls. See Ṭabarī, III, 484, 494, and 499 (A.H. 161 and 163); Barthold, Turkestan down to the Mongol Invasion, 199–200.

64. Abū Muslim, the architect of the 'Abbāsid revolution, was executed by Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr in a move to consolidate his own power. See EI[2] s.v. Abū Muslim (Moscati).

65. Yūsuf b. Ibrāhīm al-Barm led a rebellion in Khurāsān in 160/776–77 against al-Mahdī. He was defeated by troops led by Yazīd b. Mazyad and sent back to al-Ruṣāfah, where al-Mahdī had him executed. See Ṭabarī, III, 470–71; Ya'qūbī, II, 478–79.

Muslims, he was an infidel (kāfir)—but God averted the trouble. Then Ustādhsīs[66] rebelled, calling people to infidelity (kufr). Al-Mahdī[67] marched from al-Rayy[68] to Naysābūr and took care of the trouble. But what I do will be more for you! Tell me, how do you think the troops were, when they received the news of Rāfiʿ [b. Layth]?"[69] He said, "I think they were greatly disturbed." I said, "How will they be regarding you, when you are lodged among your maternal uncles,[70] with the oath of allegiance to you binding them? What will the disturbance of the Baghdad troops be? Be patient, and I will guarantee you the caliphate!" I placed my hand on my heart. He said, "I will. I put the matter into your hands. Carry it out!"

Then I said, "By God, I will speak the truth to you. ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik, Yaḥyā b. Muʿādh, and the leading commanders we have named—if they[71] undertake the matter for you, they will [774] be more advantageous for you than I, with their renowned leadership and because of the strength they possess for fighting. Whoever undertakes the matter, I will be his servant until you attain your desire and decide as you think best about me." So I met them in their lodgings. I reminded them of the oath of allegiance binding them and their obligation to fulfill it. It was as if I had brought them carrion on a plate. One of them said, "This is not lawful; go away!" Another of them said, "Who would

66. The revolt of Ustādhsīs during the reign of al-Manṣūr in 150/767 involved elements from Harāt, Bādghīs, Sijistān, and parts of Khurāsān. See Ṭabarī, III, 354–58; Yaʿqūbī, II, 457; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 183–84.

67. Al-Mahdī, the third ʿAbbāsid caliph, ruled from 158/775 to 169/785. See EI[2] s.v. (Kennedy).

68. Al-Rayy, or Ray (ancient Rhages), was a major city in northeastern Jibāl province. The modern city of Tehran began as a suburb of it. See Le Strange, Lands, 214–17; EI[1] s.v. Raiy (Minorsky).

69. The revolt of Rāfiʿ b. Layth b. Naṣr b. Sayyār (apparently the grandson of the last Umayyad governor of Khurāsān) was the occasion for al-Rashīd's expedition to Khurāsān. The revolt had begun in 190/805–6 as an expression of discontent against the misrule of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān as governor of Khurāsān, developed considerable local support, and was still continuing when al-Rashīd died. See Ṭabarī, III, 707–8; Yaʿqūbī, II, 528; Barthold, Turkestan down to the Mongol Invasion, 200–1.

70. This alludes to al-Maʾmūn's mother, Marājil, who was of Iranian extraction.

71. Correcting the reading of ed. Leiden ("it will be...") on the basis of ed. Cairo and Maqrīzī (see ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXIV).

interfere between the Commander of the Faithful and his brother?" So I came and informed (al-Ma'mūn). He said, "Undertake the matter!"

I said (to al-Ma'mūn), "You have read the Qur'ān, heard traditions,[72] and become learned in religion. The wisest plan is for you to send to the learned men in your entourage, summoning them to justice and its performance, and to reviving the Sunnah.[73] You should sit on felt mats[74] and relieve injustices." We did this. We sent to the men learned [in religious matters]. Also we treated the military commanders, kings, and descendants of kings generously. To the Tamīmī[75] we would say, "We set you in the place of Mūsā b. Ka'b"; to the Raba'ī[76] we would say, "[We set you] in the place of Abū Dāwūd Khālid b. Ibrāhīm"; and to the Yemenī, "We set you in the place of Qaḥṭabah and Mālik b. al-Haytham."[77] We summoned each tribe to the greatest of their heads. We gained the favor of the heads and said things like this to them.[78] We reduced the land tax (kharāj) from

---

72. Aḥādīth, pl. of ḥadīth: reports of sayings or actions of the Prophet, transmitted by reliable intermediaries and serving as precedents for action. See EI[2] s.v. On al-Ma'mūn's religious education, see the biography of al-Ma'mūn in Ṣafadī, al-Wāfī bi-al-wafayāt, XVII, 654–61 (repeated in Kutubī, Fawāt al-wafayāt, II, 235–39); and Ya'qūbī, II, 571–72.

73. Sunnah (from sanna, to institute) originally meant "a way of acting or conduct... instituted by former people, and... pursued by those after them"; Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1438. Before Islam sunnah referred to the practice of an ancestor handed down from one generation of a tribe to another as worthy of praise and emulation. The Islamic community applied the word to the normative actions and sayings of Muḥammad handed down within the community. See also Bravmann, The Spiritual Background of Early Islam, 123–98.

74. That is, as a sign of humility. Ibn al-Athīr, V, 155, reads "wool."

75. That is, a member of the powerful tribe of Tamīm.

76. That is, from the tribe of Rabī'ah.

77. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 155: "All these men had been naqībs ('supervisors, chiefs') of the 'Abbāsid revolution." Mūsā b. Ka'b had fought in the revolution and headed al-Manṣūr's shurṭah (Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 79; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 186). Abū Dāwūd Khālid b. Ibrāhīm had been Abū Muslim's second in command and became governor of Khurāsān after Abū Muslim's execution (Kennedy, ibid., 62–63). Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb al-Ṭā'ī had been the most important military commander of the revolution next to Abū Muslim (Crone, ibid., 188). Mālik b. al-Haytham al-Khuzā'ī had been the head of Abū Muslim's shurṭah (Crone, ibid., 181).

78. The manuscript followed by ed. Leiden has a lacuna at this point, and the translation follows the text of ed. Cairo, which may itself be corrupt. Two groups of "heads" seem to be involved: the Arab tribal leaders who had been

Khurāsān by one-fourth. They were favorably impressed and gladdened by this. They said, "The son of our sister and the son (i.e., descendant) of the paternal uncle of the Prophet, may God bless him and grant him peace!"[79]

According to ʿAlī b. Isḥāq: When the caliphate devolved upon Muḥammad [al-Amīn] and the people of Baghdad became calm, he arose on Saturday morning, a day after allegiance had been sworn to him, and ordered the building of a parade ground (maydān) around the Palace of Abū Jaʿfar in the city for polo and games.[80] Concerning this, a poet from the people of Baghdad said:

God's Amīn[81] built a parade ground, and he turned the tract into a garden.
[775] The gazelles in it were ben trees that were brought to him in it as gazelles.

Various Items of Information

In the month of Shaʿbān[82] of this year, Umm Jaʿfar[83] left al-Raqqah,[84] taking all the treasures and other things she had there.

---

active in the ʿAbbāsid revolution, and the Persian elite, which was favorably impressed by the reduction in the land tax and by references to al-Maʾmūn's Persian descent on his mother's side.

79. Cf. Fragmenta, 321: "The Persians said, 'The son . . . , the learned, just, and pious!' "Son of our sister" refers to the fact that al-Maʾmūn's mother, Marājil, was Persian and sometimes said to have been the captured daughter of Ustādhsīs, the Khurāsānian rebel. See Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 124; EI[2] s.v. al-Maʾmūn.

80. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 155; Fragmenta, 321.

81. There is a pun on the meaning of the name al-Amīn, "the trustworthy one." The second verse of the couplet is textually uncertain (see ed. Leiden note). I take it to mean that the gazelles in the garden were beautiful maidens (ben trees, because of their shapeliness, were a typical poetic comparison for women) that were brought to a place where wild gazelles once had roamed.

82. Shaʿbān 193 began on May 20, 809.

83. Umm Jaʿfar is the kunyah (agnomen) of Zubaydah, the niece of al-Manṣūr and mother of al-Amīn. See EI[2] s.v. al-Amīn; also Abbott, Two Queens of Baghdad.

84. Al-Raqqah, on the Euphrates river, was the main town of the Diyār Muḍar district of al-Jazīrah province (see note 96). The ʿAbbāsids established a major garrison adjoining the town, and al-Rashīd used al-Raqqah as a residence when the climate of Baghdad was too hot. See Le Strange, Lands, 101–3.

Her son, Muḥammad al-Amīn, met her at al-Anbār[85] with all the dignitaries who had been in Baghdad. Al-Ma'mūn established himself in charge of that to which he had been appointed —that is, the governorship of Khurāsān and its districts as far as al-Rayy. He wrote to al-Amīn and sent him many gifts. Al-Ma'mūn's letters to Muḥammad arrived one after the other, extolling the latter's greatness, and accompanied by gifts of Khurāsānian rarities—furniture, vessels, musk, beasts, and weapons.

In this year, Harthamah[86] entered the wall of Samarqand.[87] Rāfi' [b. Layth] took refuge in the inner city and sent a message to the Turks, who came to him. Harthamah was caught between Rāfi' and the Turks, but the Turks withdrew, and Rāfi' grew weaker.

In this year, Niqfūr,[88] the king of the Romans, died fighting the Bulgars.[89] His reign is said to have lasted seven[90] years. Istabrāq,[91] the son of Niqfūr, became king after him, but he had been wounded and survived only two months and then died. Istabrāq's brother-in-law, Mīkhā'īl[92] the son of Jūrjis, then became king.

In this year, Dāwūd b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī,[93] the governor of Mecca, led the pilgrimage.[94]

---

85. Al-Anbār, an important city on the left bank of the Euphrates, was about 12 farsakhs (44.6 miles) west and slightly north of Baghdad. It was the terminus of an important canal, the Nahr 'Īsā, connecting the Euphrates and the Tigris at Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 65–67; EI[2] s.v.

86. On Harthamah b. A'yan, see EI[2] s.v. Harthama (Pellat); Crone, Slaves on Horses, 177.

87. Parallel: Ya'qūbī, II, 528.

88. That is, Nicephorus I, Byzantine emperor from 802 to 811, who died in battle against the khan of the Bulgars on July 26, 811 (Ṭabarī's date for his death is incorrect). For an account of his origins, see Ṭabarī, III, 695. Cf. Vasiliev, History of the Byzantine Empire, 271; and Ostrogorsky, Geschichte des byzantinischen Staates, 151–60.

89. Al-Burjān (Bulgars) were a Turkish people who had moved into the Balkans.

90. The reading "nine years," noted in ed. Cairo, is probably correct. The words for "seven" and "nine" are easily confused in Arabic script.

91. That is, Stauracius.

92. That is, Michael I Rhangabe, who ruled from 811 to 813.

93. Dāwūd b. 'Īsā was an 'Abbāsid family member, a distant cousin of al-Rashīd.

94. Ya'qūbī, II, 526, reports that Zubaydah, the mother of al-Amīn, also made the pilgrimage this year.

In this year, Muḥammad b. Hārūn confirmed[95] his brother al-Qāsim b. Hārūn in the governorship of al-Jazīrah[96] to which his father had appointed him. He appointed Khuzaymah b. Khāzim[97] to be (al-Qāsim's) agent for al-Jazīrah, and he also confirmed al-Qāsim over Qinnasrīn[98] and the frontier strongholds.[99]

---

95. I understand the text to mean that al-Amīn confirmed his younger brother in his titular governorships, but appointed an agent to administer the districts as deputy. Note, however, that the parallel in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 155, reads: "Al-Amīn removed his brother al-Qāsim al-Mu'taman from al-Jazīrah and appointed him over Qinnasrīn and al-'Awāṣim. As governor of al-Jazīrah he appointed Khuzaymah b. Khāzim." Cf. the report below, p. 22, about al-Qāsim's being removed in 194/809–10.

96. Al-Jazīrah ("the island" or "peninsula") was the Arabic name for Upper Mesopotamia. Al-Mawṣil, al-Raqqah, and Āmid were the main towns of its three districts. See Le Strange, Lands, 85–114; EI^{2} s.v. al-Djazīra (Canard).

97. Khuzaymah b. Khāzim b. Khuzaymah al-Tamīmī was of Khurāsānian origin and the son of a naqīb of the 'Abbāsid revolution. He was prominent among the Abnā', military leaders of Khurāsānian origin who had come to Baghdad with the revolution. See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 180.

98. Qinnasrīn was a city in Syria south of modern Aleppo (Ḥalab). It was considered one of the 'Awāṣim (see note 99, below). See EI^{2} s.v. Ḳinnasrīn (Elisseeff).

99. 'Awāṣim (pl. of 'āṣimah, a defending city): This was the new line of garrisons that al-Rashīd had established in Syria to defend the Byzantine border and provide a base for launching attacks. Manbij was the main town. See EI^{2} s.v. al-'Awāṣim (Canard); Shaban, Islamic History, II, 29; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 130. For other actions by al-Amīn at the beginning of his reign, see Ya'qūbī, II, 526–28, as well as p. 103, below (the release of the 'Abbāsid 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ from prison).

The Events of the Year

194

(October 15, 809–October 3, 810)

Among these events was the disobedience of the people of [776]
Ḥimṣ[100] against their governor, Isḥāq b. Sulaymān,[101] whom Muḥammad had appointed as governor.[102] When they disobeyed him, he moved to Salamyah.[103] Muḥammad removed him from them and appointed ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd al-Ḥarashī,[104] with whom was ʿĀfiyah b. Sulaymān. He imprisoned a number of their prominent people and set fire to their city from its outer parts. When they asked him for quarter (amān), he agreed, and they became quiet. Later, they rioted; so he cut off the heads of a number of them.[105]

100. Ḥimṣ (modern Ḥomṣ) is about 135 km north of Damascus in Syria, approximately halfway between Damascus and Aleppo. See *EI*² s.v. (Elisséeff).

101. Isḥāq b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās was a member of the ʿAbbāsid family.

102. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 156.

103. Salamyah (modern Salamiyyah) is about 50 km northeast of Ḥimṣ. A number of members of the Hāshimī family had settled in it, and therefore it would be a more congenial residence for the governor in the face of hostility in Ḥimṣ. See *EI*¹ s.v. Salamīya (Kramers).

104. He is probably to be identified as the grandson (not son) of Saʿīd b. ʿAmr al-Ḥarashī, a Qaysī military commander from Qinnasrīn who had served the Umayyads. See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 144–45.

105. This notice about a rebellion in Ḥimṣ is repeated almost verbatim at the end of the year's events (p. 45, below).

In this year, Muḥammad removed his brother al-Qāsim from everything over which his father, Hārūn, had given him charge—the districts of Damascus (al-Sha'm), Qinnasrīn, the frontier strongholds ('awāṣim), and the border regions (thughūr).[106] He replaced him with Khuzaymah b. Khāzim and commanded (al-Qāsim) to live in Madīnat al-Salām.[107]

In this year, Muḥammad ordered prayers to be offered from the pulpits on behalf of his son Mūsā for the office of commander.[108]

In this year, Muḥammad al-Amīn and 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn practiced deceit against each other, and a falling out became apparent between the two.

Reasons for the Falling out between Muḥammad al-Amīn and 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn

It has been mentioned: After he had come to Muḥammad in Iraq, leaving Ṭūs and breaking the promises that al-Rashīd had made him give to his son 'Abdallāh [al-Ma'mūn], al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' took thought.[109] He realized that, if the caliphate ever devolved upon al-Ma'mūn in his own lifetime, the latter would not allow him to survive; if he gained power over him, it would be his downfall. So he strove to incite Muḥammad against 'Abdallāh. He urged him to depose him and to divert the succession to his own son Mūsā. This had not been Muḥammad's plan or intention. His intention, according to what has been mentioned about him, was to carry out for his brothers 'Abdallāh and al-Qāsim the promises and stipulations that his father had caused him to make to them. Al-Faḍl kept on disparaging [777] al-Ma'mūn in his eyes and recommending that he be deposed. Finally, al-Faḍl said, "What are you waiting for in the matter of

106. On the thughūr, see Shaban, Islamic History, II, 28–29.

107. I.e., Baghdad, which had been named "City of Peace" by its founder, al-Manṣūr. For discussion of the name, see Lassner, Topography of Baghdad, p. 45 and note.

108. The action indicated official recognition of Mūsā as successor to the office of Commander of the Faithful. See Dozy, Supplément, I, 445, for a discussion of the idiom.

109. Parallels: Ya'qūbī, II, 529; Dīnawarī, 389; Fragmenta, 321–23; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 156; Mas'ūdī, VI, 419.

'Abdallāh and al-Qāsim, your brothers? The oath of allegiance was to you first, before the two of them; they were only brought into it after you, one after the other." Al-Faḍl brought into the affair those whose opinion was on his side—'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān,[110] al-Sindī, and others in his entourage—and he caused Muḥammad to change his mind. The first thing that Muḥammad did in conformity with the counsel of al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' in the affair was to write ordering all the governors in all the garrison cities to offer prayers on behalf of his son Mūsā for the office of commander after the prayers for himself, al-Ma'mūn, and al-Qāsim b. al-Rashīd.[111]

According to al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq b. Sulaymān:[112] When al-Ma'mūn learned what Muḥammad had commanded, that his own son Mūsā should be prayed for [as an heir], and that he had removed al-Qāsim from the districts that al-Rashīd had assigned him and had made him come to Madīnat al-Salām (i.e., Baghdad), he realized that Muḥammad was plotting against him to depose him. He cut off the post[113] from Muḥammad and dropped his name from the embroidered decorations on official garments.[114]

---

110. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān, the son of a naqīb (deputy) and dā'ī in Marw during the 'Abbāsid revolution, was from a prominent family of Abnā' in Baghdad. He had been active in service to the dynasty since the reign of al-Mahdī. Under al-Rashīd he had served as governor of Khurāsān, where he had become highly unpopular because of his methods. His disastrous expedition against al-Ma'mūn's commander Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn will be narrated in detail on pp. 49ff., below. See also EI[2] s.v. Ibn Māhān (Scourdel); Crone, Slaves on Horses, 181–82; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 80–81.

111. Note that this account says that Mūsā's name was added after the names of al-Ma'mūn and al-Qāsim, but did not replace them. The next account (from another source apparently; there is a textual problem) has al-Amīn demanding that al-Ma'mūn give Mūsā precedence (p. 25, below). Finally, Ṭabarī, p. 27, below (apparently the same source, but this is not certain) has al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' forbidding any mention of 'Abdallāh and al-Qāsim as heirs. The exact sequence of events is anything but clear.

112. Probably to be identified as the son of the 'Abbāsid prince Isḥāq b. Sulaymān, who held various governorships under al-Rashīd. See Bosworth, 'Abbāsid Caliphate in Equilibrium, 15n.

113. That is, he stopped sending reports to the central government in Baghdad. On the post (barīd), see note 5.

114. Ms. A (cited in ed. Cairo) adds: "and from the coinage." The calligraphic motifs embroidered on robes worn by rulers and persons of high rank were called ṭirāz. Such garments were produced in state workshops, and the wording of the embroidered band was carefully controlled. It normally mentioned the reigning caliph and sometimes his minister or the official in charge of the workshops.

When Rāfiʿ b. al-Layth b. Naṣr b. Sayyār received news about al-Maʾmūn and his good behavior toward the people of his province and good treatment of them, he sent asking quarter (amān) for himself. Harthamah promptly granted it.[115] Rāfiʿ came out and joined al-Maʾmūn; Harthamah remained established at Samarqand. Al-Maʾmūn treated Rāfiʿ generously. Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn[116] had been with Harthamah at the siege of Rāfiʿ. After quarter had been granted to Rāfiʿ, Harthamah asked al-Maʾmūn for permission to come to him. He took his army across the Balkh River[117] while it was frozen, the people met him, and al-Maʾmūn put him in charge of the guard (ḥaras). Muḥammad took a dim view of all this and began plotting against al-Maʾmūn. As part of the plotting, he wrote to al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik,[118] who was al-Maʾmūn's financial agent for al-Rayy, commanding him to send him some [778] exotic plants from al-Rayy, wishing to test him by this. Al-ʿAbbās sent him what he had commanded him to send and concealed the matter from al-Maʾmūn and Dhū al-Riʾāsatayn. Word of what he had done reached al-Maʾmūn. He sent out al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī al-Maʾmūnī,[119] as whose subordinate he ap-

---

Thus, omitting al-Amīn's name could be considered a very serious act. The Meccan documents fixing the succession to al-Rashīd granted control of the ṭirāz workshops of Khurāsān to al-Maʾmūn (cf. Ṭabarī, III, 655). An example of ṭirāz from the reign of al-Amīn, dated A.H. 197, mentioning both al-Amīn and al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ, is in the Museum of Islamic Art in Cairo, along with one from the reign of al-Maʾmūn (A.H. 216). See Day, "Dated Ṭirāz," 422; texts in REA, I, No. 93, 208A. On ṭirāz more generally, see EI[1] and EI[1] Supplement, s.v. (Grohmann); Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah (trans. Rosenthal), II, 65–67; and Sergeant, Islamic Textiles.

115. Cf. Yaʿqūbī, II, 529, where the capitulation of Rāfiʿ is dated in Muḥarram 194.

116. This is the first mention of the commander who would lead al-Maʾmūn's forces to victory in the coming civil war. His family, apparently of Arab origin, had been settled at Būshang, near Harāt, since late Umayyad times. See EI[1] s.v. (Barthold); Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 138–39; and Kaabi, "Les Origines ṭāhirides dans la daʿwa ʿabbāside," 145–64.

117. I.e., the Oxus (Jayḥūn), which lies on the route between Samarqand and Marw.

118. He was a grandson of the early ʿAbbāsid military leader who has already been mentioned (note 77). See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 182.

119. As his name indicates, he was a mawlā of al-Maʾmūn. A native of Bādghīs, he later became governor of Armenia for al-Maʾmūn. See Ṭabarī, III, 985; Yaʿqūbī, II, 566; and Crone, Slaves on Horses, 257 n. 599.

pointed al-Rustumī to be in charge of the post, and he removed al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik. It is reported on al-Rustumī's authority that, as soon as he dismounted, a thousand men of the inhabitants of al-Rayy rallied to him.

Muḥammad sent three people to al-Maʾmūn as messengers.[120] One was al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā;[121] the second was Ṣāliḥ, the keeper of the prayer rug;[122] and the third was Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā b. Nahīk.[123] To be taken with them, he wrote a letter [to al-Maʾmūn, asking him to give his son Mūsā precedence over himself and to come to him, as he felt loneliness because of his being far away. When the message reached al-Maʾmūn, the latter wrote][124] to the master of al-Rayy, saying, "Receive them in full panoply and with weapons visible." He wrote similarly to the governor[s] of Qūmis,[125] Naysābūr, and Sarakhs,[126] and they did it. When the messengers arrived in Marw, weapons and various equipment and supplies had been prepared because of them. They went to al-Maʾmūn and de-

120. Note that there is a second, somewhat different account of what is apparently the same embassy to al-Maʾmūn, see pp. 65–74, below, under the events of the year 195, but with the notice that "this took place in the year 194." For a discussion of the two accounts, see Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn al-Rašīd," 356ff.

121. He was a member of the ʿAbbāsid family; full name: al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās.

122. On the caliph's prayer rug (muṣallā) and its significance in ʿAbbāsid court etiquette, see D. Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial ʿabbaside," 131–32; Bosworth, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate in Equilibrium, 53 n. 210.

123. Three members of this family are known to have fought for al-Amīn: ʿUthmān b. ʿĪsā b. Nahīk, Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā b. Nahīk, and ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā b. Nahīk. See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 189.

124. There is a lacuna in the manuscript, which ed. Leiden (but not ed. Cairo) restores on the basis of the parallel text in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 157–58. The restoration should be treated with caution, because Ibn al-Athīr does not always follow the exact wording of his sources and sometimes conflates accounts to form a smoother narrative. Note that the demand that al-Maʾmūn give Mūsā precedence as heir can be deduced from the next few sentences in Ṭabarī. However, the demand that al-Maʾmūn return to Baghdad plays no further role in this account, although it is important in the second account of the embassy (pp. 65–74, below). See Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 357 n.

125. Qūmis was a small province lying along the Khurāsān road between al-Rayy (in al-Jibāl province) and Naysābūr (in Khurāsān). See Le Strange, Lands, 364–68; EI[2] s.v. Ḳūmis (Bosworth).

126. Sarakhs, in Khurāsān province, was located about midway between Ṭūs and Marw. See Le Strange, Lands, 395–96.

livered Muḥammad's letter to him. It asked him to give Mūsā precedence over himself, and said that Muḥammad had given Mūsā the title al-Nāṭiq bi-al-Ḥaqq ("Speaker of the Truth"). The person who had counseled Muḥammad to do this was ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān, who used to tell him that the people of Khurāsān would obey him. Al-Maʾmūn rejected [the request] and refused [to give Mūsā precedence].

[Continuing, al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq] said: Dhū al-Riʾāsatayn said to me: Al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā said (to al-Maʾmūn), "What do you have to fear, commander, from this? Behold, my grandfather, ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, was deprived (of the succession), and it did not harm him."[127] "Be silent," I cried to him. "Your grandfather was a prisoner in their hands, whereas this man is among his maternal uncles and his partisans." So the messengers went away, and each of them was lodged in a lodging.

Dhū al-Riʾāsatayn [continued his report to me,] saying: What I saw of the acuteness of al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā pleased me; so I [779] met with him in private and said, "Will you, with your understanding and your age, neglect an opportunity to obtain your good fortune from the imām?" (At that time, al-Maʾmūn was called "the imām"; he was not called by the title of caliph. His being called "the imām" caused what came to pass—namely Muḥammad's removing him [from the succession]. Muḥammad had said to those whom he had sent, "Al-Maʾmūn has named himself 'the imām.'") Al-ʿAbbās said to me, "You have called him 'the imām.'" I said to him, "He may well become the imām of the mosque and the nation.[128] If you keep faith, he will not hurt you; but, if you betray, that's it!" Then I said to al-ʿAbbās, "You can ask me for the governorship of the pilgrimage feast, for there is no governorship more prestigious than that; or you can have one of the places of office in Egypt, if you wish." Before al-

127. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, the nephew of the caliphs al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, had been appointed by al-Saffāḥ to be next in the line of succession after al-Manṣūr. After al-Manṣūr succeeded to the caliphate, he replaced ʿĪsā with his own son, who later reigned as al-Mahdī. ʿĪsā finally renounced his rights in 146/746. See Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 91–93.

128. Qabīlah: In modern usage the word means "tribe," but here it has the less specific sense of an ethnic group, descendants of one father. Cf. Lisān, s.v. The phrase imām al-qabīlah recalls the phrases imām al-ummah and imām al-qawm. Amending it to imām al-qiblah is unnecessary.

ʿAbbās b. Mūsā departed, I received from him the oath of allegiance to al-Maʾmūn for the caliphate. Afterward, he used to write us reports [from Baghdad][129] and provide us with advice.

[Continuing, al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq] said: ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā al-Sarakhsī said (to me): Al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā visited me on his way to Marw. I described to him al-Maʾmūn's policy, the excellent management of Dhū al-Riʾāsatayn, and his suitability for the position; but he did not accept this from me. When he came back, he visited me (again), and I said to him, "What do you think now?" He said, "Dhū al-Riʾāsatayn is more than you have described!" I asked him, "Did you shake hands with the imām?" "Yes," he said. I said, "Stroke your hand over my head!"

[Continuing, al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq] said: The men went to Muḥammad and informed him of al-Maʾmūn's refusal. Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ and ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā urged Muḥammad about the oath of allegiance to his son and the deposition of al-Maʾmūn—he gave al-Faḍl money [as a reward for this]—until [Muḥammad] had the oath of allegiance rendered to his son Mūsā and named him al-Nāṭiq bi-al-Ḥaqq ("Speaker of the Truth"). He made ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā his tutor and made him governor of Iraq. The first person to administer an oath of allegiance to Mūsā was Bishr b. al-Samaydaʿ al-Azdī, the governor of Balad.[130] Then the governor of Mecca and the governor of Medina administered the oath to a few dignitaries, but not to the populace. Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ forbade the mention of ʿAbdallāh and al-Qāsim and prayer for [780] them [as heirs] on any pulpit. He intrigued to have ʿAbdallāh mentioned disparagingly. He sent a letter to Mecca—the messenger was one of the doorkeepers of the Kaʿbah,[131] a man named Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUthmān b. Ṭalḥah—saying that the two documents that Hārūn had written and placed in the Kaʿbah on behalf of ʿAbdallāh and as binding upon Muḥammad should be taken. The messenger brought the two documents to al-Faḍl. The other doorkeepers spoke about this, but they were not heeded, and they feared for their lives. When 129. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 158.

130. Balad was a town on the Tigris, 7 farsakhs (41.9 km/26 miles) north of al-Mawṣil. See Le Strange, Lands, 99, 125; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.

131. That is, a holder of the office of ḥājib (doorkeeper or guardian) of the Kaʿbah.

he brought the two documents to Muḥammad, the latter took possession of them and rewarded him with a large reward. Muḥammad tore up the two documents and nullified them.

According to what has been mentioned: Muḥammad wrote to al-Ma'mūn before al-Ma'mūn openly disobeyed him, asking al-Ma'mūn to relinquish to him some districts (kuwar) of Khurāsān that he named. Financial agents were to be sent to these districts to act on behalf of Muḥammad, and al-Ma'mūn was to allow al-Amīn to send a man to be in charge of the post (barīd) over his head and to write letters to al-Amīn with reports about him. When the letter to this effect reached al-Ma'mūn, it was grievous and distressing to him. He summoned al-Faḍl b. Sahl and the latter's brother al-Ḥasan and asked their advice. Al-Faḍl said, "The matter is dangerous. You have a retinue of your supporters and members of your household. They are put at ease by consultation; but, if matters are settled without them, it will cause uneasiness among them and the appearance of mistrust. So it would be best for the commander to do this (i.e., consult them)." Al-Ḥasan said, "It used to be said, 'In seeking the right view, consult those whose advice you trust; but, when an affair cannot be concealed, conciliate your foe by consulting him.'" So al-Ma'mūn summoned his intimates—the chiefs and notables—and read the letter to them. They all said to him, "Commander, you are asking counsel in a dangerous matter. Give our first intuition a chance for deliberate reflection." "That is the prudent thing to do," said al-Ma'mūn, and he gave them three days. When they assembled afterward, one of them said, "Commander, you have been urged to do two things displeasing [781] to you. I do not think it a mistake to repel by the inconvenience of the first of them the fear of the inconvenience of the second of them." Another said, "Commander—may God grant you happiness—people say that, if a matter is dangerous, it is better for you to give your rival part of what he wants than to come to an open falling out with him by refusing." Another said, "It is said, 'If knowledge of [future] matters is hidden from you, hold to the proper course[132] for today as much as you can; for you run the risk that today's disorder may bring on tomorrow's disorder for you.'" Another said, "If you fear that yielding voluntarily will have consequences, the breach that will be caused if we do not avoid a split will surely be even more serious."[133] Another said, "I do not think one should abandon a state of peace, for with it I may perchance be given health and safety." Al-Ḥasan [b. Sahl] said, "You all deserve [thanks] for your effort, although I differ from you in opinion." Al-Ma'mūn said, "Argue with them." He said, "The assembly was for that purpose." So al-Ḥasan approached them and said, "Do you know that Muḥammad has overstepped the bounds to ask for something that is not his by right?" "Yes," they said, "and it should be tolerated because of the harm we fear that refusing it [would cause]."[134] He said, "Are you confident that he will stop after [al-Ma'mūn] gives him these [districts], and will not go on to ask for others?" "No," they said, "but perhaps peace will transpire before what you fear and expect." He said, "But if, after asking for these districts, he asks for more, do you not think that al-Ma'mūn will have become weak because of what he has given up willingly?" They said, "We shall ward off what may befall him later by putting off the danger[135] that lies immediately at hand." "This," he said, "is contrary to the maxim we have heard of the sages who lived before us. They said, 'Seek to make your future affairs thrive by bearing whatever hardship befalls you today, but do not seek peace[136] today at the cost of exposing yourself to danger tomorrow.'" Al-Ma'mūn said to al-Faḍl, "What do you say about the issue on which they differ?" He said, "Commander, may God grant you happiness! Can one avoid fearing [782] that Muḥammad may be asking you for your excess strength in order to gain backing to oppose you in the future? Does a prudent man pursue an excess of present ease at the cost of

132. For hidyah, "[proper] course," ed. Cairo, following Ms. A, reads hudnah, "tranquillity, peace."

133. Ed. Cairo, following Ms. A, reads: "the breach that a refusal will cause will surely be even more serious."

134. The translation follows ed. Cairo. The Leiden text reads, "it should be tolerated for him the harm of whose refusing we fear."

135. The translation follows the reading of ed. Cairo (maḥdhūr), instead of the Leiden editor's conjectural emendation (mā tunjizūn, "what you will achieve").

136. Following the reading of ed. Cairo (hudnah), rather than that of ed. Leiden (hidyah), "(proper) course of action."

danger that will befall him later? The sages advised that inconvenience should be borne for the sake of future benefit they hoped would come thereby." So al-Ma'mūn said, "Indeed, by preferring the immediate present, many a man has spoiled the consequences in this world and the next." The men said, "We have spoken all the opinion that is necessary. May God assist the commander with success!" So al-Ma'mūn said, "Write to him, Faḍl!" Al-Faḍl wrote [in the name of al-Ma'mūn]:[137]

> I have received the letter of the Commander of the Faithful in which he requests the relinquishment of certain specified places—part of what al-Rashīd established in the agreement and whose command he granted to me. No one will transgress the greater part of what the Commander of the Faithful has thought best. However, he who gave me the region where I am[138] was neither to be suspected of carelessness toward his populace nor ignorant in entrusting to me those of his affairs that he entrusted. Even if that had not been confirmed by oaths and sworn covenants, not to mention my being in my present situation of looking down on an enemy of fearful strength, with a populace not to be conciliated from its unruliness and soldiers whose obedience can be obtained only by money and a good deal of largesse, the Commander of the Faithful's interest in his populace and his desire to unite his domains would be enough to cause him to devote much of his attention to the matter and promote it by spending much of his wealth. How much more so in a matter that right has made an obligation and that a sworn promise has confirmed? I am certain that, if the Commander of the Faithful had known what I know about the situation, he would not have communicated the request that he wrote to me. I am confident of approval after this explanation, God willing.

---

137. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 206.

138. For "where I am" (ana bihi), ed. Cairo reads the same consonants as a single word (unābuhu), "of which I am made to be agent."

Al-Ma'mūn had sent a garrison to the border.[139] As soon as [783] any messenger from Iraq crossed, they would send him with trusted agents; the messenger would not be allowed to ask about any news or exert any influence, induce anyone to follow by enticement or fear, or deliver a verbal or written message to anyone. Thus al-Ma'mūn prevented the people of Khurāsān from being swayed by enticement, having fear lodged in their breasts, or being led to a state of disobeying or abandoning [him]. He placed trusty guards over the lookouts of the roads. No one might pass them except those whose business caused no suspicion—one who came bearing a passport allowing him to return to his home or a well-known merchant trusted in his person and in his religion. Lone travelers without baggage[140] were prevented from traveling the roads, passing through markets, or infiltrating towns in the guise of unexpected wayfarers. Letters were searched. The first people—[it is reported][141]—to come from Muḥammad to contest al-Ma'mūn's refusal of the demands were a group who were sent only so that [Muḥammad] might know that they had seen and taken note, and that he might then ask them to give freely or[142] withhold; thus from what they said there would be an argument he might allege or an excuse for what he sought. When they came to the border of al-Rayy, they found strong management and a military command well established and confirmed. The guards held them on all sides, so that even when they unsaddled and took up lodging, they were kept from imparting or asking for news. Letters were sent ahead with a report about them. Permission came for them to be given mounts. They were conveyed under guard; no news reached them, and no news slipped out from them to others. They had been prepared to spread the news among the populace, make known the argument for abandoning [al-Ma'mūn], and call on the powerful to disobey, bestowing

139. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 159; Fragmenta, 323.

140. Ashtātāt is thus interpreted by ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CCCV, but the root from which the word is derived frequently implies disorderliness. The exact meaning is uncertain.

141. The parenthetical remark is from ed. Cairo.

142. Following ed. Cairo; ed. Leiden reads "and." The text may be corrupt.

money and guaranteeing them most of the governorships
[784] (wilāyāt), land grants (qaṭā'i'), and positions. However, they found that all this had been prevented and stopped. Finally, they came to al-Ma'mūn's gate. The following was the letter delivered to al-Ma'mūn [from al-Amīn]:[143]

> To proceed: Although the Commander of the Faithful, al-Rashīd, assigned the province [of Khurāsān] to you alone and attached to you certain districts of al-Jabal[144] to strengthen you and protect your province, that does not give you a claim to the excess money above your need. This province and its land tax (kharāj) have been sufficient for its circumstances. You, however, go beyond what is sufficient to the excess of its revenue. In addition to the province, he joined to you certain major revenue-producing districts that you do not need. [The revenues from] them ought to be returned to their people and the places to which they belong. I wrote asking you to return the districts in question to their former status, so that their excess revenue would be sent back where it belongs, and that you should allow an information officer to be in your court to send us information of interest to us about the news of your province. However, you wrote refusing to grant this, saying things which, if you were to act upon them, justice would lead us to make a demand upon you. Turn from your intention, and I will turn from making a demand upon you, God willing!

When al-Ma'mūn read the letter, he wrote in reply to him:[145]

> To proceed: The letter of the Commander of the Faithful has reached me. As he writes about what he does not

---

143. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 207.

144. Al-Jabal ("the Mountain," often in the plural form al-Jibāl) was the region known earlier as Māh or Media, roughly the northwestern quarter of the Iranian plateau. Its main cities were Qirmasīn (Kirmānshāh), Hamadhān, Rayy, and Iṣbahān (Isfahān). Khurāsān lay to the east, separated from al-Jibāl by the province of Qūmis. See EI[2] s.v. Djibāl (Lockhart); Le Strange, Lands, 185 ff.

145. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 207–8.

know, I will reveal to him the true state of affairs; as he asks for something to which he has no claim, he obliges me to justify my forbearing to comply.[146] Two rivals go beyond a state of equal sharing only when equal sharing [785] is insufficient for those who hold to it. When did someone ever depart from it while it was enough for everyone and the departure from it resulted only in breaking with it and suffering what lay in its abandonment? Son of my father, do not cause me to oppose you, when I willingly grant you obedience; nor to become estranged from you, when I want to be on friendly terms with you. Be satisfied with what justice has assigned to you, and I will be in the place where justice has set me as regards relations between us. Peace!

Then he summoned the messengers and said, "I have written a reply to the Commander of the Faithful in a matter about which he wrote to me. Deliver the letter to him, and tell him that I shall remain obedient to him until he forces me, by departing from binding right, to disobey him." So they went to deliver the message. He said, "Take exactly the same attitude as we took in speaking with you, and convey carefully what you have heard; for, as regards the letter to us, you have imparted to us what I hope you did not want to say to us." So the messengers departed; they had not carried any of their argument, nor did they bear a [favorable] report to convey to their master. They had seen a serious intention, not mixed with jest, to refuse them what they alleged to be their due.

When al-Ma'mūn's letter reached Muḥammad, he found its contents distressing. He burst into rage at whatever of it was repeated [in his hearing].[147] It was then that he commanded what we have mentioned—that prayers should cease being made for [al-Ma'mūn] on the pulpits—and he wrote to him:[148]

146. Ed. Cairo differs somewhat: "He has not written about what he does not know, that I should reveal to him the true state of affairs; nor has he asked me for something to which he has a right, that I should be obliged to justify my forbearing to comply."

147. The bracketed words are from ed. Cairo.

148. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 208.

To proceed: I have received your letter, in which you show ingratitude for God's favor toward you in enabling you to enjoy the protection of His favor, and where you expose yourself to the burning of a fire you cannot control. Indeed, your disinclination to obey [me] was more tolerable [than your ingratitude toward God]. If some previous request proceeded from me, its grounds were [786] none other than your benefit, as it was to the advantage of the majority of your subjects; moreover, it would establish you in a position of safety and assure for you a condition of peace. Let me know your view, and I will act in accordance with it, God willing.

According to Sahl b. Hārūn—al-Ḥasan b. Sahl: Al-Ma'mūn said to Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn, "My children, my family, and my wealth that al-Rashīd set aside for me—a hundred million [dirhams][149]—are at Muḥammad's court. I need them, but they are with him. What do you advise?" He consulted him several times. Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn said to him, "Commander, you need to have the remainder of your wealth and your family in your residence and beside you; but, if you write a commanding letter and he refuses you, it will lead to his breaking his oath; and, if he does so, he will force you, even against your will, to go to war with him. I would not want you to be the first to open the door of estrangement, as long as God has closed it before you. Instead, you should write a letter appealing for your due and the coming of your family, in such a way that his refusal will not oblige him to break his oath to you. If he obeys, well and good; if he refuses, you will not have gotten yourself into a war. Write to him." So [Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn] wrote on his behalf:[150]

To proceed: The regard of the Commander of the Faithful for the populace is the regard of one who does not limit himself to giving an equal share with himself; rather, he goes beyond that for them with his kindness and benevolence. This being his view concerning his

149. Cf. p. 57, below, where a sum of a million dirhams is said to have been confiscated.

150. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 208–9.

populace, how fitting it is for him to go beyond that with his brother and kinsman! Surely you know, Commander of the Faithful, in what state I am, encamped in the uttermost parts of frontier regions, with armies who are always certain to show their indiscipline and disloyalty, and with little revenue at my disposal—my family, children, and wealth being with the Commander of the Faithful. As for my family, although they are adequately provided for out of the kindness of the Commander of [787] the Faithful, who has become a father to them, they cannot help desiring and yearning for my protection. [You know, too,] the strength and help the money would give me to set things in order in my court. I have sent [someone] to convey my family and the money. May it please the Commander of the Faithful to allow him to proceed to al-Raqqah to convey this money and to command that he be given assistance in the matter, not causing him therein to fall into such difficulty as would happen by his disobedience or moving him to a decision that would be disapproved.[151] Peace.

Muḥammad then wrote to him:[152]

To proceed: I have received your letter, in which you spoke of how the Commander of the Faithful views his populace, not to mention the obligation due to one of his own family and his copartner; how you are encamped in the uttermost parts of the frontier regions; how, being encamped there, you need extra money to strengthen your position and the money from the public treasury that was assigned to be yours; finally, how you have sent someone to convey it and your family from the presence of the Commander of the Faithful. Assuredly, the Commander of the Faithful does not deny his view of his populace as you mentioned and the attachment that it

151. The translation of the last clause is uncertain. Gabrieli makes it a separate sentence: "Con ciò peraltro non si vuole spingerlo in un imbarazzo contro sua voglia, nè indurlo a una decisione contro il suo beneplacito."

152. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 209–10.

obliges him to have to his closest relations and his populace. He needs the money you mentioned to strengthen the affairs of the Muslims. Thus, it is more appropriate for him to spend it on his obligations and return it to those who are entitled to it. Neither will what brings benefit to your subjects as a whole fail to benefit you. As for what you mentioned about conveying your family, it is the intention of the Commander of the Faithful to assume responsibility for their affairs, notwithstanding the right of close relationship in which you stand. As for sending them on a journey as you have thought best to [788] do, I do not think it wise to expose them to becoming separated by a journey. If I decide so for my part, I will send them to you with trusted messengers of my own, God willing. Peace.

When the letter came to al-Ma'mūn, he said, "Refusing to grant what is our due, he wants us to become weakened by his withholding of our forces. Then, because of our weakness, he will gain a chance to oppose us." Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn said to him, "Is it not known that al-Rashīd gave that money to al-Amīn to be kept together, and that al-Amīn took possession of it in the sight of the leading men of his populace on the basis that he would hold it for administration and would not touch it? So do not leave him with no way out of this. Write to him something whose consequence will not force you to show him open hostility over it. It is best to hold fast to the rope of trust and prevent estrangement. [If he abstains, well and good.][153] If he casts covetous eyes on it, he will lay himself open to [punishment from] God for his opposition; you, by forbearance, stand to receive God's help and assistance."

Al-Ma'mūn and al-Faḍl knew that after his letter some incident would occur that would require his knowledge,[154] and some report that would require that he deal with it through his trusty companions. He knew that [Muḥammad] would cause no incident without the concurrence of men of eminence and power 153. The bracketed text is added in ed. Cairo from Ms. A.

154. Ed. Cairo: "that would require his rectification."

among the partisans [of the 'Abbāsids] and those with long service [to the 'Abbāsid cause].[155] So he decided to choose a man to carry letters addressed to the leading figures of the army in Baghdad. If Muḥammad caused al-Ma'mūn to be deposed, the man would go and deliver[156] the letters and would feel out the inclinations of the addressees. If Muḥammad did none of this, the man would keep [the letters] in his box and withhold [789] delivery of them. He ordered the man to travel quickly. When he arrived, he delivered the letters.[157] (Al-Ma'mūn's) letter with the messenger whom he sent to find out news was as follows:[158]

> To proceed: In regard to their affairs, the faithful are like the members of the body.[159] If disease occurs in one of them, the misfortune is painful to all of them. So it is with the Muslims: an incident occurs regarding one of them, but the misfortune of it reaches the others because of the law (sharī'ah) of their religion that unites them and the sanctity of their brotherhood[160] that binds them. As regards the imāms, this is an even more serious matter because of the position in which the imāms stand in relation to the rest of their peoples. There has been such a report as I cannot but believe will clearly express its distressing nature and uncover what has been hidden of its real meaning.[161] Never did two disputants dispute, one of them being on the side of God's command,[162] but that the Muslims' first help and assistance were with God Himself. You—may God have mercy upon you—

155. Arabic: al-shī'ah wa-ahl al-sābiqah.

156. Reading, with ed. Cairo, daf'ihā, rather than the conjectural emendation of ed. Leiden, dhawīhā, "the owners, i.e., addressees" of the letters.

157. The translation follows ed. Cairo. The Leiden text reads: "When he arrived, he continued the letters."

158. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 210–11.

159. The translation follows the emended reading of ed. Leiden. Ed. Cairo keeps the original reading, which yields a loose, but not impossible sentence: "The Commander [reading amīr, not amr] of the Faithful is like the members of the body."

160. The translation follows ed. Cairo (ukhuwwatihim). Ed. Leiden reads ākhiratihim: "the sanctity of their Hereafter."

161. The translation follows ed. Cairo. Ed. Leiden reads: "such a report as I believe will return from its coming and uncover what was hidden."

162. Ed. Cairo fills the lacuna found in ed. Leiden.

are in sight and hearing of the affair and are so situated that, if you speak, what you say will be listened to.[163] If you, finding it impossible to speak, refrain from something fearful, your example in the matter will be followed. The reward for good action will not be neglected by God, in addition to the obligation to you that we shall incur by your good action. A lot that obtains for you both parts, or one of them, is better than eagerly desiring one of the parts, while exposing oneself to the loss of both. Write to me with your view. Tell it to my messenger, that he may convey it to me from you, God willing.

He wrote similarly to the eminent military men.

The messenger's arrival in Baghdad coincided with the command to cease praying for al-Ma'mūn in the Friday sermon. [The messenger] was in a position of trust vis-à-vis all those to whom letters had been sent through him. Some of them refrained from replying, but clearly told the messenger what they thought; others replied to the letter. One of them wrote:[164]

[790] To proceed: I have received your letter. Truth has a proof that is self-evident, whereby it carries the argument against all who depart from it. What a bad bargain it is to lose a share of future good fortune because of present good fortune for which one hopes![165] It is even more clearly a bad bargain to lose future good fortune along with becoming subject to [present] misfortune and contingencies. I have such knowledge of where my fortune[166] lies that I hope thereby to take good care of myself and that this will spare me the trouble of seeking more, God willing.

---

163. The vocalization of ed. Cairo, followed here, seems more likely than that of ed. Leiden, which reads: "if you speak, I will listen to what you say."

164. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 211.

165. The translation follows ed. Cairo.

166. Following ed. Cairo's ḥaẓẓī, "my fortune," instead of ed. Leiden's khaṭar, "danger."

The messenger who had been sent to Baghdad wrote to al-Ma'mūn and Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn:[167]

> To proceed: I have come to the city. Your copartner has publicly shown his alteration.[168] He has put forward a sign of his opposition and separation [and has ceased from what is his duty to mention and discharge][169] in his court. I delivered your letters and found most of the people to be friends of secrecy, rejecters of publicity. I found those who are eminent among the populace[170] to care only for it and to be unconcerned about what they have borne in it. [Your] opponent is in a quandary, neither finding anyone to repel him from his design, nor anyone desiring it in its entirety. Those who disengage themselves consider the completion of the innovation to be lawful, so that they may become safe from the defeat of their innovation. The [fighting] men are in a state of earnestness. Do not give languor [a part in your affair],[171] God willing. Peace!

When Sa'īd b. Mālik b. Qādim, 'Abdallāh b. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah,[172] al-'Abbās b. al-Layth (the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful),[173] Manṣūr b. Abī Maṭar, and Kathīr b. Qādirah came to Muḥammad from al-Ma'mūn's camp, he showed them kindness and drew them close. For those of them 167. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 210–11. Gabrieli's comment on the obscurity and probable corruptness of the text should be noted.

---

168. The translation follows ed. Cairo: tanakkur, "change, alteration," usually in a pejorative sense.

169. The bracketed words are from ed. Cairo.

170. The text is difficult and almost certainly corrupt. Ed. Leiden notes a lacuna in the manuscript and conjectures an original reading, "those who were swayed by desire." Ed. Cairo reads, al-mushrifīn or al-musharrafīn bi-al-ra'iyyah, "those who are eminent (or honored) among the populace." Mushrifīn might also mean "those who desire vehemently."

171. The bracketed words are from ed. Cairo.

172. He was the grandson of Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb al-Ṭā'ī, next to Abū Muslim the most important general of the 'Abbāsid revolution. See Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 79–80; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 188–89.

173. See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 192.

who had collected [pay] for six months, he ordered twelve months' allowance (rizq), and he increased their special and general stipends (al-khāṣṣah wa-al-ʿāmmah); for those who had not yet collected, he ordered eighteen months' [pay].

When Muḥammad resolved to depose al-Ma'mūn, he summoned Yaḥyā b. Sulaym and consulted him about it.[174] Yaḥyā [791] said, "Commander of the Faithful, how can you do such a thing, given the oath of allegiance to him that al-Rashīd confirmed, binding himself in the matter by his promise and by taking oaths and stipulating conditions in the document that he wrote?" Muḥammad said to him, "Al-Rashīd's decision was a whim that Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā [al-Barmakī],[175] with his beguilement, represented to him as good; he swayed him with his charms and spells, so that he planted for us a hateful shoot. Never will our situation benefit us unless that shoot is cut down; never will our affairs run straight unless it is uprooted and we have relief from it." [Yaḥyā] said, "Then if the Commander of the Faithful thinks that he should be deposed, do not announce it openly, lest [important] people disapprove and the ordinary troops regard it as unseemly. Rather, summon one body of troops after another and one commander after another, pacifying each with kindnesses and gifts. Separate his confidants and those who are on his side. Entice them with money, and sway them with hopes of gain. When you have sapped his strength and drawn away his men, you will command him to come to you. If he comes, it will turn out as you wish with regard to him; if he refuses, you will take him with his force dulled, his wing broken, his support weakened, and his strength cut off." Muḥammad said, "Nothing settles an affair like a firm decision. You are a garrulous speechmaker, not a man of counsel. Turn from this view to [that of] 'the fortunate old man and wise vizier.'[176] Up, and get back to your ink and your pens." [Yaḥyā] said: [I said,—it was anger][177] mixed with truth and good counsel—"You have alluded to a

174. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 161.

175. For the career of this member of the famous family of viziers, see EI[2] s.v. al-Barāmika [Sourdel]. Note that Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā had served as tutor to al-Ma'mūn.

176. I.e., al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ.

177. The bracketed words are from ed. Cairo. The text seems to be unreliable.

view that is mixed with deceit and ignorance." By God, before many days had passed, he remembered what he had said and it tormented him with his error and stupidity.[178]

According to Sahl b. Hārūn: Al-Faḍl b. Sahl had infiltrated chosen men, commanders and prominent people whom he trusted in Baghdad, to write him reports on a daily basis.[179] When Muḥammad was about to depose al-Ma'mūn, al-Faḍl b. [792] al-Rabī' sent to one of these men to consult him about what he thought in the matter. The man made al-Faḍl see the gravity of breaking the promise to al-Ma'mūn and the loathsomeness of treachery toward him. Al-Faḍl said to him, "You are right, but 'Abdallāh has already caused an incident[180] that makes it necessary to break what al-Rashīd caused to be sworn to him." The man said, "Has the argument of his well-known incident become as firmly fixed in the mind of the populace as is the argument of the promise to him that has been renewed?" "No," he replied. "Then," said the man, "does this man's incident regarding you necessitate from the point of view of the populace the breaking of your promise, as long as his incident has not been a well-known one such as requires the annulment of the promise to him?" "Yes," said al-Faḍl. Raising his voice, the man said, "By God, never have I seen—as I have today—a man's judgment leading him to look into a matter, where he consults about removing a kingdom that is in his hand by argument, and then proceeds to demand it from him with stubbornness and contention!"

Al-Faḍl fell silent for a moment; then he said, "You have given me honest advice and have kindly transmitted confidential information.[181] Tell me, however: if we disregard[182] what the populace (al-'āmmah) say and find helpers from our partisans (shī'atinā) and our soldiers, what would you say?" "God keep you!" said the man. "Don't your soldiers belong to

178. Following ed. Cairo's wa-qarra'ahu bi-khaṭa'ihi wa-khurqihi, rather than ed. Leiden's "and he fled from him (wa-farra 'anhu) with his error and ill-fatedness (ḥurfihi)."

179. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 161.

180. Aḥdatha al-ḥadath can also mean "has innovated an innovation."

181. Ed. Cairo: "and have sustained the burden of trustworthiness."

182. Reading aghmaḍnā (ed. Cairo), instead of a'aḍnā (ed. Leiden).

your populace in their having sworn the oath of allegiance and in the power that a true argument has in their hearts? Even if they give you their outward obedience, will they not be on the side of the covenant documents about which they have assured knowledge?" [Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ said, "And what if they give us obedience nevertheless?"][183] The man said, "There is no obedience unless one has firm inner conviction." Al-Faḍl said, "We will awaken their desire by improving their fortunes." "Then," said he, "they will accept[184] at first, but then abandon you when you need their loyalty." Al-Faḍl said, "What is your opinion about ʿAbdallāh's soldiers?" "They are men," he said, "Who have enthusiasm for their enterprise because of their longstanding effort and the important affair in which they are engaged together."[185] Al-Faḍl said, "What is your opinion of their common people?" "They are men," he said, "who were in [793] great distress because of mistreatment. Because[186] they in their property and persons have come through him to their desire[187] as regards property and to easy circumstances of life, they are defending prosperity that is newly come to them, and they remember tribulation to which they fear a return." [Al-Faḍl] asked,[188] "Is there no way to corrupt the loyalty of the great men of the land to rebel against him, so that our battle with him could be by the intrigue of his side, not by marching toward him to do battle with him?" [He replied,][189] "As for the weak, they have come to love him because of the security and fair treat-

183. The translation follows ed. Cairo. The words in brackets were omitted in the manuscript used for the Leiden text. The Leiden editor made an unnecessary conjectural emendation to preserve the sense of his defective text.

184. Following ed. Cairo's taqabbul. Ed. Leiden's reading (thiqal, "heaviness, indolence") is a conjectural emendation of an incompletely written word in the manuscript.

185. Ed. Cairo: "their longstanding oath of allegiance and their fortune in which they are engaged together."

186. Ed. Cairo reads wulātihim ("their governors"), where ed. Leiden reads wa-liʾannahum ("and because they"). The Cairo text may be translated: "who were in great distress because of their governors' mistreatment of their property and even their persons, and who came through him. . . ."

187. Alternate translation: "to security." See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CXX.

188. Following ed. Cairo; the manuscript used by ed. Leiden was defective at this point.

189. The bracketed text is from ed. Cairo.

ment they have obtained from him, while the powerful have found nothing to censure and no ground for argument; and the weak are the great majority." Al-Faḍl said, "I think you have left us no room to believe that we should go [to fight] his soldiers or that concern about our soldiers has taken hold on his side.[190] Even stronger is what you have said about the weakness of our soldiers and the strength of his soldiers in a conflict with him. But the Commander of the Faithful is not content to abandon what he knows to be his right, nor am I satisfied with peace, given the progress that has occurred in his enterprise. Sometimes matters approach threatening danger, but in the aftermath they reveal peace and profit." The two then parted.

Because al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ had set up observation points so that letters might not cross the border, the messenger wrote by way of a woman, depositing the letter in the hollowed-out board of a packsaddle, and writing to the postmaster to speed the news on. The woman passed among the border posts (masāliḥ) unmolested and unsearched, as if she were traveling from village to village. The news reached al-Maʾmūn, agreeing with the other letters that came to him; the letters corroborated each other. So al-Maʾmūn said to Dhū al-Riʾāsatayn, "These are matters whose substance judgment foretold. These are harbingers that portend what is to come. It is enough for us that we are on the [794] side of the truth. Perhaps what is hateful will bring good in its wake."

The first action that al-Faḍl b. Sahl took after prayer for al-Maʾmūn was omitted and the report of this was confirmed was to gather the troops he had prepared in the vicinity of al-Rayy, along with troops he had garrisoned there and [other] troops to undertake their enterprise. Because the country was too barren to support them, he supplied the troops with goods brought in by pack animals over every mountain pass and road, so that they lacked nothing they needed. They stayed at the border, not crossing it and not laying violent hands on anyone coming in or passing through.[191] Then he dispatched Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, 190. The text seems disturbed.

191. Following ed. Cairo's ʿāmid, rather than ed. Leiden's ʿāmmah ("ordinary person"), which makes less sense.

along with the commanders and soldiers he attached to him. Ṭāhir marched quickly, turning aside for nothing, until he arrived at al-Rayy and encamped there. He assigned men to its districts, established his garrisons, and sent out his spies and scouts. One of the poets of Khurāsān said:[192]

The imām of justice and right-guided king has launched against the people of Iraq and its ruler
The man who of all who walk [the earth] is most resolute in judgment, prudence, and effective stratagem in what he devises:
A calamity[193] oppressive[194] and swift, whose fearful assault turns the newborn babe's hair white.

It has been mentioned: Muḥammad [al-Amīn] sent ʿIṣmah b. Ḥammād b. Sālim to Hamadhān[195] with a thousand men and put him in charge of military affairs of the districts (kuwar) of al-Jibāl. He commanded him to stay at Hamadhān and to send his vanguard to Sāwah.[196] ('Iṣmah) appointed his brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥammād to be his deputy over the guard (ḥaras). Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ and ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā began inflaming Muḥammad and urging him to depose al-Ma'mūn and have allegiance sworn to his own son Mūsā.

Various Items of Information

In this year, in the month of Rabīʿ I,[197] Muḥammad b. Hārūn confirmed his son Mūsā over everything for which he had made [795] him his deputy and made ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān master of all

192. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 162.

193. Dāhiyah can mean both "calamity, misfortune," and "a man who is very cunning, or very intelligent." See Lane, Lexicon, III, 928.

194. The translation follows ed. Cairo (naʿādin), rather than ed. Leiden (taʿaddu, "that comes").

195. Hamadhān (modern Hamadān, ancient Ecbatana), a major city of western Jibāl province, lay on the Khurāsān road, approximately 250 miles northeast of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 194–96, 227–30; *EI*² s.v. Hamadhān (Frye).

196. Sāwah (modern Sāveh) lay approximately midway between Hamadhān and al-Rayy on the great Khurāsān road (ca. 175 km east of Hamadhān). See Le Strange, Lands, 211–12, 228–30. A more detailed account of the mission of ʿIṣmah b. Abī ʿIṣmah al-Sabīʿī is given in Yaʿqūbī, II, 530. See p. 50, below.

197. Rabīʿ I 194, corresponds to December 13, 809–January 11, 810.

his affairs. Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā b. Nahīk was in charge of (Muḥammad's) police (shuraṭ); ʿUthmān b. ʿĪsā b. Nahīk was in charge of his personal guard (ḥaras); ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUbaydah was in charge of his tax [bureau] (kharāj); and in charge of his correspondence bureau (dīwān al-rasā'il) was ʿAlī b. Ṣāliḥ the keeper of the prayer rug (muṣallā).

In this year, the Romans rose against Mīkhā'īl,[198] the ruler of the Romans. He fled and became a monk. His reign is said to have lasted for two years.

In this year, Leon the General[199] became king of the Romans.

In this year, Muḥammad b. Hārūn removed Isḥāq b. Sulaymān from [the governorship of] Ḥimṣ and appointed as its governor ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd al-Ḥarashī, with whom was ʿĀfiyah b. Sulaymān. He killed a number of their prominent people and imprisoned a number, and he set fire to their city from its outer parts. When they asked him for quarter (amān), he agreed, and they became quiet. Later, they rioted; so he cut off the heads of a number of them.

---

198. That is, Michael I Rhangabe. See note 92.

199 That is, Leon V, the Armenian, who ruled from 813 to 820. See Ostrogorsky, Geschichte des byzantinischen Staates, 163–65.

The Events of the Year

195

(October 4, 810–September 22, 811)

Among the events taking place this year was Muḥammad b. Hārūn's order to invalidate the dīnārs and dirhams that had been struck for his brother 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn in Khurāsān in the year 194, because al-Ma'mūn had ordered that Muḥammad's name should not be recorded on them.[200]

200. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 164–65. The conflict over coinage raises many questions: What was the established practice as to inscriptions upon al-Amīn's accession in 193? What changes did each brother make in coins issued in his territory, and would these changes cause offense? First, it needs to be said that no dīnārs have been discovered from any Iranian mint before the reign of al-Mu'taṣim, so the information in the text seems to project the circumstances of Ṭabarī's time back into the earlier period. As for dirhams, there was no established practice at the time of al-Rashīd's death as to whose name might appear on them. Al-Amīn's coins for 193 used the inscription Rabbī Allāh ("God is my Lord"), without naming anyone. In the same year, the mints under al-Ma'mūn's control introduced dirhams inscribed mimma amara bihi al-Amīr al-Ma'mūn walī 'ahd al-muslimīn 'Abd Allāh b. Amīr al-Mu'minīn ("By order of the Commander al-Ma'mūn, heir to the rule of the Muslims, the Servant of God, son of the Commander of the Faithful"), and this continued throughout 194 and into 195, with the addition of the name of al-Faḍl sometime during 194. In 194, al-Amīn added to his dirhams the inscription mimma amara bihi 'Abd Allāh al-Amīn Muḥammad Amīr al-Mu'minīn al-'Abbās ("By order of the Servant of God al-Amīn Muḥammad, Commander of the Faithful, Family of 'Abbās"). Al-Amīn might at this point have objected to al-Ma'mūn's refusal to accept the new caliphal inscription or identify himself as anything

These dīnārs and dirhams were called rubā'iyyah. For a time they were not allowed [as currency].

Al-Amīn Forbids Prayer for al-Ma'mūn and al-Qāsim as Heirs

In this year, al-Amīn forbade prayer from the pulpits in his entire domain for al-Ma'mūn and al-Qāsim. He commanded that there should be prayer for himself on them, and after him for his son Mūsā. This took place in Ṣafar[201] of this year. His [796] son Mūsā was a child at the time. He named him, "al-Nāṭiq bi-al-Ḥaqq" ("Speaker of the Truth"). He acted in the matter on the advice of al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'. Concerning this, a poet said:[202]

The caliphate has been brought to ruin by the vizier's malice, the commander's (amīr) dissoluteness, and the counselor's ignorance.
Faḍl is a vizier and Bakr[203] a counselor
who desire what will bring about the commander's death.

When word of this reached al-Ma'mūn, he took for himself the name "Imām al-Hudā" ("Imām of Right Guidance"), and he was addressed by this name in letters.[204] else than the heir of the previous caliph. Al-Ma'mūn, for his part, could point out that many governors in previous reigns had put their names on the coinage without any reference to the reigning caliph. A more serious offense took place in 195, when al-Ma'mūn introduced the inscription al-Imām al-Ma'mūn, openly claiming the imāmate and by implication the caliphate. About rubā'iyyah one can only guess. It does not seem to be the name of a denomination or to refer to the year 194 (from arba' "four"). It is possible that an author or copyist at some point confused the words rubā'iyyah and rabbāniyyah (very similar in Arabic script) and that the passage had originally added information about al-Amīn's coins, which may have been called rabbāniyyah because of the inscription Rabbī Allāh—but this is speculation. [I am indebted to Dr. Michael L. Bates of the American Numismatic Society for this information.]

---

201. I.e., between November 3 and December 1, 810.

202. The poem is quoted again, with additional lines, on pp. 58–59, below. See note 252.

203. I.e., Bakr b. al-Mu'tamir.

204. Cf. Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 136–37: "No Abbasid caliph had officially used this title [sc. imām] before, and he himself refrained from taking the title of caliph at this time. It was probably a deliberately ambiguous gesture, ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān Assigned Command of al-Jabal

In this year, on Wednesday, the first day of the month of Rabīʿ II (January 1, 811), Muḥammad gave ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān governance of all the districts (kuwar) of al-Jabal—Nahāwand, Hamadhān, Qumm, and Iṣfahān—both their military command and their taxes.[205] He attached to him a group of commanders and ordered that he should be given—according to what has been mentioned—200,000 dīnārs, and that his sons[206] should be given 50,000 dīnārs. He gave much money to the army and ordered for it 2,000 ornamented swords and 6,000[207] garments as robes of honor. Muḥammad had the people of his household, his mawālī, and his military commanders come to the maqṣūrah [of the mosque] in al-Shammāsiyyah[208] on Friday, the 8th day of Jumādā II (March 7, 811). Having led the Friday worship, Muḥammad went into [the maqṣūrah]; his son, Mūsā, held an audience for them in the miḥrāb—with him were al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ and all who had been summoned. He read them a letter from al-Amīn. It informed them of his good opinion of them, his right over them, how they had previously sworn allegiance to him as having priority and as having none to share in the allegiance with him, and how this was binding for them. It informed them also of the innovations ʿAbdallāh had caused: styling himself imām, having prayers made on his behalf, cutting off the post, and omitting mention (of al-Amīn) in the mints and workshops for embroidered garments (ṭirāz); to announce his defiance of his brother without providing an excuse for attack. It also shows that Ma'mun was pursuing the policy, begun by Mahdi and continued by the Barmakids, of developing the religious nature of Abbasid authority and seeking a reconciliation with the Alids and their supporters."

---

205. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 165; Fragmenta, 323.

206. At least four sons of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā are known. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī had already died fighting the rebel Rāfiʿ (Ṭabarī, III, 712). Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī commanded his father's right wing (p. 52, below) and after his father's death was sent by al-Amīn to Syria to recruit troops. Afterward, he switched his allegiance to al-Ma'mūn, attempted a coup in Baghdad, and was killed. Also mentioned are ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī and Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī (p. 82, below). See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 179.

207. Fragmenta, 323: "seven thousand."

208. The quarter of East Baghdad lying to the northeast of al-Ruṣāfah; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 199–216.

('Abdallāh) had no right to such innovations, nor were the stipulations that he claimed had been made in his favor valid. [797] It urged them to obey (al-Amīn) and maintain allegiance to him. After the letter had been read, Sa'īd b. al-Faḍl, the preacher, rose and spoke in the same vein, seconding it and saying things similar to what it had said. Then al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' spoke while seated; he spoke energetically and at length. He mentioned how no one but the Commander of the Faithful, Muḥammad al-Amīn, had any right to the imāmate and caliphate; God had given neither 'Abdallāh nor anyone else any share or portion therein. As for Muḥammad's household or the others, none of them said anything, except Muḥammad b. 'Īsā b. Nahīk and a group of important persons from the caliph's personal guard (ḥaras). In his speech, al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' said, "Prince Mūsā, the son of the Commander of the Faithful, has ordered that you be given, people of Khurāsān,[209] from his very own money 3 million dirhams to be divided among you." Then the people departed. 'Alī b. 'Īsā came to Muḥammad (al-Amīn) and told him that the people of Khurāsān had written him a letter saying that if he marched forth, they would obey him and be led by him.

In this year, 'Alī b. 'Īsā went to al-Rayy to fight al-Ma'mūn.[210]

'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān Goes to al-Rayy to Fight the Forces of al-Ma'mūn

According to al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq: 'Alī b. 'Īsā left the City of Peace[211] the evening of Friday, the 15th of Jumādā II of the year

209. Note that the people addressed must be troops of Khurāsānian origin resident in Baghdad, i.e., the so-called Abnā' al-Dawlah. On the other hand, Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 195, interprets the letter mentioned in the next sentence as having actually come from the province of Khurāsān ("if he came to them, they would obey him..."). In view of 'Alī b. 'Īsā's record as governor of Khurāsān, al-Amīn should have been aware of potential problems. See the report given on p. 63, below, explaining the appointment of 'Alī b. 'Īsā as having been cunningly engineered by an agent of Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn, knowing that the people of Khurāsān hated their former governor.

210. Parallels: Ya'qūbī, II, 530; Fragmenta, 323.

211. I.e., Baghdad. See note 15. A second account of the expedition can be found on pp. 75 ff., below, with different dates.

195 (March 14, 811). He left in the late afternoon of that day, between the Jum'ah prayer and the afternoon ('aṣr) prayer, for his camp on the Bīn Canal.[212] There he stayed with about [798] 40,000 men. He carried with him a silver shackle with which to bind al-Ma'mūn—so he asserted. Muḥammad al-Amīn went with him as far as al-Nahrawān on Sunday, six days before the end of Jumādā II (March 23, 811); there he reviewed the troops who had been attached to 'Alī b. 'Īsā. He remained the rest of that day in al-Nahrawān and then returned to the City of Peace. 'Alī b. 'Īsā stayed at al-Nahrawān for three days. Then he marched quickly in the direction he had been ordered to take. When he reached Hamadhān, he appointed 'Abdallāh b. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah to be in charge of it. Muḥammad had written to 'Iṣmah b. Ḥammād, instructing him to return with his closest companions, and had attached the rest of his army, including its funds and other things, to 'Alī b. 'Īsā.[213] He had also written to Abū Dulaf al-Qāsim b. 'Īsā,[214] instructing him, along with his companions who were with him, to join ['Alī b. 'Īsā]. He sent with him Hilāl b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥaḍramī and commanded that soldiers with stipends (farḍ) [be assigned] to him. Then he assigned to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jabalah al-Abnāwī[215] the command over Dīnawar[216] and commanded him to travel with the best[217] of

212. The Bīn Canal (Nahr Bīn) branched from the Nahrawān Canal at the town of Jisr Nahrawān (about 10 miles northeast of Baghdad, where the Khurāsān road crossed the Nahrawān Canal) and flowed west and south to join the Tigris at Kalwādhā. See Le Strange, Lands, 59–60, 174.

213. According to Ya'qūbī, II, 530, al-Amīn had earlier sent out 'Iṣmah b. Abī 'Iṣmah al-Sabī'ī, but 'Iṣmah, calling attention to the Meccan agreement, had refused to cross into al-Ma'mūn's territory without the latter's permission. Cf. p. 44, above, and p. 74, below; neither of these reports, however, mentions 'Iṣmah's reluctance to breach the Meccan agreement as a motive for his replacement.

214. Abū Dulaf al-Qāsim b. 'Īsā b. Idrīs al-'Ijlī was an important Arab landowner in the area southeast of Hamadhān and leader of the Banū 'Ijl tribal group. See Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 139.

215. The name is corrected in ed. Cairo to "al-Abnāwī"; ed. Leiden reads "al-Anbārī" throughout.

216. The city of Dīnawar in western Jibāl province lay about 60 miles west of Hamadhān, north of the main Khurāsān road. See Le Strange, Lands, 189; EI[2] s.v. (Lockhart).

217. Baqiyyah often has this meaning; cf. ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CXXXIX. An alternative translation would be "with the remainder of his companions."

his companions; with him he sent 2 million dirhams that had been conveyed to him previously. 'Alī b. 'Īsā left Hamadhān for al-Rayy before 'Abd al-Raḥmān reached him; he traveled until he reached al-Rayy in full battle readiness. Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn met him with fewer than 4,000 men—it has been reported that he was with 3,800 men.

Three persons left Ṭāhir's army for 'Alī b. 'Īsā, seeking thereby to gain his favor.[218] He asked them who they were and from which country. One of them told him that he was from the army of ('Alī's) son 'Īsā, whom Rāfi' [b. Layth] had killed.[219] "Then," he said, "you are one of my soldiers!"[220] He gave orders concerning him, and the man was flogged two hundred strokes; the [other] two men he treated with contempt. The report of this reached the companions of Ṭāhir, and they became more eager to fight 'Alī and more hostile toward him. [799]

According to Aḥmad b. Hishām, who was in charge of Ṭāhir's police (shurṭah), who said:[221] The letter from al-Ma'mūn saying that he should be addressed as caliph had not reached them when we met [in battle]. I said to Ṭāhir, "'Alī b. 'Īsā has come with those whom you see. If we show ourselves to him and he says, 'I am the agent of the Commander of the Faithful,' and we concede that to him, we shall not be in a position to fight him."[222] Ṭāhir said to me, "I have received nothing concerning this." So I said, "Leave me to what I intend to do." "As you will," he said. I ascended the pulpit, cast off [allegiance to] Muḥammad, and offered prayers for al-Ma'mūn as caliph. We set out that day or the next, a Saturday—it was in Sha'bān[223] of the year 195. We encamped at Qusṭānah, which is the first stage from al-Rayy toward Iraq. 'Alī b. 'Īsā reached a desert tract called Mushkuwayh.[224] Between him and us was a distance

218. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 168; Fragmenta, 324.

219. For the death of 'Īsā b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā fighting the rebel Rāfi' b. Layth in 191/806–7, see Ṭabarī, III, 712.

220. That is, you had no business remaining with al-Ma'mūn.

221. His father had suffered at the hands of 'Alī b. 'Īsā. See Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 140. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 167.

222. See Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 368, for a discussion of Aḥmad b. Hishām's advice.

223. I.e., between April 29 and May 27, 811.

224. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, this was a small town two stages from al-Rayy on the road to Sāwah.

of seven farsakhs (26 miles). We set our vanguard at a distance of two farsakhs (7.4 miles) from Qusṭānah.[225] ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā thought that when Ṭāhir saw him, he would hand over the administrative district [of al-Rayy] to him. When he saw that Ṭāhir was serious [in his intention to fight], he said, "This is a desert place, not a place for encampment." He therefore turned left, toward a district called Rustāq Banī al-Rāzī.[226] The Turks were with us. We encamped by a river, and he encamped near us; between him and us there were sand flats (dakādik) and hills. In the last part of the night, a man came to me and told me that ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā had entered [the territory of] al-Rayy; he had sent a letter to the people, and they had responded to him. I went out onto the road with the man and said to him, "This is [800] their road, but there are no hoof-prints here and nothing to indicate his passage." I went to Ṭāhir and awakened him. "Are you going to pray?" I asked. "Yes," he said, and he called for water and made ready. Then I told him the report. We prayed the morning prayer. Then he told me to mount. We stopped on the road. He said to me, "Would you like to cross these flats?" So we looked down on ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā's army. They had girded on their swords. "Go back," he said. "We have made a mistake." So we went back. He said to me, "Go forth."[227] So I summoned al-Maʾmūnī, al-Ḥasan b. Yūnus al-Muḥāribī, al-Rustumī, and Muḥammad b. Muṣʿab. All of them went forth. Al-Maʾmūnī was in charge of the right wing. Al-Rustumī and Muḥammad b. Muṣʿab were in charge of the left wing.

ʿAlī [b. ʿĪsā] approached with his army. The desert was filled with white and yellow from the swords and the gold.[228] Over his right wing he set al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī [b. ʿĪsā]. With him was Abū Dulaf al-Qāsim b. ʿĪsā b. Idrīs. Another person was in charge of his left wing. They charged and drove us back, until they entered the army, which with great difficulty rose and drove them off.

---

225. The translation follows ed. Cairo (note), rather than the conjecture of ed. Leiden.

226. That is, he entered the administrative district (ʿamal) of al-Rayy by a road other than the main road.

227. Ed. Cairo: "Make our companions depart."

228. Alternative reading: "from the gilded swords."

When he saw ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, Ṭāhir said, "This is something we cannot stand up to, but let us do it like the Khārijites!"[229] So he decided to attack the main part of the army. He gathered 700 men from the Khwārazmians, among them Mīkāʾīl, Saysal,[230] and Dāwūd Siyāh.

According to Aḥmad b. Hishām:[231] We said to Ṭāhir, "We should remind ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā of the oath of allegiance that was sworn and the oath of allegiance that he himself received specifically on behalf of al-Maʾmūn from the people of Khurāsān." He agreed. So we attached the two [texts] to two spears. I stood between the battle lines and said, "Truce! Do not shoot at us, and we will not shoot at you." ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā said, "You have it." I then said, "ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, do you not fear God? Isn't this the text of the oath of allegiance that you yourself had people swear? Fear God, for you have reached the door [801] of your grave!" "Who are you?" he asked. "Aḥmad b. Hishām," I said. (ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā had once given him 400 lashes.[232]) ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā cried out, "People of Khurāsān, whoever fetches him shall have 1,000 dirhams!"

There were people from Bukhārā with us. They shot at (ʿAlī), saying, "We will kill you and take your money." From (ʿAlī's) army, al-ʿAbbās b. al-Layth, the mawlā of al-Mahdī, came forth; also, a man called Ḥātim al-Ṭāʾī came forth. Ṭāhir attacked him, grasped the hilt of the sword with both hands, struck him, and felled him.[233] Dāwūd Siyāh attacked ʿAlī b.

229. This appears to be the meaning of naj ʿalhā khārijiyyatan. That is, "Let us make an attack on a vastly more numerous foe," an attack such as the notoriously ferocious Khārijite rebels might make.

230. Saysal is the correction suggested by ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXIV; the manuscript and ed. Cairo read "Sabsal." Ed. Leiden also suggests that "Mīkāʾīl" may be a mistake for "Mīkāl."

231. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 168.

232. Presumably this had occurred during ʿAlī's term as governor of Khurāsān under al-Rashīd.

233. Ed. Cairo adds, "and killed him." Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 168: "And for that reason, Ṭāhir was named Dhū al-Yamīnayn ('Possessor of Two Right Hands')." Masʿūdī, VI, 423, adds that Ṭāhir's two-handed blow killing al-ʿAbbās b. al-Layth caused the defeat of ʿAlī's army and earned him this nickname. An astrological derivation of the name is given in Ibn Khallikān (trans. de Slane), II, 472.

ʿĪsā and felled him, not recognizing him.[234] ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā was on a white-backed destrier[235] that Muḥammad [al-Amīn] had given him as a mount. Such a horse is thought unlucky in battle and presages defeat. Dāwūd said, "Let us sport with them."[236]

[Continuing, Aḥmad b. Hishām] reported: Ṭāhir the Younger—i.e., Ṭāhir b. al-Tājī—said, "Are you ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā?" "Yes," he replied, "I am ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā." (ʿAlī) thought that he would be held in awe and that no one would advance against him; but (Ṭāhir) attacked him and slaughtered him with the sword.[237] Muḥammad b. Muqātil b. Ṣāliḥ attempted to wrest the head from them; he tore out a tuft of his beard and took it to Ṭāhir [b. al-Ḥusayn], announcing the good news to him. Ṭāhir's blow[238] was the victory, and for that reason he was given the name Dhū al-Yamīnayn ("Possessor of Two Right Hands") that day, because he had grasped the sword with his two hands. The companions (of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā) took up arrows to shoot us. I did not know about ʿAlī's death until someone said, "By God, the commander has been killed." We followed them for two farsakhs. Twelve times they stood their ground against us, but we kept driving them back. Ṭāhir b. al-Tājī came up to me with the head of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā. (The latter had sworn that he [802] would set up Aḥmad's head on the pulpit on which Muḥammad had been deposed and had ordered the morning meal to be prepared for him in al-Rayy.)

I went back and found a leather bag that had belonged to ʿAlī. It contained a tunic (durrāʿah), a coat (jubbah), and an

234. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 169: "Some accounts say that Dāwūd Siyāh shot him with an arrow and killed him." Cf. Masʿūdī, VI, 423.

235. Birdhawn, a war horse capable of carrying a man in full armor, not the lighter-limbed and fleeter Arabian horse. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 186.

236. The words of Dāwūd Siyāh (the name means "Black David" in Persian) seem to be Persian, but the copyist has so corrupted them that they are unintelligible. Ed. Leiden reads: "nārī alʾnān katabtum. Ed. Cairo reads: "nārī asnān katabtum." In Arabic, this would mean, "My fire teeth you have written." Ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXIV, proposes reading "bāzī-yi īnān kunīm," which is what I have translated.

237. Note that Yaʿqūbī, II, 531, conflates Ṭāhir al-Tājī and Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn.

238. Cf. Masʿūdī, VI, 423: "which he inflicted with both hands on al-ʿAbbās b. al-Layth was the reason for the army's defeat."

undershirt (ghilālah). I put them on and prayed two prostrations of prayer in thanksgiving to God, who is exalted and blessed. In his camp we found 700 bags, with 1,000 dirhams in each. In the hands of the men from Bukhārā who had taunted him, saying that they would take his money, we found a number of mules carrying chests. They thought that it was money, but when they broke open the chests, lo and behold it was wine from the Sawād.[239] They divided up the bottles and said, "We have worked hard in order to drink!"

According to Aḥmad b. Hishām: I came to Ṭāhir's tent. He had become worried because I had been away from him so long. "Good news!" he said to me. ["This is a tuft from 'Alī's beard!" "Good news!" I said to him.] "This is 'Alī's head."[240] In thanksgiving to God, Ṭāhir freed those of his slaves who were in his presence. Then they brought [the body of] 'Alī—the aides had tied his hands to his feet—carried on a beam, as a [dead][241] donkey would be carried. Ṭāhir gave orders concerning him: he was wrapped in a felt cloth and thrown into a well. Ṭāhir wrote a letter to Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn with the news. The mail pouch traveled the night of Friday, the night of Saturday, and the night of Sunday—there are about 250 *farsakh*s between Marw and that place. It arrived with them on Sunday.[242]

According to Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn: We had given directions to Harthamah and furnished him with supplies of weapons.[243] He set out that day, and al-Ma'mūn saw him off. I said to al-Ma'mūn, "Do not stop on any account until you are saluted as caliph, for it has become your due. We cannot be sure that someone may not propose a truce between the two brothers; but if you are saluted as caliph, it will not be possible for you to

---

239. The Sawād (literally, "the black," sc. earth) is the fertile plain of Mesopotamia.

240. The bracketed words are from ed. Cairo. The manuscript used for ed. Leiden became abbreviated through homoioteleuton. The version in Mas'ūdī, VI, 423–24, adds that the page of Aḥmad b. Hishām was carrying the head in a horse's nosebag, which he set before Ṭāhir on cue from his master.

241. The addition is from ed. Cairo.

242. This implies an astonishing average daily speed of 400 km (248 miles) over the ca. 1,150 km (713 miles) between al-Rayy and Marw. See Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 33.

243. That is, to reinforce Ṭāhir. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 169.

retreat." I came forward, along with Harthamah and al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, and we saluted him as caliph. Al-Ma'mūn's supporters hastened [to do the same]. Then I went back tired and weary; I had not slept for three days while outfitting Harthamah. The servant said to me, "Here comes 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mudrik." The latter was in charge of the postal service, and we were awaiting the mail pouch [to learn whether matters had turned out] for us or against us. He came in, but remained silent. I said, "Alas, what are you hiding?" "Victory!" he said. Lo, Ṭāhir's letter to me was:[244]

> May God lengthen your life, subdue your enemies, and make those who hate you your ransom! I write to you with the head of 'Alī b. 'Īsā before me and his ring on my finger. Praise be to God, the Lord of the worlds!

I rushed to the residence of the Commander of the Faithful, and the slave lad (ghulām) followed me with black clothing.[245] I went before al-Ma'mūn, announced the good news to him, and read him the letter. He ordered that the people of his family, the commanders, and important people be summoned. They came in and saluted him as caliph. The head of 'Alī arrived on Tuesday and was sent around Khurāsān [to be displayed].

According to al-Ḥasan b. Abī Sa'īd, who said: We appointed Ṭāhir to a military command in the year 194, and his command has continued uninterrupted until the present time.[246]

According to Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Naysābūrī, who said:[247] When news of the death of 'Alī b. 'Īsā reached Muḥammad b. Zubaydah, who at the time was by the riverside, fishing, he said to the man who announced it

---

244. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 169; Mas'ūdī, VI, 424.

245. Sawād: black clothing was the court dress of officials. See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CCCI; Dozy, Supplément, I, 699.

246. The original significance of this truncated report is unclear. It may be connected to the report in Ibn Khallikān [trans. de Slane], II, 473, that, at the time Ṭāhir was assigned his command, al-Faḍl b. Sahl predicted that his standard would not be "untied" [i.e., defeated] for 56 years, and that this prediction proved true.

247. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 169; Fragmenta, 325.

to him, "Woe to you! Leave me. Kawthar[248] has already caught two fishes, and I haven't caught anything yet."

[Continuing,] he said: A certain man who was envious used to say, "Ṭāhir thinks that ʿAlī is superior to him."[249] He also said, "When will Ṭāhir arise to fight ʿAlī, given the large size of his army and the obedience of the people of Khurāsān to him?" When ʿAlī was killed, he backed down and said, "By God, had Ṭāhir met him by himself, he would have fought him with his army until he prevailed or was killed in the attempt."

One of ʿAlī's companions, a man of strength and courage, said concerning the death of ʿAlī:[250]

With him we met the lion when it breaks the neck of its prey; and we were such as never to be frightened away by an encounter.
From of old we have rushed into death and adversities;
when (death) bears down, there is nowhere to hide!
He brought low our riders when we met:
death came, and the covering was removed.[251]
He killed our ram, our head, [804] as if destiny had been in his hand.

When news of the death of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā reached Muḥammad and al-Faḍl [b. al-Rabīʿ], the latter sent on Muḥammad's authority to Nawfal, al-Maʾmūn's eunuch (khādim)—he was al-Maʾmūn's agent in Baghdad, his treasurer, and his caretaker for his family, children, estates, and money—and took from him the million dirhams that al-Rashīd had given to al-Maʾmūn. He seized his estates and the income from them in the Sawād and put his own agents in charge of them. He sent out ʿAbd 248. Kawthar was al-Amīn's favorite eunuch.

249. Following ed. Cairo; ed. Leiden reads, "A certain man who was envious of Ṭāhir used to say that ʿAlī was superior to him."

250. Ed. Cairo adds: "and the encounter with Ṭāhir."

251. "Covering" is a metaphor for ignorance. Cf. Qurʾān 50:21–22 (describing the Day of Judgment): "And the Trumpet shall be blown; that is the Day of the Threat. And every soul shall come, and with it a driver and a witness. 'Thou wast heedless of this; therefore We have now removed from thee thy covering, and so thy sight today is piercing.'" al-Raḥmān al-Abnāwī with strength and armaments. The latter encamped at Hamadhān.

Someone mentioned having heard ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim say at that time: Muḥammad [al-Amīn] wants to remove mountains and rout armies with his management and ill-fated heedlessness. How far he is from doing that, by God! As the former man said: "God has caused the flock you were herding to perish."

When Muḥammad had the oath of allegiance sworn to his son Mūsā and sent out ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, a poet from Baghdad, seeing Muḥammad's preoccupation with his own diversion and his idleness and how he neglected to oversee ʿAlī and al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ, said:[252]

The caliphate has been brought to ruin by the vizier's malice, the imām's dissoluteness, and the counselor's ignorance.
Faḍl is a vizier and Bakr a counselor
who desire what will bring about the commander's death.
This is nothing but a path of delusion:
the worst of roads are the paths of delusion.
The caliph's active homosexuality (liwāṭ) is a marvel, even more marvelous than it is the vizier's passive homosexuality (ḥulāq).[253]
One of them buggers; the other gets buggered:
such, by my life, is the difference of the cases.
[805] If only the two would make use of each other,
they could manage to keep the affair quiet.
But one of them plunged into [the eunuch] Kawthar, and being covered by donkeys did not satiate the other.

---

252. Masʿūdī, VI, 438, quotes eight lines of the poem and identifies the author as the blind poet ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 170, quotes the first three verses, but says that he has omitted the remaining verses "because of the foul slander in them. I am amazed that Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī], Godfearing man that he was, recorded them!"

253. Both printed editions misread the word ḥulāq as khalāq "portion, share"; the two words differ by a single diacritical dot. The parallelism of the verse points to a sexual meaning. In Lisān, II, 970, one finds two sexual meanings for ḥulāq: either an infectious venereal disease of horses and donkeys, causing inflammation of the skin of the penis, and treated by gelding the infected animal; or the condition of a female ass constantly in heat but never conceiving despite being covered many times. See also al-Khafājī, Shifāʾ al-ghalīl, s.v. ḥalaqī.

So they themselves brought their deeds into scorn, and they were at odds, like a camel's way of urinating.[254]
More wondrous than the one and the other is that we swear allegiance to the small child among us:
One who does not know how to wash his buttocks, and whose back[255] has not left the bosom of a nurse.
This has happened only because of Faḍl and Bakr, who want to abrogate the Book that gives light.
Were it not for time's vicissitudes, would these two be either in the caravan or in the company going forth to fight?[256]
But these are disorders[257] like mountains on which the lowly and contemptible have risen aloft.
Patience! In patience there is great good, even if the long-suffering man's patience has already worn thin.
Lord, take them quickly to Thyself; bring them to the punishment of hellfire.
Make an example of Faḍl and his party, and crucify them around these bridges.[258]

It has been mentioned: When Muḥammad sent to al-Ma'mūn concerning the oath of allegiance to his son Mūsā, and sent out messengers to him about the matter, al-Ma'mūn wrote in reply to his letter:[259]

> To proceed: The letter of the Commander of the Faithful has reached me, criticizing my rejection of a

254. Arabic lexicographers explain the proverb "More contrary than a camel's urinating," as arising from the ability of the camel (and also the lion, according to Arab naturalists) to direct the stream of its urine backward. See Freytag, Proverbia, I, 456; Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 447.

255. Another reading: "And from whose urine the nurse's breast is not free."

256. The line alludes to the proverb "Such a one is neither in the caravan nor in the company going forth to fight," applied to one not regarded as fit for a difficult undertaking. See Lane, Lexicon, VIII, 2825; Freytag, Proverbia, II, 500; Maydānī, Amthāl, III, 168–69.

257. Following the reading (fitan) in ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXIV, instead of the original Leiden reading (qunan), "hills."

258. This is probably meant to recall the unhappy fate of al-Rashīd's disgraced vizier Ja'far b. Yaḥyā al-Barmakī in 187/803. See Ṭabarī, III, 667 ff.

259. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 212.

position wherein he has wronged me and has desired me to be in a state contrary to what he knows to be right. By my life, had the Commander of the Faithful brought things to a state of fairness, demanding only it, and not provoking disapproval by its abandonment, his very first words would have been clearly persuasive, and I would have been convicted if I abandoned rightful obedience to him. However, as I am quick to render what is rightful, while he is ceasing to act in accordance with it, it rather behooves him to act in accordance with what is right in his own affair. He should adhere to it [806] and give of his own accord. Then, if I do what is right, I shall have freed him from worry; whereas if I reject what is right, he will be justified [in what he does]. As for the beneficence he has promised in exchange for obedience to him and the punishment he has threatened for disobedience to him, has anyone ever departed from the right in his action, and yet left the considerate man room to trust his word? Peace!

[Continuing,] he said: He wrote to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, when he learned of what the latter had resolved to do:[260]

To proceed: You are in the [protective] shadow of a mission (daʿwah) whose sanctum you and your forebears have always been ready to defend, whose preservation you have sought, and whose right you have upheld. Making this your duty to your imāms, you have clung to the rope of your community (jamāʿah), giving willing obedience, joining together against your opponents, and being partisans and brethren[261] to those who agree with you. You have preferred them before fathers and children, and gone through thick and thin with them.[262] You have considered nothing more advantageous to you than that which unites your fellow-

260. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 213–15.
261. Ed. Cairo: "helpers."
262. Literally: "comporting yourselves in whatever tribulation or prosperity they comported themselves."

ship, and nothing more damaging to you than that which dissolves your unity. Anyone averse to this you have held to be astray from the goal and from following the path of truth; and against them you have been swords of God's vengeance. How many of them have been left lying in a land of rending beasts, lifeless limbs, with the winds blowing dust in their faces, and the beasts of prey summoning each other to the place where they fell unbedded and unpillowed, having gone to a nation...[263] and whose good fortune is not quick to come! The imāms have therefore accorded you the trust in their affairs and precedence in their traditions that you have earned. You yourself have been more zealous than many of their trusted agents and close associates, so that God has made you the hero of the people of your mission (da'wah) and the chief who undertakes the main part of the business of your community.[264] If you tell them to draw near, they draw near; if you give the sign to proceed, they proceed; and if you hold back, they stop and stand still from faith in you[265] and seeking counsel. You increase in fortune with the increase in yourself [of obedience to them], and they increase in [807] fortune with the increase for you of [their] obedience to you. Now you have arrived at a position in which you have approached your day (i.e., your end), a position for which the greater part of your lifetime was expended. Only the seal of your work remains to be awaited. If it is good, your earlier good deeds will be accepted because of it; if it is the opposite, your earlier effort will be lost because of it. Abū Yaḥyā, you now see a state of affairs in which you have dislodged the people who favored you and the rulers who upheld the right of your imāmate by thrusting at a knot that you yourself undertook to 263. There is a lacuna in the manuscript.

264. Ed. Cairo: "your imāms."

265. Following the emendation (īmānan bika) proposed by ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXIV. The original Leiden reading, followed by ed. Cairo, was wi'āman laka, "in harmony with you."

tighten and by [violating][266] covenants whose ratification you oversaw. These affected first the inner circle, but then the matter reached the generality of Muslims, with binding oaths and confirmed pacts. What has arisen is something that will cause unanimity to be disrupted, a community to be split, and a unity to be dispersed. You thereby expose yourself to an alteration of favor and the disappearance of the path that former imāms have trodden. When favor departs from those who govern your affairs, its departure will extend to you in your own persons. God will not change [His favor] toward a people until they change their own state.[267] Anyone who labors to disperse it labors therein not so much against himself as against those who sustain it[268] and are in charge of its defense, having exposed them to becoming prey to their enemies and food for a people whose claws will immerse themselves in their blood. Your position is such that if you speak, your words will be regarded; if you advise, you will not be impugned for your counsel. By favoring the right, you will have favor with the people of right. How different the man who obtains present gain by abandoning the right, bringing ruin upon himself in his last state, and the man who backs the right, attaining to a good last state along with abundant good fortune in his present life! That to which you are being summoned is not your advantage; that to which you are being asked to incline is not his disadvantage. It is a duty that your merits demand, something that will deserve reward from your Lord and from the people of your imāmate whose right you will have maintained. If it is impossible for you to speak or act,

266. The word is supplied from ed. Cairo, reading khatr for khathr.

267. Cf. Qur'ān 8:53 and 13:11. Cf. the paraphrase of the verse in Ṭabarī, Jāmi' al-bayān, XIII, 81: "God does not change the favor and well-being that are among a people, removing these and destroying the people, until they exchange their state for mutual injustice and aggression; that is when God's punishment and indignation alight upon them."

268. Following the reading of ed. Cairo (ḥamalatihā). Ed. Leiden reads jumlatihā, "the totality of it." The meaning is unclear.

go to an abode where you will be free from fear for your person and where you will rule by your judgment. Cross over to someone who will favorably receive your good action and who will restore you to your post and your wealth.[269] God will be with you in this; and God suffices as a guarantor. If that is not feasible for you for reasons of your own safety, then withhold your hand, and speak the truth as long as you[270] do not fear that it will entail harm to you. Perhaps, someone will emulate you and be content with your prohibition! Inform me of your opinion, that I may know it, God willing. [808]

ʿAlī [b. ʿĪsā] brought the letter to Muḥammad. The people who were for abrogation among the aides aroused the latter's ardor and fueled his fires. His intoxication with power and his base nature assisted in this. He turned over judgment in the matter to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ, for the latter used to act as his helper. Meanwhile, the letters of Dhū al-Riʾāsatayn were reaching the spy he was consulting in his affair, saying: "If the people insist on deciding for conflict, use subtle means so that they entrust the matter to ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā." Dhū al-Riʾāsatayn specified ʿAlī for this because the latter had left a bad impression on the people of Khurāsān, who were united in their opposition to him, and because the populace held that he should be fought.[271] Al-Faḍl consulted the spy he used to consult, and the man said, "ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā—if he does it, you cannot hit them with anyone like him in terms of his wide renown,[272] generosity of spirit, and his position of having long governed in the terri-

269. This may be an offer to restore ʿAlī to the governorship of Khurāsān.

270. Reading with ed. Cairo takhaf ("you do not fear") for ed. Leiden's nakhaf ("we do not fear").

271. Cf. Ṭabarī, III, 702 (year 189/804–5): "When ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā went off to Khurāsān, he tyrannized over its people and treated them harshly. He gathered an immense sum of money, and out of it sent to Hārūn presents, including horses, slaves, clothing, musk, and wealth, whose like had never been seen before." (Translation, Bosworth, ʿAbbāsid Caliphate in Equilibrium, 250–51.)

272. Reading ṣawtihi, as suggested by ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXIV. Ed. Leiden originally read ṣawmihi ("his fasting"). The reading of ed. Cairo (ṣawbihi, "his rain") may be preferable. Rain is sometimes used as a metaphor for generosity. "Extensiveness or abundance of rain" would form a parallel to "generosity of spirit."

tory of Khurāsān and done many good works among its people. Furthermore, he is the elder statesman (shaykh) of the mission (da'wah) and the best[273] of those who are its partisans." So they decided to send 'Alī, and events took their course. Two armies rallied to al-Ma'mūn when 'Alī was sent: his soldiers with whom he made war on the enemy, and the common people of Khurāsān, who were a party[274] against 'Alī because of the bad impression he had left with them. This (sc. the appointment of 'Alī b. 'Īsā) was a policy in which there was great risk, except in the minds of men of weak judgment, both [809] because of 'Alī's own nature and because of what he and his forebears had done previously. So events took their course and he was killed.

Sahl [b. Hārūn] mentioned that 'Amr b. Ḥafṣ, the mawlā of Muḥammad, said: I went in to see Muḥammad in the middle of the night—I was one of his inner circle and could come to him when none of his [other] mawālī and entourage could. I found him with a candle before him, thinking. I greeted him, but he did not reply to me; so I realized that he was planning some affair of his. I remained standing in his presence until most of the night had passed. Then he raised his head to me and said, "Bring me 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim." I went to 'Abdallāh and brought him, and ('Abdallāh) continued arguing with (Muḥammad) until the night ended. I heard 'Abdallāh saying, "I beseech you for God's sake, Commander of the Faithful; do not be the first of the caliphs who broke his promise, violated his covenant, made light of his oath, and rejected the judgment of the caliph who preceded him." "Be silent," he said. "What a man you are![275] 'Abd al-Malik[276] was wiser than you and

273. Perhaps to be translated, "the remnant of those who were its partisans."

274. Ed. Cairo reads, "who made war against him."

275. Literally, "To God [be attributable] your father!" For an explanation of the idiom, see Lane, Lexicon, I, 11.

276. The parallel accounts disagree about which 'Abd al-Malik is meant. Dīnawarī, 389, identifies him as the Umayyad caliph 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān (ruled from 65/685 to 86/705). Mas'ūdī, VI, 419–20, identifies him as 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ, a prominent member of the 'Abbāsid family who had been imprisoned by al-Rashīd on suspicion of aspiring to the caliphate and who was released by al-Amīn. See Ṭabarī, III, 688–94. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 156, places the episode in 194.

saw things more fully when he said, 'Two stallions cannot be together in one camel herd.'"

'Amr b. Ḥafṣ [continued,] saying: I heard Muḥammad saying to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī', "Alas, Faḍl, life is impossible while 'Abdallāh remains and resists. He must be deposed." Al-Faḍl was supporting him in this and promising him that he would do it. (Al-Amīn) was saying, "When will that be, if he gains control of Khurāsān and the adjacent territory?"

One of Muḥammad's eunuchs (khadam) mentioned: When Muḥammad set about deposing al-Ma'mūn and having allegiance sworn to his son, he gathered the chief military commanders and proposed [the matter] to them one by one.[277] They refused him; scarcely any people backed him. Finally, he reached Khuzaymah b. Khāzim and asked him for his advice about it. The latter said, "Commander of the Faithful, anyone who lies to you is not giving you sincere advice, and anyone who speaks the truth to you is not deceiving you. Do not embolden the military commanders to depose, lest they depose you; and do not induce them to break the compact, lest they break their compact with you and their allegiance to you; for the treacherous man is abandoned, and the perfidious man is defeated." 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān approached. Muḥammad [810] smiled and said, "But the elder statesman (shaykh) of this regime, the eyetooth of this dynasty (dawlah) will not oppose his imām and will not obey halfheartedly." Then he raised him to a place to which I had never seen him raise him before. People therefore say that he was the first of the military commanders who agreed to depose 'Abdallāh and followed Muḥammad in his opinion.

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]:[278] When Muḥammad resolved to depose 'Abdallāh, al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' said to him, "Will you not excuse him, Commander of the Faithful? After all, he is your brother. Perhaps he will concede this matter peacefully, and you will have been spared the trouble of dealing with him and will have escaped from having to fight and oppose him." "What should I do?" he said. "You should write a letter to him," he said, "trying to placate him, allaying his apprehension, and asking him to yield to you what he has under his control. That is a more effective way of managing the affair and will be better spoken of than trying to subdue him with troops and forestall him with trickery." Muḥammad said to him, "I[279] will do as you think best in the matter." When Ismāʿīl b. Ṣubayḥ came to write the letter to ʿAbdallāh, he said, "Commander of the Faithful, your asking him to yield what he has under his control will engender doubt, strengthen suspicion, and put him on guard. Write to him telling him that you need him and that you would like to have him close to you and profit from his counsel. Ask him to come to you; that will be more effective and more likely to lead to making him obey and comply." Al-Faḍl said, "What he has said is right, Commander of the Faithful." "Then," he said, "let him write as he thinks best." So he wrote to him:[280]

277. Cf. the parallel account in Dīnawarī, 391, where the issue is not the deposition of al-Ma'mūn, but his being asked to return to Baghdad to serve as vizier, while Mūsā was to be made governor of Khurāsān.

278. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 159.

> From al-Amīn Muḥammad, Commander of the Faithful, to ʿAbdallāh, the son of the Commander of the Faithful Hārūn:
>
> To proceed: The Commander of the Faithful has considered your situation, your location in your frontier region, and the help and assistance he hopes to obtain > [811] in his God-given burden and responsibility for the affairs of God's worshipers and lands from your closeness. He has pondered the governorship that the Commander of the Faithful, al-Rashīd, assigned to you and what he commanded—that you alone should be in charge of what was assigned to you. The Commander of the Faithful hoped that no offense toward his religion or violation of his oath would be introduced, as his sending for you was in a matter whose benefit affects the Muslims and whose advantage and merit extends to

279. Following ed. Cairo; ed. Leiden has "Do as you think best."

280. Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 204–5. The letter is paraphrased in Dīnawarī, 389–90.

them all. The Commander of the Faithful has realized that your being close to him will be a more solid defense for the frontier regions and better for the armies. It will render the income from captured lands [fay'][281] more secure and will be more profitable for the populace than your staying in the province of Khurāsān, separated from your family, and absent from the Commander of the Faithful and from the advice and counsel from you that he wishes to enjoy. In investing Mūsā, the son of the Commander of the Faithful, as your deputy, the Commander of the Faithful has thought it wise to give him responsibility for any of your commands or prohibitions that shall reach him.[282] Come to the Commander of the Faithful with God's blessing and assistance, bringing the amplest hope, the broadest expectation, the most praiseworthy result, and the most penetrating intelligence; for you are the most worthy person for the Commander of the Faithful to ask for help in his affairs and to relieve his toil in matters involving the good of the people of his household[283] and those under his protection. Peace!

He gave the letter to al-'Abbās b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī, 'Īsā b. Ja'far b. Abī Ja'far,[284] Muḥammad b. 'Īsā b. Nahīk, and Ṣāliḥ, the keeper of the prayer rug, and commanded them to take it to 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn. They were to spare no manner of softness and gentleness and were to make the matter easy for him. One of

281. Fay' ("permanent booty") was the tribute or tax income from captured lands from which the stipends of Muslim soldiers were paid. See EI[2] s.v.

282. This seems to imply that Mūsā is to assume nominal responsibility for Khurāsān (doubtlessly under an elder tutor to carry out the actual administration) as al-Ma'mūn's khalīfah (deputy). Cf. Dīnawarī, 389; Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 357.

283. Following ed. Leiden in reading ahl baytihi. Ed. Cairo reads ahl millatihi ("people of his religious community," i.e., Muslims), contrasting with dhimmatihi ("those under his protection," i.e., non-Muslims). The Cairo reading may be preferable. Note that on p. 69, below, both editions agree on a similar phrase, ahl al-millah wa'l-dhimmah ("people of the [Muslim] community and protected [non-Muslims]").

284. That is, the grandson of al-Manṣūr.

them carried money, favors, and gifts. This was in the year 194. So they took his letter. When they reached 'Abdallāh, he [812] admitted them, and they gave him Muḥammad's letter and the money, favors, and gifts he had sent with them.

Then al-'Abbās b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā spoke. Having praised and extolled God, he said, "Commander, your brother has taken upon himself in the caliphate a great weight and in attending to the affairs of men an enormous burden. He has been truly intent on good, so that he has needed ministers, aides, and assistants in what is just. He has little fellowship with the members of his family. You are his brother, his like; he has turned to you in his affairs, and has hoped for your help and assistance. Not because we doubt your sincerity toward him do we deem you to be slow in devotion to him, nor is it because we fear you will disobey him that we urge you to obedience. In your coming to him lies great fellowship and benefit for his dynasty (dawlah) and reign. Answer, commander, the call of your brother. Choose obedience to him, and help him in those of his affairs in which he has called upon you for help; for therein lies the performance of what is right, kindness toward kindred, the welfare of the dynasty (dawlah), and the strength of the caliphate. May God make the commander resolute to follow the right course in his affairs, and may He grant him goodness and righteousness in the outcome of his judgment."

'Īsā b. Ja'far b. Abī Ja'far spoke, saying, "Multiplying words to the commander, may God assist him,[285] would be foolishness, and frugality[286] in acquainting him with his duty toward the Commander of the Faithful would be deficiency. The commander, may God grant him honor, has been absent from the Commander of the Faithful, and the latter has not been able to dispense with his presence. In the presence of other members of his family he finds that he has no one adequate, and he finds no substitute or replacement for him. The commander is the person whom it most behooves to show piety toward his brother and to obey his imām. Let the commander do as the Commander of the Faithful has written to him, as will be most pleasing and closest to the approval and affection of the Commander of the Faithful. Coming to him will be an act of merit and good fortune; slowness in coming to him will be an offense to religion and a damage and harm to the Muslims."

285. The translation follows ed. Cairo's ayyadahu Allāh. Ed. Leiden's Allāh Allāh is a probably a copyist's error based on the similar ductus of the two words.

286. Following ed. Cairo's iqtiṣād, which is preferable to ed. Leiden's iqtiṣār ("limitation, abbreviation").

Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā b. Nahīk spoke, saying, "Commander, we will not give you even more multiplication of words and [813] long-windedness about what you already know concerning the right of the Commander of the Faithful, nor will we[287] with stories and sermons sharpen your intention about the attention and concern required of you in the affairs of the Muslims. The Commander of the Faithful has needed aides and advisors in his presence. He has tried to place you under obligation, turning to you to help and strengthen him in his affairs. If you respond to the Commander of the Faithful in his invitation to you, it will be a great blessing and to the advantage of your subjects and family. If you stay put, God will enable the Commander of the Faithful to dispense with you; but that will not cause him to be any less devoted to you or to rely less on your obedience and sincere advice than he does now."

Ṣāliḥ, the keeper of the prayer rug, spoke, saying, "Commander, the caliphate is weighty, and aides are few. The people of strife and disobedience who plot against this dynasty (dawlah) and harbor deceit toward it and recalcitrance toward its friends are many. You are the brother of the Commander of the Faithful and his like. Whether matters go well or badly depends on you and on him; for you are his heir by virtue of a covenant, and the sharer in his authority and governorship. The Commander of the Faithful has tried to lay you under obligation by his letter. He has trusted that you will assist in those of his affairs in which he has asked you to help. Your agreeing to come to him will entail great benefit for the caliphate and joy and ease of mind for people of the [Muslim] community and protected aliens. May God grant the commander success in his affairs and decree for him that which will be most pleasing and profitable to him."

287. Following ed. Cairo's nashḥadhu; ed. Leiden's yushḥadhu is unlikely on grammatical grounds.

Al-Ma'mūn then praised and extolled God and said, "You have informed me of what I do not deny as regards the right of the Commander of the Faithful, may God grant him honor. You have called me to what I choose and do not reject—namely, to help and assist. I am ready to obey the Commander of the [814] Faithful and eager to hasten to do what will please him and be agreeable to him. But in deliberateness lies clarification of judgment, and in using good judgment lies sincere resolution. The matter to which the Commander of the Faithful has called me is one from which I will not hang back by way of delaying or resisting, but I will not embark on it haphazardly or hastily. I am in one of the frontier regions of the Muslims. Its enemy is rabid with fury; his vehemence is intense. If I neglect him, I fear that damage and harm will befall both soldiers and subjects. Yet, if I stay to deal with him, I fear that I shall fail to do what I would like—namely, help and assist the Commander of the Faithful and freely give him obedience. Depart until I consider my affair and [obtain] sincere advice about what I should decide as regards going, if God so wills." He then commanded that they should be lodged, given hospitality, and treated well.

According to Sufyān b. Muḥammad: When al-Ma'mūn read the letter, he wrung his hands.[288] What came to him in it was distressing to him, and he did not know what to reply to it. So he called al-Faḍl b. Sahl, had him read the letter, and said, "What do you think about this matter?" He replied, "I think you should hold fast to your position and not make a way against us,[289] while you can avoid it." "How," he asked, "can I hold fast to my position and defy Muḥammad, when the greater part of the commanders and troops are with him, and when most of the money and stores have gone to him, not to mention the favors and benefits that he has distributed among the people of Baghdad? People incline toward money and are led by it; if they find it, they do not care about maintaining allegiance or desire to fulfill a covenant or a trust." Al-Faḍl said to him, "When suspicion has arisen, caution is in order. I fear Muḥammad's treachery and am apprehensive that he may covet what you have in your hands. It is better for you to be with your soldiers and your strength, residing amid the people of your governorate. If something befalls you from him, you shall gather forces against him and strive to overcome him in battle and by strategy. Either God will give you victory over [815] him in reward for your loyalty [to the Meccan agreement] and good intention, or the other will happen, and you will have died steadfast, with your honor intact; you will not have sat idle and enabled your enemy to have his way with your person and your blood."

288. Parallels: Dīnawarī, 390; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 159–60.
289. Ed. Cairo: "against yourself."

Al-Ma'mūn said, "Had this affair come upon me while I was in a position of strength and while my affairs were in good order, it would have been of minor importance, and it would have been possible to repel it by stratagem. But it has come upon me after Khurāsān has been stirred up. Its inhabited lands and waste lands are in a state of disturbance. Jabghūyah[290] has abandoned obedience; Khāqān, the ruler of Tibet,[291] is acting up; the king of Kābul is preparing to raid the lands of Khurāsān that border on him; the king of Abrāzbandah[292] is withholding the tribute (ḍarībah) that he used to render; and I have no strength for even one of these matters. I know that Muḥammad has asked me to come only for some evil that he plans. I see nothing else to do than abandon my position and join Khāqān, the king of the

290. Barthold identifies jabghū or yabghū as a Turkish title and identifies the ruler in question as "the jabghū of the Qarluq [Turks]" (cf. Turkestan down to the Mongol Invasion, 173, 202). Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 138, freely renders, "the jabghū of the Turks." Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 358 n., calls him "Jabghūyah the king of Ṭukhāristān," following Ṭabarī, II, 1206.

291. Arabic Tubbat, from which the word "Tibet" comes, referred to the lands around the headwaters of the Oxus River, in the west of modern Sinkiang province of China, rather than Tibet proper. See Le Strange, Lands, 435, 437; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v. Tubbat.

292. Or, Barāzbandah: The original reading, amended on the basis of references given in ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXIV, was Utrārbandah, apparently a compound of the place name Utrār or Uṭrār, a town on the Sayḥūn (Jaxartes, Syr Darya) River, earlier known as Bārāb or Fārāb, with the Persian word band, dam or weir. Cf. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v. Uṭrār; Le Strange, Lands, 484–85. Barthold, Turkestan down to the Mongol Invasion, 202, accepts the reading Utrārbandah.

Turks, asking him for protection in his country. It is better for me to be safe in my person and out of reach of someone who wants to subdue me and use treachery against me."

Al-Faḍl said to him, "Commander, the end of treachery is disaster, and one cannot be safe from the evil consequence of injustice and tyranny. Many a man disesteemed has again become powerful; many a man subdued has again become an overpowering subduer. Victory is not by small or great numbers. The anguish of death is less grievous than the anguish of humiliation and injury. I do not think you should leave your position and go to obey Muḥammad, stripped of your commanders and soldiers, like a head separated from its body, for him to pass judgment over you, so that you become one of his subjects without exerting yourself in striving and fighting. Rather, write to Jabghūyah and Khāqān. Give them charge over their lands. Promise them that you will strengthen them in fighting the kings. Send to the king of Kābul some gifts and precious things from Khurāsān, and ask him for a treaty; you [816] will find him eager for it. Remit to the king of Abrāzbandah his tribute for this year; make it a gift from yourself that you grant to him. Gather your outlying provinces to yourself, and attach to yourself those of your troops who have become separated. Then strike cavalry with cavalry and infantry with infantry. If you win, [well and good]; if not, you will be able to join Khāqān as you wish."

'Abdallāh realized that what he had said was right. "Do as you think best," he said, "in this and in my other affairs." [Al-Faḍl] sent letters to those rebels. They became satisfied and yielded. He wrote to the commanders and soldiers who had left Marw, and made them come to him. He wrote to Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, who was then 'Abdallāh's agent in charge of al-Rayy. He commanded him to secure his area, gather his outlying districts to himself, and be in a state of alert and preparation for an army if it invaded him or a foe[293] if it attacked him. So the latter readied himself for war and prepared to repel Muḥammad from the province of Khurāsān.

293. Reading aw 'adūw, with ed. Cairo, rather than wa-'adad ["and a number"] as in ed. Leiden.

It is said: ʿAbdallāh sent to al-Faḍl b. Sahl and asked his advice in the matter of Muḥammad. "Commander," he replied, "give me a respite today, and I will bring you an opinion tomorrow." He spent that night considering what was best to do. In the morning, he came to (ʿAbdallāh) and told him that he had considered the stars and had seen that he would win and that the result would be in his favor.[294] So ʿAbdallāh remained in his place and made up his mind to fight and contend with Muḥammad. Having finished consolidating matters in Khurāsān as he wished, ʿAbdallāh wrote:[295]

> To the Servant of God Muḥammad, Commander of the Faithful, from ʿAbdallāh b. Hārūn:
>
> To proceed: I have received the letter of the Commander of the Faithful. I am merely one of his governors and aides. Al-Rashīd, may God's blessings be upon him, commanded me to stay in this frontier region and oppose any enemy of the Commander of the Faithful who seeks to ensnare its people. Upon my life, my remaining here will be more profitable for the Commander of the Faithful and more useful to the Muslims than my going to the Commander of the Faithful, although I would be happy to be in his presence and glad to see God's favor toward him. Therefore, if he thinks it wise to confirm me over my district and excuse me from going to him, he will do so, God willing. Peace. [817]

Then he summoned al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā, ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar, Muḥammad [b. ʿĪsā], and Ṣāliḥ and gave them the letter. He gave them generous gifts for the way and conveyed to Muḥammad a gift to Khurāsānian delicacies that he had prepared for him. He asked them to speak well of him in Muḥammad's presence and to excuse him.

According to Sufyān b. Muḥammad: When Muḥammad read ʿAbdallāh's letter, he realized that al-Maʾmūn would not 294. On al-Faḍl b. Sahl's knowledge of astrology, see Ibn Khallikān (trans. de Slane), II, 472–73; also Dīnawarī, 390.

295. Parallels: Dīnawarī, 390–91; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 160; Italian translation and discussion in Gabrieli, "Documenti," 205–6.

submit and come to him. He therefore dispatched ʿIṣmah b. Ḥammād b. Sālim, the master of his guard (ṣāḥib ḥarasihi), and commanded him to establish a garrison (maslaḥah) between Hamadhān and al-Rayy. He was to prevent merchants from carrying any provisions into Khurāsān. He was to search travelers, so that they would have no letters with them containing reports about him and what he intended to do. This was in the year 194. Then he resolved to fight him. He summoned ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān and assigned him the command of 50,000 horsemen and foot soldiers from the people of Baghdad.[296] He handed him the army registers (dafātir al-jund) and commanded him to select and choose those who pleased him. He was to give special treatment to whomever he liked and raise those he wanted to [a salary of] 80 [dīnārs]. He gave him access to the [stores of] weapons and treasuries. Then they were dispatched against al-Maʾmūn.

According to Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith, who said: When ʿAlī [b. ʿĪsā] was about to set out for Khurāsān, he rode to the door of Umm Jaʿfar and said goodbye to her.[297] She said, "ʿAlī, although the Commander of the Faithful is my child for whom I feel the utmost affection and greatest anxiety, I sympathize
[818] with ʿAbdallāh and feel pity for him because of the adversity and harm that are befalling him. My son is merely a king who has competed with his brother for his power and who has envied what the latter has in his hand. The generous [among his followers] will devour his flesh; the others will kill him![298] Show ʿAbdallāh the respect due to him because of his father and because of his being a brother. Do not speak roughly to him, for you are not his peer. Do not compel him as slaves are compelled, and do not weaken him with a shackle or fetter. Do

296. Ahl Baghdād: This normally does not mean the general population of the city, but rather the soldiers registered on the military rolls at Baghdad. See Lassner, The Shaping of ʿAbbāsid Rule, 280 (note 61) for a discussion of the term.

297. That is, to the residence of al-Amīn's mother, Zubaydah. Parallels: Dīnawarī, 392; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 165–66.

298. Cf. the somewhat freer translation of Nabia Abbott: "The better sort among his followers devour his worldly substance and the rest would be the death of him." (Two Queens of Baghdad, 213–14). "Eat the flesh of someone" can mean either devour his wealth or defame him. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 71, s.v. akala.

not deprive him of a maidservant or servant. Do not be harsh with him in journeying. Do not go beside him or ride before him. Do not mount your horse until you have held his stirrup. If he reviles you, bear with him. If he uses many words[299] to you, do not dispute with him." Then she gave him a silver shackle and said, "If he comes to be in your hand, bind him with this shackle."[300] He said to her, "I accept your command and will act in obedience to you in this."

Muḥammad published the deposition of al-Ma'mūn and had allegiance sworn to his two sons, Mūsā and 'Abdallāh, in all regions except Khurāsān. When they swore allegiance, he gave the Banū Hāshim, the military commanders, and the army money and gifts. He gave Mūsā the name al-Nāṭiq bi-al-Ḥaqq ("Speaker of the Truth"), and he gave 'Abdallāh the name al-Qā'im bi-al-Ḥaqq ("Upholder of the Truth"). 'Alī b. 'Īsā departed from Baghdad on 7 Sha'bān 195 (May 5, 811) and encamped at al-Nahrawān.[301] Muḥammad escorted him out, and the commanders and soldiers also rode forth. Provision wagons[302] were gathered, and craftsmen and workers were dispatched with him. It is said that his army was a farsakh [in length], with its tents, equipment, and baggage. One of the people of Baghdad said they had never seen an army with more men, livelier mounts, brighter swords, fuller equipment, or in more perfect array than his army.

According to 'Amr b. Sa'īd: After Muḥammad had passed the Khurāsān Gate,[303] ['Alī][304] dismounted and went on foot. (Muḥammad) approached to impart a commission to him.[305] He said, "Forbid your soldiers to harass the populace, or raid the [819]

299. Ed. Cairo reads, "If he behaves foolishly." The same reading is suggested in ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CCXCII.

300. The parallel in Ya'qūbī, II, 530, has al-Amīn give 'Alī the shackle.

301. The date has previously been given as 15 Jumādā II 195 (p. 49, above). Arguments in favor of the earlier date are given in Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 366 (note 3).

302. Aswāq: see ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CCCII, for this meaning.

303. The Khurāsān Gate (Bāb Khurāsān), one of the four gates in the walls of the original Round City of Baghdad, faced northeast and led to the main floating bridge over the Tigris and the great Khurāsān highway. See Le Strange, Baghdad, p. 15.

304. The bracketed text is present only in ed. Cairo.

305. Parallel: Dīnawarī, 391.

people of the villages, or cut trees, or rape women. Put Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī in charge of al-Rayy. Attach to him a large body of troops. Command him to pay his troops their salaries (arzāq) from income from the land tax (kharāj) [of al-Rayy]. Put one of your companions in charge of every district you leave. If any of the soldiers or notables of the people of Khurāsān comes out to you, honor him openly and give him a generous gift.[306] Do not punish a brother for his brother. Remit from the people of Khurāsān one-fourth of the land tax (kharāj). Grant no quarter to anyone who shoots an arrow at you or who thrusts at one of your companions with a spear. Do not allow ʿAbdallāh to remain more than three days from the day you capture him. When you send him forth, let him be with your trustiest companion. If Satan beguiles him, so that he shows himself hostile to you, be careful to bind him well. If he escapes from you into one of the districts of Khurāsān, take charge yourself of going after him. Have you understood all I have charged you?" "Yes," he said, "may God preserve the Commander of the Faithful." "Go," he said, "with God's blessing and help."

It has been mentioned: His astrologer came to him and said, "May God preserve the commander! If you delayed your journey until the moon is good,[307] bad luck would be in the ascendant for him, and good luck would be declining and departing from him." He, however, said to one of his slaves, "Saʿīd, tell the commander of the vanguard to strike his drum and advance his banner. We know no difference between a bad moon and a good moon. If anyone fights us, we fight him; if anyone makes peace with us, we make peace with him and leave him alone. If anyone makes war on us and fights us, there is nothing for us to do than slake the swords with his blood. We take no account of a bad moon. We have set our minds on bravery in the encounter and on fighting the enemy."

306. Contrast ʿAlī's behavior toward the three deserters from Ṭāhir's camp mentioned on p. 51, above.

307. Ṣalāḥ al-qamar: this may mean the full moon, although I have not found the phrase in any dictionary. Since ʿAlī left Baghdad on the seventh day of the lunar month, this would have meant a week's delay. The phrase fasād al-qamar ("a bad, imperfect moon") also is not recorded in the dictionaries. Another possibility is that ṣalāḥ ("becoming better") and fasād ("deteriorating") refer to waxing and waning phases of the moon or to its location in auspicious or inauspicious signs of the zodiac.

According to Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: One of [those in the army of 'Alī b. 'Īsā] was mentioned as having said: I was among those who went out in the army of 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān. When he passed Ḥulwān,[308] caravans from Khurāsān met him.[309] He asked them about the news, seeking information about the troops of Khurāsān. He was told that Ṭāhir was staying at al-Rayy, reviewing his forces and mending his equipment. He laughed and said, "What is Ṭāhir? By God, he is a mere thorn, compared to my branches; or a spark, compared to my fire. Someone like Ṭāhir does not take charge of armies and deal with battles." Then he turned to his companions and said, "By God, all that stands between you and his being snapped like a tree in a tempest is that word reach him of our crossing the pass of Hamadhān. Lambs are not strong enough to butt with their horns, neither do foxes have the endurance to encounter lions. If Ṭāhir stays in his place, he will be the first to be subjected to the edges of swords and the points of spears!" [820]

According to Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith: When 'Alī b. 'Īsā reached the pass of Hamadhān, he met a caravan that had come from Khurāsān. He asked them about the report. They said that Ṭāhir was established at al-Rayy; he had prepared for fighting and had obtained battle gear; reinforcements were flowing to him from Khurāsān and the adjacent districts; he was growing stronger by the day and his forces more numerous; and he was, they thought, the master of the army of Khurāsān. 'Alī said, "Has anyone [of account][310] from the people of Khurāsān come?" "No," they said, "but matters there are confused, and the people are frightened." So he ordered that they should journey on without stopping. He said to his companions, "The enemy's farthest point is al-Rayy. Once we have put it behind our backs, 308. The town of Ḥulwān (east of modern Qaṣr-e Shīrīn) lay on the great Khurāsān road in a mountain pass that marked the border between Iraq and al-Jibāl province (the Iranian highlands). See Le Strange, Lands, pp. 63, 191, 227–28; EI[2] s.v. (Lockhart).

309. Parallels: Dīnawarī, 392–93; Mas'ūdī, VI, 420–24; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 166–67.

310. The words in brackets are from ed. Cairo.

that will break their strength; they will become disorganized, and their forces will scatter." Then he sent letters to the kings of Daylam[311] and the Ṭabaristān mountains[312] and to the kings friendly to them, promising them favors and gifts. He made them presents of crowns, bracelets, and gold-ornamented swords, and he commanded them to cut the Khurāsān road and stop anyone who intended to reach Ṭāhir to reinforce him. They agreed to do this. Then he marched until he reached the [821] beginning of the district of al-Rayy. The commander of his vanguard came to him and said, "God save the commander! If you were to send spies, dispatch scouts, and look for a place where you could encamp and make a trench for your forces so that they would be safe, that would be a better plan and more pleasing to the soldiers." "No," he replied, "one does not prepare for someone like Ṭāhir by stratagems and caution. Ṭāhir's condition will result in one of two things: either he will fortify himself in al-Rayy, and its inhabitants will fall upon him unexpectedly, saving us the trouble of dealing with him; or he will vacate the city and retreat, if our horsemen and soldiers approach him." Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī came to him and said, "Pull the army together; take care that your troops are not attacked by night; and do not send the horses out to pasture without men to protect them: for armies are not managed by negligence, neither are wars conducted by being unprepared. The sure way is for you to be on guard. Do not say, 'My opponent is Ṭāhir'; for a hidden spark has often become a blaze, and a trickle has often been disregarded and dismissed, only to become a great flood. Our armies have drawn near to Ṭāhir; had his intention been to flee, he would not have waited until today." "Be silent," he replied, "for Ṭāhir is not of the rank that you think him to be. Men use caution only when they meet their match; they make preparations only if their foe is their peer or their equal."

---

311. Daylam, a small mountainous area between the Safīd Rūd River and the Caspian Sea in Gīlān province of northwestern Iran, was inhabited by warlike tribesmen who had served the Sasanians as mercenaries and maintained their autonomy after the Iranian plateau came under Arab rule. See Le Strange, Lands, 172–74; EI^{2} s.v. [Minorsky].

312. Ṭabaristān was the region of high mountains (the Alburz chain) south of the Caspian Sea. See Le Strange, Lands, 368–76.

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Mujālid, who said: ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā advanced until he encamped ten *farsakh*s from al-Rayy. Ṭāhir was in the city; he had shut its gates and placed garrisons on the roads leading to it, and had made ready to fight ʿAlī. Ṭāhir consulted his companions, and they advised him to remain in the city of al-Rayy and delay fighting as long as possible, until reinforcements of cavalry came to him from Khurāsān and a military commander to take charge of the matter instead of him. They said, "Your staying in the city of al-Rayy will be easier on your forces and on you.[313] It will render them better able to obtain supplies and find shelter from the cold. Better, if a fight [822] befalls you suddenly, that they[314] take refuge in houses and that you[315] have strength to procrastinate and hold out until reinforcements reach you or a force comes to you from behind you."

Ṭāhir replied, "Yours is not the best plan. The people of al-Rayy are in awe of ʿAlī and fearful of his depredation and violence. On his side are those you have heard about: Bedouins from the desert, brigands from the mountains, and rabble from the villages. I am worried that if he attacks the city while we are in it, fear of him may lead its people to rise against us and help him fight us. Also, never have fighters been threatened in their homes, with the army of the foe coming against them, but that they lost courage and became submissive; their strength departed, and their foe became emboldened against them. The only plan is for us to set the city of al-Rayy behind our backs. If God gives us victory, [well and good]; if not, we shall rely upon the city, fighting in its streets, and taking refuge in its impregnability, until reinforcements or a force from Khurāsān comes to us." "Yours is the best plan," they said. So Ṭāhir issued orders among his forces, and they went out and encamped five *farsakh*s from al-Rayy, at a village called Kalwāẓ. Muḥammad b. al-ʿAlāʾ came to him and said, "Commander, 313. Ed. Cairo omits the words, "and on you." They may be the result of dittography.

314. That is, "your forces." The translation follows the text of ed. Cairo. The Leiden text (naʿtaṣimū, "we take refuge") is grammatically anomalous.

315. The translation follows the Cairo reading. The Leiden reading (naqwū, "we have strength") is grammatically anomalous.

your soldiers have become awed by this army; their hearts have filled with fear and terror of it. You should stay in your place and put off fighting, until your men sniff out the foe, become at ease with them, and know the way to take in fighting them." "No," he replied, "I will not be destroyed by inexperience and irresoluteness. My men are few; the enemy's army is great, and their numbers are many. If I put off fighting and delay the conflict, I fear they will learn how few in number we are and how exposed. They may seek to win over those on my side by enticement or intimidation, so that most of my forces may turn [823] away from me, and the men of steadfastness and endurance may abandon me. Instead, I will make infantrymen fight hand to hand with infantrymen, and horsemen join battle with horsemen. I will rely on obedience and loyalty. I will be steadfast, like one who reckons on a good reward and is eager to gain the merit of martyrdom. If God bestows victory and success, that is what we want and hope; if the other happens, I shall not be the first to have fought and been killed! What is in God's presence is greater and better."

'Alī [b. 'Īsā] said to his companions, "Hasten toward the enemy, for their number is small. If you advance toward them, they will have no courage to endure the heat of swords or the thrust of spears." He arranged his troops into a right wing, left wing, and center. He assigned ten banners, with a thousand men under each, and sent the banners forward one by one, putting a bowshot between each. He gave orders to the commanders: when the first banner had fought, held out, and defended [those behind], and the battle had become too protracted for it, the next banner was to be brought forward; the one that had fought was to be moved back, until its men regained their spirits, rested, and had energy to fight again. He put men with coats of mail, chest armor, and helmets in front of the banners; he himself stayed in the center with his companions—men of strength, constancy, and courage.

Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn arranged his troops, divided his squadrons of horsemen, and set his ranks in order. He passed by each commander and each group and said, "You friends of God and people who are loyal and give Him thanks, you are not like these whom you see—people of perfidy and treachery. They have neglected what you have preserved; they have scorned what you have honored; they have violated the oaths to which you have been faithful; they are seeking only what is false and are fighting in a state of treachery and ignorance—men of plunder and pillage! If you avert your eyes and make firm your feet, God will fulfill His promise and will open to you the gates of His strength and help. Fight for your religion against tempters to civil strife and lords of hellfire! Repel their falsehood by your truth, for it is but a single hour until God will judge between you—and He is the best of judges!"[316] He became very anxious and began saying, "People of loyalty and sincerity, be steadfast, be steadfast! Defend [your honor], defend [your honor]!" [824]

The people [in the two armies] advanced toward each other. The inhabitants of al-Rayy gathered[317] and locked the city gates.[318] Ṭāhir proclaimed, "Friends of God, attend to those in front of you, rather than to those behind you, for only effort and valor will save you." They joined and fought fiercely with each other; both sides showed endurance. ʿAlī's right wing overcame and badly broke Ṭāhir's left wing, and his left wing dislodged [Ṭāhir's] right wing from its position. Ṭāhir said, "Set your strength and your effort against the squadrons of horsemen in the middle! If you break one of their banners, those in front will turn back upon those in the rear." So his forces showed true bravery; they attacked the foremost of the center banners, put them to flight, and killed many among them. The banners turned back upon each other, and ʿAlī's right wing collapsed. The men in Ṭāhir's right wing and his left wing saw what his companions had done. They turned against those who were opposite them and put them to flight. The rout reached ʿAlī, and he began calling to his companions, "Where are the wearers of bracelets and crowns? You Sons [of the Dynasty],[319] come to

316. Qur'ān 7:87.

317. Ed. Cairo: "rose up."

318. Parallels: Dīnawarī, 393; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 168.

319. The Abnāʾ al-Dawlah ("Sons of the Mission or Dynasty") were Arabs and Iranians of Khurāsānian origin, who had come to Iraq with the ʿAbbāsid revolution, settled in Baghdad, and formed the dominant force in the army of al-Amīn. See Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 104; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 66; Lassner, The Shaping of ʿAbbāsid Rule, 133–36; and Bosworth, The ʿAbbāsid Caliphate in Equilibrium, pp. xvii and 4.

me! Rally after retreat! Returning[320] to the battle is part of endurance in it!" One of Ṭāhir's men shot him with an arrow and killed him. They set their swords on them, killing them and taking them prisoner, until night fell and separated them from their quarry. They took many spoils. Ṭāhir proclaimed among ʿAlī's forces that anyone who laid down his weapons would be safe. So they threw away their weapons and dismounted from their horses. Ṭāhir returned to the city of al-Rayy and sent the prisoners and heads to al-Maʾmūn.

It has been mentioned: ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā threw [825] himself down on that day among the slain. He had received many wounds. He remained among the dead, pretending to be one of them, that day and that night, until he felt safe from pursuit. Then he got up, attached himself to a group of refugees from the army, and went to Baghdad. He was one of ʿAlī's oldest sons.

According to Sufyān b. Muḥammad: When ʿAlī [b. ʿĪsā] set out toward Khurāsān, al-Maʾmūn sent to the commanders who were on his side, proposing to each one of them individually that he should fight him. All of them showed fear and made excuses in order to find a way to be released from encountering him and fighting him.

According to one of the people of Khurāsān: When al-Maʾmūn received Ṭāhir's letter with the news about ʿAlī [b. ʿĪsā] and what God had inflicted upon him, he gave audience to the people. They came before him, congratulated him, and wished him strength and victory. On that day, he proclaimed that Muḥammad was deposed. He himself[321] was mentioned as caliph in prayers in all the districts of Khurāsān and neighboring areas.[322] The people of Khurāsān were delighted. Preachers there gave sermons, and poets recited verses. On that subject, a poet [from the people of Khurāsān][323] said:

---

320. Following the Cairo reading (muʿāwadah), which makes better sense than the Leiden reading (muʿāwanah, "assistance").

321. Following ed. Cairo; ed. Leiden reads: "and mentioning [himself] as caliph in prayers," which is syntactically strained.

322. Yaʿqūbī, II, 531, gives a sermon reportedly preached by al-Maʾmūn on this occasion.

323. The bracketed words are from ed. Cairo.

The community has come to be in a state of happiness regarding its worldly affairs and religion:
For it has kept the compact of the Imām of Right Guidance, the best of Eve's sons, its Trusted One (ma'mūnihā).[324]
It was on the brink [of destruction]; but when it kept faith, it escaped the evil that would have destroyed it.
It upheld God's truth, when there were written among his children the books of its registers.
Do you not see the community—how, after ruin,
God has brought it good fortune to adorn it?

The [rest of the] poem is many verses long.

According to ʿAlī b. Ṣāliḥ al-Ḥarbī: When ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā was killed, people in Baghdad became very agitated and spread wild rumors.[325] Muḥammad regretted his own perfidy and treachery. The military commanders met among themselves. This took place on Thursday, the middle of Shawwāl 195 (July 10, 811). They said, "ʿAlī has been killed, and we do not doubt that Muḥammad needs men and must employ people who have skills. Men are advanced only by their own selves; they are raised by their valor and boldness. Let each of you command his troops to riot and demand pay and gifts. Perhaps, given this state of affairs, we shall obtain from him what is to our advantage and to the advantage of our troops." They agreed upon this. The next morning they went to Bāb al-Jisr.[326] They shouted, "Allāhu akbar!"[327] and demanded pay and gifts. News of this reached ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim, and he rode toward them with his men and with the forces of other commanders of Bedouin Arabs. The two sides shot arrows at each other, threw stones, and fought fiercely. Muḥammad heard the shout of "Allāhu akbar!" and the noise. He sent one of his mawālī to bring him a report. The man returned to him and informed him [826]

324. The line alludes to the title Imām al-Hudā taken by al-Ma'mūn (see p. 47, above) and puns on the meaning of al-Ma'mūn's name, "he who is trusted or trustworthy."

325. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 170; Fragmenta, 325.

326. Bāb al-Jisr (Gate of the Floating Bridge) was at the eastern end of the northernmost of the three floating bridges linking Baghdad with the districts on the east bank of the Tigris. See Le Strange, Baghdad, p. 178.

327. "God is most great!"—used here as a rallying cry.

that the troops had assembled and had rioted to demand their pay. "And are they demanding anything except their pay?" he asked. "No," the man replied. "How small a thing they have demanded!" he said. "Go back to 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim, and command him to turn away from them." Then he ordered that they should be given four months' pay. He raised those who had been under eighty [dīnārs] to eighty.[328] He ordered that the commanders and inner circle (khawāṣṣ) should be given presents and gifts.

Al-Amīn Sends 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jabalah to Fight Ṭāhir

In this year, Muḥammad the Deposed[329] sent 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jabalah al-Abnāwī to Hamadhān to fight Ṭāhir.[330]

According to 'Abdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ: When news that 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān had been killed and that Ṭāhir had extirpated his army reached Muḥammad, he dispatched 'Abd al-Raḥmān [827] al-Abnāwī with 20,000 men from the Abnā'.[331] He sent money with him, strengthened him with weapons and horses, gave him gifts, and appointed him governor of Ḥulwān in addition to whatever territory of Khurāsān he might conquer. With him he assigned skilled horsemen of the Abnā' and men of valor, vigor, and ability from them. He commanded him to travel quickly, with little tarrying or resting, so that he would arrive at the city of Hamadhān before Ṭāhir. He was to dig a trench around himself and his forces, gather to himself [war][332] equipment, and hasten to fight Ṭāhir and his forces. 'Abd al-Raḥmān exerted himself and carried out al-Amīn's command in all that the latter wanted him to do. He advanced toward Ṭāhir cautiously and warily, avoiding the negligence and slug-

328. On military salaries for the period, see Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 78.

329. Henceforth, the reports in Ṭabarī frequently designate al-Amīn as "Muḥammad the Deposed (al-Makhlū')."

330. Parallels: Ya'qūbī, II, 532; Dīnawarī, 393–94; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 170; Fragmenta, 325–26.

331. See note 319 on Abnā' al-Dawlah ("Sons of the Mission or Dynasty").

332. The addition is from ed. Cairo.

gishness of ʿAlī [b. ʿĪsā]. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān went and took up quarters at the city of Hamadhān. He secured the roads leading to it, fortified its wall and its gates, and repaired the breaches in them. He gathered provision wagons and laborers into the city, collected equipment and provisions in it, and prepared to meet Ṭāhir and fight him.

After his father was killed, Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī escaped with a group of his companions and established himself between al-Rayy and Hamadhān. Whenever any refugee from his father's army passed him, he retained him. He thought that Muḥammad would appoint him in his father's stead and would send him cavalry and infantry. He intended to gather the remnants of the army until reinforcements and help reached him. He wrote to Muḥammad, asking him for help and assistance. Muḥammad wrote back, informing him that he had sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Abnāwī and commanding him to stay where he was and encounter Ṭāhir with the men he had with him; if he needed strength and men, he was to write to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, and the latter would strengthen and help him.

Having received the news, Ṭāhir headed toward ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and his forces. When he drew near Yaḥyā, Yaḥyā said to his companions, "Ṭāhir has drawn near us. He has with him those whom you know—foot soldiers and horsemen of Khurāsān. [828] He was your master only yesterday. If I encounter him with the remnants of the army that I have with me, I fear he will scatter us, causing those behind us to lose courage. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān will use this as an excuse and thereby clothe me with shame, cowardice, and weakness in the eyes of the Commander of the Faithful. On the other hand, if I appeal to him for assistance and remain waiting for his help, I fear that he may hold back from us, clinging to his men, preserving them, and trying to avoid having them killed. Let us march toward the city of Hamadhān and encamp near ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. If we appeal to him for help, his help will be close to us. If he needs us, we will help him; we shall be in his vicinity and fight on his side." "Yours is the best plan," they replied. So Yaḥyā departed; but when he approached the city of Hamadhān, his companions abandoned him, and most of those who had gathered around him dispersed.

Ṭāhir proceeded to the city of Hamadhān and came within sight of it. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān called up his forces, and they came out in battle order; he drew up his ranks[333] against Ṭāhir, and they fought fiercely. Both sides held out steadfastly, and there were many killed or wounded among them. Then ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was driven back. He entered the city of Hamadhān and remained there some days, until his forces became stronger and the wounded recuperated. He then ordered preparations and marched out to fight Ṭāhir. When Ṭāhir saw his banners and the first of his forces come into sight, he said to his companions, "ʿAbd al-Raḥmān wants to present himself to your sight. If you approach him, he will fight you. If you drive him back, he will hurry to the city, enter it, and fight you by its trench, making himself secure by means of the gates and wall of the city. If he drives you back, they will have wide room to maneuver against you: the breadth of the battlefield will enable them to fight you and kill any of you who are driven back and flee. So take a stand close to our trench and our camp: if he approaches us, we will fight him; if he goes far from their trench, we will [829] close in on him." So Ṭāhir halted where he was. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, thinking that fear was making him slow to encounter him and attack him, hastened to fight with him. They fought fiercely. Ṭāhir held out resolutely and killed many of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's men. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān kept saying to his forces, "People of the Abnā'! Sons of kings, and men familiar with swords![334] These are Persians; they are not men who can last for long or show endurance. So hold out against them—may my father and my mother be your ransom!" He would pass by each banner, saying, "Show endurance, for we need to endure only a little while. This [hour] is the beginning of endurance and victory!" With his own hands he fought hard and made fierce charges; with every charge he inflicted much slaughter upon Ṭāhir's forces, but no one withdrew or moved from his place. Then one of Ṭāhir's men attacked ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's standard bearer and killed him, and Ṭāhir's forces made a bold rush

333. Ed. Cairo reads: "he encountered Ṭāhir."

334. The translation follows the emendation {ālāf, "those who are familiar with," instead of manuscript alfāf, "groves"} proposed in ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CDLXX.

against their foe. The latter turned to flee, and Ṭāhir's forces put their swords to them and continued killing them until they had driven them back to the gate of the city of Hamadhān. Ṭāhir stayed at the gate of the city besieging him and the inhabitants. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān would come out every day and fight at the gates of the city; his men would throw stones and shoot arrows from on top of the wall. The siege tightened around them. The inhabitants of the city suffered harm at the hands of (ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's) men and loathed the fighting and the war. Ṭāhir cut off their supplies from every direction. When ʿAbd al-Raḥmān saw this—seeing that his men had perished or were in distress and fearing that the people of Hamadhān would rise against him—he sent to Ṭāhir and asked him for safe conduct (amān) for himself and those on his side. Ṭāhir granted it to him and fulfilled [the agreement]. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān withdrew with his forces and those forces of Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī for whom he had requested safe conduct.

Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn Named Dhū al-Yamīnayn

In this year, Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn was given the name Dhū al-Yamīnayn ("He Who Has Two Right Hands"). The report of the reason why he was thus named has already been given;[335] now the person who gave him that name will be mentioned.[336] [830]

It is mentioned that after Ṭāhir had defeated the army of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān and had killed ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, he wrote to al-Faḍl b. Sahl:

> May God lengthen your life, subdue your enemies, and make those who hate you your ransom! I write to you with the head of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā on my lap and his ring on my hand. Praise be to God, the Lord of the Worlds!

Al-Faḍl arose and saluted al-Ma'mūn as Commander of the Faithful. Al-Ma'mūn reinforced Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn with men and commanders and named him Dhū al-Yamīnayn and Ṣāḥib 335. See p. 54, above, and note 233.

336. Ed. Cairo, "now we shall mention the person..."

Ḥabl al-Dīn.[337] He raised those with him who were at [a salary] under eighty [dīnārs] to eighty [dīnārs].

The Rebellion of al-Sufyānī in Syria

In this year, al-Sufyānī[338] ('Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah) appeared in Syria and pressed his claim to power. This took place in the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah.[339] He expelled Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far from there, after having besieged him in Damascus. Sulaymān was Muḥammad's governor of Damascus, and he made his escape only after he had despaired.[340] Muḥammad the Deposed dispatched al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān to [fight] him. Al-Ḥusayn did not reach him; instead, when he reached al-Raqqah,[341] he remained there.

Ṭāhir Expels al-Amīn's Agents from al-Jibāl Province

In this year, Ṭāhir expelled Muḥammad's agents from Qazwīn[342] and the other districts of al-Jibāl province.[343] The reason for this was as follows.

---

337. The title means "Master of the Rope of Religion," i.e., the bond or covenant of the Islamic religion, and thus commemorates Ṭāhir's upholding of the Meccan agreement. Its wording is modeled on Qur'ān 3:103, "Hold fast to God's rope, together, and do not scatter."

338. The name identifies him as a descendant of Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān, the founder of the Umayyad dynasty overthrown by the 'Abbāsids. He was one of the few survivors of the Umayyad family. His grandfather, Khālid b. Yazīd, had played a prominent role in Umayyad family politics during the reigns of Marwān and 'Abd al-Malik. His mother was a descendant of 'Alī. Parallels: Ya'qūbī, II, 532; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 172. Further references in Crone, Slaves on Horses, 253, note 549.

339. That is, the last month of the year, between August 25 and September 22, 811.

340. Accepting the emendation [al-ya's] proposed by ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXV, which also is the reading of ed. Cairo. The original Leiden reading [al-ba's] would mean "after valor," i.e., after a fight.

341. The city of al-Raqqah was located on the upper Euphrates River in the province of al-Jazīrah. The 'Abbāsids made it the center of a large military garrison. See Le Strange, Lands, 101–3.

342. Qazwīn [modern Qazvīn], about 100 miles northwest of al-Rayy and 125 miles northeast of Hamadhān, was heavily garrisoned to defend the Iranian heartland against the only partially pacified Daylamī tribesmen to the north. See Le Strange, Lands, 218–20; EI[2] s.v. Ḳazwīn [Hillenbrand].

343. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 171.

According to 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ: When Ṭāhir headed toward 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Abnāwī in Hamadhān, he became afraid that Kathīr b. Qādirah, who was in Qazwīn as one of Muḥammad's agents, along with a large army, would fall upon him if he left him behind his back. After Ṭāhir had drawn near to Hamadhān, he commanded his forces to encamp, and they did so. He then rode with a thousand horsemen and a thousand [831] foot soldiers and headed toward Kathīr b. Qādirah. When he drew near him, Kathīr fled with his men and abandoned Qazwīn. Ṭāhir stationed a large garrison of soldiers there. He put one of his companions in charge of the city and commanded him to fight any of the forces of 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Abnāwī or any others who tried to enter the city.

The Death of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jabalah al-Abnāwī

In this year, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jabalah al-Abnāwī was killed at Asadābādh.[344]

According to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣāliḥ: When Muḥammad the Deposed dispatched 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Abnāwī to Hamadhān, he had the two sons of al-Ḥarashī, 'Abdallāh and Aḥmad, follow him with a large body of horsemen from the people of Baghdad. He commanded the two to encamp at Qaṣr al-Luṣūṣ.[345] They were to heed and obey 'Abd al-Raḥmān and reinforce him if he needed their help. After 'Abd al-Raḥmān had come out to Ṭāhir on a guarantee of safety, 'Abd al-Raḥmān remained to show Ṭāhir and his forces that he was peaceably intentioned and satisfied with their promises and oaths. But then he took them off guard. He rode with his men—Ṭāhir and his forces sensed nothing—and attacked them; and they laid their swords to them. The foot soldiers among Ṭāhir's forces held their ground against them by means of swords, 344. The town of Asadābādh was located on the great Khurāsān road about 30 miles east of Hamadhān, on the eastern side of a mountain pass. See Le Strange, Lands, 195–96; EI[2] s.v. (Streck). Parallels: Dīnawarī, 394; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 171; Fragmenta, 326.

345. Qaṣr al-Luṣūṣ ("Robbers' Castle") was the Arabic name for the town of Kanguvār, about 120 miles east of Ḥulwān on the Khurāsān Road, and 60 miles west of Hamadhān. See Le Strange, Lands, 20, 188.

shields, and arrows; they knelt down on their knees[346] and fought him as fiercely as possible. The foot soldiers held off the attackers until the horsemen had taken up their equipment and gear and advanced boldly in battle. The two sides fought fiercely, until swords became ragged and spears broke in two. Then 'Abd al-Raḥmān's forces fled. He himself dismounted with some of his companions and fought until he was killed. His companions said to him, "You can escape; do so! The foe has wearied of fighting. The battle has tired them out. They have no energy or strength to pursue." He kept saying, "I will [832] never retreat! The Commander of the Faithful shall never see the face of me defeated." There was great slaughter among his companions, and his army was destroyed. Those of his forces who escaped reached the camp of 'Abdallāh and Aḥmad, the sons of al-Ḥarashī. The forces of the latter became overcome by apprehension[347] and faintheartedness; their hearts were filled with fear and terror, so that they turned back in defeat, turning aside for nothing, without anyone encountering them until they reached Baghdad. The country having become open to him, Ṭāhir advanced, passing[348] town by town and district by district, until he encamped in one of the villages near Ḥulwān, called Shalāshān. He dug a trench there, fortified his camp, and gathered his forces around him.

One of the Abnā', elegizing 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Abnāwī, said:

Verily, eyes are weeping only for a horseman who banished shame from himself with swords and spear shafts.
When the dust of death[349] cleared away, revealing the surface of his face, he had attained the highest glory and made it his own.

---

346. This was a defensive position used by infantry being attacked by cavalry.

347. Ed. Cairo reads, "weakness."

348. Ed. Cairo reads, "taking," which is also the reading of the parallel texts in Ibn al-Athīr and Fragmenta.

349. Ghubār al-mawt can be interpreted in a number of ways. Because dust is a frequent attribute of battles in Arabic poetry, it could mean "the death-bringing dust of battle." Because ghubār can be a synonym for ghubrah, "dusty color," the phrase could also mean "the dusty color or paleness of death."

He was a young man who, as long as he was close to manliness, cared not whether this afflicted the citadel of his soul or scattered his wealth;
One who made for spearheads a marketplace,[350] and who did not fear appointed death when it drew near.

Various Items of Information

In this year, the governor of Mecca and Medina for Muḥammad b. Hārun was Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās. It was he who led the pilgrimage in this year and in the two years preceding—193 and 194. Al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā al-Hādī was governor of al-Kūfah for Muḥammad. Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī was governor of al-Baṣrah for Muḥammad. [833] Al-Ma'mūn was in Khurāsān; his brother Muḥammad was in Baghdad.[351]

---

350. The word sūq ("market") is frequent in military metaphors. Al-Zamakhsharī, Asās al-Balāghah, 314, explains the phrase sūq al-ḥarb ("the war's marketplace") as "the thick of the battle and its center." In other words, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was always in the place where the spears were thickest.

351. Cf. Yaʿqūbī, II, 532–33 for additional reports for this year, especially two pro-Ma'mun disturbances, one in the Sawād of Iraq, the other among the Abnāʾ in al-Ḥarbiyyah quarter of Baghdad. Yaʿqūbī also has a report of trouble in Egypt when al-Amīn's governor there omitted al-Ma'mūn's name as heir from the oath of allegiance.

The Events of the Year 196

(SEPTEMBER 23, 811–SEPTEMBER 11, 812)

Among the events taking place this year was Muḥammad b. Hārūn's imprisonment of Asad b. Yazīd b. Mazyad and his dispatching of Aḥmad b. Mazyad and ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah to Ḥulwān to fight Ṭāhir.

Al-Amīn Imprisons Asad b. Yazīd and Dispatches Aḥmad b. Mazyad to Fight Ṭāhir

According to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Waththāb: Asad b. Yazīd b. Mazyad related to him that al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ had sent to him after the death of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Abnāwī.[352] [Asad b. Yazīd continued,] saying: So I came to him. When I went in to him, I found him sitting in the courtyard of his house, with a piece of paper he had read in his hand. His eyes were red, and he was very angry. He was saying, "He sleeps like a polecat, [and he wakes up like a wolf whose only concern is its belly and that tries to deceive the herdsman, while the dogs lie in wait for it.][353] He does not consider how happiness comes to an end, 352. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 174; Fragmenta, 327.

353. The bracketed words are restored from ed. Cairo. A line of text has dropped out of the manuscript used by ed. Leiden.

and he does not set his mind on carrying out a plan or strategy. His cup diverts him; his goblet distracts him. He runs after his pleasure, while the days approach stealthily[354] for his destruction. 'Abdallāh already has set to work to deal with him. He has notched for him his most accurate arrow, to hit him, despite the remoteness of his dwelling, with a lethal blow that penetrates, with death that strikes home. He has marshalled doom for him on horseback and has hung tribulation for him on spearheads and sword blades." Then he exclaimed, "Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return!"[355] and quoted from the poetry of al-Ba'īth:[356]

I remember a slender girl, tight-knit as a rein, bashful, with curly hair and a beautiful face;
With a mouth clear-colored and sweet-tasting—on account of it, the darkness brightens when she smiles—
With breasts like two [perfume] boxes, a stomach lean and slender, and beauty[357] whose fire burns vehemently. [834]
I sported with her the longest night of the year, Ibn Khālid,[358] while at Marw al-Rūdh[359] in anger you abstain from sin.[360]
I keep speaking tenderly to her, while under Ibn Khālid
Umayyah is a strong [horse] with large flanks.
Charging against cavalry in many an attack has made it lean;
it has a cheek by which spearheads resound.

---

354. Ed. Cairo: "while the days hasten."

355. Qur'ān 2:156, traditionally said in times of misfortune.

356. Al-Ba'īth (Khidāsh b. Bishr b. Khālid al-Mujāshi'ī) was a poet and orator of the tribe of Tamīm who died ca. 134/751 in al-Baṣrah. He was involved in exchanges of satires with the poet Jarīr. See Sezgin, GAS, II, 363–64; *EI*² s.v. al-Ba'īth (Pellat). The text of the poem in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 174, contains some variants.

357. Reading juhr, the emendation proposed in the Leiden note. The manuscripts and Ibn al-Athīr (followed by the Cairo edition) read jahm, "a frowning, or austere look."

358. This may refer to Umayyah (b. 'Abdallāh) b. Khālid b. Asīd, a member of the Umayyad family who served as governor of Khurāsān under 'Abd al-Malik between 74/693 and 78/697.

359. Marw al-Rūdh (Marv-ar-Rūd, Marrūd), called Upper or Little Marv to distinguish it from the larger city of Marw, was located about 160 miles south of its namesake on the same river, the Murghāb, in the province of Khurāsān. See Le Strange, Lands, 404.

360. Following ed. Cairo's wa-anta ("while you"); ed. Leiden reads 'alayya ("against me").

He battles Ibn Khāqān's Turks by night, not wavering until dawn becomes visible.
The next day from the long chase his body is emaciated; but I in the morning devote myself to pleasure.
[Early in the morning I take something that is ruddy, whose odor is like musk;
when you sniff it in its jug it has a sweet fragrance.][361]
What a difference there is between me and Ibn Khālid
Umayyah in the sustenance that God allots!

Then he turned to me and said, "Abū al-Ḥārith,[362] you and I are running toward a goal such that if we fail to reach it, we shall be blamed; yet if we exert ourselves to attain it, we shall be cut off. We are branches from a [single] root: if it thrives, we thrive; if it weakens, we weaken. This fellow[363] has abandoned himself to fate like a foolish slave girl. He takes counsel with women and pursues dreams. The pleasure seekers and reckless men who are with him have gained his ear. They promise him [835] victory and make him expect a good outcome, while destruction is coming toward him faster than a torrent toward a sandy plain. I fear, by God, that we shall perish when he perishes and be destroyed when he is destroyed. You are the outstanding horseman of the Arabs and the son of their outstanding horseman.[364] He has turned to you to confront this man. Two things on your part have given him hope: one is the sincerity of your obedience and the merit of your advice; the other is the good fortune that attends on your counsel and the firmness of your courage. He has commanded me to remove any excuse you might have and give you whatever you desire, although moderation is the beginning of good counsel and the key to good fortune and blessing. So take whatever you need, and hasten quickly toward your enemy. I hope that God will grant you the honor of this victory and that through you He will set in order the muddled affairs of this caliphate and dynasty (dawlah)."

361. The bracketed line, which refers to wine, is found only in ed. Cairo and in the parallel text in Ibn al-Athīr.

362. "Abū al-Ḥārith" is the kunyah (agnomen) of Asad b. Yazīd.

363. That is, al-Amīn. The Arabic implies contempt.

364. See note 38.

I said, "I will be bold to obey the Commander of the Faithful, may God strengthen him, and to obey you, and eager to do everything that will bring weakness and humiliation upon his enemy and your enemy. However, a warrior does not act without preparation, nor does he begin his business with inadequacy and deficiency. There can be no warrior without soldiers, and there can be no soldiers without money. The Commander of the Faithful—may God strengthen him—has filled the hands of his soldiers who are present in the camp [sc. at Baghdad]; he has continually given them ample salaries and generous gifts and benefits. If I lead my men forth while their hearts are fixed on their brethren who remain behind, they will be of no use to me in confronting him who is in front of me. Indeed, he has preferred men [of peace][365] to men of war; he has elevated men of repose above men of exertion and toil. What I ask is that a year's salary be ordered for my men and that salaries for a year be carried with them. He should give extra salary (khāṣṣah) to those men of ability and valor among them who do not have it now. I will replace those among them who are chronically ill or weak and give horses to a thousand of the men who are with me. I will not be asked to give an account of the cities and districts I have captured for myself." "You have demanded a great deal," he said. "The matter must [836] be discussed with the Commander of the Faithful." Then he mounted, and I rode with him. He went in to Muḥammad before me and announced me; then I was given admittance and entered. Scarcely had two words been exchanged between us before (Muḥammad) became angry and ordered me to be imprisoned.

According to one of Muḥammad's courtiers (khāṣṣah): Asad said to Muḥammad, "Give me the two sons of ʿAbdallāh al-Ma'mūn, to be prisoners in my hands. If he gives me obedience and submits to me, [well and good]; if not, I will deal with them according to my judgment and carry out my command upon them." (Muḥammad) replied, "You are a mad Bedouin![366]

365. The words in brackets are from ed. Cairo.

366. Aʿrābī means a Bedouin, as opposed to a sedentary Arab, but as ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CCCLV, notes, it often is used abusively ("rustic"). Cf.

I call upon you to lead the Arabs and the Persians; I assign you the tax revenue of the districts of al-Jibāl province as far as Khurāsān; I raise your rank above your peers among the sons of military commanders and kings—and you call upon me to kill my children and spill the blood of my family! Truly, this is folly and insanity!" Two of the sons of 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn were in Baghdad. They were with their mother, Umm 'Īsā, the daughter of Mūsā al-Hādī, living in al-Ma'mūn's palace in Baghdad. When al-Ma'mūn gained control of Baghdad, they went out with their mother to join him in Khurāsān, where they remained until they [all] came to Baghdad. They were his oldest sons.

According to Ziyād b. 'Alī, who said: When Muḥammad became angry with Asad b. Yazīd and ordered his imprisonment, he said, "Is there among the family of this man anyone who can take his place? For I do not want to render them disaffected, given their priority in service[367] and their past obedience and loyalty." He was told, "Yes, among them there is Aḥmad b. Mazyad.[368] He is the best of them in manner of conduct and the soundest of them in intention to obey. In addition to this, he possesses strength, valor, and skill in managing soldiers and confronting battles." So Muḥammad sent a post rider to him to command him to come to him.

According to Bakr b. Aḥmad, who said: Aḥmad was heading toward a village called Isḥāqiyyah. With him were a group of [837] his family members, his mawālī, and his entourage. After he had crossed the Abān River,[369] he heard the voice of the post rider in the middle of the night. "This is very strange," he said, "a post rider at a time like this and a place like this! Surely, he is about some business."[370] Presently, the post rider halted and

---

Ṭabarī, II, 590: mā ahlu Makkata illā a'rāb ("The people of Mecca are nothing but rustics").

367. That is, the early attachment of their family to the 'Abbāsids.

368. Aḥmad b. Mazyad was the uncle of Asad b. Yazīd b. Mazyad.

369. The Abān or Bān River was one of the watercourses through which the Tigris flowed into the Great Swamp between Wāsiṭ and al-Baṣrah in southern Iraq. See Le Strange, Lands, 40–41.

370. The translation follows the emendation proposed by ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXV. The earlier emendation proposed by ed. Leiden and followed by ed. Cairo was, "Surely, this business is strange."

called to the boatman, "Is Aḥmad b. Mazyad with you?" "Yes," he said. So the rider dismounted and handed him Muḥammad's letter. Aḥmad read it; then he said, "I have reached my estate—between me and it there is only a mile.[371] Let me visit it and give what orders I wish to give concerning it. I will come with you tomorrow morning." "No," he replied, "the Commander of the Faithful commanded me not to let you delay or allow you to rest, but to make you set out at whatever hour of night or day I met with you." So Aḥmad went back with him. When he reached al-Kūfah, he stayed there for a day, until he had outfitted himself and had taken provisions for the journey; then he went to Muḥammad.

According to Aḥmad [b. Mazyad], who said: When I entered Baghdad, I went first to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'. I said, "I will greet him and make use of his position and influence with Muḥammad." Having been given admittance, I went in to him. With him was 'Abdallāh b. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah, whom he was trying to induce to go to [fight] Ṭāhir. 'Abdallāh was making large demands upon him for money and men. When [al-Faḍl] saw me, he greeted me and took me by the hand. Then he led me up until he had brought me with him onto the elevated part of the sitting room. He turned toward 'Abdallāh, jesting and joking with him. With a smile on his face, he said:

I tell you, when your cord became frayed,[372] we found a mother and a father from the tribe of Shaybān instead of you.[373]
If one were to count the stones, the Shaybānīs would be even more numerous; and they are more closely related to us than you.

'Abdallāh replied, "They are indeed so. By them the breach [838] will be filled, the enemy defeated, and obedient subjects de-

371. An Arabic mile (mīl) was one-third of a farsakh, or about 2 km (1.08 miles). See Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 63.

372. The frayed tent rope is a metaphor for a relationship or obligation that is weakening or unraveling.

373. Asad b. Yazīd b. Mazyad and Aḥmad b. Mazyad were from the tribe of Shaybān. See Crone, Slaves on Horses, 169–70. A pun may be involved: dūnakum ("instead of you") may also mean "cheaper than you."

fended from the violence of rebels." Al-Faḍl then turned toward me and said, "The Commander of the Faithful mentioned you; so I described you to him as being very obedient, excellent in counsel, severe against rebels, and outstanding in judgment. He therefore has decided to choose you for a mission and make your name famous. He will raise you to a rank that no member of your family has ever attained." He turned to his servant and said, "Saddler, order my horses!" Horses were saddled for him without delay; he went, and I went with him. When we went in to Muḥammad, he was in the courtyard of his residence, with a cloak.[374] He kept ordering me to come closer, until I was almost touching him. He said, "Your nephew's confused ideas and bad manners became too much for me. His contrariness went on too long for me. Finally it alienated me from him and engendered suspicion about him in my heart. By his misconduct and disobedience he caused me to impose on him such correction and imprisonment as I did not wish to impose on him. But you have been described to me as a fine man, and a good character has been imputed to you; so I have decided to raise your status, exalt your rank, and give you precedence over the other members of your family. I will put you in charge of making war on this miscreant, perfidious company of men, and I will give you pay and reward for encountering them in battle. Consider how you will act. Make firm your intention, and help the Commander of the Faithful according to your goodness. Make him rejoice over his enemy, and your joy and honor shall be abundant." I replied, "In obedience to the Commander of the Faithful—may God strengthen him!—I will give my heart's blood. In making war on his enemy, I will accomplish the best he has hoped from me and the strength and skill he expects from me, God willing."

Muḥammad said, "Faḍl!" "At your service, Commander of the Faithful," he replied. "Give him," he said, "the registers [839] of Asad's men, and attach to him the men of al-Jazīrah and the Bedouin Arabs who are present in the camp." [To me] he said, "Hurry about your business, and hasten your journey toward him." I went out, selected the men, and reviewed the registers. The number of men whose names I certified came to 20,000. Then I set out for Ḥulwān with them.

374. Lahu sāj "with, i.e., wearing a cloak," is problematic. See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CCC.

It has been mentioned that when Aḥmad b. Mazyad was about to depart, he went before Muḥammad and said, "Give me your charge—may God bestow honor upon the Commander of the Faithful!" Muḥammad said, "I commend a number of good traits to you. Beware of envy, for envy is the shackle of aid [from God].[375] Take no step forward without asking God's blessing. Unsheathe the sword only after doing what excuses.[376] If you can accomplish something by mildness, do not go beyond it to roughness and sharpness.[377] Be a good companion to the regular soldiers (jund) who are with you. Inform me of your news every day. Do not endanger yourself in the pursuit of favor with me, and do not bestir yourself in anything that you fear may redound to my disadvantage. Be a sincere brother and good comrade to 'Abdallāh [b. Ḥumayd]; do your best to join with him, accompany him, and be on good terms with him.[378] Do not let him down, if you asks you for help; do not delay, if he calls on you to aid. Let your hands be one and your word be in agreement." Then he said, "Ask for what you need, and set out as soon as possible toward your enemy." Aḥmad invoked blessings upon him and said, "Pray often for me. Do not believe what the envious say about me. Do not reject me before learning where my foot stands for you, [and do not contravene my considered judgment. Grant me the pardon of my nephew." "It is granted to you," he said.][379] He then sent to Asad, loosed his bonds, and

375. The expression is proverbial. From an original sense of "strong desire," the word baghy developed the negative connotation of "desiring that someone else's happiness be transferred to oneself," and then the even more negative meaning of "acting wrongfully, injuriously, or tyrannically." See Lane, Lexicon, I, 231.

376. That is, only after giving a warning. Cf. the proverbial expression, a'dhara man andhara, "He who warns has an excuse," i.e., cannot be blamed for his action. See Lane, Lexicon, V, 1983–84.

377. Reading shirrah ("evil, inordinate desire, sharpness, anger") with ed. Cairo, rather than ed. Leiden's sharah ("vehement desire, greed").

378. That is, do not allow friction to develop between your Bedouin troops and 'Abdallāh b. Ḥumayd's regular troops (Abnā') from Baghdad.

379. The translation follows the longer text of ed. Cairo. In place of the words in brackets, ed. Leiden reads, "Send to Asad, loose his bonds, and set him free."

set him free. [Praising Aḥmad, and mentioning his condition and rank,][380] Abū al-Asad al-Shaybānī[381] said concerning this:

Let the decision of his imām give joy to Abū al-ʿAbbās;
what he has in mind concerning him is the bestowing of more and more.
The Commander of the Faithful summoned him to a thing from which the shadow of every pillar[382] falls short.
He hastened to do it with judgment, resolution, and skill:
the judgment of Abū al-ʿAbbās is strong and true.
[840] You rose to a task that [other] men could not shoulder, and you [shouldered it] with ready success and good fortune.
You thereby restored to the seekers the person most dear to them:
one who is like you links newly acquired with inherited honor.
He saved Asad from the constraint and pain of shackles, and to him he was as kind as Yazīd.[383]
He fetched him out like an enormous lion, the sire of cubs, with brawny arms, and tall of stature.

According to Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith: Muḥammad [al-Amīn] dispatched Aḥmad b. Mazyad with 20,000 men of the Bedouin Arabs, and ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah with 20,000 men of the Abnāʾ. He commanded the two of them to encamp at Ḥulwān and repel Ṭāhir and his forces from it. If Ṭāhir stayed at Shalāshān, they were to head toward him with their forces, so as to push him back and make war on him. He also charged them to maintain unity, be on friendly terms with each other, and love one another in obedience [to him].

The two of them set out and encamped near Ḥulwān, at a 380. The text in brackets is from ed. Cairo.

381. See Aghānī, XII, 174–79 [ed. Cairo, XIV, 5005–15] for a biography of this poet, whose full name was Abū al-Asad Nubātah b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥimmānī al-Shaybānī.

382. ʿAmīd ("pillar, stay") also means "a person on whom one relies," and hence, "military commander." In modern Arabic the word means "brigadier general."

383. That is, he was like a father to his nephew Asad b. Yazīd.

place called Khāniqīn.[384] Ṭāhir stayed in place and entrenched himself and his forces. He smuggled spies and scouts into the camps of the two men; these brought false rumors to the men and told them that Muḥammad had assigned military pay ('aṭā') to his companions and had commanded such and such salaries (arzāq) for them. Ṭāhir kept working surreptitiously to stir up dissent and sedition among the men. Finally, they fell out with each other, and their affairs became disorganized. They fought each other, evacuated Khāniqīn, and retreated without having encountered Ṭāhir and without any fighting having transpired between them and him. Ṭāhir advanced and encamped at Ḥulwān. Having entered Ḥulwān, Ṭāhir remained only a short time, until Harthamah b. A'yan brought him a letter from al-Ma'mūn and al-Faḍl b. Sahl, commanding him to hand over to him the cities and districts he had taken and go to al-Ahwāz.[385] Ṭāhir handed them over to him. Harthamah established himself in Ḥulwān and fortified it. He placed his garrisons and observation posts on its roads and its mountains. Ṭāhir went to al-Ahwāz. [841]

Al-Ma'mūn Raises the Rank of al-Faḍl b. Sahl

In this year, al-Ma'mūn raised the rank and standing of al-Faḍl b. Sahl.[386]

It has been mentioned: After al-Ma'mūn received the news that Ṭāhir had killed 'Alī b. 'Īsā and had seized his camp and that he had named him "Commander of the Faithful"; when, furthermore, al-Faḍl b. Sahl saluted him with this title; and when he became convinced that the report about Ṭāhir's having killed 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jabalah al-Abnāwī and overcome his army was true, he summoned al-Faḍl b. Sahl and in Rajab[387] of this year gave him the governance of the East, from 384. Khāniqīn, on the Khurāsān road, was six farsakhs (22.3 miles) before Qaṣr Shīrīn, which in turn was six farsakhs before Ḥulwān. See Le Strange, Lands, p. 62; *EI*² s.v. Khāniḳīn (Schwarz).

385. Al-Ahwāz was a city in Khūzistān, about 260 miles southeast of Ḥulwān and about 70 miles northeast of al-Baṣrah. See *EI*² s.v. (Lockhart).

386. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 177; Fragmenta, 327–28.

387. That is, between March 18 and April 16, 812.

the mountains of Hamadhān to the mountains of Siqīnān[388] and Tibet in longitude, and from the Sea of Persia and India to the Sea of Daylam and Jurjān[389] in latitude. He gave him a salary ('umālah) of 3 million dirhams. He bound his banner on a two-pronged spearhead, gave him a flag, and named him "Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn."[390]

Someone has mentioned that he saw his sword at the house of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl. On one side it was inscribed in silver, Ri'āsat al-Ḥarb ("Leadership of War"), and on the other side, Ri'āsat al-Tadbīr ("Leadership of Administration"). 'Alī b. Hishām carried the banner; Nu'aym b. Ḥāzim carried the flag. He appointed al-Ḥasan b. Sahl to be in charge of the tax bureau (dīwān al-kharāj).

'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ Appointed Governor of Syria

In this year, Muḥammad b. Hārūn appointed 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī[391] to be in charge of Syria and commanded him to travel there. He recruited soldiers for him from its inhabitants

---

388. Siqīnān is the Leiden editor's conjectural emendation for the manuscript's Sufyān. Ed. Cairo reads Siqīnān, but does not say whether Ms. A confirms this reading. The Leiden editor based his emendation on De Goeje's edition of al-Istakhrī's Kitāb Masālik al-mamālik, 290. De Goeje originally read this Central Asiatic place-name as al-Safīnah, but in the glossary and addenda volume (p. 426) he corrected the reading to al-Saqīnah, citing an 1873 article on Central Asiatic place-names preserved in a contemporary Chinese travel account (H. Yule, "Notes on Hwen Thsang's Account of the Principalities of Tokháristán," 92–120). Yule connected the Chinese form Shikhini with the Arabic Shighnān. De Goeje apparently thought that Siqīnān was an alternate form of the same name. In any case, a mountainous area on the upper headwaters of the Oxus River seems to fit the context as the northeastern boundary of the area assigned to al-Faḍl b. Sahl.

389. I.e., the Caspian Sea. Jurjān was the province and city of the same name at the southeastern corner of the Caspian Sea (approximately the modern Iranian province of Astarābād). See Le Strange, Lands, 376–81; EI[2] s.v. Gurgān (Hartmann).

390. See note 56.

391. 'Abd al-Malik's father was an uncle of al-Manṣūr. 'Abd al-Malik had been imprisoned by al-Rashīd at the time of the fall of the Barmakids, but was released by al-Amīn after al-Rashīd's death. Cf. Ṭabarī, III, 692; Ya'qūbī, II, 526–27; Ibn al-Athīr, 177–79; Fragmenta, 327; Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 372. For a history of this branch of the 'Abbāsid family and its power in Syria, see Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 74–75, 142.

to fight Ṭāhir and Harthamah. A report of the reason for this appointment follows.

According to Dāwūd b. Sulaymān: After Ṭāhir had become strong, after his cause had advanced, and after he had defeated those of Muḥammad's commanders and armies that he de- [842] feated, ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ came before Muḥammad. ʿAbd al-Malik had been imprisoned in al-Rashīd's prison. After al-Rashīd died and Muḥammad succeeded to power, the latter commanded that ʿAbd al-Malik should be released. This took place in Dhū al-Qaʿdah 193.[392] ʿAbd al-Malik felt grateful to Muḥammad for this and considered it his obligation to obey him and give him sincere advice in return. So he said, "Commander of the Faithful, I see that the people have become emboldened against you. The men of the two armies have acted in this way. You have given free rein to your generosity. If you keep doing this, you will make them unruly and insolent; and if you stop giving and being generous, you will irritate and anger them. One does not retain soldiers by economizing; on the other hand, fiscal stability cannot last in the face of expenditure and extravagance. Furthermore, the defeats have frightened your army. Fighting and battles have unnerved and weakened them, and their hearts have become filled with awe of their enemy and aversion to meeting them and fighting them. If you send them against Ṭāhir, he with his few troops will overcome their large numbers; with his strength of resolve, he will defeat their weak loyalty and resolve. The Syrians, on the other hand, are men tested in war and disciplined by hardships. Most of them are submissive to me and quick to obey me. If the Commander of the Faithful dispatches me, I will get him an army of them who will do great damage to his enemy and through whom God will aid His friends and the people who obey Him."

Muḥammad said, "I will put you in charge of them and strengthen you with whatever money and equipment you ask. Set out as soon as possible. With your judgment and insight, act so that the effect of the action will become apparent and its benefit will be praised, God willing!" He put him in charge of Syria and al-Jazīrah and strongly urged him to depart. He sent with him a garrison (kanaf) of soldiers and Abnā'.

392. That is, between August 16 and September 14, 809.

'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ Recruits Troops in Syria for al-Amīn

In this year, 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ traveled to Syria. When he reached al-Raqqah, he established himself there. [He dispatched his messengers and letters to the heads of the armies of the Syrians, saying that men should be assembled there and Muḥammad should be supplied with them for the war against [843] Ṭāhir.][393] A report of this follows. (I have already mentioned the reasons why Muḥammad sent him to do this.)

According to Dāwūd b. Sulaymān: When 'Abd al-Malik reached al-Raqqah, he dispatched his messengers and wrote to the heads of the armies of Syria and the chiefs of al-Jazīrah. There remained not one of them of whom hopes were entertained and whose valor and ability were commended to whom he did not make promises and whose hopes and expectations he did not enlarge. So they came to him chief after chief and group after group. Whenever anyone came before him, he would give him a gift, bestow a robe of honor upon him, and give him a horse. So the people of Syria—Zawāqīl[394] and Bedouin Arabs—came to him from every direction. They assembled in his presence until they became very numerous. Then someone from the army of the people of Khurāsān[395] sighted a horse that had been taken from him at the battle of Sulaymān b. Abī

393. The bracketed text is from ed. Cairo.

394. Ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CCLXXVIII, wrongly suggests the translation, "non-Arab soldiers of Syria and Mesopotamia," for Zawāqīl. Note the unambiguously Arab (Qaysi) names of the three Zawāqīl leaders mentioned on p. 108, below: Naṣr b. Shabath [al-'Uqaylī], 'Amr al-Sulamī, and al-'Abbās b. Zufar. According to Ibn Durayd (quoted in Lisān al-'Arab), Zawāqīl was the name of a tribe in and adjacent to al-Jazīrah. The Leiden glossary quotes this passage and adds (on the authority of al-Jāḥiẓ), "they seem not to have been of good reputation, because highwaymen were designated by the same name." The Zawāqīl were probably a group of Qaysī tribesmen known for brigandage. See discussions in Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 143; Ayalon, The Military Reforms of Caliph al-Mu'taṣim, 18–20.

395. That is, from the Abnā' who had come from Baghdad; they were of Khurāsānian origin.

Ja'far[396] being ridden by one of the Zawāqīl. He pursued[397] it, and a quarrel ensued between the two men. A group of Zawāqīl and [Khurāsānian] soldiers gathered. They joined battle. Each group helped its man. They clashed and fought hand to hand. The Abnā' consulted with each other and assembled before Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid.[398] "You are our shaykh," they said, "our chief and our hero. You have seen how the Zawāqīl have treated us. Unite us; or else they will despise us, embolden themselves against us, and behave like this every day." He replied, "I am not going to get into a fight or be present with you in such a situation." The Abnā' then prepared themselves and made ready. They took the Zawāqīl by surprise, attacked them with swords, killed large numbers of them, and slaughtered them in their dwellings. The Zawāqīl assembled, mounted their horses, and girded on their swords. A battle broke out between them. Word of this reached 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ. He sent a messenger to them, commanding them to stop and lay down their arms, but they threw stones at him. They fought fiercely all day, and the Abnā' killed many of [844] the Zawāqīl. When 'Abd al-Malik, who was seriously ill, was told of the large number who had been killed, he struck his hands together and said, "Oh my humiliation! The Arabs are being mistreated in their own dwelling, their own place, and their own land."

The Abnā' who had held back from the violence became 396. This does not refer to the Battle of Fakhkh (169/786), at which al-Manṣūr's son, Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far, put down an 'Alid revolt at Mecca (cf. Ṭabarī, III, 551–68), which would make the horse over thirty years old! The chronicle of Michael the Syrian records that soon after his accession, al-Amīn sent Sulaymān b. al-Manṣūr to govern Ḥimṣ, Damascus, and Palestine, but that his forces were badly defeated by a certain rebel named 'Amr and returned covered with shame to Baghdad. The same chronicle mentions that the fighting on this later occasion broke out when a "Persian" (i.e., a soldier from the regular army sent from Baghdad) saw one of the "Ṭaiyayê" (Bedouins) passing Callinice (al-Raqqah) riding a horse "that had belonged to his father, who had been killed by the Ṭaiyayê at Saroug." This makes it clear that the reference here is to Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far's activity in Syria no more than three years earlier, not to the battle of Fakhkh. See Michel le Syrien, Chronique, III, 21–22, 26.

397. Ta'allaqa bihā could also mean "he grabbed hold of it."

398. On Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid al-Marwazī, see Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 105, 144–45.

angry. The situation worsened. Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān led the Abnāʾ. The next morning, the Zawāqīl gathered in al-Raqqah; the Abnāʾ and Khurāsānians gathered in al-Rāfiqah.[399] One of the men of Ḥimṣ[400] stood up and said, "People of Ḥimṣ, flight is a lesser evil than destruction, and death is a lesser evil than humiliation.[401] You have gone far from your lands and have left your regions, seeking abundance after having experienced dearth, and esteem after having been despised—and now you have fallen into disaster and dismounted in the place where death rages most fiercely! Death is in the moustaches and the high hats of the black-robed ones.[402] To arms! To arms!—before the way is cut off, and trouble alights; before the time of seeking passes, and the way of departure becomes difficult; before action becomes impossible, and the appointed time draws near!"[403] A man from [the tribe of] Kalb stood up in the stirrups of his camel and recited:[404]

A war so vehement that whoever suffers it comes to grief!
A war whose horsemen have leveled their spear shafts!
God has brought a blaze—the blaze of war!
If Kalb plunges into it, He will cover them with shame!

Then he said, "Men of Kalb, it is the black banner![405] By God, it has never turned back or turned aside. Its upholder[406] has never submitted, and its keeper has never become weak. You know the blows that the Khurāsānians' swords have inflicted on your 399. Al-Rāfiqah ("the Companion") was the new garrison town built on the outskirts of al-Raqqah by the caliph al-Manṣūr in 155/772. See Le Strange, Lands, 101–2.

400. The men from Ḥimṣ, identified later as belonging to the tribe of Kalb, are a group separate from the Zawāqīl (Qays). See Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 143.

401. The meaning seems to be "death from famine" is better than humiliation.

402. That is, the partisans of the ʿAbbāsids, who wore black as their color. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. musawwid. On the high hat (qalansuwah), see note 482.

403. The end of the speech is in rhymed prose (sajʿ), suggesting the gravity of the speaker's words and his excitement.

404. The meter is rajaz, often used for such spontaneous battlefield poems.

405. Black was the color of the ʿAbbāsids.

406. Reading, with ed. Cairo, nāṣiruhā, instead of ed. Leiden, naṣruhā ("its help, victory").

necks and the marks of their spears on your breasts. Withdraw from evil, before it grows great; pass it by, before it flames up. To Syria! [To Syria!][407] To your home! To your home! A Palestinian death is better than a life in al-Jazīrah.[408] I for one [845] am going back. Whoever wants to depart, let him depart with me." So he went, and most of the Syrians went with him.

The Zawāqīl went and burned most of the fodder that the merchants had gathered. Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān with a group of Khurāsānian troops stayed at the gate of al-Rāfiqah for fear of Ṭawq b. Mālik. A man from the Banū Taghlib went to Ṭawq and said, "Don't you see what the Arabs have suffered at the hands of these men? Arise! You are not the kind of man to hold back from this affair. The people of al-Jazīrah have turned their eyes to you. They hope for your help and assistance." Ṭawq replied, "By God, I do not belong to al-Jazīrah's Qays or to its Yemen.[409] I was not involved in the beginning of this affair, that I should be present to witness its end! I care too much for my men and my people to expose them to death on account of these fools from the army and ignorant men from Qays. I see safety only in keeping clear."

Naṣr b. Shabath [al-ʿUqaylī][410] came with the Zawāqīl. He was riding a chestnut horse with a blaze on its forehead and was wearing a black tunic (durrāʿah) that he had tied behind his back. In his hand he had a spear and shield, and he was reciting:

Horsemen of Qays, be steadfast unto death!
[My soul],[411] do not frighten me away from meeting sudden death.

---

407. The second "Syria" is supplied from ed. Cairo. One must understand an imperative or hortatory verb, such as "let us go toward," or "take care for."

408. After the preceding reference to abundance and dearth, the intention seems to be, "Death by starvation in Palestine is better than a livelihood in al-Jazīrah."

409. Qays and Kalb (or Yemen) were the two parties into which the Bedouins of al-Jazīrah were divided.

410. His full name is given in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 179.

411. The verbs in this line and the next are in the feminine. They must be understood as addressed to something feminine, such as yā nafsī, "O my soul." Ed. Cairo incorrectly vocalizes the verb in the second line as turhibunī ("you [m. sg.] do not frighten me"), which is metrically impossible. The vocalization of ed. Leiden (turhibinnī, second energetic mood) is correct.

Cease hoping[412] with [thoughts of] "it might be" and "would that it were."

He and his companions then attacked. He fought fiercely, but the army held firm against them, and there was great slaughter among the Zawāqīl. Then the Abnā' made attacks, killing and wounding in each of them. Most of the killing and bravery in that charge were the work of Kathīr b. Qādirah, Abū al-Fīl, and Dāwūd b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā al-Khurāsānī. The Zawāqīl were defeated. Their line of defense that day had been led by Naṣr b. Shabath, 'Amr [b. 'Abd al-'Azīz] al-Sulamī, and al-'Abbās b. Zufar [al-Kilābī].[413]

[846] In this year, 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ died.[414]

In this year, Muḥammad b. Hārūn was deposed and made to swear allegiance to his brother, 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn, in Baghdad.

The Abortive Coup of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān against al-Amīn in Baghdad

In this year, Muḥammad b. Hārūn was imprisoned in the Palace of Abū Ja'far with Umm Ja'far, the daughter of Ja'far b. Abī Ja'far.[415] A report of the reason for this follows.

According to Dāwūd b. Sulaymān: After the death of 'Abd al-Malik b. Ṣāliḥ at al-Raqqah, al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān summoned the army. He put the foot soldiers into boats and had the horsemen mount. He gave them gifts; those who were weak he strengthened and mounted on horses, until he brought them out of the territory of al-Jazīrah. This was in the year 196.

Aḥmad b. 'Abdallāh mentioned that he was one of those present in al-Jazīrah with 'Abd al-Malik when al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī led them back and that this was in Rajab of 196.[416]

---

412. The reading of ed. Cairo (tamannī) is superior to the conjecture of ed. Leiden (taḥannī, "bending, being compassionate").

413. Full names from Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 179.

414. Cf. Ya'qūbī, II, 534, on the anarchy in Syria.

415. Parallels: Ya'qūbī, II, 534; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 179–80; Fragmenta, 328–30.

416. I.e., between March 18 and April 16, 812.

He mentioned that the Abnā' and people of Baghdad met al-Ḥusayn with honor and exaltation. They erected tents for him,[417] and the commanders, chiefs, and nobles (ashrāf) went out to meet him. He entered his home in the highest honor and making a very fine figure.

In the middle of the night, Muḥammad sent to him, commanding him to ride to him. Al-Ḥusayn said to the messenger, "By God, I am not a singer, an evening companion, or a jester. I have not taken charge of any province for him, nor have I collected money for him. Why does he want me at this hour? Go away! When it is morning, I will come early to him, God willing." The messenger went away. In the morning, al-Ḥusayn went to Bāb al-Jisr.[418] Troops gathered around him, and he ordered that the gate leading out to the Palace of 'Abdallāh[419] b. 'Alī should be locked, along with the gate of the Market of Yaḥyā.[420] He said, "Men of the Abnā', God's caliphate gives [847] no license for arrogant behavior, nor do His favors consort with insolence and pride. Muḥammad wants to corrupt the usages of your religion. He would violate [the terms of] your oath of allegiance, break up your unity, and transfer your strength to others. Only yesterday, he was the master of the Zawāqīl! By God, if his term lasts long and he regains strength, the unwholesome consequences of this will return upon you, and the harm and adversity he causes to your dynasty (dawlah) and regime (da'wah) will become evident. Cut off his influence, before he cuts off yours! Bring down his strength, before he brings down yours! By God, none of you has aided him but that he has been abandoned, and no one has protected him but that he has been killed. No one finds indulgence with God, nor does

417. Ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CDX, suggests that the phrase ḍarabū lahu al-qibāb may mean "they decorated the squares in his honor with garlands and wreaths," or "they set up a triumphal arch for him."

418. Gabrieli, on the basis of other indications of location in the passage, locates this Bāb al-Jisr (Bridge Gate) at the end of the second or main bridge over the Tigris. See "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 374 (note 3); but cf. note 326 earlier.

419. Corrected from the manuscript reading 'Ubaydallāh by the editor of ed. Leiden, who suggests that this is the Palace of 'Abdallāh b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān. See ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXV.

420. On the Market of Yaḥyā (Sūq Yaḥyā), see Le Strange, Baghdad, 199–201.

God have regard for him, if he violates his promises and breaks his oaths."

Then he ordered the people to cross the bridge. They crossed it and came to the Khurāsān Gate Road.[421] [Meanwhile, the people of] al-Ḥarbiyyah[422] and the people of the suburbs near the Syrian Gate, [al-Anbār Gate, and the bank of the Ṣarāt Canal near al-Kūfah Gate][423] gathered. Some of Muḥammad's horsemen—Bedouin Arabs and others—hurried to [fight] al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī. They fought fiercely for part of the day. Al-Ḥusayn ordered his commanders and close companions who were with him to dismount. They dismounted to fight their foe with swords and spears, fighting with true valor, and pushing them back until they dispersed from the gate of al-Khuld [Palace].

On Sunday, the 11th of Rajab, 196 [March 28, 812], al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī declared Muḥammad to be deposed and received the oath of allegiance for ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn from the morning of Monday until the evening. On Tuesday, after the battle between al-Ḥusayn and the forces of Muḥammad, al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā al-Hāshimī went early to Muḥammad and seized him. He went in to him and forced him to leave al-Khuld Palace for the Palace of Abū Jaʿfar. There he imprisoned him until [848] the time of the midday prayer. Then al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā seized Umm Jaʿfar and ordered her to leave her palace for the City of Abū Jaʿfar.[424] She refused; so he summoned a chair for her and ordered her to sit on it. He lay about her head with a whip, abused her, and spoke coarsely to her; so she sat in it. Then he gave orders concerning her and she was taken into the city, [to be] with her son and her [other] children.

The next day, the men demanded their pay (arzāq) from al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī and became unruly. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid stood up at the Syrian Gate and said, "Men! By God, I do not know why al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī is acting as if he were our com-

421. That is, the road near the Khurāsān Gate of the Round City. See Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 144.

422. Al-Ḥarbiyyah quarter was located to the northwest of the Round City, beyond the Syrian Gate. It was populated mainly by people who had accompanied the ʿAbbāsids from Khurāsān. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 107ff.

423. The bracketed text is from ed. Cairo.

424. That is, the Round City of Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr.

mander and taking charge of this affair instead of us. He is not the oldest among us, nor the one among us with the greatest claim to honor, nor the highest among us in rank. Among us there are those who will not accept base action and will not be led by deception. I am the first of you to break his compact. I openly rebuke him and condemn his action. Whoever thinks as I do, let him stand aside with me."

Asad al-Ḥarbī stood up and said, "People of al-Ḥarbiyyah, this is a day of great consequence. You have been asleep, and your sleep has lasted a long time. You have lagged behind, and others have been given precedence over you. Some people have taken the position that Muḥammad should be deposed and imprisoned; as for you, go and take the position that he should be released and set free."

Then came an aged shaykh on a horse, one of the "abstainers."[425] He shouted to the men to be quiet, and they did so. He said, "Men, are you assailing Muḥammad because he has cut off your pay?" "No," they said. "Has he fallen short," he said "in what is due to any of you, or your chiefs, or your eminent men?" "We know of no such case," they said. "Has he removed any of your leaders?" he said. "God forbid that he should have done that!" "Then why have you abandoned him," he said, "and helped his enemy oppress him and take him captive? I swear to God, never have people killed their caliph [849] but God has set upon them the power of the slaying sword and violent death. Arise and defend your caliph. Fight against whoever wants to depose and murder him."

[The troops from] al-Ḥarbiyyah arose, and with them arose most of the people of the suburbs, with drawn swords[426] and

425. Abnā' al-kaffiyyah (the original, unamended Leiden reading, which is recommended in Addenda, DCCLXV) is explained thus in ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CDLIV: "In Iraq in Umayyad times, those who, although dissatisfied with the death of 'Uthmān, refrained from taking up arms, saying..., 'Better that you should be 'Abdallāh the slain than 'Abdallāh the murderer,' were called ahl al-kaff. In Khurāsān, this name was given to those who dedicated themselves and their possessions to the cause of the house of the Prophet.... In Ṭabarī, III, 848, they are called al-kaffiyyah, which seems to refer to abstaining from stipends—i.e., that they would accept no stipends." Ed. Cairo prefers Guyard's original emendation: abnā' al-kifāyah, "men of capability, skill, or intelligence."

426. Reading mushahharāt, with ed. Cairo, rather than ed. Leiden's mushtaharāt, "holiday garments."

good equipment. They fought fiercely against al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī and his forces from mid-morning until the rays of the sun grew weak, inflicting many wounds upon his forces. Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī was taken prisoner. Asad al-Ḥarbī went in to Muḥammad, broke his fetters, and seated him in the caliph's seat. Muḥammad noticed some men who were not wearing military or army clothing and who were not carrying weapons; he gave them orders, and they took what they needed from the weapons that were in the storerooms. He made them promises and raised their hopes; as a result the rabble (ghawghāʾ) looted many weapons, silken goods, and other things. Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī was brought, and Muḥammad rebuked him for his disobedience, saying, "Did I not advance your father over people? Did I not give him charge of cavalry troops and fill his hand with money? Did I not give you positions of honor among the people of Khurāsān and raise your ranks above those of other commanders?" "Yes," he replied. "Then how have I deserved your repudiating obedience to me," he asked, "your inciting the people against me, and your urging them to fight me?" Al-Ḥusayn said, "I trust the pardon of the Commander of the Faithful and hope for his forgiveness and favor." (Muḥammad) said, "The Commander of the Faithful hereby does so for you and puts you in charge of avenging yourself[427] and the slain members of your family." He then called for a robe of honor for him and put it on him. He gave him mounts, commanded him to go to Ḥulwān, and put him in charge of whatever was beyond its pass.

[850] According to ʿUthmān b. Saʿīd al-Ṭāʾī, who said: I used to enjoy special favor with al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī. After Muḥammad pardoned him and restored to him his command and rank, I crossed over to him along with the well-wishers. I found him standing at Bāb al-Jisr. I congratulated him and wished him well. Then I said to him, "You have become master of the two armies and the confidant of the Commander of the Faithful. Be thankful for the pardon and forgiveness!" Then I jested and joked with him. I recited some verses to him, saying:

427. Perhaps one should read, "avenging your father," as in Fragmenta, 329, and Ibn al-Jawzī [Leiden note].

They slew him when his perfection had become complete, and he had become renowned for generosity and nobility.
He was bright faced, as if the full moon were the form of his face, when he came walking in a coat of mail.
When the coward's soul was sick with fear and recoiled, he marched forward, with a Mashrifī sword of Indian steel.
He was grave in the council chamber, but impetuous in the fray:
often turning back to fight the foe, not speaking in excess.
Then avenge yourself upon the enemy, for they intentionally have assailed you with a foul and ignoble deed.

He laughed and said, "How eager I am for that, if time helps me, and if I am aided by conquest and victory!" Then he halted at the foot of Bāb al-Jisr.[428] He fled with a group of his servants and mawālī. Muḥammad summoned troops, and they rode in pursuit of him. They overtook him at the Mosque of Kawthar. When he saw the horsemen, he dismounted and tied his horse. He prayed two prostrations and placed himself in a state of dedication.[429] Then he encountered them, charging at them, driving them back with each charge, and killing some of them. Then his horse stumbled and he fell off. The people hastened [851] to strike him with spears and swords, and they took his head. Concerning this, ʿAlī b. Jabalah (some say al-Khuraymī) said:[430]

Yea, may God assail those who disbelieved in Him, and took[431] the head of Ḥusayn al-Harthamī.
In him they brought down a firm spear [of a man], with a Yemeni sword and Rudayni spear.

---

428. The fuller text in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 181, is probably original and may have been shortened in the Ṭabarī manuscript by a copyist's error (homoioteleuton): "People were congratulating him. When the people departed from him, he cut the bridge and fled."

429. The Arabic taḥarrama can mean either to assume the simple garment (iḥrām) of a pilgrim, or to pronounce the words Allāhu akbar ("God is most great!"). The latter seems appropriate here as a preparation for death.

430. ʿAlī b. Jabalah al-ʿAkawwak (160/776–213/828) was a poet of Khurāsānian origins active in Baghdad. See Sezgin, GAS, II, 572–74; EI^{2} s.v. al-ʿAkawwak (Blachère). On al-Khuraymī (corrected from manuscript al-Khuzaymī), see note 462.

431. The translation follows ed. Cairo, fāzū, rather than ed. Leiden, fādaw ("they ransomed").

In opposition to right he expected honor and authority, but his desire brought him only the boot of Ḥunayn to wear.[432]

It has been said: When Muḥammad pardoned al-Ḥusayn, he appointed him vizier and gave him his ring.

Al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān was killed on the middle day of Rajab of this year,[433] in the Mosque of Kawthar, one farsakh from Baghdad on the road to Nahr Bīn.[434] Allegiance was renewed to Muḥammad on Friday, the 16th of Rajab of this year (April 2, 812). Al-Ḥusayn's imprisonment of Muḥammad in the Palace of Abū Jaʿfar had lasted two days. During the night in which Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī was killed, al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ fled.

The Death of Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Muhallabī and Ṭāhir's Entry into al-Ahwāz

During this year, Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, when Harthamah had come to him, went from Ḥulwān to al-Ahwāz and killed Muḥammad's governor of the city, Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Muhallabī.[435] This happened after Ṭāhir sent armies ahead of himself toward the city, and before he himself set out toward him to fight him. A report of this follows.

[852] According to Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith, who said: After Ṭāhir had encamped at Shalāshān, he dispatched al-Ḥusayn b. ʿUmar al-Rustumī to al-Ahwāz. He commanded him to travel at a moderate pace: he was not to travel without sending out scout-

---

432. "Coming back wearing the boots of Ḥunayn" was a proverbial expression for coming back empty-handed or not achieving one's hopes. The source of the proverb is explained in Lane, Lexicon, II, 770.

433. I.e., the fifteenth day of the month, April 1, 812.

434. The Bīn Canal (Nahr Bīn) was a subsidiary canal east of Baghdad. It left the main Nahrawān Canal a short distance above the town of Nahrawān and flowed into the Tigris about 2 *farsakh*s below Baghdad. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 174–76.

435. Parallels: Yaʿqūbī, II, 534; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 181–83; Fragmenta, 330. On the Muhallabī family, to which the governor Muḥammad b. Yazīd b. Ḥātim b. Qabīṣah b. al-Muhallab belonged, and its importance among the Azd tribesmen of al-Baṣrah, see Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 82–83; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 135.

ing parties, and he was to encamp only in a secure location, where he could feel safe about his forces. After al-Ḥusayn had set out, Ṭāhir's spies came and informed him that Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Muhallabī, Muḥammad's governor of al-Ahwāz, had set out with a large host, intending to encamp at Junday Sābūr,[436] which was the boundary between [the provinces of] al-Ahwāz and al-Jabal, to protect al-Ahwāz and ward off any of Ṭāhir's forces who wanted to enter it. They said that he was with a numerous and powerful force. Ṭāhir summoned a number of his companions, including Muḥammad b. Ṭālūt, Muḥammad b. al-'Alā', al-'Abbās b. Bukhārākhudhāh, al-Ḥārith b. Hishām, Dāwūd b. Mūsā, and Hādī b. Ḥafṣ. He ordered them to travel quickly, until their foremost forces made contact with the rearmost forces of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Umar al-Rustumī. If he needed reinforcement, they were to reinforce him; if an army encountered him, they would back him up.

Ṭāhir sent out these armies, but no one encountered them until they were close to al-Ahwāz. Word of them reached Muḥammad b. Yazīd. He reviewed his forces, strengthened those of them who were weak, and mounted the foot soldiers on mules. He advanced and encamped at the market of 'Askar Mukram,[437] setting the inhabited area and the water behind his back. Ṭāhir became fearful that [Muḥammad] would hasten toward his forces; so he reinforced them with Quraysh b. Shibl, and he himself set out until he was close to them. He dispatched al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī al-Ma'mūnī and commanded him to join up with Quraysh b. Shibl and al-Ḥusayn b. 'Umar al-Rustumī. These armies traveled until they drew close to Muḥammad b. Yazīd at 'Askar Mukram. Muḥammad gathered his forces and [853] said, "What do you think best? Should I delay fighting and put off the encounter with enemy, or should I fight it out with them, regardless of whether it is to my advantage or against it?

436. Junday Sābūr, or Jundī Shāpūr, about seventy miles north of al-Ahwāz, was an important city. Under the Sasanians, it had been the capital of Khūzistān province and was famous for its medical school. See Le Strange, Lands, 238, 247; *EI*² s.v. Gondēshāpūr (Huart).

437. The town of 'Askar Mukram, on the Masruqān Canal in Khūzistān, was about halfway between al-Ahwāz and Junday Sābūr. See Le Strange, Lands, 233, 236–37, 242, 246–47; *EI*² s.v. (Streck).

By God, I do not think that I should go back [to the Commander of the Faithful or leave al-Ahwāz." They said to him, "The best plan is for you to return] to al-Ahwāz, fortify yourself there, and avoid fighting Ṭāhir. You should send to al-Baṣrah and enroll troops there, summoning an army from those of your tribesmen over whom you have authority and who have sworn allegiance to you."[438] He accepted their advice. His men followed him, and he turned back until he came to Sūq al-Ahwāz.[439] Ṭāhir commanded Quraysh b. Shibl to follow him and deal quickly with him, before he could fortify himself in Sūq al-Ahwāz. He commanded al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī al-Ma'mūnī and al-Ḥusayn b. 'Umar al-Rustumī to travel on the heels of [Quraysh]; if he needed their help, they were to help him. Quraysh b. Shibl closely followed Muḥammad b. Yazīd: whenever Muḥammad b. Yazīd departed from a village, Quraysh encamped in it, until they came to Sūq al-Ahwāz. Muḥammad b. Yazīd arrived at the city first and entered it. He relied on the inhabited area for support, setting it to his rear; he mustered his forces and resolved to fight the enemy. He called for money, and it was poured out before him. He said to his companions, "Whoever among you wants reward and rank, let him show me his mettle." Quraysh b. Shibl advanced until he was close to him and said to his companions, "Remain in your position and your battle lines. Let most of your fighting with them be done while you are on foot. Fight them with energy and strength." There was not one of his men who did not gather for himself as many stones as he could. Before Muḥammad b. Yazīd could pass over toward them, they weakened his men with stones and inflicted many injuries on them with arrows. A group of Muḥammad b. Yazīd's forces came over. Quraysh ordered his forces to dismount to fight them, and they did so, fighting them fiercely, until they went back, retreating one group after the

438. The translation of the three preceding sentences follows the Cairo text, which is clearly superior to that of ed. Leiden, with the exception of one word [tughādiya, "hasten," sc. to fight], where I prefer the Leiden reading [nu'ādiya, "we should avoid," sc. fighting]. The bracketed words are not found in ed. Leiden. The Cairo text itself may contain corruptions.

439. Sūq al-Ahwāz ("Market of al-Ahwāz") is the longer form of the name of the city of al-Ahwāz. See Le Strange, Lands, 232.

other. Muḥammad b. Yazīd turned to a group of his mawālī [854] who were with him and said, "What do you think best?" They said, "Regarding what?" He said, "I see that those on my side have been routed. I fear they will abandon me. I do not expect them to return. I have decided to dismount and fight by myself, until God decrees what He wants. Whoever of you wishes to depart, let him depart. By God, I would rather that you survive than that you perish and be destroyed!" They replied, "Then we would be treating you unjustly, by God! You freed us from slavery, raised us up from humiliation, enriched us after we were poor—and then we abandon you in this condition! No, we will advance before you and die beside the stirrup of your horse. May God curse this world and life after your death!" Then they dismounted, hamstrung their horses, and attacked Quraysh's forces fiercely, killing many of them, and crushing their heads with rocks and other things. But one of Ṭāhir's men reached Muḥammad b. Yazīd, struck him with a spear, and felled him. The men rushed to strike him and thrust at him, until they killed him.

Lamenting the death of Muḥammad b. Yazīd, one of the people of al-Baṣrah said:

Whoever tastes slumber's savor of joy—as for me, sleeplessness has pressed me hard.
A generous man of right action has passed away; I have lost, in him, my heart and my hearing, and my eyes have overwhelmed me [with tears].
He was succor in time of drought:
    and now the spring rainclouds have passed away.
Al-ʿUyaynī[440] was faithful to the imām:
    the blow of the ridged, iridescent one[441] did not frighten him.
He would have assailed time's vicissitude with his skill, were it not that mankind is subject to the Decree.

---

440. I.e., al-Muhallabī [Leiden note].

441. I.e., the sword: a well-tempered sword had ridges in the metal of its blade and an iridescence.

Then depart praised; for everyone with an allotted term of life strives for what you strove for at the end of life.

A Muhallabī clansman who was wounded many times in the battle and whose hand was cut off said:[442]

[855] I reproached myself only that I was incapable of agility, and that I had been weakened by wounds.
Had my two hands been sound, I would have fought to defend him, and I would have warded off from him Ṭāhir's accursed one.
He was a hero never seen to abandon the sword in the fray, when he entered battle with its dust and earned fame.[443]

According to al-Haytham b. 'Adī, who said: When Ibn Abī 'Uyaynah[444] went before Ṭāhir, he recited to him his poem [that begins with the verse]:

He whom a country delights does not depart from it, but he whom it displeases does not abide.

Finally, he came to his verse:

My thought was grieved only because of one thing concealed in the breast from speech.

Ṭāhir smiled and said, "By God, what grieved you regarding him grieved me also, and what pained you pained me. I disliked what happened, but death will occur and destiny will descend. Ties of kindred are inevitably cut and one becomes estranged from relatives for the sake of upholding the caliphate and performing the duty of obedience." We supposed that he was referring to Muḥammad b. Yazīd b. Ḥātim.

---

442. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 182.

443. Literally, "and became known by a by-name."

444. Two poets, brothers from the al-Muhallabī family, both sometimes called simply "Ibn Abī 'Uyaynah," were active at this time, and the poem sometimes is attributed to one and sometimes to the other. The elder was Abū Ja'far 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Abī 'Uyaynah b. al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah; the younger was Abū al-Minhāl Abū 'Uyaynah b. Muḥammad b. Abī 'Uyaynah. The poem can be found in Aghānī, XVIII, 17 (ed. Cairo, 7742). Its theme is disappointment over kinsmen who do not maintain family solidarity—thus its appropriateness to the present context. See also Sezgin, GAS, II, 605–6.

According to ʿUmar b. Asad, who said: Ṭāhir established himself at al-Ahwāz after he had killed Muḥammad b. Yazīd b. Ḥātim.[445] He sent out his agents into its districts and took charge of al-Yamāmah,[446] al-Baḥrayn, and ʿUmān—what was adjacent to al-Ahwāz and what was adjacent to the district of al-Baṣrah. Then he turned inland, heading toward Wāsiṭ.[447] At that time, al-Sindī b. Yaḥyā al-Ḥarashī and al-Haytham, the [856] deputy of Khuzaymah b. Khāzim, were in the city. The garrisons and agents began to collapse, garrison by garrison, and agent by agent. As soon as Ṭāhir approached them, they left their districts and fled from them, until Ṭāhir was close to Wāsiṭ. Al-Sindī b. Yaḥyā and al-Haytham b. Shuʿbah summoned their forces, gathered them to themselves, and were about to fight. Al-Haytham b. Shuʿbah ordered the master of his horses to saddle his horses for him. So the man brought him a horse, but al-Haytham kept shifting his eyes from one horse to another—there were a number of them before him. The master of horses saw the disturbance and fear in his face. "If you are going to flee," he said, "this is the one for you. She gallops farther and is stronger for traveling." Al-Haytham laughed and said, "Bring the escape horse here! It is Ṭāhir; there is no shame for us in fleeing from him!" So both of them left Wāsiṭ and fled.

Ṭāhir entered Wāsiṭ. He became fearful that al-Haytham and al-Sindī would reach Fam al-Ṣilḥ[448] before him and fortify themselves there. So he dispatched Muḥammad b. Ṭālūt and commanded him to reach Fam al-Ṣilḥ before the two and prevent them from entering it, if they tried. He also dispatched one of his commanders, a man called Aḥmad b. al-Muhallab, toward al-Kūfah, which was then being governed by al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā al-Hādī. When the report about Aḥmad b. al-Muhallab reached al-ʿAbbās, he threw off his allegiance to Muḥammad and wrote to Ṭāhir that he would obey and swear allegiance to

445. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 183–84; Fragmenta, 330.

446. Al-Yamāmah was a part of the Najd area in central Arabia. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.

447. Wāsiṭ was a major city on the lower Tigris. It was called "Wāsiṭ" (central, middle) because it was roughly equidistant from Baghdad, al-Kūfah, and al-Baṣrah. See Le Strange, Lands, 39.

448. Fam al-Ṣilḥ ("Mouth of the Ṣilḥ Canal") was a town seven farsakhs (26 miles) upstream from Wāsiṭ. See Le Strange, Lands, 38.

al-Ma'mūn. Ṭāhir's horsemen encamped at Fam al-Nīl,[449] and Ṭāhir took control of everything between Wāsiṭ and al-Kūfah. Al-Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī, who was Muḥammad's governor of al-Baṣrah, wrote to Ṭāhir announcing his obedience. Ṭāhir moved on and encamped at Ṭarnāyā.[450] He stayed there for two days, but did not think it a suitable location for the army. He ordered a floating bridge, and it was thrown across the river.
[857] He secured his camp with a trench, and he sent his letters of appointment to the governors. Al-Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī in al-Baṣrah, al-'Abbās b. Mūsā al-Hādī in al-Kūfah, and al-Muṭṭalib b. 'Abdallāh b. Mālik in al-Mawṣil swore allegiance to al-Ma'mūn and cast off their allegiance to Muḥammad in Rajab of the year 196.[451] Some have said that the man who was governing al-Kūfah for Muḥammad when Ṭāhir arrived was al-Faḍl b. al-'Abbās b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā. After the men I have just mentioned wrote to Ṭāhir announcing their allegiance to al-Ma'mūn and their repudiation of Muḥammad, Ṭāhir confirmed them over their districts. He appointed Dāwūd b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī al-Hāshimī to govern Mecca and Medina, and Yazīd b. Jarīr al-Bajalī to govern Yemen, and he dispatched al-Ḥārith b. Hishām and Dāwūd b. Mūsā to Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah.[452]

Ṭāhir Takes al-Madā'in and Marches toward Ṣarṣar

In this year, Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn took al-Madā'in[453] from the forces of Muḥammad [al-Amīn]. From there he went toward 449. Fam al-Nīl ("Mouth of the Nīl Canal"), where the Nīl Canal flowed into the Tigris, was a few miles above Fam al-Ṣilḥ. See Le Strange, Lands, 72–73.

450. The location and vocalization are unknown. The manuscript may be corrupt. Ibn al-Jawzi and Ibn al-Athīr read "at Jarjarāyā," which is on the Tigris River about halfway between Wāsiṭ and Baghdad.

451. That is, between March 18 and April 16, 812. Ya'qūbī, II, 534, dates Ṭāhir's entry into Wāsiṭ on 3 Rajab 196.

452. Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah was located just east of the Sūrā branch of the Euphrates River, on the main road halfway between Baghdad and al-Kūfah. Under the name al-Hāshimiyyah, which never succeeded in displacing the original name, the town had served briefly as the first capital of the 'Abbāsids in Iraq. See Le Strange, Lands, 70–71; EI^{2} s.v. Ḳaṣr ibn Hubayrah (Lassner).

453. Al-Madā'in ("the cities," so named because it consisted of a number of separate towns linked by a floating bridge across the Tigris) was the former Sasanian winter capital about 20 miles south of Baghdad. See EI^{2} s.v. (Streck).

Ṣarṣar,[454] constructed a floating bridge, and proceeded to Ṣarṣar. A report of the reason for his entering al-Madā'in and going to Ṣarṣar follows.

It has been mentioned: After Ṭāhir had sent al-Ḥārith b. Hishām and Dāwūd b. Mūsā to Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah, and after word had reached Muḥammad that his governor in al-Kūfah had cast off allegiance to him and had sworn allegiance to al-Ma'mūn, Muḥammad dispatched the commander Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and Muḥammad b. Ḥammād al-Barbarī.[455] He commanded them to attack al-Ḥārith and Dāwūd by night at Qaṣr [Ibn Hubayrah]. They were told, "If you follow the main road, it will not escape their notice; instead, take the shortest route to Fam al-Jāmi',[456] which is the site of a market and a camp. Encamp there, and make a night attack upon them, if you want to do that, for you will be near enough to them." So the two of them sent the foot soldiers from al-Yāsiriyyah[457] to Fam al-Jāmi'. Word of this reached al-Ḥārith and Dāwūd. They rode with a detachment of horsemen and prepared to deal with the foot soldiers. They crossed over to them by a ford in the [858] Sūrā',[458] beside which they had encamped, and inflicted a heavy blow on them. Ṭāhir dispatched Muḥammad b. Ziyād and Nuṣayr b. al-Khaṭṭāb to reinforce al-Ḥārith and Dāwūd. The armies assembled at al-Jāmi' and marched until they encountered Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and Muḥammad b.

454. Ṣarṣar, on the canal of the same name, which joined the Tigris a few miles above al-Madā'in, was only 5 miles south of Baghdad, on the main north-south road to al-Kūfah. See Le Strange, Lands, 32, 35, 67.

455. Muḥammad's father, Ḥammād al-Barbarī ("the Berber" or "the Nubian"), had been a slave and mawlā of the caliph. He had been freed by al-Rashīd at the opening of his reign. See Ya'qūbī, II, 498–99; Crone, Slaves on Horses, 191.

456. Location uncertain: Fam al-Jāmi' (the mouth of the Jāmi' canal) is perhaps to be connected with the town of al-Ḥillah, sometimes called al-Jāmi'ayn (the Two Mosques), on the east branch of the Euphrates, south of Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah. The road to al-Ḥillah passed east of Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah. See Le Strange, Lands, 71; Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 376 n. 2.

457. Al-Yāsiriyyah, on the 'Īsā Canal 2 miles west of Baghdad, was considered either the westernmost quarter of the city or a separate village. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 74, 76, 151–52.

458. That is, the Sūrā (eastern) branch of the Euphrates. See Le Strange, Lands, 70.

Ḥammād between the Durqīṭ Canal[459] and al-Jāmiʿ. The two sides fought each other fiercely. The forces from Baghdad were defeated. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān fled and reached the village of Shāhī.[460] He crossed the Euphrates and took the desert road to al-Anbār.[461] Muḥammad b. Ḥammād returned to Baghdad. Concerning this, Abū Yaʿqūb al-Khuraymī[462] said:

The two of them transgressed with breach of promise, that they might split thereby the rock of truth; so they (themselves) were broken, with scattered host.
A lean one, O Ibn al-Barbarī, allowed us to escape—a horse that goes forth for a long march and finds the way.

According to Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith: When Muḥammad b. Ḥammād al-Barbarī entered Baghdad, Muḥammad the Deposed sent al-Faḍl b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā al-Hāshimī to al-Kūfah and appointed him governor of it. He joined to him Abū al-Salāsil, Iyās al-Ḥirābī, and Jumhūr al-Najjārī and commanded him to travel quickly. Al-Faḍl set out. After he crossed the ʿĪsā Canal,[463] his horse stumbled and fell. He therefore switched from it to another, regarding it as an evil omen, and said, "O God, I ask you for blessing on this journey!" Word of this reached Ṭāhir, and he sent Muḥammad b. al-ʿAlāʾ and wrote to al-Ḥārith b. Hishām and Dāwūd b. Mūsā that they should obey him. Muḥammad b.

459. For the Durqīṭ (or Darqīṭ) Canal, see Le Strange, Lands, 80.

460. Yāqūt, with some uncertainly, places Shāhī near al-Qādisiyyah, which was west of al-Kūfah on the road to Mecca. The text here implies a location on the east side of the Euphrates.

461. Al-Anbār, on the left bank of the Euphrates, was about 12 farsakhs (44.6 miles) west of Baghdad. It was an important crossing point on the Euphrates near the northernmost navigable canal connecting the Euphrates with the Tigris. See EI^{2} s.v. (Streck).

462. Abū Yaʿqūb Isḥāq b. Ḥassān b. Qūhī al-Khuraymī was a poet of Sogdian origin who settled in Iraq and became a mawlā of the Khuraym family. A eulogist of al-Rashīd and the Barmakids, he supported al-Amīn in the civil war and died ca. 214/829. See GAL, S I, 111–12; Sezgin, GAS, II, 550–51; EI^{2} s.v. Abū Yaʿqūb al-Khuraymī (Pellat). His poems have been collected and edited by ʿAlī Jawad al-Ṭāhir and Muḥammad Jabbār al-Muʿaybid, Dīwān al-Khuraymī (Beirut, 1971). The following poem is not included in their collection.

463. The ʿĪsā Canal flowed in a semicircle around the southern limits of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 49–56.

al-ʿAlāʾ encountered al-Faḍl at Qaryat al-Aʿrāb.[464] Al-Faḍl sent word to him, saying, "I will heed and obey Ṭāhir. My departure was merely a deception on my part upon Muḥammad [al-Amīn]; so leave me free to go to [Ṭāhir]." Muḥammad [b. al- [859] ʿAlāʾ] said to him, "I do not know of what you are speaking; I neither accept it nor reject it. If you want the commander Ṭāhir, turn around and take the easiest and most direct way." So he went back. Muḥammad [b. al-ʿAlāʾ] said to his companions, "Be careful, for I fear this man's trickery." Thinking that Muḥammad b. al-ʿAlāʾ felt himself safe from him, al-Faḍl without delay cried out, "God is most great!"[465] However, he found Muḥammad ready and prepared. They fought very fiercely. Al-Faḍl's horse fell, but Abū al-Salāsil defended him until he mounted, and he said, "I will mention this stand to the Commander of the Faithful." The forces of Muḥammad b. al-ʿAlāʾ attacked those of al-Faḍl and defeated them: they continued killing them all the way to Kūthā.[466] Ismāʿīl b. Muḥammad al-Qurashī and Jumhūr al-Najjārī were taken prisoner in that battle.

Ṭāhir headed toward al-Madāʾin, where there was a large force of Muḥammad's cavalry under al-Barmakī, who had fortified himself there and was receiving reinforcements, gifts, and robes of honor from Muḥammad every day.[467] When Ṭāhir had drawn near to al-Madāʾin, but was still two *farsakh*s away, he dismounted, prayed two prostrations, and added many extra prayers to God, saying, "O God, we ask for help, as Thou didst help the Muslims at the Battle of al-Madāʾin."[468] He dispatched al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī al-Maʾmūnī and Quraysh b. Shibl. He dispatched al-Hādī b. Ḥafṣ in charge of his vanguard, and

464. Qaryat al-Aʿrāb seems to be a proper name; however, it may simply mean "the village of the Bedouin Arabs."

465. Allāhu akbar, i.e., as the signal for an attack.

466. The town of Kūthā, on the canal of the same name, was located on the main north-south road from Baghdad to al-Kūfah, about 35 miles south of Baghdad, and 18 miles north of Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah. See Le Strange, Lands, 68–69; EI[2] s.v. [Plessner].

467. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 184.

468. That is, the battle in which the capital of the Sasanian Empire fell to Muslim forces led by Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ in Ṣafar 16 (March 637). See EI[2] s.v. al-Madāʾin [Streck].

he marched. When al-Barmakī's forces heard the sound of his drums, they saddled the horses. They began to draw up their ranks and make those in the forefront of the men join those in the rear. Al-Barmakī began setting the ranks into good order; but as soon as he set a line in order, it would break up and fall into disorder. "O God," he said, "we take refuge in Thee from desertion!" Then he turned to the commander of his rear and said, "Let the men go, for I see an army that is worthless." So they followed one another closely, heading toward Baghdad. Ṭāhir encamped at al-Madā'in and sent Quraysh b. Shibl and al-'Abbās b. Bukhārākhudhāh ahead to al-Darzījān.[469] Aḥmad [860] b. Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī and Naṣr b. Manṣūr b. Naṣr b. Mālik were encamped at the Diyālā River,[470] and they prevented al-Barmakī's forces from crossing to Baghdad. Ṭāhir advanced until he reached al-Darzījān, opposite Aḥmad [b. Sa'īd] and Naṣr b. Manṣūr. He had the foot soldiers go over to them. Not much fighting took place between the two sides before [al-Barmakī's forces] were defeated. Ṭāhir turned left, toward the Ṣarṣar Canal, constructed a floating bridge, and encamped there [sc. at Ṣarṣar].

The Governor of Mecca Casts off Allegiance to al-Amīn

In this year, Dāwūd b. 'Īsā, the governor of Mecca and Medina, cast off his allegiance to Muḥammad, whose governor he was for the two cities.[471] He swore allegiance to al-Ma'mūn and received the oath of allegiance to him from the people. He wrote announcing this to Ṭāhir and al-Ma'mūn. Then he himself departed to go to al-Ma'mūn. A report of how this happened follows.

It has been mentioned: After the caliphate had devolved upon al-Amīn, he sent to Mecca and Medina Dāwūd b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās and 469. Al-Darzījān was a large village located close to Baghdad on the west side of the Tigris. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

470. The Diyālā River flowed into the Tigris from the east 3 miles below Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 59–60; EI[2] s.v. (Longrigg).

471. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 184–85; Fragmenta, 330–31.

removed al-Rashīd's governor of Mecca, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad al-Makhzūmī, who had been responsible for public worship, the police (aḥdāth), and the administration of justice among the people. Muḥammad [b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān] was replaced in all of these things by Dāwūd b. 'Īsā, save for the administration of justice, for al-Amīn retained (Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān) in the latter office. Dāwūd resided as governor of Mecca and Medina on behalf of Muḥammad [al-Amīn]. He led the pilgrimage in the years 193, 194, and 195. After the year 196 began, word reached him about how 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn had deposed his brother and what Ṭāhir had done to Muḥammad's commanders. Muḥammad had written to Dāwūd b. 'Īsā, commanding him to cast off allegiance to 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn and swear allegiance to al-Amīn's son, Mūsā. Muḥammad sent for the two documents [861] that al-Rashīd had written and hung in the Ka'bah and took them.[472] After Muḥammad had done this, Dāwūd assembled the doorkeepers of the Ka'bah, the people of Quraysh, the jurists, and the witnesses who had attested to the contents of the two documents—Dāwūd himself had been one of them. Dāwūd said, "You know the promise and covenant that al-Rashīd received from us and from you at the Sacred House of God, when we swore allegiance to his two sons, that you[473] would be on the side of the wronged against the wrongdoer, the injured against the injurer, and the betrayed against the betrayer. Now we have seen, and you have seen too, how Muḥammad has initiated the wronging, injuring, and betrayal of his brothers 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn and al-Qāsim al-Mu'taman. He has deposed the two of them and has had allegiance sworn to his infant son, a babe not yet weaned. He has disobediently [and wrongfully][474] had the two contracts removed from the Ka'bah and has burned them with fire. I have decided to cast him off 472. The chronology is unclear. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 162, places al-Amīn's action in 194, before al-Ma'mūn's sending of Ṭāhir to al-Rayy. In any case, Dāwūd's anger over the destruction of the Meccan documents was not the immediate cause of this change of allegiance. See Kimber, "Hārūn al-Rashīd's Meccan Settlement," 58.

473. Ed. Cairo: "we."

474. The bracketed text is from ed. Cairo.

and swear allegiance to 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn as caliph, because he has been wronged and injured." The people of Mecca said to him, "Our judgment is as your judgment. We will cast him off with you." He set them a time—the midday prayer—and sent a crier into the roads between the mountains of Mecca, announcing, "To prayer! In congregation!" When the time for the midday prayer came—it was Thursday,[475] the 27th day of Rajab 196—Dāwūd b. 'Īsā came out [of his residence] and led the people in the midday prayer. The pulpit had been placed for him between the Corner and the Standing Place.[476] He climbed up and sat on it. He gave orders for the dignitaries and nobles (ashrāf) of the people, and they drew near to the pulpit. Dāwūd was an eloquent preacher with a strong voice. The people having assembled, he rose to preach, saying:

> Praise be to God, the Possessor of dominion, who gives dominion to whom He will, and withdraws dominion from whom He will; who exalts whom He will, and abases whom He will; in whose hand is the good;
> [862] and He is powerful over everything.[477] I bear witness that there is no god but God alone, who has no partner, and who upholds justice; there is no god but He, the Almighty, the Wise.[478] And I bear witness that Muḥammad is His servant and His messenger, whom He sent to bring the religion [of Islam], through whom He sealed the prophets, and whom He made a mercy for all beings.[479] May God bless him among the ancients and those of later times.

---

475. The 27th of Rajab (April 13, 812) fell on a Tuesday, and the 29th fell on Thursday. The numbers sab' (seven) and tis' (nine) are very similar in Arabic script and are often confused. The correct reading is probably "Thursday, the 29th of Rajab" (April 15, 812).

476. That is, between the eastern corner (rukn) of the Ka'bah's main façade, where the Black Stone kissed by pilgrims is affixed to the building, and the Standing Place (maqām) of Abraham, located in front of the main façade, which also contains the door of the building. According to Qur'ān 2:125 and 3:97, the Ka'bah stands at the place where Abraham had once prayed. See von Grunebaum, Muhammadan Festivals, 19.

477. Cf. Qur'ān 3:26.

478. Ibid., 3:18.

479. Ibid., 21:107.

To proceed: People of Mecca, you are the root and the branch, tribesmen and kin, partners in the blessing. To your land have God's visitors[480] come, and toward your qiblah[481] the Muslims turn. You know the promise and covenant that al-Rashīd Hārūn—may the mercy and blessing of God be upon him—enjoined upon you when he received the oath of allegiance to his two sons, Muḥammad and 'Abdallāh, in your midst: that you would help the wronged against the wronger, the injured against the injurer, and the betrayed against the betrayer. Now you have learned, and we have learned also, that Muḥammad b. Hārūn has initiated wronging, injuring, and betrayal. He has violated the conditions that he voluntarily granted in the interior of the Sacred House. Now it has become lawful for us and for you to depose him from the caliphate and to transfer it to him who has been wronged, injured, and betrayed. Behold, I make you witnesses that I have cast off Muḥammad b. Hārūn from the caliphate, even as I have cast off this qalansuwah[482] from my head.

He removed his qalansuwah from his head and threw it to one of the servants at his feet. It was made of red striped Yemeni cloth.[483] A black Hāshimī qalansuwah was brought, and he put it on. Then he said: "I swear allegiance to the Servant of God 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn, the Commander of the Faithful, for the caliphate! Arise to swear allegiance to your caliph!" A group of dignitaries ascended the pulpit to him, one after the other, swore to him the oath of allegiance to 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn for the caliphate, and repudiated Muḥammad [al-Amīn]. Then

480. That is, the participants in the annual pilgrimage, who are called "visitors" (wafd) of God.

481. The qiblah is the direction of the Ka'bah. Muslims face it during prayer.

482. The qalansuwah was a tall, conical hat, a symbol of high rank in Sasanian Iraq, later worn by the Abbasid caliphs, their viziers, and judges. See Dozy, Supplément, II, 409, and Dictionnaire détaillé des noms des vêtements, 365–71; Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial 'abbaside," 133–34; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 186.

483. Burūd ḥibarah musalsalah: Cf. Dozy, Dictionnaire détaillé des noms des vêtements, 133–36.

[863] he descended from the pulpit. The time for the midafternoon prayer had arrived, so he led the people in worship and then sat down at one end of the mosque. People began to swear the oath of allegiance to him, one group after another. He would read to them the document of allegiance, and they would clasp his hand. He did this for several days. He also wrote to [his son,][484] Sulaymān b. Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā, who was his deputy in Medina, commanding him to do with the people of Medina as he had done with the people of Mecca—cast off Muḥammad and swear allegiance to ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn.

As soon as he received a [favorable] reply from Medina about the swearing of allegiance [to al-Maʾmūn], Dāwūd, who was in Mecca, set out—he and a group of his children—to go to al-Maʾmūn in Marw. He went by way of al-Baṣrah, Fārs, and Kirmān. When he reached al-Maʾmūn in Marw, he told him how he had sworn allegiance to him and had cast off Muḥammad and how the people of Mecca and of Medina had hastened to do the same. Al-Maʾmūn was delighted by this. He took the fact that the people of Mecca and Medina were the first to swear allegiance to him as a good omen, and he wrote them a gentle and amiable letter, promising them good things, and raising their hopes. He ordered that a writ be drawn up appointing Dāwūd to be in charge of Mecca, Medina, and their districts—public worship, special exactions,[485] and taxes (jibāyah). In addition, he was given the governorship of ʿAkk.[486] Three brigades (alwiyah) of troops were assigned to him to deal with these. Al-Maʾmūn wrote on his behalf to al-Rayy authorizing a special grant (maʿūnah) of 500,000 dirhams.

Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā left in haste, journeying quickly, striving to arrive in time for the pilgrimage. With him was his nephew, al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās. Al-Maʾmūn had appointed al-ʿAbbās 484. The bracketed words are from ed. Cairo.

485. Maʿāwin, pl. of maʿūnah, probably refers to levies for the police force. Ṣāḥib al-maʿūnah often means "chief of police." See Dozy, Supplément, II, 192.

486. ʿAkk was a tribe with territory in the Tihāmah, the coastal plain of Yemen. See EI[2] s.v. (Caskel).

b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā to be in charge of the pilgrimage festival. He and his uncle Dāwūd traveled and stayed at Baghdad as guests of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, who honored them, showed them favor, and gave them generous support. He dispatched with the two of them Yazīd b. Jarīr b. Yazīd b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī, [864] whom Ṭāhir had appointed to be governor of Yemen, and with whom he sent a large body of horsemen. Yazīd b. Jarīr b. Yazīd b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī guaranteed them that he would induce his family and tribesmen, the kings and nobles of the people of Yemen, to cast off Muḥammad and swear allegiance to ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn. They all traveled until they reached Mecca. When the pilgrimage arrived, al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā led the people who came for the festival. After they had completed the pilgrimage, al-ʿAbbās returned to Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, who was besieging Muḥammad. Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā remained in his district of Mecca and Medina, and Yazīd b. Jarīr went on to Yemen. He called on its people to cast off Muḥammad and swear allegiance to ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn. He read them a letter from Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, promising them justice and equity, encouraging them to obey al-Maʾmūn, and telling them of the just treatment al-Maʾmūn had extended to his subjects. The people of Yemen agreed to swear allegiance to al-Maʾmūn. They were delighted with this, swore allegiance to al-Maʾmūn, and cast off Muḥammad. Yazīd b. Jarīr b. Yazīd conducted himself very well among them, showing justice and equity. He wrote to al-Maʾmūn and to Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn about their acquiescence and swearing of allegiance.

Harthamah b. Aʿyan Defeats al-Amīn's Forces

In this year, during the months of Rajab and Shaʿbān,[487] Muḥammad [al-Amīn] placed about 400 companies (liwāʾ) of troops under the command of various leaders and appointed ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā b. Nahīk commander over them all.[488] He commanded them to march against Harthamah b.

487. I.e., between March 18 and May 15, 812.
488. Parallels: Yaʿqūbī, II, 534–35; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 186–87; Fragmenta, 332.

A'yan. They did so, and the two sides met at Jalultā, a few miles from al-Nahrawān, during the month of Ramaḍān.[489] Harthamah defeated them and captured 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. 'Īsā b. Nahīk. Harthamah sent him to al-Ma'mūn. Harthamah advanced and encamped at al-Nahrawān.

Some of Ṭāhir's Men Go over to al-Amīn

[865] In this year, a large group of men left Ṭāhir and went over to Muḥammad on a promise of safety (amān), and the army mutinied against Ṭāhir. Muḥammad distributed a large sum of money among Ṭāhir's men who had come to him. He appointed men to be commanders and daubed their beards with perfume.[490] People therefore called them "the perfume commanders." A report of the reason and consequences of this follows.

According to Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith, who said: Having reached [Ṣarṣar], Ṭāhir established himself by the Ṣarṣar Canal and energetically prosecuted the war against Muḥammad and the people of Baghdad. He defeated every army that came against him. But the money and clothing that Muḥammad was giving were too much for Ṭāhir's men, and about 5,000 Khurāsānians and others who joined them left his army. Muḥammad was delighted with them. He made promises to them, raised their hopes, and registered their names among [those who received pay of] eighty [dīnārs].

They continued at this for months. [Muḥammad] appointed commanders from al-Ḥarbiyyah and others—men who presented themselves and sought the position. He gave them appointments and sent them to Daskarat al-Malik[491] and al-Nahrawān. He sent to them Ḥabīb b. Jahm al-Namarī the Bedouin Arab with his forces. There was not much fighting between them

---

489. I.e., between May 16 and June 14, 812.

490. Ghāliyah was a perfume containing musk, ambergris, camphor, and oil of ben. See Lane, Lexicon, VI, 2289.

491. Daskarat al-Malik ("King's Daskarah," so named because of the ruins of a Sasanian palace), 16 farsakhs northeast of Baghdad on the Khurāsān highway, was the stage beyond Nahrawān and before Jalūlā. See Le Strange, Lands, 62; EI[2] s.v. Daskara [Duri].

[and the enemy]. Muḥammad summoned some of the Baghdad commanders and sent them to al-Yāsiriyyah,[492] al-Kawthariyyah, and the Double [Bridge of] Boats.[493] He supplied them with food, strengthened them with pay allowances (arzāq), and made them a buttress for those behind them. He scattered spies among Ṭāhir's forces and smuggled letters to the heads of the army, raising their hopes, and exciting their desires, so that they mutinied against Ṭāhir. Many of them went over to Muḥammad on a promise of safety. Each group of ten had a drum; they thundered and stormed and raised a clamor. They advanced until they were close to the Ṣarṣar Canal. Ṭāhir [866] arranged his forces in phalanxes (karādīs). Then he passed by each phalanx and said, "Do not let the multitude of those you see deceive you, and do not let the fact that some of them went over on a promise of safety inhibit you; for victory lies with true bravery and constancy, and conquest lies with steadfastness. 'How often a little company has overcome a numerous company, by God's leave; and God is with the steadfast'."[494] Then he commanded them to advance, and they did so. They fought the enemy with swords for a time. Then God made the people of Baghdad turn their backs; they retreated in defeat and evacuated their campsite. Ṭāhir's forces plundered all the weapons and money it contained.

When news of this reached Muḥammad, he commanded that pay ('aṭā') [be distributed], and it was done.[495] He brought out his chests and treasuries and distributed gifts. He gathered the people of the suburbs and reviewed the men with his own eyes. Whenever he saw someone handsome and good-looking, he gave him a robe of honor and appointed him commander. Whenever he appointed someone a commander, he had the man's beard daubed with perfume. They were the ones that

492. See note 457.

493. Al-Safīnatayn apparently refers to the fourth bridge of boats, described as "double," that al-Amīn added to the three that already crossed the Tigris. Located downstream from the Lower Bridge, it crossed the river to a point near the palace that al-Amīn built at Kalwādhā, on the east bank. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 179, 296–97.

494. Qur'ān 2:249.

495. Parallels: Ya'qūbī, II, 534; Mas'ūdī, VI, 446–47.

people called "perfume commanders." To each of his new commanders he distributed 500 dirhams and a flask of perfume, but he gave nothing to the army of the commanders and their forces. When Ṭāhir's scouts and spies brought him word of this, he sent messengers and letters to the men, made them promises, and sought to win them over to his side. He set the lower ranks among them against the higher ranks. They mutinied against Muḥammad on Wednesday, the 6th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 196 (August 18, 812). One of the Abnā' of the people of Baghdad said concerning this:

Say to al-Amīn, "By God Himself, it was only the perfume that dispersed the army."
And Ṭāhir—my soul, fear Ṭāhir, with his deliberateness and ample provisions!
The reins of the kingdom have come to be in his hand, while he fights the company who commit injustice.
[867] O perfidious one, delivered [to destruction] by your own perfidy, the disgrace of your wickedness has been revealed.
The chief lion has come upon you with his assaults, raging, among ravenous lions.
Flee! But there is no place of refuge from one like him, except to the Fire [of Hell] or the Pit.

When the army mutinied and matters became difficult for Muḥammad, he consulted his commanders. He was told, "Make amends to the men, and correct your affairs; for in them is the stay of your kingdom. It was they, after God, who took it away from you in the days of al-Ḥusayn [b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā]; it was they who returned it to you; and you have learned their valor and bravery." But he was stubborn about them and commanded that they should be fought. He sent al-Tanūkhī to deal with them, along with others of those who had come over on a promise of safety (musta'minah) and soldiers who were on his side, and the latter hastened to fight the men. Ṭāhir sent the men messages, and they sent messages to him. He took [persons who were] their pledges for obedience to him and wrote to the men. He gave them a guarantee of safety (amān) and bestowed money on them generously. On Tuesday, the 12th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (August 25, 812), Ṭāhir advanced as far as the garden at the foot of al-Anbār Gate.[496] He encamped at the garden with his commanders, soldiers, and forces. Muḥammad's commanders and soldiers who had joined Ṭāhir on a guarantee of safety also encamped in the garden and in the suburbs. He increased the pay (arzāq) of all of them to eighty [dīnārs], doubled the special bonuses (khawāṣṣ) for commanders and the sons of commanders, and caused the money to be paid regularly to them and many of their men.

The prisoners breached the prisons and came out. There was civil disorder. Rogues and scoundrels (al-du"ār wa'l-shuṭṭār) assaulted decent people. Sinners became powerful, believers were humiliated, and decent people were disturbed. Conditions among the people deteriorated, except for those who were in Ṭāhir's camp, for he kept check on the situation, restrained unruly and immoral people, and was severe with them. He went out to fight both early and late, until the two sides grew sluggish and populated areas became ruinous.

In this year, al-'Abbās b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī led the pilgrimage on behalf of Ṭāhir. He mentioned al-Ma'mūn as caliph in the prayers. This was the first pilgrimage festival at which prayers were offered for him as caliph at Mecca and Medina. [868]

496. Ṭāhir's position was to the northwest of the city, outside the suburb of al-Ḥarbiyyah, and controlling the main road that, leaving the Round City through the Syrian Gate, went west to the city of al-Anbār. The al-Anbār Gate (Bāb al-Anbār) was located where this road crossed the canal known as the Trench of Ṭāhir, approximately 1 mile west of the Syrian Gate. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 110–11.

The Events of the Year 197

(SEPTEMBER 12, 812–AUGUST 31, 813)

In this year, al-Qāsim b. Hārūn al-Rashīd and Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī joined al-Ma'mūn from Iraq. Al-Ma'mūn sent al-Qāsim to Jurjān. Also in this year, Ṭāhir, Harthamah, and Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab besieged Muḥammad b. Hārūn in Baghdad.[497]

Details and Results of the Siege of Baghdad

According to Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Tamīmī and others: Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab al-Ḍabbī encamped at the Palace of Raqqat Kalwādhā.[498] He set up siege engines—*manjanīq*s and *'arrādah*s[499]—and dug ditches. He would go out during 497. Parallels: Ya'qūbī, II, 535; Mas'ūdī, VI, 447–72; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 188–94; Fragmenta, 332–34.

498. This palace (the name means "the palace of the plain or marsh of Kalwādhā") was built by al-Amīn on the east bank of the Tigris, near the town of Kalwādhā, about 6 miles south of the Lower Bridge of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 295, 307.

499. The manjanīq and the 'arrādah were stone-hurling machines of the traction trebuchet type. An asymmetrically positioned beam was rotated swiftly around a fulcrum by several men pulling ropes attached to the beam's shorter end. The projectile was attached to a sling on the beam's longer end. The manjanīq was the larger machine, with two trestles supporting a horizontal the days, when the army was occupied with the fight against Ṭāhir, and with the *ʿarrādah*s would shoot at people who were coming and going. He collected a tithe on merchants' money, taxed boats, and harassed the people greatly. What he was doing was reported to Ṭāhir: the people came and complained to him of what had befallen them at the hands of Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab. Word of this also reached Harthamah. (Ṭāhir) reinforced him[500] with soldiers, for he had almost been taken. The troops then desisted from [attacking] him.

An anonymous poet from the East Bank said concerning Zuhayr and how he killed people with *manjanīq*s:[501]

Do not come near the manjanīq and the stones.
You saw this slain man, how he was buried:
He went out early, that no news might escape him; [869]
he came back a slain man and left the news behind!
What energy he had,
and what bodily health when he went out early!
He did not want it to be said, "There took place involving so-and-so some affair," while he did not know who had commanded it.[502]
O master of the manjanīq, what have your hands wrought?
They have not spared or left alone.[503]
His desire was other than what was decreed:
Alas, desire will never overcome fate!

Harthamah encamped at the Bīn Canal, surrounded himself with a wall and a ditch, and set up *manjanīq*s and *ʿarrādah*s.

---

beam that served as fulcrum for the arm. In the ʿarrādah, a single upright with a U-shaped socket attached to its upper end supported the arm. I am indebted to an unpublished paper by Dr. Paul Chevedden for details about the operation of the two engines. See also EI[2] s.vv. ʿArrāda (Cahen) and Mandjanīḳ (Hill).

500. The reference appears to be to Harthamah—cf. the incident narrated on pp. 164 ff., below.

501. Masʿūdī, VI, 454, quotes six lines with variants and identifies the author as the blind poet ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

502. The line puns on two words from the same root: amr, affair, and amara, he commanded.

503. Cf. Qurʾān 74:28.

He had ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Waḍḍāḥ encamp at al-Shammāsiyyah. Ṭāhir encamped at the garden by al-Anbār Gate.

According to al-Ḥusayn al-Khalīʿ,[504] who said: When Ṭāhir took possession of the garden at al-Anbār Gate, Muḥammad felt very afraid that he would enter Baghdad. He distributed whatever money he had at hand. Distressed and with burning heart, he commanded that whatever property was in the storerooms should be sold and that the gold and silver vessels should be minted into dīnārs and dirhams; these were to be brought to him for his forces and expenses. It was at this time that he commanded that al-Ḥarbiyyah should be bombarded with naphtha and fire and by *manjanīq*s and *ʿarrādah*s; people coming and going there were killed as a result of them. Concerning this, ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Malik al-ʿItrī al-Warrāq[505] said:

[870] O shooters of the manjanīq,
all of you are without compassion.
You do not care whether one is a friend, or is not a friend.
Alas, do you know what you are shooting?
Passers-by on the road!
Many a tender girl, flirtatious,
like a leafy bough,
Was expelled from her world
and from a goodly life.
She found no way to avoid it:
she was forced into public view on the day of the fire.

According to Muḥammad b. Manṣūr al-Bāwardī, who said: After Ṭāhir's strength had become too strong for Muḥammad, so that the latter's troops were defeated and his commanders scattered, one of those who went over to Ṭāhir on a promise of safety was Saʿīd b. Mālik b. Qādim. He joined Ṭāhir, and the latter put him in charge of the district of al-Baghiyyīn[506] and

504. See note 512.

505. Further information about ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Malik al-Warrāq in Sezgin, GAS, II, 524. Masʿūdī, VI, 455, ascribes the verses (with an additional fifth verse) to the blind poet ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

506. Al-Baghiyyīn district was on the west bank of the Tigris, at the foot of the Upper Bridge, north and east of al-Ḥarbiyyah. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 108.

the markets there, and the bank of the Tigris, with what adjoins it and faces it, up to the Tigris bridges. He commanded him to dig trenches and build walls in all the [areas of] houses and streets he took. He provided him with money, workers, and weapons. He commanded [the people of] al-Ḥarbiyyah to accompany him on patrols. He assigned someone to Dār al-Raqīq[507] Road and someone to the Syrian Gate, giving orders similar to those he had given to Sa'īd b. Mālik. There was so much ruin and destruction that the beauties of Baghdad were effaced. Concerning this, al-'Itrī says:[508]

Who has smitten you, Baghdad, with the [evil] eye? [871]
Were you not for a long time the delight of the eye?
Were there not in you people whose dwelling and whose friendship were a great adornment?
The raven[509] cried to them of departure, so they separated.
Oh the pain of departure I felt because of them!
I commend to God people whom I never remember
but that tears flow from my eye.
They once were; then a fate separated and dispersed them:
for fate it is that separates the two sides.

Muḥammad [al-Amīn] assigned 'Alī Farāhmard, along with the fighters (muqātilah) he joined to him, to the Palace of Ṣāliḥ (Qaṣr Ṣāliḥ) and the Palace of Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far,[510] up to the palaces of the Tigris and adjoining areas. He diligently burned houses and streets and destroyed them with *manjanīq*s and *'arrādah*s at the hands of a man who was known as al-Samarqandī, who used to shoot with the manjanīq. Ṭāhir

507. Dār al-Raqīq ("Slaves' House") was not far from the Upper Bridge, off the main road between al-Baghiyyīn and al-Ḥarbiyyah. It originally was a barracks for slaves brought from the Turkish borderlands to serve in the caliphal household. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 123. Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 382 [note 1] discusses this front of the siege.

508. For more lines of the poem, see pp. 213–14, below. Mas'ūdī, VI, 456, quotes the poem with variants.

509. In Arabic poetry, the raven is a harbinger of separation.

510. The Palace of Prince Ṣāliḥ (Qaṣr Ṣāliḥ) and the Palace of Prince Sulaymān (Qaṣr Sulaymān), named after sons of the caliph Manṣūr, were located on the west bank of the Tigris not far upstream from the Main Bridge, which carried the Khurāsān Road across the river. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 108.

acted similarly. He sent messages to the people of the suburbs—al-Anbār Road, al-Kūfah Gate, and adjoining areas. Whenever the people of an area yielded to him,[511] he dug a trench around them and positioned his garrisons and banners. If any people refused to yield and become obedient to him, he opened hostilities, fought them, and burned their houses. Thus he came [872] and went with his commanders, horsemen, and foot soldiers, until Baghdad became desolate, and people feared that it would remain a ruin. Concerning this, al-Ḥusayn al-Khalīʿ says:[512]

Are the men hurrying with rapid pace from both sides of Baghdad, or what is it?
Have you not seen how strife has joined to men of strife men who are strangers [to strife].[513]
Baghdad—its buildings have been pulled to pieces, according to the decision of neither that man nor this one.
By destruction and fire her people have been annihilated;
a punishment has encompassed whoever sought refuge.
How good time's changes will be, if Baghdād, for lack of people, does not again become Baghdādh![514]

Ṭāhir gave the name "Abode of Promise-Breaking"[515] to the suburbs whose inhabitants disobeyed him, the eastern City of

---

511. Variant in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 189: "assailed him."

512. The poet al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk, called al-Khalīʿ ("the Profligate") or al-Ashqar ("the Blond"), was a courtier of al-Amīn. The first of these nicknames seems to have been acquired through feats of wine drinking. See Aghānī, VI, 170ff., for a biography; also Sezgin, GAS, II, 518–19; *EI*² s.v. (Pellat).

513. Shudhdhādh, here rendered "strangers," can have a variety of meanings derived from a basic meaning of "to be apart, to fall out of the common mass of things." It sometimes means "deviant." See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. I read the verb in the line as active, rather than passive as vocalized by ed. Leiden. The meaning seems to be that the fighting has affected not only those normally affected by war—soldiers—but also those who should be strangers to it—either irregular troops or civilian casualties.

514. That is, if the city whose Arabic name is Baghdād does not return to bearing the name of the Persian village Baghdādh that occupied the site before the caliph al-Manṣūr constructed his capital. Ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXVI, lists other Arabic authors who note (and condemn) the pronunciation Baghdādh as "pagan" and "non-Arab."

515. Dār al-Nakth: Cf. the expression Dār al-Ḥarb ("Abode of War") used to designate territory occupied by people who resisted the advance of Islam and rejected its call, thereby becoming legitimate objects of war.

Abū Ja'far,[516] and the markets of al-Karkh[517] and al-Khuld[518] and adjacent areas. He seized the estates and commercial properties (ghallāt) of any members of the Hāshimī family, military commanders, and mawālī who did not come out promptly to him, wherever these properties were to be found in the area under his control; so they became submissive, broken in spirit, and obedient. [On al-Amīn's side,] the soldiers became submissive and too sluggish to fight—except for the street vendors, naked ones, people from the prisons, riffraff, rabble, cutpurses, and people of the market, to whom Ḥātim b. al-Ṣaqr had given permission to plunder.[519] Al-Hirsh[520] and the Africans (Afāriqah) went forth; Ṭāhir fought them without letup, without wearying, [873] and without tiring. Mentioning Baghdad, and describing what took place in it, al-Khuraymī said:[521]

They said, when Time had not yet made sport with Baghdad, when her misfortunes had not yet caused her to fall;
When she was like a bride, whose hidden part[522] was as enticing to the young man as her visible part:

---

516. Perhaps the text should be corrected to "the City of Abū Ja'far and al-Sharqiyyah." Al-Sharqiyyah was a suburb southeast of the Round City. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 188.

517. Al-Karkh was the quarter located to the southwest of the Round City. It became the market center for the entire city. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 65–68.

518. I.e., the markets near al-Khuld Palace, to the east of the Round City, near the foot of the Main Bridge. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 101–2.

519. Naked ones ('urāh): the word can mean unclothed or unarmed (see Dozy, Supplément, II, 123)—either paupers who fought in their rags or people who fought with makeshift weapons. The accounts of al-Amīn's irregulars use a colorful vocabulary—'urāh (naked ones), awbāsh (riffraff), ri'ā' (rabble), ghawghā' (mob), ṭarārūn (cutpurses), and 'ayyārūn (vagrants). Mas'ūdī, VI, 452–53, gives a detailed description of them. Cf. Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 383–84; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 145–46.

520. For the identity of al-Ḥasan al-Hirsh, a leader of irregular troops, see Fragmenta, 412 note b [Leiden note].

521. The text of this 135-verse poem was badly preserved in the manuscript available to the Leiden editor: not only did many places require emendation, but there were a number of lacunae. In many of these places the Cairo edition is superior. The text may also be found in the modern Dīwān, 27–37 (poem number 24), which is based on the text from Ṭabarī.

522. The Cairo reading (bāṭinuhā, "her hidden part") is logically and grammatically preferable to the conjectural Leiden reading (bādiyuhā, "her apparent part").

"A paradise on earth![523] The abode of happiness!"
Of distressing calamities there were few.
The world's breasts yielded abundantly to her inhabitants;
there were few of them who were debtors or creditors.
Her residents enjoyed a life of ease;
they pastured there on her pleasures.
Her people were in a pleasing garden, whose flowers shone brightly after the raindrops.[524]
[They were] people whom a life in pleasure and ease beguiled—if only the prosperous places of this world endured!
It was the abode of kings whose foundations were anchored there, and whose pulpits were established in it:
People of eminence and wealth,[525] epitomes of glory,[526] if one were to count their exploits; Fortune's favorites,[527] in the inheritance of a kingdom whose stays were tied firmly by its elders.
But then—time is full of change—their younger successors kept injuring their kingdom, Until they gave each other an intoxicating cup to drink of strife whose destructiveness cannot be told.
Once there had been fellowship, but now they separated into parties, with the bonds between them severed.
Have you seen the kings, what they did when no rebuker restrained them with counsel?
Our kings made themselves fall into a pit of perdition from which they could not emerge.
How would it have harmed them if they had fulfilled their pact, and if their zeal for righteousness had been strong;
[874] If they had not competed to shed the blood of their partisans, 523. Ed. Cairo: "A paradise of immortality (khuld)," with a pun on al-Khuld Palace.

524. The translation follows ed. Cairo.

525. Ed. Cairo: "eminence and generosity"—reading nadā instead of ed. Leiden's tharā.

526. Literally, "gathering places of glory," i.e., people in whom all titles to glory came together, as if assembling in a "club" (nādī).

527. Literally, "the chicks of happiness" (afrākhu nu'mā)—happiness being compared to a hen nurturing its brood.

and sent out[528] warriors to contend for superiority against each other;
And if the goods of this world that had been gathered for them had satisfied them?
But the soul's voraciousness harms the soul!
The pool of the kings—they kept digging it, those of them who were filled with desire and those who filled them [with it].[529]
They kept desiring[530] the luxuries of this world, seeking to surpass each other, until their treasures were plundered by force.
They kept selling what the fathers had gathered for the sons—may their traffickings bring no profit!
Have you seen the gardens in flower,
when their blossoms delight the eye of the beholder?
Have you seen the palaces rising into view,
their chambers concealing women like statues?
Have you seen the villages the kings have planted,
when their fields are green,
Surrounded by vineyards, palm trees, and fragrant herbs from which their birds take seeds?[531]
Now they have become devoid of people. Their gardens[532] have been defiled with blood—Desolate and empty! Dogs howl in them.
He who visits[533] them does not recognize the vestiges of them.
Now misery never leaves them;
it is their companion, while joy has forsaken them.

---

528. The translation follows ed. Cairo (tabta'ith fityatan).

529. That is, both kings and their counselors dug a pit for themselves.

530. The translation follows ed. Cairo (tabghī), rather than ed. Leiden (tubqī), "preserving."

531. The translation follows ed. Cairo for the second part of this line. The copyist of the manuscript used for ed. Leiden replaced the line's second hemistich with the corresponding hemistich of the following line.

532. A double meaning is involved: maḥājir means both "enclosed gardens" and "cheeks."

533. The translation follows ed. Cairo (zā'iruhā).

At Zandaward[534] and al-Yāsiriyyah,[535] and on the two river banks, where the ferries have ceased, At the mills[536] and Upper al-Khayzurāniyyah,[537]
whose bridges were lofty,
And at the Palace of 'Abdūyah, there is a lesson and guidance for every soul whose inner thoughts have become pure.
Where are their guards,[538] and where is their guardian?
Where is he upon whom benefits were bestowed, and where is their bestower?
Where are their eunuchs and their servants?
Where are their inhabitants and their builder?
Where have the Slavic al-Jarādiyyah[539] guards gone, and the Abyssinians, with their pendulous lips?
[875] The army disperses from its parades;
its lean [horses] run there at random—
Carrying men from Sind and India, Slavs, and Nubians with whom Berbers have been mixed—Like birds in flights,[540] they have been sent forth to no avail, their fair-skinned troops preceding their blacks.
Where are the virgin gazelles in the garden of the kingdom—the young ones who walked so gracefully?
Where are their comforts and their pleasures?

---

534. At Zandaward, on the east bank of the Tigris, south of Baghdad, there was a monastery famous for its orchards. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 210–11.

535. See note 457.

536. The conjectured reading bi'l-ruḥiyyi is metrically difficult, and the manuscripts have ya t.r.l.ḥ.y, which makes no sense. The mills might be Ruḥā al-Baṭrīq, "the Patrician's Mill," a large grain milling complex at the southern end of a very fertile tract of land west of the city. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 142–44.

537. Al-Khayzurāniyyah, named for the wife of the caliph al-Mahdī, was north of Ruṣāfah on the east bank of the Tigris and contained a cemetery where the imām Abū Ḥanīfah was buried. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 190–92.

538. Instead of ḥurrās, "guards," I conjecture an original reading of maḥrūs, "the one who is guarded." This would make the first hemistich parallel in construction with the second.

539. The Jarādiyyah corps of guards may have been given this name in reference to the pale color of the locust (jarād) or to a species of falcon (ṣaqr al-jarād or al-jarādī). See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CLXII; also the explanation given on p. 225, below.]

540. The unusual word abābīl echoes Qur'ān 105:3, a passage evoking the flight of an army.

Where are they who were adorned, and he who adorned them?
With musk, Yemeni ambergris, and aloes wood their censers were kindled.
They glided in silk, in garments saffron-colored and embroidered, with their lyres strung.
Where is their dancer and their piper, to whom they responded until their throats were tired?
People's ears were utterly captivated,
when their flutes vied with their lutes.
Now it has become as empty as the belly of a wild ass,[541] and he who burns it burns it with blazing fire.
One would think that in their courts had dwelt the people of ʿĀd,[542] and that roaring winds had smitten them.
No soul knows what will assail it by night—what accident of Fortune—or what will come upon it in the morning.
Morning and evening it is a target and a butt,
wherever its inclination leads it,
For the arrows that Fortune shoots—those that draw blood and those that rip open.
Oh the misfortune of Baghdad, the capital of a kingdom whose calamities have fallen on its people!
God granted her a respite; then he punished her,
when her grievous sins encompassed her,
With leveling to the ground, bombardment, and fire,
and with war that came to assail her.

---

541. The comparison of a deserted place to the belly of a wild ass goes back to pre-Islamic poetry, e.g., verse 49 of the Muʿallaqah of Imru al-Qays. Commentators gave various explanations: that the wild ass is an emblem of poverty because it finds little fodder, that it is useless because it cannot be ridden or milked, or that there was a desert place named Jawf al-Ḥimār ("Ḥimār's Hollow") whose inhabitant, a man named Ḥimār ("Ass"), was punished by God.

542. The people of ʿĀd are mentioned in the Qur'ān. They were people of old, perhaps giants, and builders of buildings still to be seen. The prophet Hūd was sent to them to warn them to mend their ways, but they disbelieved and were destroyed by a wind that below for seven nights and days. See Bell, Introduction to the Qur'ān, 127–28; Qur'ān, Suras 7, 11, 26, 46, 54, and 69.

[876] How many transgressions have we seen in Baghdad!
Will the Lord of Majesty forgive her?[543] Upon Baghdad, while she was at peace, descended a disaster she had not anticipated.
Evil rose over her from its places of rising,
and her people were overtaken by their offenses.
Religion was weak in her: there was no respect for the virtuous, and her unrighteous overpowered the devout.
The slave humiliated his master, and her freeborn[544] were enslaved.
He who was most wicked became lord of his neighbors, and robbers gained control over the gates of the streets.
He who has seen Baghdad, with the armies by it, with the soldiers having thrown a cordon around it,
With many a numerous troop, well armed and courageous,
their shrieks causing unborn babes to be aborted, Throwing its gentle girls into the perdition of death,
with Ṭāhir bearing down to attack it,
With the "shaykh"[545] passing with his troops collected, sending forward their rear, attacking by turns, While Zuhayr at al-Firk[546] has a band of lions—distinguished ones, who bear up under adversity—Squadrons of death, under banners whose victor and helpers bring trouble:
[He who has seen these things] knows that things foreordained must surely take place as their Ordainer desires.
Behold Baghdad! No nest is built in its houses by its sparrows from bewilderment.
Behold it surrounded by destruction, encircled with humiliation, its proud men besieged.

---

543. The translation of the second hemistich follows ed. Cairo. The manuscript used by ed. Leiden was illegible at this point.

544. Following ed. Cairo; ed. Leiden reads, "her women living in seclusion."

545. The reference is unclear. Perhaps one of the leaders of street gangs or irregular troops is intended.

546. Following ed. Cairo: al-Firk was a village near Kalwādhā on the east bank of the Tigris south of Baghdad (Yāqūt, Mu'jam). Ed. Leiden has bi-l-qawli ("according to report"), a lectio facilior. On Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab's encampment near Kalwādhā, see p. 134, above.

From the shore of the Euphrates up to the Tigris, where its ferries have stopped, Fire, like the neck of a red-maned horse, stampedes, [877]
while its ruddy ones gallop around it.[547]
This one burns [the city], and that one demolishes it;
and the scoundrel (shāṭir) sates himself with plunder.
The markets of al-Karkh are deserted;
its vagrant ('ayyār) and wayward prance about.[548]
From the vilest of her men war has brought forth mighty lions from their lairs to assail them.
Their shields are of reed mats;
their neck protectors,[549] when they put them on, are of palm leaves.
Early to the battle in their coats of mail made of wool, when their "horsemen" are numbered,[550] Go the battalions of al-Hirsh, under whose banner the cutpurse aids the gambler.
They get neither pay (rizq) nor salary ('aṭā'), nor does their gatherer assemble them for the encounter.[551]
In every gated street and on every side there is a siege engine[552] whose moving beam[553] raises its voice.

---

547. The text of this verse is corrupt in the two available manuscripts. The Leiden editor marks the line "non certum." The Cairo text is metrically possible, but incomprehensible. The Dīwān, 32, restores the line based on a quotation in Muḥāḍarāt al-Udabā' by Rāghib al-Iṣfahānī. Its reading (nārun ka-hādi l-shaqrā'i nāfiratun) turns the line into a striking metaphor based on the fact that the adjective ashqar ("ruddy") is applied both to horses with red manes and to fire (cf. Lane, Lexicon, s.v.).

548. This and the next two verses are quoted in Mas'ūdī, VI, 462.

549. The mighfar was a piece of fine mail worn under the helmet and extending downward to cover the shoulders. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v.

550. That these are not regular troops is emphasized by describing their makeshift armor: shields made of reed mats, neck protectors made of palm leaves, and armor made of wool. The word used for "horsemen" (asāwir, pl. of iswār) normally refers to heavily armored Persian cavalrymen and may be ironic, as these irregulars had no war horses.

551. Variant: "with difficulty."

552. The word used, khaṭṭārah, is derived from the verb khaṭara, "it (an animal) lashed its tail up and down or from side to side." The seesaw action of the beam of the manjanīq suggested the name, which was also given to a rotating-beam irrigation machine. See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CCXXVI; Lane, Lexicon, s.v.; Dozy, Supplément, I, 382.

With [projectiles] like men's heads [taken] from pieces of stone the evil man loads the sling.
It is as if over their heads there were flocks of dusky sand grouse taking flight in commotion.[554]
The shouts of the men come from beneath them, while the swinging beams hurl [their missiles].
Have you seen the unsheathed swords that men are brandishing in the markets?
Horses are prancing in its lanes, carrying Turks with sharpened daggers.
Naphtha and fire are in its roads;
its inhabitants are fleeing because of the smoke.
[878] Men run carrying plunder, while the city's wellborn women have exposed their ankle bracelets,[555]
Having gathered in the lanes:
their Concealer[556] has caused them to emerge into view.
Each is a woman who used to lie abed until midmorning, concealed from view, her visage not visible among her family.
The hidden damsel of the curtained chamber has emerged into public with her hair loose.
She trips over her gown; urging her to haste is a charge of horses whose hooves are being spurred on.
Distraught, she asks where the way is;
behind her the flames strive to reach her.
The sun has never unveiled her fair beauty,
but now war has unveiled her to touch her.
Have you seen the woman bereft of her child, wailing in the streets, running, overcome by fatigue,

553. The Leiden glossary suggests that the participle khāṭir is used to describe the operator of the manjanīq: "and its operator raises his voice." It is more likely that the term describes the beam of the machine and that the line refers to the sound it makes as it is fired.

554. The stones flung by the manjanīq are like the swift flight of flocks of desert sand grouse (qaṭā).

555. That is, as they run, their ankle bracelets become visible.

556. Sātir, the Concealer or Protector, is an epithet for God. A woman in danger of being seen in a state of undress would call out, "yā Sātir!" See Dozy, Supplément, I, 633.

Following a bier on which her only son, in his breast a spear wound, assails her [with grief]?
Wide [the wound]: its spacious place purges away dishonor;
he that pierced it shook it with the head of the spear.[557]
She looks at his face and cries of bereavement, while a flood of tears covers her.
The breath rattled in his throat, then he gave up the ghost, slain for naught, with no avenger to be feared.
I have seen the young men on the field of battle, their noses defiled in the dust.
Each was a young man who defended those he was honor-bound to protect:
kindlers of strife experienced distress in the fray because of him.
The dogs have spent the night by him, mangling him, their claws stained with blood.
Have you not seen the horses wheeling round with the men, their hindquarters wounded?
The horses trip over the handsome faces of the dead, and the skin around their hooves is smeared with blood.
They trample the livers of courageous young men, and their hooves split their skulls.
Have you not seen the women under the manjanīqs, striving with each other in running, their hair dissheveled:
Noble women, aged women, [879] and middle-aged spinsters; the young girls among them have had no experience?[558]

---

557. The text is uncertain and its meaning unclear to me. For ed. Leiden's murīduhā ("its desirer"), which is metrically impossible, ed. Cairo reads mirbaduhā ("its spacious place"), which is metrically possible but problematic in meaning. The line may describe the wound of the only son referred to in the previous verse. The Leiden editor's suggested emendation for the first hemistich, tulqī n-nuthāra min yadiha, "she [the distraught mother] scatters coins from her hand," hardly seems appropriate, even if such a funeral custom existed. In any case, the vocabulary of the line points to a context of spears and wounds. For the possibility of a spear's metaphorically "desiring" to make a wound, see Lane, Lexicon, III, 1184.

558. The text and meaning of the second hemistich are uncertain. The reading of ed. Leiden, lam tukhayyar ("have not been chosen") is impossible on metrical

They carry food made of flour on their shoulders, their headcloths bound tightly.
Both she who lived in poverty and she who was wealthy:
a stone crushes the head now of one, now of the other.
One asks about her family, having been despoiled;
even the rag on her head has been stripped away.
Would that I knew[559]—for fortune is full of changes, some desirable, and others whose occurrence is to be feared—
Will our land ever again be rich as once it was, now that its events have brought us to this end?
Who will deliver to Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn messages whose author has occupied himself with good counsel?—
That the best of rulers men have ever known, when their noble qualities are enumerated,
Is God's caliph among mankind, al-Ma'mūn, their rescuer[560] and restorer.
Toward him have aspired the hopes of his nation submissively, both the righteous and the sinner.
They expect an abundant rain of justice from his indications,
and the evidences of them reveal godliness.
They have praised policy on your part which has removed doubt, and other policy whose justifications are sound.[561]
They have joined together in obedience, through your gentleness, to al-Ma'mūn, those in the highlands and those in the lowlands.
You [Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn] are his ear among mankind, grounds. Ed. Cairo reads lam tuḥtabar, a form not attested in the dictionaries. Perhaps one should read lam takhtabir, which is what I have translated.

---

559. The translation follows ed. Cairo, yā layta shi'rī, rather than the emendation proposed by Leiden to make sense of an unintelligible manuscript reading.

560. The reading of ed. Cairo (muntāshuhā, "their rescuer, savior [from destruction]) is superior to that of ed. Leiden (sā'isuhā, "their manager, governor").

561. The parallelism of the line implies that the first "policy" or "behavior" (sīrah) refers to benefits bestowed, whereas the second reference is to punishments imposed. For this use of ma'dhirah ("justification, excuse") to refer to heavy-handed actions, see Lane, Lexicon, V, 1984.

and an eye whose sight never weakens;
So give thanks to Him who is Enthroned for the favor of His blessing:
whoever is thankful for favor becomes deserving of even more favor.[562]
Be on guard—ransom for you be your subjects and the armies, both those who are commanded in them and those who command.
Do not bring yourself into deep waters from which no one can emerge by skill.
Keep to the shallow water; do not embark upon the deep when its floods are in tumult.
Moderation! The road is full of branchings:
the most unlucky of them are those where [feet sink into] soft sand and that deviate.
You are now in a nation [880] whose latter-day [rulers] have departed from the guidance of its earliest [rulers].
But you are its skilled manager and guide:
will you compel it to the right?
Chastise men whose behavior you have seen,
who by their actions have violated the ordinance of the Book;
And extend to the people the hand of mercy, thereby rendering them free from want.
You are in a position to act with justice, for that is your intent, and destiny agrees with its extension.
People have seen that toward which their faces turn,
and its best men have been made to rule the nation.
Our[563] necks are turned toward you, whenever the nobles of the tribes assemble.
How many sincere counsels we have for you, for the sake of God and kinship whose props are strong!—
And a claim whose bonds have drawn [me] close to you, and another one—do you remember it?

562. The repetition of faḍl ["favor"] in each hemistich evokes the name of al-Faḍl b. Sahl ["Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn"].

563. Ed. Cairo reads, "its," i.e., the nation's.

Men's striving for knowledge causes them to make requests;
both those of them who travel in the evening and those who travel in the morning hasten.[564] Receive something [viz. a poem] bright as a mirror:
as it travels it will not become lost in any country.[565]
I have not composed it from greed or insolence:
every soul is subject to the command of its ruling passion.
God has caused it to travel bringing sincere advice and reverence; and its strands have been tightly woven.
It has come to you to relate matters to you,
as one might unroll a merchant's bolt of cloth.
I have caused it to be conveyed by a friend who is trustworthy, one who, because of admiration for it, will continually recite it.

The Battle at Qaṣr Ṣāliḥ

In this year, those who had been put in charge of Qaṣr Ṣāliḥ [the Palace of Ṣāliḥ] by Muḥammad [al-Amīn] went over [to Ṭāhir] on a promise of safety. In this year the battle that went against Ṭāhir's forces at Qaṣr Ṣāliḥ took place. The account of this battle follows.

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣʿab: Ṭāhir
[881] continued to vie in endurance with Muḥammad and his army, as I have described, until the people of Baghdad grew weary of fighting him. ʿAlī Farāhmard, who had been assigned to the Palaces of Ṣāliḥ and Sulaymān b. Abī Jaʿfar by Muḥammad [al-Amīn], wrote to ʿṬāhir, asking him for a promise of safety, and guaranteeing him that he would give him what was in his possession from that area to the bridges, including the *manjanīq*s and *ʿarrādah*s that were there. [Ṭāhir] accepted this from him and responded favorably to his request. By night he sent to him[566] Abū al-ʿAbbās Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb al-Bādhaghīsī, 564. The sense is not clear. I vocalize the last word of the first hemistich as muṭlibuhum, following Lane, Lexicon, V, 1846.

565. The idea may be that the fame of the poem will spread far and wide, reaching all lands.

566. Possibly "to the palace"; the Arabic is ambiguous.

the commander of his police, along with those of his commanders and valiant horsemen whom he had joined to the latter. On the eve of Saturday, the middle day of Jumādā II of the year 197,[567] ['Alī Farāhmard] handed over everything that Muḥammad had put him in charge of. Muḥammad b. 'Īsā [b. Nahīk], Muḥammad's chief of police, also asked for a promise of safety from [Ṭāhir]. He had been fighting along with the Africans (Afāriqah), men from the prisons, and rabble (awbāsh). Muḥammad b. 'Īsā had not been in any way insincere in regard to Muḥammad and was redoubtable in war. When these two went over to Ṭāhir on a promise of safety, Muḥammad was on the brink of destruction. So disquieted that he could not remain at rest, he resigned himself [to his fate] and went to the gate of [the palace of] Umm Ja'far[568] to await what would happen. Irregulars (ghuwāt) consisting of vagrants ('ayyārūn), street vendors, and soldiers came, and the two sides fought each other inside and outside Qaṣr Ṣāliḥ until the day became advanced.

Abū al-'Abbās Yūsuf b. Ya'qūb al-Bādhaghīsī was killed inside Qaṣr [Ṣāliḥ], along with the important commanders and chiefs who were with him. Farāhmard and his forces fought outside Qaṣr [Ṣāliḥ], until he was defeated and withdrew to Ṭāhir. No battle before or after was more difficult for Ṭāhir's forces than this one; none resulted in more dead, injured, and [882] disabled among Ṭāhir's forces than this battle. The factions[569] composed a great deal of poetry about it, mentioning the intense fighting that occurred in the war. The mob (ghawghā') and 567. According to Wüstenfeld-Mahler, the middle day of Jumādā II (the 14th day of a month of twenty-nine days) in 197 fell on Sunday, February 14, 813. Possibly, the previous thirty-day month was ended a day early, so that the 14th fell on Saturday, February 13. In any case, 'Alī Farāhmard surrendered during the night between Friday and Saturday.

568. This palace, named after al-Amīn's mother, Zubaydah ("Umm Ja'far"), was also called al-Qarār Palace. It was on the west bank of the Tigris, about half a mile south of al-Khuld Palace, between the Main Bridge and the Lower Bridge. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 102–3.

569. Accepting the reading ḥizab of ed. Leiden and interpreting it as a plural of ḥazbah, which is attested by Dozy, Supplément, I, 281, in this meaning. The reading is suspect. Ed. Cairo reads al-shu'arā', "the poets."

rabble [ri'ā'] composed [poetry] about it. Among what was said about it were the verses of [al-Ḥusayn] al-Khalī':[570]

God's Amīn, trust in God,[571] and you shall be granted endurance and help.
Entrust the matter to God,
and God the Almighty will protect you.
Victory will be ours with God's help—
the attack, and not the retreat;
Whereas for the renegades, your enemies, will come a day of evil and defeat.
Many a cup that spews forth death,
hateful its taste and bitter,
Have we been made to drink, and we have made them drink of it;
but the thirst was with them.[572]
Thus it is with war—sometimes it is against us, and sometimes for us.

According to one of the Abnā': Ṭāhir dispersed his messengers and wrote to the commanders, Hāshimītes, and others, after he had taken their estates and properties, inviting them to a promise of safety [amān] and to join in repudiating Muḥammad and in swearing allegiance to al-Ma'mūn. A group went over to him, including 'Abdallāh b. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah al-Ṭā'ī and his brothers, the children of al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah, Yaḥyā b. 'Alī b. Māhān, and Muḥammad b. Abī al-'Āṣ.[573] Some of the commanders and Hāshimites corresponded with him in secret, and their hearts and inclinations came to be on his side.

After the battle of Qaṣr Ṣāliḥ, Muḥammad turned to diversion and drink. He entrusted matters to Muḥammad b. 'Īsā b.

570. This poem, which was recited in al-Amīn's presence to celebrate the victory over Ṭāhir at Qaṣr Ṣāliḥ, is said to have earned the poet a reward of 10,000 dirhams. It is quoted in Aghānī, VI, 202; also Mas'ūdī, VI, 458–59.

571. The hemistich puns on the meaning of al-Amīn's name, "the trustworthy one." One might translate "Trustworthy one of God, trust in God."

572. That is, they were the ones who drank deeply of the drink of death. Variant in Mas'ūdī: "but the last [draught] of it was for them."

573. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 190, reads, "Muḥammad b. Abī al-'Abbās al-Ṭā'ī."

Nahīk and al-Hirsh. From the streets and gates near them, [883] the two of them placed their agents in the city gates, suburbs, al-Karkh market, the Tigris quays, al-Muḥawwal Gate,[574] and al-Kunāsah.[575] The thieves and criminals of these areas despoiled anyone they were able to lay hands on—men, women, and infirm people from the [Muslim] community and non-Muslims.[576] They did things the likes of which we have never heard to have happened in any other countries at war.

When this had gone on a long time for the people and Baghdad had become oppressive for its inhabitants, those who had the strength to do so left the city after the oppressive exactions, painful affliction, and great danger. Ṭāhir admonished his forces to behave quite differently: he was strict in this and treated suspicious characters roughly. He commanded Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid to protect the weak and women and to give them gifts and relief. When a man or a woman escaped from the hands of al-Hirsh's forces and reached Ṭāhir's forces, their fear would depart and they would feel secure. The woman would display whatever gold and silver, goods, or fine clothing she had. People therefore said that [the situation of] Ṭāhir's forces, the forces and companions of al-Hirsh, and the people who had escaped was like the parable of the wall, concerning which God, whose Name is exalted, said:[577] "And a wall shall be set up between them, having a door on whose inward side is mercy, and on whose outward side is chastisement." After the people's tribulation had gone on a long time, their condition became very bad and they were unable to endure it any longer. Concerning this, one of the young men of Baghdad said:[578]

I wept blood over Baghdad, when I lost the ease of a pleasant life.

574. Al-Muḥawwal Gate was located about three-quarters of a mile from the al-Kūfah Gate of the Round City, on the southwest. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 146.

575. Al-Kunāsah ("Place of Sweepings") was an open space about 2 miles west of al-Muḥawwal Gate on the main road. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 150.

576. Ahl al-dhimmah: protected monotheists, Jews and Christians.

577. Qur'ān 57:13.

578. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 190–91, quotes fourteen verses of the poem with variants; Mas'ūdī, VI, 460, quotes twelve verses with variants.

We have been given sorrow in exchange for joy, and in exchange for plenty we have been given scarcity.
[884] The [evil] eye of the envious has afflicted Baghdad, and has caused its people to perish by the manjanīq.
Here are people who have been overcome and burned by the fire, and here a woman is mourning for a drowned man.
Here a woman is shouting, "Alas the day!"
and here one is crying over the loss of someone dear.
Here a dark-eyed woman, pleasing of mien,
in a shift anointed with perfume,
Is fleeing from the fire into the looting, while her father is fleeing [from the looting] into the fire.
One who stole [the beauty of] her eyes from the gazelle, and whose teeth are like the flash of lightning—
[All these], as bewildered as beasts being led to the sacrifice, pensive, wearing necklaces around their throats,
Call on someone to take pity, but there is none to take pity:
brother has lost brother.
Here are people who have been expelled from the shade of this world:
their property is being sold in every market.
[885] Here a stranger, whose home is close,[579] lies headless in the middle of the road.
He was caught in the middle of all their fighting, and people do not know to which party [he belonged].
Child does not remain to care for his father, and friend has fled without friend.
Whatever I may forget of the past,
I will always remember [the battle of] Dār al-Raqīq.[580]

It has been mentioned: One of Ṭāhir's Khurāsānian commanders, a man of courage and strength, went out one day to fight. Seeing some unclothed[581] men without weapons, he said to his companions in scorn and contempt, "Are only these

579. The sense is uncertain. The variant in Mas'ūdī, "far from home," makes more sense.
580. See note 507. This may refer to the battle described on p. 176, below.
581. See note 519.

whom I see fighting us?" "Yes," he was told, "these whom you see are the plague!" "Fie on you," he said, "shrinking from them and holding back, when you have splendid weapons, equipment, and strength, as well as your bravery and courage! What could the devices of these I see accomplish, when they have no weapons, no equipment, and no armor to protect them?" So he strung his bow and went forward. One of the men [on the other side] saw him and went toward him with a pitch-covered reed mat in his hand and a horse's nose bag full of stones under his arm. Whenever the Khurāsānian shot an arrow, the vagrant ('ayyār) covered himself, and the arrow fell on his mat or near him. He would then take it and put it into a part of his reed mat he had prepared for that purpose and had fashioned like a quiver. Whenever an arrow fell, he would take it and cry [886] out, "A dāniq!"—that is to say, he had obtained the value of the arrow, which was a dāniq.[582] The Khurāsānian and the vagrant continued at this until the Khurāsānian exhausted his arrows. He then rushed at the vagrant to strike him with his sword. The latter took a stone out of his bag, put it into a sling, hurled it, and did not miss the man's eye. Then he hurled another and would have knocked the man off his horse, had he not dodged it. The man wheeled round and retreated, saying, "These people are not human beings!"[583]

[Continuing, the narrator of this account] said: It has been related to me that when the story of the man was told to Ṭāhir, he was moved to laughter and excused the Khurāsānian from going out to fight. One of the poets of Baghdad said concerning this:[584]

These wars have brought out men who belong neither to war's Qaḥṭān nor to its Nizār:[585]
A company in woolen coats of mail

582. The dāniq or dānaq was a small coin, one-sixth of a dirham.

583. That is, they fight like demons (jinn), rather than men (ins). Cf. Fragmenta, 334: "These people are not men; they are jinn."

584. Mas'ūdī identifies the author as the blind poet 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

585. That is, they belong to none of the famous lineages of the Arabs—Qaḥṭān being the ancestor of the South Arabian tribes, and Nizār an ancestor of the North Arabian tribes.

who go into battle like ravenous lions.
Upon them are neck protectors made of palm fronds, which serve instead of helmets, and shields of reed mats.
They do not know what flight is, when even heroes seek refuge from the spears in flight.
One of them rushes to attack
two thousand—naked, not having even a waist wrapper.
They young fellow says, when he strikes a spear thrust, "Take that from the vagrant lad ('ayyār)!"
[887] How many a noble (sharīf) has war rendered of no repute!
How many a gambler and cutpurse has it exalted!

Ṭāhir Forbids Boatmen to Bring Anything to Baghdad[586]

According to Muḥammad b. Jarīr [al-Ṭabarī]: In this year, Ṭāhir forbade boatmen and others to bring anything to Baghdad, except to the people who were in his camp. He established surveillance over them for this purpose. A report of what took place between him and the forces of Muḥammad the Deposed in this and Ṭāhir's reason for doing so follows.

The reason for this, according to what has been related, was as follows: When so many of his forces were killed or wounded at Qaṣr Ṣāliḥ, Ṭāhir was pained and troubled. Never had he had a battle that had not gone in his favor, rather than against him. Feeling troubled, he ordered razing and burning. He tore down the houses of those who opposed him between the Tigris, Dār al-Raqīq, and the Syrian Gate, and [from] al-Kūfah Gate to the Ṣarāt Canal, the mills of Abū Ja'far,[587] the suburb of Ḥumayd, the Karkhāyā Canal, and al-Kunāsah.[588] He began to make

586. The following paragraph and the accompanying heading are not in the manuscript on which the Leiden edition was based. The translation follows ed. Cairo.

587. Apparently, this was another name the Patrician's Mill (Raḥā al-Baṭrīq), on the Ṣarāt Canal close to al-Kūfah Gate on the southwest side of the Round City. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 142, and note 536, above.

588. The suburb of Ḥumayd, named after a fief granted to Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah, was located along the Muḥawwal Road, going west from al-Kūfah Gate. The Karkhāyā Canal paralleled this road, and al-Kunāsah (see note 575) lay farther west along it. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 147–48.

attacks on Muḥammad's forces during the night and just before daybreak. Every day he gained possession of one district after another, dug trenches around them, [and set] watchposts of soldiers [in them]. Muḥammad's forces also began to demolish, adding [to the destruction]. Ṭāhir's forces would wreck a house and depart, whereupon Muḥammad's forces would pull off its doors and roofing and would be even more damaging in their depredations upon their own people than Ṭāhir's forces were. One of their poets—some say he was 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Warrāq al-'Itrī—said about this:[589]

Every day we have a breach we cannot close;
they increase in regard to what they seek, and we decrease.
Whenever they tear down a house, we take its roofing, [888] and wait for yet another one [to be torn down].
Whenever they strive their utmost in evil,
our mob strives even more than they to do evil.
They have hemmed in every broad place of our land;
they have come to have people in it and have stayed.
They start the quarry with drums; if there appears to them the face of game nearby, they hunt it down.
They have destroyed the lands east and west for us, and we do not know where to go.
When they are present, they speak of what they know;
and if they see nothing ugly, they conjecture.[590]
No one kills brave men like an experienced man, a messenger of death, who roves as a thief by night.
You see the hero famous in every town,
if he ever sees an "unclothed one,"[591] show his fear.
If a vigorous man sees him, limping back on his heels for fear he retreats.
He will sell you the head of a young man for a dirham;
if he says, "I will get it cheaper," he will do it.
How many among us who slay one of them [889]

589. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 192, quotes the first eight verses with variants; Mas'ūdī, VI, 464, quotes ten verses with variants.

590. The text may be corrupt. The sense is difficult. The word translated "conjecture" (takharraṣū) can also mean "speak falsehood."

591. I.e., one of the irregular troops.

will, in recompense for his death, have his sins purged away!
You see him, if he proclaims a truce (amān), coming forth to single combat; sometimes he signs at us, and sometimes he singles [us] out.
Our Qur'ān readers have given authorization to fight them, so that any man killed has been killed only by someone who has received authorization.

He also said about this:[592]

People are in the midst of destruction and movement from place to place;
they have spoken allusively, spreading rumors.
You who ask about their condition,
your eye will suffice you instead of asking.
Once they said "Allāhu akbar!" referring to the Merciful One;
now they say "Allāhu akbar!" for battle.[593]
Cast your eyes upon their host;
wait for relief, and count the nights.
No one remains in Baghdad but he to whom poverty clings, who has many children to support.[594]
No mother protects her home, nor does her brother protect it, nor anyone else.
He has no wealth but a spear;
his spear in his hand is his capital.
[890] It was the lesser [of evils] to God, so He provided for his hands, because of his misery, the killing of men [as a means of support].
If this condition comes upon anyone, his end is to be killed, in any event!

---

592. Mas'ūdī, VI, 465–66, quotes eight verses, attributing them to the blind poet 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

593. That is, they use the slogan "God is most great!" as a battle cry. Literally, "Once their takbīr was for al-Raḥmān; now their takbīr is for fighting."

594. Mas'ūdī adds after this line: "Or a man who has escaped from prison, who is neither an Arab nor one of the mawālī." The line, "He has no wealth but a spear" seems to continue the sense of this line that Ṭabarī omits.

Why are we being killed for their sake?
Praise be to Thee, O God of glory!

He also said:

I will never leave Baghdad,
no matter who departs or who stays.
So long as sustenance supports us, we do not care afterwards who is the imām.

According to 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Malik al-'Itrī: When Ṭāhir saw that they were not heeding the killing, destruction, and burning, he commanded that merchants be forbidden to take any flour or other commodities from his district into the City of Abū Ja'far, al-Sharqiyyah, and al-Karkh.[595] He commanded that boats coming from al-Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ be diverted at Ṭarnāyā onto the Euphrates, thence to al-Muḥawwal al-Kabīr, then into the Ṣarāt [Canal], and then into the trench by al-Anbār Gate.[596] Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab for a certain price would give protection up to Baghdad: from each ship containing cargo he took from 1,000 to 2,000 or even 3,000 dirhams, more or less. Ṭāhir's agents and forces in Baghdad did the same or worse on all the roads of the city. Prices rose. People were caught in the tightest kind of siege. Many of them despaired of relief and [891] ease. Those who had left the city were glad; those who had remained regretted that they had done so.

In this year, Ibn 'Ā'ishah asked Ṭāhir for a guarantee of safety. He had fought on Muḥammad's side for a time in al-Yāsiriyyah.

The Battle of al-Kunāsah

In this year, Ṭāhir placed some of his commanders in [various] parts of Baghdad. He placed al-'Alā' b. al-Waḍḍāḥ al-Azdī with his companions and those he attached to him in al-

595. The translation follows the text of ed. Cairo, rather than ed. Leiden, which is corrupt at this point.

596. On the Trench of Ṭāhir and al-Anbār Gate, located about 1 mile due west of the Syrian Gate of the Round City, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 109–11.

Waḍḍāḥiyyah[597] over al-Muḥawwal al-Kabīr. He placed Nu'aym b. al-Waḍḍāḥ, the brother of al-'Alā', with the Turks and others who were with him next to the suburb of Abī Ayyūb on the shore of the al-Ṣarāt [Canal]. He fought continually[598] for months. Both sides held firm. During this time, they fought a battle in al-Kunāsah. Ṭāhir directed it in person. Many of Muḥammad's forces were killed in it. 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Malik [al-Warrāq] said:[599]

Sunday's battle was something that will be spoken of forever.
How many bodies have I seen thrown down, and how much blood!
For one onlooker
death was lying in wait:
A stray arrow came upon him and tore through his liver.
Someone cries out, "O my father!"
and someone cries out, "O my son!"
Many a man is floating drowned, who once was strong in endurance.
No one has missed him,
except the "ladies of the town."[600]
And how many a person has been lost who was valiant, who was dear to the bereaved:
He was among the onlookers
in front, very silent.[601]
[892] If he had set eyes on what
[the bereaved] has set eyes on, he would not have returned.

---

597. Al-Waḍḍāhiyyah is the reading of ed. Cairo. The manuscript used for ed. Leiden has an undotted word that the editor conjecturally read as bi-l-rābiṭah ("at the post or garrison"). Al-Waḍḍāḥiyyah lay just outside the al-Baṣrah Gate of the Round City. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 58, 92.

598. Literally, "he went out early in the morning to fight and late in the afternoon."

599. Mas'ūdī, VI, 467–68, quotes sixteen lines and attributes them the blind poet 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

600. On banāt al-balad as prostitutes, see ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CXLIII.

601. Ed. Leiden reads shadīda l-kharadi ("stong of bashfulness, virginity, or silence"). Ed. Cairo reads shadīda l-ḥaradi ("strong of anger").

There remains no mature man of them who has escaped, nor any youth.
Ṭāhir's ravenousness is like the ravenousness of a lion.
He has pitched his tent, not to depart, on the battlefield, like a man who does not quit his abode.
His eyes emit at the time of battle a blaze of fire.
One person says, "They have killed a thousand, but not any more."
Another says, "Yea, more; indeed, the slain cannot be counted."
One person flees toward them, dreading the fear of the morrow.
In vain! You will see of those who have passed away not a one!
Those who have passed away will never return to those who remain, even to all eternity.
I said to one who had been pierced by a spear, but whose spirit within him had not yet perished:[602]
"Who are you—alas for you, poor man—in relation to Muḥammad?"
He replied, "Not through kinship am I close [to him], nor am I from a town [of his].
"I have never seen him at all, and have never received of him any gift."[603]
And he said, "Not because of error did I fight, nor out of good sense;
"But only for something immediate that comes from him into my hand."

According to 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Malik: Muḥammad commanded Zurayḥ, his slave (ghulām), to search for money and to demand it from people who held deposits in safekeeping and [893]

602. The last word of the line is problematic. The translation follows ed. Cairo's lam tabid(ī). Ed. Leiden reads ta'adi, with the note sic in codice. Perhaps this should be vocalized lam ta'ud(ī) from the root '-w-d, "to decline, return."

603. Ṣafad means both "bond" and "gift."

from others. He commanded al-Hirsh to obey Zurayḥ. He would force his way into people's houses, raid them by night, and make seizures on mere suspicion. In this way he collected a great deal of money and ruined many people. People escaped [from Baghdad] on the pretext of going on the pilgrimage. The rich fled. Al-Qarāṭīsī said concerning this:[604]

They have pretended to be making the pilgrimage, though not intending to make it;
rather, they want to flee from al-Hirsh.
How many people were living a life of well-being,
when al-Hirsh was deputed to bring ruin upon them!
Anyone whose house Zurayḥ searches experiences humiliation and is visited by plundering.

The Battle of Darb al-Ḥijārah

In this year, the Battle of Darb al-Ḥijārah[605] took place. A report of it follows.

It has been mentioned: This battle, which took place in the vicinity of Darb al-Ḥijārah, went in favor of Muḥammad's forces and against Ṭāhir's. Many people were killed in it. Concerning this, 'Amr b. 'Abd al-Malik al-'Itrī said:

Saturday's battle, the day of Darb al-Ḥijārah, cut off a company of onlookers.
That was after they wore themselves out, but our rabble killed them with stones.
He came to the shūrajīs[606] with intent to kill;
he said, "I want the command for you."
[894] He was met by men each of whom was a suspicious thief

604. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 190, quotes the first two verses; Mas'ūdī, VI, 496, quotes the poem and attributes it to the blind poet 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

605. Darb al-Ḥijārah ("Street of Stones") was the location of a bridge that crossed the Karkhāyā Canal that paralleled the main road from the al-Kūfah Gate to Muḥawwal. Al-Kunāsah was located on the same road, about 1 mile to the west. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 150–51, 308.

606. The lacuna in the Leiden text of this hemistich is filled by ed. Cairo. A shūrajī [from Persian shūra, nitre] was either a slave employed in making salt-encrusted land fit for agriculture or the master of such land. See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CCCXIX.

who had spent his term in prison for mischief,
One who had nothing on to conceal himself, whose penis stood up like a minaret.
So they retreated from them, although in the past they had fought well in every attack.
To us, these are the same as those:
they respect no man or woman with a right to protection.[607]
Everyone who was obscure has become a chief, living a life of comfort and abundance:
Every day he carries in his right hand
a spear with a pennant on top.
The Mother of Evil has brought him forth from her house to seek plunder—his vagrant mother.
He speaks abusively to people; he does not care for nice words when he abuses, nor does he hint.
This is not a time of the noble and generous man;
this is the time of villains, people of evil nature.
Fighting once used to be fighting;
today, O Most High, it is a trade.

He also said: [895]

A reed mat coated with pitch on the back—
Muḥammad and Manṣūr are in it.
Strength and security are their watchwords, and their saying is, "The wall has been taken."
What benefit will there be for you in their wall, when you are slain or taken prisoner?
Your horsemen have been killed in conflict, and many of your homes have been destroyed.
Bring for yourselves a single leader who is well mannered, in whose face there is light.
You who ask about our condition,
Muḥammad is in the palace, besieged.

607. Ed. Cairo fills in the lacuna in the Leiden text of this hemistich.

The Battle of al-Shammāsiyyah Gate

In this year, a battle took place at al-Shammāsiyyah Gate.[608] Harthamah was taken prisoner in it. A report of the reasons for the battle, how it took place, and its results follows.

According to ʿAlī b. Yazīd, who said: Harthamah was encamped at the Bīn Canal (Nahr Bīn), protected by a wall and trench. He had prepared *manjanīq*s and *ʿarrādah*s, and had stationed ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Waḍḍāḥ at al-Shammāsiyyah. From time to time he would go forth, but he would halt at the Khurāsān Gate,[609] fearful of the men of the army, not desiring to fight. He would summon the people to his cause, but they would abuse him verbally and mock him. So he would stand [896] for a time and then depart. Ḥātim b. al-Ṣaqr was one of Muḥammad's commanders. He had agreed with his forces—unclothed ones and vagrants (ʿayyārūn)—that they would give battle to ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Waḍḍāḥ by night. They descended upon ʿUbaydallāh suddenly, while he was unaware, and launched an attack on him, driving him from his position. He retreated in defeat, and they captured from him horses, weapons, and much equipment. Ḥātim b. al-Ṣaqr took control of al-Shammāsiyyah. When the news reached Harthamah, he brought his forces up to reinforce (ʿUbaydallāh) and to drive off the army from him back to its position. Muḥammad's forces came to [fight] him, and fighting broke out between them. One of "the unclothed" took Harthamah prisoner, not recognizing him. One of Harthamah's companions attacked the man, cut off his hand, and freed Harthamah. The latter came back in defeat. When news about him reached the men of his camp, it collapsed totally, and its men went fleeing in panic toward Ḥulwān. Night and their preoccupation with plundering and taking prisoners hindered Muḥammad's forces from pursuit. I have been told that the men of Harthamah's army did not make their way back for two days. The "unclothed ones" became stronger because of what had come into their hands. Many poems were written about that battle. One of them is the following by 'Amr al-Warrāq:

608. Al-Shammāsiyyah Gate was located at the northern extremity of al-Shammāsiyyah quarter on the east bank of the Tigris, at the point where the main road north to al-Mawṣil left al-Shammāsiyyah. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 170, 199.

609. That is, the Khurāsān Gate of al-Mukharrim quarter on the East Bank, not to be confused with the similarly named gate of the Round City. See Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 385 (note 5).

A naked one who owns no shirt goes forth in the morning to look for a shirt.
He assaults someone who has a coat of mail that blinds the eyes with its brightness.
In his hand is a banner
red that gleams like jewels.
He is eager to seek fighting,
more eager than a man who seeks pleasure.
He is easy to be led, as if he were going forth to eat date candy.
He is a marauding lion, who has always been an accomplished chief of robbers.
He is bolder and more resolute in advancing in battle than a wounded lion.
He approaches on a contemptible mount,
and his stock is from the worst stock.
He escapes, if escape occurs, [897]
on something fleeter than a young camel.
A man in armor, if exposed to his murderous intent, has no place of refuge.
How many a brave horseman has he sold at a cheap price!
He calls out, "Oh who will buy the head of an armored man for a handful of dates?"

One of Harthamah's companions said:

Time comes to an end, but their fighting never ends:
houses are pulled down, and wealth diminishes.
People are unable to do what they have sought to do:
they cannot fend off ruin, no matter how they try.
They bring us a report in which there is no light;
every day there are stories about the sons of harlotry.

When news of what the "unclothed ones" and Ḥātim b.

al-Ṣaqr had done to 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Waḍḍāḥ and Harthamah reached Ṭāhir, it grieved and distressed him. He commanded that a floating bridge be thrown across the Tigris above al-Shammāsiyyah. He dispatched his forces and set them in order; he himself went forth with them to the bridge. They crossed over toward the enemy and fought them in very fierce fighting. He reinforced them with his men periodically, until they turned back Muḥammad's forces and made them leave al-Shammāsiyyah. He sent 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Waḍḍāḥ and Harthamah back to the places that had been abandoned.[610]

After the victory of the "unclothed ones," Muḥammad had given out 2 million dirhams [in pay] by taking apart his palaces and audience rooms (majālis) at al-Khayzurāniyyah. Now, the forces of Ṭāhir burned them all—the roofs had been gilded—and killed many of the "unclothed ones" and looters. Concerning this, 'Amr al-Warrāq says:[611]

Two heavy things[612] and Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn came upon us the morning of Monday.
[898] They assembled their host at night and proclaimed:
"Seek your vengeance today for al-Ḥusayn."[613]
They beat their drum, and to [fight] them rushed men, each of them strong of spear and forearm.
You who were slain on the plain, who were cast down on the shore,

---

610. Wa-radda al-mahājir / muhājir 'Ubaydallāh ibn al-Waḍḍāḥ wa-Harthamah. This might mean, "He sent 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Waḍḍāḥ and Harthamah back to al-Muhājir," taking al-Muhājir as a place name. Such a place is attested (Le Strange, Baghdad, 59), but it was next to al-Kūfah Gate of the Round City, whereas the context implies that the two men reoccupied the positions in al-Shammāsiyyah, across the river from the Round City. I therefore take mahājir to be equivalent to mahājir, "abandoned places."

611. Mas'ūdī, VI, 471, quotes the lines with variants.

612. According to the lexicons, thaqalāni ("two heavy things") can mean two armies (because they are heavy in assault), or mankind and the jinn (because anything held in esteem can be called a thaqal). See Lane, Lexicon, I, 344. There is some uncertainty about the reading, which is Guyard's emendation of manuscript ba'lāni ("two lords"). Neither the original reading nor the emendation fits the meter, although the emendation is possible by poetic license.

613. That is, vengeance for al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān. See pp. 108–14, above, for the circumstances surrounding his death.

the object of whose love was among Ṭayyi' of the Two Mountains:
What was in your hands? If the people had made peace, would you have been in need?
Were you a vizier or a commander? Nay, you were as far from both things as the stars of the Little Dipper.
How many a keen-sighted man went out early with two eyes to see the situation [of the armies] and came back with one eye!
They do not miss what they intend:
their archers aim only at the eyes.
You who ask me about them, they are the worst people
I have ever seen among mankind; no others are like these two:
The worst of those still alive or those who have passed on—of those who have passed on or those I have seen among the two heavy things (sc. mankind and jinn).

When what Ṭāhir had done was reported to Muḥammad, it caused him great distress and anxiety. A secretary to Kawthar [899] mentioned that Muḥammad composed the following verses, or that someone composed them and attributed them to him:

I have been sorely afflicted by the most brave-hearted among men and jinn, who, when he excels, is like nothing else that excels.
With every man of power he has a spy who watches him and knows what he says.
He is not inattentive to something because of stubbornness, when an inattentive person would cause an affair to fail.

In this year, Muḥammad's situation weakened, and he became certain that he would perish. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim b. Khuzaymah fled from Baghdad to al-Madā'in.

According to al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk: When he realized that Muḥammad entertained suspicions about him, and that low persons and rabble were biased against him, 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim b. Khuzaymah became worried about himself and his property. He made his way to al-Madā'in at night in boats with his dependents and children and stayed there. He was not present at any of the fighting.

According to someone else: Ṭāhir sent a letter to him and warned him that his estates would be seized and that he would be liquidated. So he took warning, escaped from the strife, and remained safe. One of his relatives said concerning this:

Ibn Khāzim was not cowardly in the face of rowdies, riffraff, and inferior persons:
But he feared the assault of a lion, crushing in his strength, famous for his aggressiveness.

When his action became known among the people, the merchants of al-Karkh met among themselves and said, "We ought to disclose our position to Ṭāhir and show him that we are innocent of giving aid against him." They assembled and drafted a letter informing him that they were obedient and well disposed toward him because of what they had heard: namely, his commitment to obeying God, upholding the right, and repressing wrongdoers. They did not look on the war as legitimate, let alone fight [in it]. Anyone from their side who advocated [900] it did not belong to them. "The common thoroughfares were choked with them. Indeed, the men . . . ,[614] nor do they own houses or real estate in al-Karkh. They are either cutpurses, makers and sellers of sweets,[615] or people from the prisons. Their only shelters are the baths and mosques. The merchants among them are mere street vendors who deal in trifles. A woman is forced to support herself by the mercy of a pimp for a while before she can escape.[616] An old man even falls on his face from weakness. A person carrying a purse in his waistband or in his hand has it cut away from him. We have no might or power against them, nor do we have anything for ourselves with them [here]. Indeed, some of us remove the stones from the road

614. There is a lacuna in the manuscript. The words with which ed. Cairo attempts to fill the lacuna turn out to be a dittography from the previous line.

615. Sawwāṭ wa-naṭṭāf: makers and sellers of nāṭif, a sweet paste that had to be kneaded a long time, drawn out, and pounded. See Fagnan, Additions, 83, s.v. sawwāṭ.

616. The translation follows the Leiden text as interpreted in Glossarium, CDXXXI. Ed. Cairo differs, but also seems to have suffered corruption: "A man meets a woman in the press of people, and the two tarry (yaltaththāni, an otherwise unattested form of the root l.th.th) before escaping."

because of the tradition (ḥadīth) concerning this that has been reported from the Prophet, may God bless him and grant him peace; how then [would we fail to act] if we had power to prevail against those it would benefit religion and life in this world to have kept off the street, put permanently into prison, and banished from the land, and [if we had power] to stop greed and riot and banish vice, purse-snatching, and stealing? God forbid that any of us should make war on you!"

It has been mentioned that they wrote a petition concerning this and that some men arranged[617] to slip through to him with it. But those who were wise and prudent among them said to them, "Do not think that Ṭāhir does not understand this or that he is unable to send spies among you and against you, so that it is as if he were present among you. The best plan is not to make yourselves conspicuous with this; for we cannot be sure but that if some base person sees you, it will lead to your destruction and the loss of your property. The danger of your being exposed to these base persons is too fearful for you to seek to clear yourself from disgrace in the eyes of Ṭāhir. Indeed, if you were sinners and wrongdoers, you would be more likely to receive his pardon, mercy, and forgiveness. So put your trust in God, who is blessed and exalted, and forbear." They deferred to them and forbore. Ibn Abī Ṭālib, the blind [poet], said:[618]

Never mind the people of the streets, for soon [901]
the claws of the lion will get them.
The membrane around strong hearts will be torn asunder;
soon they will go into the grave.
God will destroy all of them because of greed[619] and wickedness.

It has been mentioned: Al-Hirsh went out, and with him the rabble, "unclothed ones," and a multitude of all sorts of people,

617. The translation follows ed. Cairo's itta'ada qawmun, rather than ed. Leiden's anfadhū qawman ("they dispatched men"). The passage makes it clear that the petition was never sent. The two words are similar in Arabic script.

618. Quoted in Mas'ūdī, VI, 470.

619. Variant in Mas'ūdī: "rebellion."

and made his way to the Island of al-'Abbās.[620] A party of Ṭāhir's men came forth, and the two sides fought violently. It was a section in which no fighting had taken place, but after that day it became a battlefield. In the end, the victory went to [Ṭāhir]; however, on the first day of the fighting, Muḥammad's forces gained the upper hand over Ṭāhir's forces, until they drove them back to the house of Abū Yazīd al-Sharawī.[621] The people of the suburbs in the areas next to the al-Anbār Gate Road became frightened.

It has been mentioned: When Ṭāhir saw this, he dispatched one of his commanders to them. He was occupied in many directions, fighting off Muḥammad's forces from them. He inflicted a heavy blow on them there: many men drowned in the Ṣarāt [Canal], and others were killed. Concerning the defeat of Ṭāhir on the first [day],[622] 'Amr al-Warrāq said:

Ṭāhir's crier announced in our presence,
"People, desist; remain at home.
"Tomorrow will come to you; so beware
[a lion with a wide jaw in which there is . . .]"[623]
Then the rabble arose to confront him after midnight, before the prayer [of dawn].
On Saturday, they left his army confounded and silent in the darkness of night.

About the battle that went against Muḥammad's forces, he said:

How many a slain man have we seen!
We did not ask him why!—

620. Jazīrat al-'Abbās, or more commonly, al-Jazīrah al-'Abbāsiyyah, was a large area, about one and one-half miles in length and half a mile in width, located west of the Round City, between two branches of the Ṣarāt Canal, which split below the plot and reunited above it. It had been granted as a fief to al-'Abbās, brother of the caliph al-Manṣūr, and was celebrated for its fertility. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 142.

621. That is, toward the Round City. The house of Abū Yazīd al-Sharawī was on the northwest side of the square outside al-Kūfah Gate. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 59.

622. The bracketed word is from ed. Cairo.

623. The second hemistich of the line is found only in ed. Cairo; the manuscript used by ed. Leiden has a lacuna. The last word of the line in ed. Cairo, 'uyūt, is not recorded in any dictionary and almost certainly is corrupt.

One wearing mail, whom a "naked one"
met with violence and recklessness:
If the former met the latter with a spear, [902]
the latter met the former with boasting[624]—
An Ethiopian who kills people over a piece of canvas,
Cloaked in [only] the sun, content with every sustenance that is wished for.
He makes an attack and kills none but the head of an army:
Such as 'Alī Afrāhamard,[625] or 'Alā', or Quraysh.
Beware of a shot, O Ṭāhir, from the hand of the little Ethiopian!

'Amr al-Warrāq also said concerning this:

The beauty of Baghdad has departed—and it indeed possessed beauty.
Every day there has broken it
one shock after another.
The earth has raised a cry unto God from the abomination, crying aloud.
O you who have been slain,
you are not following the religion of the [true] way.
Would that I knew what you gained when you journeyed by night.
Was it to Paradise that you were sent,
or are you being sent to the Fire?
Was it stones that killed you, or were you killed perforce by spears?
If you fought in piety,
then a thousand pilgrimages be upon us![626]

According to 'Alī b. Yazīd—a certain eunuch (khādim): Muḥammad ordered that whatever remained in the already

624. A pun is involved, since faysh means both "boasting" and "glans penis"—alluding to the "unclothed" state of the irregular troops.
625. He is referred to elsewhere by the variant name Farāhmard.
626. That is, to expiate the sin of murder.

despoiled storehouses should be sold. However, those in charge of them concealed[627] what was in them, to steal [it]. Muḥammad's situation became increasingly precarious: he had lost what he possessed, and the men were demanding pay (arzāq). One day, in vexation at what was befalling him, he said, "I wish that God Almighty would kill the two sides, both of them,[628] and give people rest from them. Not a one of them but is an enemy—both those who are on our side and those [903] who are against us. The former want my money; the latter want my life." Some verses that he is said to have recited were mentioned to me:[629]

Disperse and leave me alone, you company of "helpers."
All of you are many-faced,[630]
as is the nature of human beings,
And I see nothing but deceit and false hopes.
I possess nothing—
ask my treasurers!
Alas for me, what has befallen me from the one who resides in the garden.[631]

[Continuing,] he said: Muḥammad's cause became weaker. His army dispersed and became frightened in its camp. He sensed that Ṭāhir was about to overcome him and defeat him.

In this year, al-'Abbās b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā led the pilgrimage. Ṭāhir sent him to be in charge of the ceremonies at the command of al-Ma'mūn. Dāwūd b. 'Īsā was in charge of Mecca in this year.

---

627. The translation follows the reading of ed. Cairo (katama). The original Leiden reading (kamma, "hid") is changed in the Addenda to lamma, "gathered up."

628. Ms. Ahmet III, 2929, the second manuscript used by ed. Cairo, ends at this point. The text of the remainder of this volume is based on the single manuscript available to the Leiden editor.

629. Mas'ūdī, VI, 472, quotes the poem with variants.

630. The translation follows Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 387 n. 2, who takes dhū wujūh to mean "hypocrites."

631. That is, from Ṭāhir. Instead of sākin, the Mas'ūdī version reads nāzil, "encamped," and glosses, "meaning Ṭāhir."

The Events of the Year 198

(SEPTEMBER 1, 813–AUGUST 21, 814)

Ṭāhir Captures Baghdad

In this year, Khuzaymah b. Khāzim disobeyed Muḥammad b. Hārūn, separated himself from him, and sought a promise of safety from Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn.[632] Harthamah entered the eastern part [of Baghdad]. A report concerning why Khuzaymah left Muḥammad, how this turned out, and how he became obedient to Ṭāhir follows.

It has been mentioned as the reason for this: Ṭāhir wrote to Khuzaymah, telling him that if he were to sever relations with Muḥammad and offer him no effective aid, he [sc. Ṭāhir] would [904] not be remiss in his regard.[633] When he received Ṭāhir's letter, Khuzaymah consulted his trusted friends and members of his family. They said to him, "By God, it seems to us that this man has our master by the nape of the neck; so make an arrangement for yourself and for us." He therefore wrote to Ṭāhir, announcing his obedience, and telling him that if he himself were the person encamped on the eastern side instead of Harthamah, he would

632. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 194–97; Fragmenta, 335.

633. The translation follows the emendation proposed in ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXVII.

undertake every danger for him. He made known to (Ṭāhir) his lack of confidence in Harthamah and urged him not to lay any burden on the latter in the matter without guaranteeing to him (sc. Khuzayamah) that he would stand in his stead; Harthamah would then be brought into the affair. He (sc. Khuzaymah) would cut the bridges and as consequence bring about a situation that would elicit his approval and pleasure. If (Ṭāhir) did not guarantee him this, it would not be possible for him to expose himself to the mob, rabble, ruffians, and destruction. Ṭāhir accordingly wrote to Harthamah, rebuking him and accusing him of incompetence, saying, "You have gathered soldiers, wasted money, and given it in grants without the Commander of the Faithful or myself, when I am in such need of it to cover expenses and expenditures. You have failed to act against troops of little might and small significance, as if drawing back and afraid. This is surely an offense! Get ready to enter [the city], for I have decided to push back the army and cut the bridges. I hope that you will meet no significant opposition to this plan, God willing!" Harthamah wrote [back] to him, "I acknowledge your salutary opinion and excellent advice. Command as you wish; I will not oppose you." So Ṭāhir wrote to Khuzaymah to inform him of this.

It has been mentioned that when Ṭāhir wrote to Khuzaymah, he wrote a similar letter to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān.

It has been said: On the eve of Wednesday, eight nights remaining in the month of Muḥarram of the year 198 (September 21, 813), Khuzaymah b. Khāzim and Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā seized the Tigris bridge and cut it.[634] They set up their banners on it, cast off their allegiance to Muḥammad, [905] and proclaimed allegiance to ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn. The people of ʿAskar al-Mahdī[635] remained quiet and stayed in their homes and markets that day. As soon as Harthamah entered, a few other commanders besides these two came to him and swore to him that he would see no misbehavior from them. He accepted this from them. Ḥusayn al-Khalīʿ composed the following about Khuzaymah's cutting of the bridge:[636]

634. Gabrieli, "La successionc di Hārūn ar-Rašīd," 387 n. 4, identifies this as the main (middle) bridge, but notes that other bridges may have been cut as well, as implied by Ṭāhir's preceding message and the poem that follows.

635. ʿAskar al-Mahdī (al-Mahdī's Camp) was another name for the suburb of Ruṣāfah at the foot of the main bridge on the east bank of the Tigris. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 42, 187–89.

We all owe Khuzaymah a debt of gratitude, because God the Merciful has stilled the tumult of war.
He himself took charge of the affairs of the Muslims, and defended and protected them most gloriously.
Had it not been for Abū al-ʿAbbās [Khuzaymah], fortune would not have ceased being angry with us night and day.
Khuzaymah was not criticized for doing such a deed, when the east of the country and the west were in turmoil.
He subjected the two Tigris bridges to cutting, while spears were pointed and souls were in the palm of the sword.
He wounded the head of doom when it was threatening doom, suffering distress because of one event, and laughing because of another event.
So it (sc. doom) was like a fire that a cloud has beguiled, extinguishing by flame an encompassing flame.[637]
What is the killing of one soul among many souls, if the world returns to peace and plenty? [906]
The heroic deed of Abū al-ʿAbbās requires no expiation, when persistent trouble has recourse to trouble [to stop it].

According to Yaḥyā b. Salamah the Secretary (al-Kātib): Ṭāhir came early on Thursday against the city—al-Sharqiyyah[638] and its residential districts and al-Karkh and its markets. He demolished the two bridges over the Ṣarāt [Canal]—the old and the 636. The first five verses with variants are quoted by Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 194–95.

637. That is, as a cloud with flashing lighning puts out a fire by raining, so Khuzaymah by violence has extinguished violence. The translation of this and the preceding verse is uncertain.

638. Al-Sharqiyyah was a suburb of West Baghdad southeast of the Round City, between the main road leaving al-Baṣrah Gate and the shore of the Tigris. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 53, 90, 94. Ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXVII, quotes from al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, "It was named al-Sharqiyyah because it was to the east (sharq) of the Ṣarāt [Canal]."

new. There was heavy fighting at them. Ṭāhir tasked his forces severely and oversaw the fighting in person. Those who were with him fought at Dār al-Raqīq, and he[639] defeated the men until he drove them back to al-Karkh. Ṭāhir fought at al-Karkh Gate and al-Waḍḍāḥ Palace. He defeated Muḥammad's forces, and they were driven back in confusion. Ṭāhir passed through without turning aside for anything, until he had entered forcibly with the sword. He commanded his crier to proclaim security to anyone who remained in his house. At al-Waḍḍāḥ Palace, the market of al-Karkh, and the outskirts he placed commanders and soldiers in every location as required. He made his way to the City of Abū Ja'far and encircled it, along with the Palace of Zubaydah and al-Khuld Palace, from near the Bridge Gate,[640] to Khurāsān Gate, the Syrian Gate, al-Kūfah Gate, al-Baṣrah Gate, and the bank of the Ṣarāt [Canal] up to its outlet into the Tigris, with horses, equipment, and weapons. Ḥātim b. al-Ṣaqr, al-Hirsh, and the [North] African troops fought Ṭāhir steadfastly; so he set up *manjanīq*s behind the wall against the city and across from the Palace of Zubaydah and al-Khuld Palace and bombarded [them]. Muḥammad, with his mother and children, left for the City of Abū Ja'far. Most of his soldiers, eunuchs, and slave girls scattered from him into the streets and roads without turning aside for anything. The rabble and the low persons also scattered. 'Amr al-Warrāq said about this:

[907] O Ṭāhir of strength,[641] whose like has never been found!
O master (sayyid), son of a master,

639. The pronouns are ambiguous. I take the clause to mean that Ṭāhir (i.e., his forces) defeated them (i.e., the opposing forces of Muḥammad) and drove them back to al-Karkh. Ṭāhir then fought at the gate of al-Karkh, defeated Muḥammad's forces, and entered al-Karkh. The textual witness, however, is uncertain, probably because what we have is a condensation of a longer account. Ed. Cairo continues as follows: "Ṭāhir fought them at al-Karkh Gate and al-Waḍḍāḥ Palace: Muḥammad's forces defeated them, and they [i.e., Ṭāhir's forces] were driven back in confusion." This makes Ṭāhir's entry into al-Karkh and proclamation of security illogical.

640. Fragmenta, 335, reads: "from near the bridge to Khurāsān Gate."

641. Yā ṭāhira l-ẓahri: the Arabic plays on the similar sound of the two words and their visual similarity in Arabic script.

son of a master, son of master!
Back to their former occupations have gone Muḥammad's "naked ones."
Makers and vendors of sweets,[642] as well as impostors;
Bandits who were taking refuge with vagrants and paupers;
Men in shackles who broke out of prisons
and became unshackled;
Men bold to plunder, who became masters,
though they were never entitled to be masters:
These have become obedient to your strength and have submitted, after having been rebellious for a long time.

According to ʿAlī b. Yazīd, who said: One day I was at the home of ʿAmr al-Warrāq with a group of people, when a man came and told us about Ṭāhir's attack at al-Karkh Gate, and how the men had been driven back from it. ʿAmr said, "Hand me a cup," and he said concerning this:[643]

Take it, for wine has [many] names:
"medicine" is one, and "disease" is another.
Water improves it, when it is decanted—sometimes—but water sometimes spoils it.
Someone said, "They had a battle
this very day," and [other] things.
I said to him, "You are an ignoramus.
You neglect the good things.
"Drink, and spare us reports about them.
People will make peace, if they want to."

Someone else then came among us and said, "So-and-so has fought with the 'naked ones'; so-and-so has come; so-and-so has plundered." Again, [al-Warrāq] said:

What a time we are in!
The great have died out.

642. For naṭṭāf and sawwāṭ, see note 615.
643. The text with minor variants is quoted in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 195.

These low persons and rabble are commanders among us.
We have nothing,
except what He wills.
[908] The earth has cried out, and the heavens, too, have cried out to God.
Religion has been taken away,
and blood has become of little importance to God.
Abū Mūsā, take the good things:
the time for the meeting has come.
Here is unmixed wine for you:
the drinking companions have come to you.

'Amr al-Warrāq also said about this:

If you want to anger
a soldier and get him to obey,
Say, "You soldiers,
Ṭāhir has come to you!"

Muḥammad fortified himself in the city, along with those who were fighting on his side. Ṭāhir besieged him, taking the gates from him, and preventing flour, water, and other things from reaching him and the people of the city.

According to al-Ḥusayn b. Abī Sa'īd, who said that the eunuch (khādim) Ṭāriq, one of Muḥammad's courtiers (khāṣṣah) and one of al-Ma'mūn's after the arrival of the latter, told him that one day while under siege—or he may have said that it was on his last day—Muḥammad asked him to bring him something to eat: [Continuing, Ṭāriq] said: I entered the kitchen and found nothing. So I went to Jamrah the perfumer, who was al-Jawhar's slave girl, and said to her, "The Commander of the Faithful is hungry. Do you have anything, for I have found nothing in the kitchen?" She said to a girl of hers named Banān, "What do you have?" She brought a chicken and a loaf of bread. I brought them to him and he ate. He asked for water to drink, but there was none in the beverage closet.[644] By the evening he had decided to meet Harthamah, and he never again drank water until he perished.

644. Khizānat al-sharāb may refer to a place where beverages were placed to be cooled. Cf. the description of the meshrebeeyeh (mashrabiyyah) in Lane, Modern Egyptians, 8–9.

According to Muḥammad b. Rāshid, who said that Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī[645] told him that he had been staying with Muḥammad the Deposed in the City of al-Manṣūr in his palace at the [909] Golden Gate,[646] when Ṭāhir besieged him. [Continuing, Ibrāhīm] said: [Muḥammad] went out one night, wanting to relieve the dejection he was feeling. He went to al-Qarār Palace,[647] at Ṣarāt Point, below al-Khuld Palace, late at night. He sent for me, and I went to him. He said, "Ibrāhīm, don't you see the pleasantness of this night and the beauty of the moon in the sky, with its light in the water?" [We were on the bank of the Tigris at the time.] "Would you like to drink?" "As you will," I said, "may God make me your ransom!" So he called for a flagon (raṭl) of date wine (nabīdh). He drank it and then gave orders, and I was given a similar one to drink.

I began to sing to him without his asking me, for I knew in what bad humor he was. I sang something that I knew he liked. "How would you like someone to accompany you?" he said. "How I would like that!" I said. So he called for a favorite slave girl of his named Ḍa'f. Given that we were in such a state of affairs, I found her name ominous.[648] When she came before him, he said, "Sing," so she sang from the poetry of al-Nābighah al-Ja'dī:[649]

---

645. The 'Abbāsid prince Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī was famous as a singer. See EI[2] s.v. [Sourdel]. Another version of the incident is found in Aghānī, IV, 189 (ed. Cairo, V, 1794–96). Cf. Mas'ūdī, VI, 426–30 (different isnād and details), Fragmenta, 335–36. Two shorter reports of apparently the same incident occur on pp. 231–33, below.

646. The Palace of the Golden Gate was at the center of the Round City. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 19, 30–33, 309–10.

647. On al-Qarār Palace, also known as the Palace of Zubaydah, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 102–3. Le Strange's explanation of the name is wrong. As Nabia Abbott noted, the meaning of Qarār was "permanency," alluding to the phrase dār al-qarār ("abode of permanency," i.e., heaven) in Qur'ān 40:39. See Abbott, Two Queens of Baghdad, 218 n.

648. Ḍa'f means "weakness."

649. Al-Nābighah al-Ja'dī (Ḥibbān b. Qays) was born before Islam, but lived most of his life as a Muslim and died in 65/684. The verse alludes to Kulayb b. Rabī'ah from the tribe of Taghlib. By killing a camel belonging to al-Basūs, a woman from the closely related tribe of Bakr (the camel had strayed onto his pasture and broken the eggs in a bird's nest), Kulayb precipitated the "War of

Kulayb, by my life, was a better defender
and less guilty than you, yet he became stained with [his own] blood.

What she sang distressed him and was ominous to him. He said to her, "Sing something else," so she sang:[650]

Their departure has made my eye tearful and sleepless:
verily, parting from loved ones provokes many tears.
The vicissitudes of their fortune continued to oppress them, until they destroyed each other: verily the vicissitudes of fortune are oppressive!

He said to her, "May God curse you! Don't you know anything [910] else to sing?" She replied, "Master, I only sang what I thought you liked. I didn't mean to do anything you disliked. It was only something that came to me." Then she started another song:[651]

By the Lord of repose and movement, fate possesses many snares.
Night and day succeed each other,
and the stars revolve in the firmament,
Only to transfer prosperity from one king occupied with the love of this world to another.
But the kingdom of the Possessor of the [Heavenly] Throne endures forever:
it neither passes away nor is shared with a partner.

"Get up," he said, "and may God be wrathful with you!" So she stood up. Now he had a beautifully made crystal cup—Muḥammad used to call it Zubb Rubbāḥ[652]—that had been al-Basūs" between the two tribes. See Sezgin, GAS, II, 245–47; Nallino, Le Poesie di an-Nābiġah al-Ġa'dī (Rome, 1953), 105–8; Shi'r al-Nābighah al-Ja'dī, 143.

---

650. Quoted with minor variants in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 196.

651. In Aghānī, III, 179, the poem is attributed to Abū al-'Atāhiyah. Seven verses of it are quoted in Ṭabarī, III, 450, where they are said to have been recited by a mysterious hidden voice (hātif) foreboding the death of al-Manṣūr in A.H. 158. Variants exist in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 196.

652. The text and the meaning are uncertain. In the notes to his edition of Fragmenta (I, 125), de Goeje explains the name as derived from a kind of date from al-Baṣrah called zubb rubbāḥ or zubb rubāḥ (literally, "monkey penis"; cf. Lane, Lexicon, III, 1208). Ibn al-Athīr reads rubb riyāḥ, which is the name of a kind of mushroom.

placed before him. As the slave girl got up to leave, she tripped over the cup and broke it.

[Continuing,] Ibrāhīm said: The strange thing is that whenever we sat with this slave girl, we experienced something unpleasant in our assembly. [Muḥammad] said to me, "Alas, Ibrāhīm, don't you see what this slave girl has mentioned and what happened with the cup? By God, I think my time has come." "God," I said, "will lengthen your life, strengthen and preserve your kingdom for you, and subdue your enemy." Before I had finished my words, we heard a voice from the Tigris, saying: "Decided is the matter whereon you two enquire."[653] "Ibrāhīm," he said, "didn't you hear what I just heard?" "No, by God, I heard nothing," I said, although I had indeed heard. "You will hear a soft sound," he said. So I went down to the river bank, but I saw nothing. We resumed the conversation, and the voice returned: "Decided is the matter whereon you two enquire." He jumped up in distress from where he was sitting, mounted, and returned to his place in the city. It was only one or two nights later that the events of his death occurred—it was [911] on Sunday, the 6th or 4th day of Ṣafar in the year 198.[654]

According to Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī,[655] who said: On the eve of Friday, seven days before the end of the Muḥarram in the year 198 [September 23, 813], Muḥammad b. Hārūn entered the City of Peace, fleeing from the palace called al-Khuld, because of the manjanīq stones that were landing on it. He commanded that his audience rooms [majālis] and carpets be burned, and they were. Then he went into the city. It had been fourteen months, less twelve days, since war had broken out with Ṭāhir.

---

653. Qur'ān 12:41.

654. The day of the week and the day of the month do not match. The 4th of Ṣafar [October 4, 813] fell on a Tuesday; the 6th of Ṣafar [October 6] fell on a Thursday. In the chronology of al-Madā'inī, which follows, the day and date do coincide.

655. The historian Abū al-Ḥasan 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Sayf al-Madā'inī [b. 135/752, d. ca. 228/843] was active at al-Baṣrah [his birthplace], al-Madā'in, and Baghdad, and was credited with over 200 works on history and literature, most of which survive only as quoted in the works of later authors. See EI[2] s.v. al-Madā'inī (U. Sezgin).

The Death of al-Amīn

In this year, Muḥammad b. Hārūn was killed.[656] The report of his death follows.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā al-Julūdī, who said: After Muḥammad had gone into the city and taken up residence there, his commanders realized that neither they nor he had equipment for the siege. Fearing that they would be defeated, Ḥātim b. al-Ṣaqr, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Aghlab al-Ifrīqī, and his [other] commanders went before Muḥammad and said, "Your condition and ours has come to what you see. We have formed a plan which we submit to you. Consider it, and make up your mind to do it; for we hope that it will be right, and that God will make it prosper, if He will." "What is it?" he asked. They said, "The men have scattered from you, and your foe has encircled you on every side. Of your cavalry, 1,000 horses, the best and swiftest of them, remain with you. We think we should choose 700 of the Abnā', men whom we know to love you. We will mount them on these horses and make a sortie by night from one of these gates; for the night belongs to its people,[657] and no [912] one will stand firm against us, God willing. We will go out until we reach al-Jazīrah and Syria. You will raise troops and gather taxes, and will gain a large domain and a new kingdom. People will rally to you, and the soldiers will be cut off from pursuing you. It is for this that God, the Almighty and Exalted, has made new things happen in the succession of night and day." "How excellent your plan is!" he said to them, and he determined to do it. When word of this got out to Ṭāhir, he wrote to Sulaymān b. Abī Jaʿfar, Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā b. Nahīk, and al-Sindī b. Shāhak: "By God, if you do not make him stay and dissuade him from this plan, I will leave you not one estate unconfiscated, and my only objective will be your lives!" So they went before Muḥammad and said, "We have heard what you have decided to do. We beseech you for God's sake to take care for your life. These men are wretches. Now that the siege

656. Parallels: Yaʿqūbī, II, 536 [very brief]; Dīnawarī, 395 [very brief]; Masʿūdī, VI, 472–84; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 197–202; Fragmenta, 337–41, 413–15.

657. Apparently a proverbial expression. See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CXXII.

has resulted in what you see, they feel they have no place to go. They think there will be no security for their persons or property with your brother or with Ṭāhir and Harthamah because of the widespread knowledge of how they have applied themselves to the war and prosecuted it assiduously. We fear that if they make a sortie with you and you fall into their hands, they will take you prisoner and take your head. They will seek to gain favor by means of you and will make you the means to their own safety." And they cited examples of this to him.

[Continuing,] Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā al-Julūdī said: My father and his companions were sitting in the portico (riwāq) of the room (bayt) where Muḥammad and Sulaymān and his companions were. When they heard what they were saying and saw that he had accepted it for fear that matters would turn out as they had told him, they were on the verge of going in to them and killing Sulaymān and his companions. But then they changed their minds. They said, "War within, and war without!" and they ceased and desisted.

[Continuing,] Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā [al-Julūdī] said: When this made an impression on Muḥammad's heart and sank into his mind, he turned from his decision and returned to accepting the [913] guarantee of safety (amān) and departure they had given him. He acceded to the request of Sulaymān, al-Sindī, and Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā [b. Nahīk]. They said, "Your only objective today is safety and diversion. Your brother will leave you [to go] where you like. He will set you apart in some place and give you everything that befits you and all you like and desire. No harm or evil will befall you from him." He trusted in this and agreed with them to go out to Harthamah.

[Continuing,] Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā [al-Julūdī] said: My father and his companions did not want to go out to Harthamah, because they had been his companions and knew his ways. They feared he would treat them roughly, would not favor them, and would give them no offices. So they went before Muḥammad and said to him, "Since you have refused to accept our advice to you—and it was the right advice—and have agreed with these flatterers, it would be better for you to go out to Ṭāhir than to Harthamah."

[Continuing,] Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā [al-Julūdī] said: He said to them, "Alas, I do not like Ṭāhir! For I have dreamed: it was as if I were standing on a brick wall towering into the sky, broad-based and firm; never have I seen one like it in length, breadth, and firmness. I was wearing my black robes,[658] my belt, my sword, my hat (qalansuwah), and my boots. Ṭāhir was at the base of the wall, and he kept striking its base until the wall fell. I fell and my hat fell from my head. I have an ominous feeling about Ṭāhir. I am uneasy about him and therefore do not want to go out to him. But Harthamah is our mawlā and like a father. I am more comfortable with him and trust him more."

According to Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—Ḥafṣ b. Irmiyāʾīl: When Muḥammad wished to cross from the palace at al-Qarār to a house that was in the Garden of Mūsā[659]—he had a floating [914] bridge in that place—he ordered that [carpets] should be spread in that audience room (majlis) and that it should be perfumed.

[Continuing,] he said: So my assistants and I spent the night getting perfume and aromatics, gathering apples, pomegranates, and citrons, and putting them in the rooms. My assistants and I stayed up all night. After I had prayed the morning prayer, I gave an old woman a piece of ambergris incense containing 100 mithqāls,[660] like a melon, and said to her, "I've been up all night and am very tired. I have to get some sleep. If you see the Commander of the Faithful coming on the bridge, put this ambergris on the brazier"—and I gave her a small silver brazier with coals on it. I told her to blow until she burnt it all. I went onto a bark (ḥarrāqah)[661] and fell asleep. Before I knew what was happening, the old women came in a panic and woke me up. "Get up, Ḥafṣ," she said. "I've gotten into trouble." "What is

658. For the significance of black clothing as the official ʿAbbāsid color, see the references in note 245.

659. The exact location is unknown. The Mūsā Canal passed through al-Mukharrim quarter of East Baghdad. The reference may be to the Garden of Zāhir, which was located on the east bank of the Tigris, where the Mūsā Canal emptied into the river, a short distance below the main bridge. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 219–20.

660. I.e., 446.4 grams, or 15.75 ounces (see Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 1–5).

661. On the kind of ship, see Mez, The Renaissance of Islam, tr. Khuda Bakhsh and Margoliouth; Kindermann, "Schiff" im Arabischen; and al-Nukhaylī, Al-Sufun al-islāmiyyah.

it?" I said. She said, "I saw a man coming on the bridge, alone, resembling the Commander of the Faithful in build. There was a group of people in front of him and one behind him, so I didn't doubt that it was he. So I burned the ambergris; and when he came, it was 'Abdallāh b. Mūsā, and here is the Commander of the Faithful coming now!" I cursed her and upbraided her, and gave her another piece like the first to burn in his presence. She did so. This was when things began to take a turn for the worse.

According to 'Alī b. Yazīd, who said: After the siege against Muḥammad had gone on for a long time, Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far, Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī, and Muḥammad b. 'Īsā b. Nahīk left him, and all of them made their way to 'Askar al-Mahdī. Muḥammad remained besieged in the city Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. Muḥammad discussed with his companions and those who remained with him whether to ask for quarter [amān]. He asked them about the way to escape from Ṭāhir. Al-Sindī said to him, "By God, master, if al-Ma'mūn were to get hold of us, it [915] would be against our wishes and to our misfortune. I see no deliverance but Harthamah." "How by Harthamah," he asked him, "when death has surrounded me on every side?" Others advised him to go out to Ṭāhir. They said, "If you swore him oaths by which he became certain that you were committing your kingdom to him, perhaps he would trust you." But he said to them, "You have missed the mark in your advice, and I have erred in consulting you. If 'Abdallāh my brother had toiled himself and taken charge of matters according to his own judgment, would he have accomplished one-tenth of what Ṭāhir has accomplished for him? I have tested Ṭāhir and inquired about his thinking. I have not found him inclined to break faith with 'Abdallāh or to have any ambition except for him. If he agreed to obey me and turned to me, I would fear nothing, even if all the people of the earth opposed me. I wish he would agree to that: I would give him my treasuries; I would put my affairs into his hands and be pleased to live under his protection. But I have no hope that he will do so." Al-Sindī said to him, "You are right, Commander of the Faithful. Let us go quickly to Harthamah, for he thinks that there is no justification to act against you if you go out to him from the [capital of the] kingdom. He has already given me a guarantee that he will fight to defend you if 'Abdallāh moves to kill you. Go out at night, at an hour when people are asleep. I hope that what we do will escape the people's notice."

According to Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī: When Muḥammad was about to go out to Harthamah and had agreed to his terms, Ṭāhir was troubled and refused to show leniency and allow him to depart. He said, "He is in my quarter, on the side [of the river] where I am. I have made him come out by siege and fighting, [916] until he has come to ask for quarter (amān). I do not agree that he should go out to Harthamah, rather than me, so that the victory should be his."

When Harthamah and the commanders saw this, they met in the house of Khuzaymah b. Khāzim. Ṭāhir and his closest commanders went to them. Sulaymān b. al-Manṣūr, Muḥammad b. 'Īsā b. Nahīk, and al-Sindī b. Shāhak came to them. They negotiated and arranged the matter. They informed Ṭāhir that al-Amīn would never come out to him: if what he requested were not granted, there was a risk that the result in his case would be like [what had happened] in the days of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān. They said to him, "He will come out in his person to Harthamah, for he feels safe with him and trusts his good intention, but is afraid of you. To you he will give the seal, the scepter, and the mantle—that being the caliphate.[662] Do not spoil this affair. Take advantage of it, since God has facilitated it." [Ṭāhir] granted this and agreed. But according to report, when al-Hirsh learned the news, he decided to gain favor with Ṭāhir; so he informed him that what had taken place between them and him was a trick, and that the seal, the mantle, and the scepter would be carried with Muḥammad to Harthamah. Ṭāhir accepted this and believed that it was as [al-Hirsh] had written. He became angry. He placed men in ambush around the Palace of Umm Ja'far and the Palaces of al-Khuld with weapons; they also had crowbars[663] and hoes. It was the 662. On these insignia of the caliphate, see note 41.

663. 'Atal has a variety of meanings: an iron implement, perhaps like a machete, for cutting or lopping the side-shoots of palm trees; a kind of pickax used for digging; or an iron bar like a crowbar, used for demolishing walls. See Lane, Lexicon, V, 1949.

eve of Sunday, five days before the end of Muḥarram 198—the 25th of Aylūl (September), according to the Syriac month.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Abī Sa'īd—Ṭāriq the Eunuch (khādim), who said: When Muḥammad was about to go out to Harthamah, he became thirsty before leaving. So I looked for water in his beverage closet, but found none. In the evening, he hastened out, intending to go to Harthamah at the time that had been arranged between them. He put on the caliphal robes, a woolen tunic (durrā'ah), a shawl (ṭaylasān), and his tall hat (qalansuwah). Before him was a candle. When we reached the [917] guardhouse of al-Baṣrah Gate,[664] he said, "Get me a drink from the guards' wells." I handed him a cup of water, but it revolted him because of its foul odor, and he did not drink it. He went to Harthamah. Ṭāhir then assaulted him: he had hidden himself in ambush for him at al-Khuld; when Muḥammad went to the bark (ḥarrāqah), Ṭāhir and his companions came out and bombarded the bark with arrows and stones. [The passengers] leaned toward the water, and the bark overturned; Muḥammad, Harthamah, and those in it fell into the water. Muḥammad swam across and reached the Garden of Mūsā. But he suspected that his falling into the water had been a trick on the part of Harthamah, so he crossed the Tigris [again] and reached the vicinity of the Ṣarāt [Canal]. Those in charge of the garrison were Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far al-Balkhī and Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd. The latter was the son of the brother of Shaklah, the mother of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī. Ṭāhir had put him in charge—whenever [Ṭāhir] gave one of his Khurāsānian companions a command, he joined men to him.[665] Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd, who was known as al-Ṭāhirī because Ṭāhir was promoting him in responsibilities, recognized [Muḥammad al-Amīn]. [Al-Ṭāhirī] called out to his men, and they came down and took [Muḥammad]. He himself quickly laid hold of Muḥammad. He grasped his legs and dragged him. He was placed on an ordinary horse,[666] a coarse soldier's waist-wrapper was thrown on him, and he was taken to the lodging of Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far al-Balkhī, who was staying at al-Kūfah Gate. (Al-Ṭāhirī) mounted a man behind him to hold him lest he fall, as is done with prisoners.

664. Cf. another version on p. 189, below, where the cavalcade passes the Khurāsān Gate.

665. That is, he joined to Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far al-Balkhī (from Balkh in Khurāsān, as his name indicates) a man with Baghdad connections, in this case the nephew of the concubine Shaklah, the mother of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī. On Shaklah, see Abbott, Two Queens of Baghdad, 33–34.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Abī Sa'īd—Khaṭṭāb b. Ziyād: When Muḥammad and Harthamah fell into the water, Ṭāhir hastened to the Garden of Mu'nisah, opposite al-Anbār Gate, the site of his camp, lest he be accused of the drowning of Harthamah. [Khaṭṭāb continued,] saying: When Ṭāhir reached the Syrian Gate—we were with him in the cavalcade, along with al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī al-Ma'mūnī and al-Rashīd's eunuch (khādim) al-Ḥasan al-Kabīr—Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd caught up with us and dismounted. He approached Ṭāhir and told him that he had taken [918] Muḥammad prisoner and had sent him to al-Kūfah Gate, to the lodging of Ibrāhīm al-Balkhī. Ṭāhir turned to us and told us the news. "What do you say?" he asked. Al-Ma'mūnī said [in Persian], "Ma-kun"—that is, "Do not do as was done to Ḥusayn b. 'Alī." Then Ṭāhir called a mawlā of his named Quraysh al-Dandānī and commanded him to kill Muḥammad. Ṭāhir followed him, heading for al-Kūfah Gate, toward the place.

According to al-Madā'inī[667]—Muḥammad b. 'Īsā al-Julūdī, who said: When [Muḥammad] had made ready to leave—it was after the final night prayer ('ishā'), the eve of Sunday—he came out into the courtyard of the palace and sat down on a chair. He was wearing white robes and a black shawl (ṭaylasān). We came into his presence and stood before him with maces.

Kutlah the eunuch (khādim) came and said, "Master, Abū Ḥātim[668] sends you his greetings. He says, 'Master, I have come at the appointed time to transport you, but I think you should not come out tonight; for I saw by the Tigris, on the shore, something that made me suspicious. I fear that I may be overpowered, so that you may be taken from my hands or your life

666. A birdhawn, a hack or destrier, i.e., a non-Arabian, nonthoroughbred horse.

667. Ṭabarī highlights the contrasting nature of this account by introducing the isnād with the word ammā: "As for al-Madā'inī, he mentioned . . ."

668. That is, Harthamah, whose kunyah (agnomen) was Abū Ḥātim. See Ṭabarī, III, 718.

be lost. Instead, stay where you are, until I go back and prepare myself. I will come tomorrow night and bring you out. If you are attacked, I will fight to defend you, and shall have my equipment with me.'" Muḥammad said to him, "Go back to him and say to him, 'Do not leave, for I am coming out to you now. It cannot be avoided. I will not stay until tomorrow.'"

(Muḥammad) was apprehensive. He said, "The people and the mawālī and guards in charge of my gate have scattered from me. I am afraid that if I wait for the morning and the report of their scattering reaches Ṭāhir, he will come in to me and take me." He called for a black horse of his—a bobtail with a blaze on its forehead and white on its legs; he called it "al-Zuhrī."[669] Then he called for his two sons. He embraced them, smelled them, and kissed them. He said, "I commend you to God." His eyes [919] filled with tears, and he began to wipe them with his sleeve. Then he stood up and jumped onto the horse. We went out in front of him to the palace gate, until we had mounted our horses. Before him was a single candle. When we reached the arcades[670] next to Khurāsān Gate, my father said to me, "Muḥammad, stretch out your hand over him, for I fear that some man may strike him with a sword. If he is struck, the blow will hit you instead of him." So I threw the reins of my horse onto its mane and stretched out my hand over him, until we reached Khurāsān Gate. We ordered it to be opened and went out to the wharf. Harthamah's bark was there. (Muḥammad) went up to it. The horse began to hesitate and shy. He struck it with the whip and urged it onward, until he had ridden into the Tigris and boarded the bark. We took the horse, went back to the city, and entered it. We gave orders and the gate was locked. We heard the screaming, so we went up to the dome that was over the gate. There we stood, listening to the sound.

According to Aḥmad b. Sallām, the official in charge of peti-

669. The vowels are uncertain; al-Zahrī, al-Zuhrā, al-Zahrā, and al-Zuharī are other possibilities. Mas'ūdī, VI, 476, reads al-Zuhayrī, al-Zuhayrā, or al-Zahīrī.

670. Ṭāqāt: The round city of Baghdad was surrounded by a triple wall (outer, main, and inner ramparts). The roadway into the city from each of the four main gates was bordered on either side between the main and inner wall by vaulted arcades. These originally contained shops, but later were occupied by the city police and horse guards. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 25–26.

tions and complaints,[671] who said: I was among the commanders who rode with Harthamah in the bark. When Muḥammad got into it, we stood up out of respect. Harthamah knelt on his knees and said, "Master, I cannot stand up because of my arthritis."[672] He embraced him, held him to his bosom, and then began kissing his hands, and feet, and eyes, saying, "My lord and master, the son of my lord and master!"

(Muḥammad) began to examine our faces. He looked at ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Waḍḍāḥ and said to him, "Which of them are you?" He replied, "I am ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Waḍḍāḥ." "Yes," he said. "May God reward you well. How thankful I am for what you did in the matter of the snow![673] If I meet my brother, may God preserve him, I will not fail to praise you before him and [920] ask him to reward you on my behalf."

While we were about these things and Harthamah had given orders for the bark to push off, Ṭāhir's men attacked us in skiffs (zawārīq) and boats (shadhawāt). They raised a clamor and clung to the rudder. Some of them cut the rudder; others bored holes in the bark; others threw bricks and shot arrows. The bark was breached. Water entered it, and it sank. Harthamah fell into the water, and a sailor pulled him out. Each of us struck out as best he could. I saw how Muḥammad, having come to that state, was encumbered by his clothes, and how he threw himself into the water.

Then I came ashore. One of Ṭāhir's men caught hold of me and took me to a man who was sitting on an iron chair on the bank of the Tigris behind the Palace of Umm Jaʿfar with a fire lit before him. He said in Persian, "This is a man who came out of the water—one of the passengers in the bark who fell into the water." "Who are you?" he said to me. I said, "One of Harthamah's men. I am Aḥmad b. Sallām, the police chief (ṣāḥib shurṭah) of the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful." "You're lying," he said. "Tell me the truth."

---

671. Ṣāḥib al-maẓālim: On the development of this insituation, see Amedroz, "The Maẓālim Jurisdiction in the Aḥkām Sulṭāniyya of Māwardī," JRAS (1911), 635–74; Levy, The Social Structure of Islam, 348–51.

672. Niqris: a swelling of the joints of the leg, either from arthritis or gout. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v.

673. Sic. I do not know to what this refers.

I said, "I have told you the truth." "Then what has happened to the Deposed One?" he said. I said, "I saw how he was encumbered by his clothes and how he threw himself into the water." He said, "Bring my horse." They brought his horse and he mounted. He gave orders that I should be led by his side.

A rope was put on my neck and I was led by his side. He turned onto al-Rushdiyyah Street. When he reached the Mosque of Asad b. al-Marzubān, I became out of breath from running and was unable to run. The person who was leading me said, "This man has stopped; he isn't running." "Dismount," he said, "and cut off his head." I said to him, "May I be made your ransom! Why will you kill me, when I am a man to whom God has shown favor? I wasn't able to run, but will ransom myself with 10,000 dirhams." When he had heard mention of the 10,000 dirhams, I said, "You shall detain me with you until the [921] morning and give me a messenger for me to send to my agent in my home in ʿAskar al-Mahdī. If he doesn't bring you the ten thousand, cut off my head." "You've made a fair offer," he said, and he commanded that I should be mounted. So I was mounted behind one of his companions. He took me to the house of his master—it was the house of Abū Ṣāliḥ the secretary (al-kātib). He took me into the house and commanded his slaves to keep me. He gave them orders and instructions. He found out from me the news about Muḥammad and how he had fallen into the water; so he went to Ṭāhir to tell him the news about him. He turned out to be Ibrāhīm al-Balkhī.

His slaves took me into one of the rooms of the house. There were reed mats in it, two or three pillows—and, in one version, some rolled-up mats.[674] I sat down in the room. They brought a lamp into it, checked the door of the house, and sat down to talk.

---

674. The reading of ed. Leiden, fī riwāyah, implies that this is a parenthetical remark by al-Ṭabarī, alluding to a different version of Aḥmad b. Sallām's account. Cf. p. 194, below, which seems to be such a version. But the text is suspect. On p. 193, Aḥmad b. Sallām goes behind the mats rolled up "in the corner (fī zāwiyah) of the room." Since riwāyah and zāwiyah differ in Arabic script only in the order of two letters and the presence or absence of a dot over the first letter of the word, the original reading here may also have been: "and, in a corner, some rolled-up mats."

After an hour of the night had passed, we suddenly heard horses moving. People knocked on the door. It was opened for them, and they entered, saying, "Pusar-i Zubaydah!"[675] A man was brought in to me, unclothed, wearing drawers, a turban veiling his face, and a tattered piece of cloth on his shoulders. They put him with me, ordered those in the house to guard him, and left additional men behind with them.

After the man had settled down in the room, he removed the turban from his face. It was Muḥammad! I wept and said to myself, "Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return."[676] He began looking at me and said, "Which of them are you?" I said, "I am your mawlā, master." "Which of the mawālī?" he asked. I said, "Aḥmad b. Sallām, the official in charge of petitions and complaints." "I know you from somewhere else," he said. "You used to come to me in al-Raqqah." "Yes," I said. He said, "You used to come to me and often showed me kindness. You are not my mawlā; you are my brother and one of my own [family]." Then he said, "Aḥmad—." "At your service, master," I said. "Come close to me," he said, "and hold me. I feel very [922] frightened." So I held him to myself. His heart was beating so hard that it was about to burst his chest and come out. I kept holding him to me and calming him. Then he said, "Aḥmad, what has happened to my brother?" I said, "He is alive." "May God bring evil upon their postmaster!" he said. "What a liar he is! He said that he had died." He seemed to be apologizing for waging war against him. I said, "Rather, may God bring evil on your ministers!" "Say nothing but good about my ministers," he said, "for they are not at fault. I am not the first person to have sought a thing and been unable to achieve it." Then he said, "Aḥmad, what do you think they will do to me? Do you think they will kill me, or will they keep their oaths to me?" I said, "No, they will keep them for you, master." He began to draw around himself the tattered rag that was on his shoulders, drawing it and holding it with his upper arm on the right and left. I took off a lined cloak that I was wearing and said, "Master, throw this over you." "Alas," he said, "let me be. This is from

675. Persian for "Zubaydah's son," i.e., Muḥammad al-Amīn.
676. See note 23.

God, who is magnified and exalted. In this place it is better for me."

While we were thus, there was a knocking on the door of the house, and it was opened. An armed man came in to us and looked closely at him to confirm that it was he. When he became certain that it was, he left and locked the door. This was Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd al-Ṭāhirī. Thus I realized that the man would be killed.

I had yet to perform the odd prostration of my prayer.[677] I feared that I would be killed with him without having completed the prayer. So I stood up to complete an odd number of prostrations. "Aḥmad," he said. "Do not go away from me. Pray next to me. I feel very afraid." So I drew near to him. At midnight or close to it, I heard the movement of the horses. There was a knocking at the door, and it was opened. Some Persians entered the house with drawn swords in their hands. When he saw them, he stood up and said, "'Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return!' By God, my life has perished for the sake of God! Is there no escape? Is there no one to help? Is there none of the Abnā'?" [923]

They came and stood at the door of the room where we were. They drew back from entering it. They started saying to each other, "Go on," and pushing each other. I stood up and went behind the mats rolled up in the corner of the room. Muḥammad got up and took a pillow in his hand and started saying, "Woe unto you! I am the cousin of the Messenger of God, may God bless him and grant him peace. I am the son of Hārūn. I am the brother of al-Ma'mūn. [Fear] God, [fear] God concerning my blood!" One of them came in to him—he was named Khumārawayh and was a slave (ghulām) of Quraysh al-Dandānī, Ṭāhir's mawlā. He struck him a blow with the sword. It landed on the front of his head. Muḥammad struck his face with the pillow that was in his hand and leaned on him to take the sword from his hand. Khumārawayh shouted in Persian, "He's killed me! He's killed me!" A group of them came in. One of them pricked him in the hip with his sword. They got on top of him and slaughtered him, cutting the nape of his neck. They took his head and went with it to Ṭāhir. They left his body. A little before daybreak, they came for his body, wrapped it in a horse blanket, and carried it away.

677. The reference is to a form of night prayer called ṣalāt al-witr, consisting of an odd number of prostrations (rak'ahs)—three or five. The narrator remembers that he has not yet completed the final one. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. watara.

In the morning, I was told, "Hand over the 10,000 dirhams, or we will cut off your head." So I sent to my agent. He came to me. I commanded him, he brought them, and I handed them over. Muḥammad's entry into the city had taken place on Thursday. He had gone out to the Tigris on Sunday.

Aḥmad b. Sallām is also reported to have said in this account: I said to Muḥammad, after he had come into the room with me and had become calm, "May God not reward your ministers well, for they brought you to this pass." He replied to me, "Brother, this is not the place for blame." Then he said, "Tell me about al-Ma'mūn, my brother: is he alive?" "Yes," I said, "this fighting—on whose behalf is it, if not his?" He said, [924] "Yaḥyā, the brother of ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl b. ʿĀmir"—he was in charge of news in Harthamah's camp—"told me that al-Ma'mūn had died." I said to him, "He lied." Then I said to him, "This waist wrapper (izār) you are wearing is a coarse one. Put on mine and this shirt of mine, for it is soft." He said to me, "For someone in a state like mine, this is plenty." So I instructed him to turn his thoughts toward God[678] and pray for forgiveness, which he began to do.

While we were thus, suddenly there was a thud from which the floor almost shook, and behold, Ṭāhir's men had entered the house and headed toward the room. The door was narrow; so Muḥammad tried to hold them off with a pillow[679] that was

678. Laqqantuhu dhikr Allāh: The expression has a general sense here. In later times, the custom developed of whispering "instructions" into the ear of the dead man at the time of interment, so that he could answer the examining angels correctly. This instruction was called talqīn (from the same root as laqqantuhu). Cf. Lane, Modern Egyptians, 523–25; Dozy, Supplément, II, 553–54.

679. The text of the only manuscript reads mijannah, "shield." As ed. Leiden notes, the parallel in Fragmenta, 415a, reads mikhaddah, "pillow." The two words are easily confused in Arabic script. Because a pillow (referred to as a with him in the room. As soon as they reached him, they threw him to the ground. Then they rushed at him and cut off his head. They went to meet Ṭāhir with it, and they carried his body to the Garden of Mu'nisah, to his camp. When 'Abd al-Salām b. al-'Alā', the commander of Harthamah's guard, came, [Ṭāhir] gave him permission [to enter]. He had crossed over to him by the bridge that was in al-Shammāsiyyah. ['Abd al-Salām] said to him, "Your brother [Harthamah] sends greetings to you. What is your news?" [Ṭāhir] said, "Lad, bring the basin." They brought it. Muḥammad's head was in it. "This," he said, "is my news! Let him know." In the morning, he set Muḥammad's head on al-Anbār Gate.[680] Countless residents of Baghdad went out to look at it, and Ṭāhir came to say that it was "the head of Muḥammad the Deposed."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Īsā: The Deposed One saw a louse on his garment. "What is this?" he said. They said, "Something that gets into the clothing of the people." He said, "May God protect me from the passing away of prosperity." He was killed that very day.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Abī Sa'īd: Both armies, that of Ṭāhir and that of the people of Baghdad, regretted the killing of Muḥammad because of the wealth they had been obtaining.

Also according to him: He mentioned that the repository (khizānah) holding the head of Muḥammad, the head of 'Īsā b. Māhān, and the head of Abū al-Sarāyā[681] was entrusted to him. [Continuing,] he said: I looked at the head of Muḥammad. There was a blow on his face. The hair of his head and beard was intact: none of it had fallen[682] off, and its color was unchanged. [925]

Ṭāhir sent the head of Muḥammad to al-Ma'mūn, along with wisādah] already has been mentioned as in the room and it would be unlikely for the captors to have left al-Amīn in a room with military equipment with which to defend himself, mikhaddah is likely to have been the original reading.

---

680. Cf. Fragmenta, 415: "on the tower, the tower of the wall of the garden next to al-Anbār Gate. Al-Anbār Gate was opened and countless residents . . ."

681. I.e., al-Sarī b. Manṣūr, known by his kunyah, Abū al-Sarāyā, who in the following year (198/815) led an 'Alid uprising in al-Kūfah in the name of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm (known as Ibn Ṭabāṭabā). The rebellion was put down, and Abū al-Sarāyā was executed on 10 Rabī' I 200 (October 19, 815). See Ṭabarī, III, 977–81, 984–87.

682. The reading of ed. Cairo (yataḥātta) is superior to that of ed. Leiden.

the mantle, the scepter, and the prayer rug—it was of palm leaves and lined—with Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Muṣʿab, his cousin.[683] Al-Maʾmūn ordered that he be given a million dirhams. I saw Dhū al-Riʾāsatayn bring the head of Muḥammad before al-Maʾmūn on a shield by his own hand. When the latter saw it, he prostrated himself.

According to al-Ḥasan [b. Abī Saʿīd]—Ibn Abī Ḥamzah—ʿAlī b. Ḥamzah al-ʿAlawī, who said: A number of members of the family of Abū Ṭālib[684] approached Ṭāhir while he was in the garden at the time of the death of Muḥammad the son of Zubaydah. We happened to be in the capital. He gave them and us gifts. He wrote to al-Maʾmūn granting us or some of us permission [for an audience]. So we set out for Marw, and then returned to Medina. People congratulated us on our good fortune. We met the residents and other people who were in Medina and described to them the death of Muḥammad and how Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn had summoned a mawlā of his named Quraysh al-Dandānī and ordered him to kill him. A certain old man among them said to us, "How did you say [his name was]?" I told him. The old man said, "Praise God! That is what we used to relate—that Quraysh would kill him. We assumed this meant the tribe [of Quraysh], but the name has fit with the name."

According to Muḥammad b. Abī al-Wazīr—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. Khālid b. Barmak: When news of the death of Muḥammad reached Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī, he exclaimed "Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return!" He wept a long time and then said:[685]

Turn aside at a place of wind-swept ruins, at al-Khuld [Palace], with its stones and bricks; [926] With its polished marble that was gilded,
    and the door that was a door of pure gold:
Turn aside at it, and learn there with certainty the power of the Almighty.

683. Literally, "the son of his father's brother."
684. That is, descendants of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.
685. The poem is quoted with variants in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 201–2.

Take a message from me to the master who is over the subordinate and the commander.
Tell him, "O son of him who was favored with [God's] guidance,[686] cleanse God's lands of Ṭāhir."[687]
He was not satisfied with severing his jugular veins, as sacrificial animals are slaughtered with butchers' knives,
But went so far as to come dragging his limbs with a rope, destroying [his limbs] as far as one can go,[688] Death having already settled upon him, and his eye having lost its sight.

When news of this reached al-Ma'mūn, it was distressing to him.

According to al-Madā'inī: Ṭāhir wrote [the following letter] to al-Ma'mūn about the victory:

> To proceed: Praise be to God the Exalted, the Possessor of power and glory, kingdom and dominion; Who, when He wills a thing, says to it only "Be," and it is; save Whom there is no god; the Merciful, the Compassionate.[689]
>
> Among the things that God determined and confirmed, ordained and established, were how that the Deposed One should break his oath of allegiance, violate his covenant, and be overthrown[690] in his strife, and how that He would decree that he would be slain for the deeds his hands had earned; and God is never unjust to His servants.
>
> I have previously written to the Commander of the Faithful, may God lengthen his life, about how God's 686. The poet addresses al-Ma'mūn as a relative of the Prophet.

687. There is a pun on ṭahhir ("cleanse") and the name Ṭāhir.

688. The text of the second hemistich is uncertain. The translation follows the reading and interpretation suggested by ed. Leiden, Addenda, DCCLXVII.

689. Cf. Qur'ān 36:82.

690. The unusual word (irtikās) recalls Qur'ān 4:88, 91, where the same root is associated with God's overthrow of those who become hypocrites or cause civil strife (fitnah).

army surrounded the [Round] City and al-Khuld [Palace]; how they occupied its outlets, its roads, and its ways of access on the Tigris, up to the streets of the City of Peace; how garrisons were set up around it; how I brought down ships and boats with 'arrādahs and fighters opposite al-Khuld and the Khurāsān Gate to keep watch over the Deposed One, lest he practice some guile [927] or follow a course of action whereby he might find a way to stir up strife, arouse discord, or provoke combat, after God, who is exalted and glorified, had encircled him and abandoned him; how messengers went repeatedly, conveying what Harthamah b. A'yan, the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, was offering to him and asking of me: that the way should be cleared for him to go out to [Harthamah]; how I met with Harthamah b. A'yan to discuss the matter; and how I disliked what [Harthamah] proceeded to do on his own initiative regarding him after God had exhausted him and cut off his hope concerning every stratagem or support, after requisites had been cut off, and after he had been prevented from reaching water, let alone other things, so that his own servants and followers among the people of the city and those who had taken refuge in it with him wanted to kill him and conspired to fall upon him to protect and save their own lives. And there were other things, such as I have explained to the Commander of the Faithful, may God lengthen his life, and such as I hope have reached him.

I now inform the Commander of the Faithful that I carefully considered what Harthamah b. A'yan, the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, had arranged regarding the Deposed One, what he had offered him, and what he had agreed to for him. I found that if he were to escape from his place, where God had made him dwell with humiliation and contempt, and where He had brought him into confinement and siege, civil strife would increase; the people lying in wait in the outlying areas would only grow more ambitious and unsettled. I informed Harthamah b. A'yan of this and of my dislike of what he had given (al-Amīn) hope of and had agreed to for him. Harthamah, for his part, said he did not think it right to go back on what he had granted him. Having despaired of his changing his mind, I made an agreement with him: the Deposed One would send ahead the Prophet's mantle, sword, and scepter before leaving; then I would give him free passage to go out to (Harthamah). I did not want there to be any disagreement between myself and (Harthamah), by which we might reach a situation that would give the enemies hope against us, or any falling out of hearts, instead of our unity. The agreement was on this basis and that we would meet at our appointed time on the eve of Saturday. So, with my closest confidants, men I have relied on and whose self-possession, valor, and loyalty I trust, I went and made a full inspection of those whom I had put in charge of the city and al-Khuld on land and water, and commanded them to be vigilant and alert, on guard and cautious. Then I went back toward the Khurāsān Gate. I had prepared barks and ships in addition to the existing equipment, so that I might ride them myself at the time of my rendezvous with Harthamah. I boarded them, together with a group of my closest confidants and hired men (shākiriyyah). I stationed a group of them, horsemen and foot soldiers, between Khurāsān Gate and the wharf and on the shore. Harthamah b. A'yan approached until he came close to the Khurāsān Gate, equipped and ready. He had tried to outwit me by a message to the Deposed One: he was to go out to him when he reached the wharf, and he would transport him before I knew of it or before he had sent me the mantle, the sword, and the scepter according to the terms on which he had agreed with me. When the Deposed One's departure was reported to those whom I had stationed at Khurāsān Gate, they came hurrying as soon as he came into their sight to check the seal, for I had given them an order and warned them not to allow anyone to pass without my order. He, however, tried to reach the wharf before them. Harthamah brought the bark up to it, and [928]

the promise breaker reached it before my men. Kawthar was in the rear; my mawlā Quraysh captured him and with him the mantle, the scepter, and the sword. He took him and the things he had. The companions of the Deposed One fled when they saw that my forces [929] intended to prevent their Deposed One from leaving. Some of them rushed toward Harthamah's bark, which capsized with them, so that it filled with water and sank; others returned to the city. The Deposed One then threw himself out of the bark into the Tigris to reach safety on shore, regretting his having left, violating the promise, and proclaiming his rallying cry. A group of my aides, whom I had posted between the Khurāsān Gate wharf and al-Ṣarāt Point, hastened to him. They took him by force and compulsion, without pact or agreement. He proclaimed his rallying cry, persisted in his perfidy, and offered them 100 beads,[691] each of which, he said, had a value of 100,000 dirhams; but they insisted on being loyal to their caliph, may God preserve him, on upholding their religion, and on preferring their bounden duty. So they laid hold of him, God having delivered him up and left him solitary, each desiring him and wishing to obtain favor with me before his fellow, until disorder broke out among them.[692] They tried to subdue him with their swords, competing for him, and fearing lest he should elude them. Finally, there was appointed[693] for him one zealous for God, His religion, His Messenger, and His caliph, and he did away with him. Word of this reached me, and I commanded that his head should be carried to me. When it had been brought, I ordered those whom I had posted in the city, al-Khuld, and the surrounding area, and everyone else in the garrisons to remain in their places and secure

691. The word ḥabbah can mean either a bead, a small coin, or a unit of weight (0.0706 gram). See Dozy, Supplément, I, 241; Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 1–5. Perhaps al-Amīn was carrying jewels.

692. Alternative translation: "they fought among themselves."

693. The verb used here, utīḥa, normally is used of things ordained or destined by God.

their immediate vicinity, until my order should come to them. Then I left. Thus God has granted great benefit and victory to the Commander of the Faithful—to him, and to Islam through him and in him.[694]

In the morning, the people became excited and disagreed about the Deposed One. Some believed he had been killed, whereas others denied it; some doubted, whereas others were certain. So I thought it wise to dispel their uncertainty about him. I brought out his head for them to look at, that it might be verified in their eyes. Thus the confusion in their minds would be ended, along with the evil of sedition by those who seek corruption and hasten to strife. I went toward the city early in the morning. Those in it surrendered, and its people rendered obedience. The areas adjoining the [930]
City of Peace on the east and the west—their quarters, suburbs, and districts—showed themselves loyal to the Commander of the Faithful. The war came to an end. (God) restored with peace and Islam the people of (peace and Islam). God has removed corruption from them. Through the blessing of the Commander of the Faithful, He has brought them into peace and tranquillity, into meekness, loyalty, and contentedness. Every benefit comes from God, the Almighty and Exalted, and every good thing; and to God be praise for this.

As I write this to the Commander of the Faithful, may God keep him, there is not in my presence any inciter to strife, or any instigator, or any mischief maker; there are only people who heed and obey, eager and ready. God has caused them to taste the sweetness of the Commander of the Faithful and the gentleness of his rule, so that they go about their affairs in its shadow, going early to their places of business, and returning late to their homes. God is the Bestower of this benefit, the Completer of it, and the One who will grant even more of it through His blessing.

I pray that God will gladden the Commander of the 694. The meaning of the end of the sentence is not clear.

Faithful with His favor; that He will continually increase it for him; that He will cause him to be thankful to Him for it; and that He will make His grace toward him continuous, lasting, and uninterrupted; until God unites for him the good of this world and of the world to come—for him, his friends, the upholders of his right, and for all the Muslims through his blessing, the blessing of his rule, and the good fortune of his caliphate. For He is their protector in this and faithful in it; and He is quick to hear and benevolent in what He desires.

Written on Sunday, four nights remaining in the month of Muḥarram 198.[695]

It has been mentioned concerning Muḥammad the Deposed that before his death, after he had gone into the city and had seen how events had turned against him and how his aides were slipping away and going out to Ṭāhir, he sat in the gallery[696] that he had made on [the Palace of] the Golden Gate.[697] (He had ordered it to be built some time earlier.) He commanded that all the commanders and soldiers who were with him in the city should be summoned; and so they were gathered in the courtyard (raḥbah). He looked down upon them and said:[698]

[931] Praise be to God who raises up and brings low, who gives and withholds, who straitens and enlarges; and to Him is the journeying. I praise Him even for time's misfortunes, the desertion of helpers, the scattering of men, the departure of wealth, the coming of misfortunes, and the arrival of disasters; praising Him with praise in return for which He will lay up for me the greatest reward and give me the best consolation. I bear witness

695. The day, Sunday, and the date (the 26th day of a thirty-day month) do not coincide. The last Sunday in Muḥarram, according to modern tables, was the 25th of the month (September 25, 813).

696. Janāḥ means "wing." Le Strange calls it a "belvedere" or "pinnacle," a covered gallery or balcony built high enough so that the caliph could look out at the courtyard of the palace and address a gathering. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 31–32.

697. On this palace, located at the center of the Round City, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 31–32.

698. Parallel: Mas'ūdī, VI, 443–44.

that there is no god but God alone—no partner has He—as He has testified to Himself, and as His angels have testified to Him; and that Muḥammad is His faithful servant and His messenger to the Muslims (may God bless him and grant him peace). Amen, O Lord of the worlds!

To proceed: O company of the Abnā' and people who preceded [all others] in following right guidance! You know of my negligence in the days when al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' was my vizier and adviser and how his days continued, causing me regret among courtiers (khāṣṣah) and commoners ('āmmah). Finally, you alerted me, and I took notice; you sought my aid in everything that displeased you in regard to myself and among you; and I gave you unsparingly what my kingdom contained and my power had obtained—what I had gathered and what I had inherited from my fathers. I named as commander someone who was not suitable and entrusted matters to someone who was not up to them. I strove—God knows—to gain your approval by every means I could; you strove—God knows—to displease me by every means you could. As part of this, I sent you 'Alī b. 'Īsā, an elder and senior man among you, and people who were merciful and affectionate toward you. It would take too long to mention what was done on your part. I forgave the offense and was generous. I acquiesced and told myself to be patient when I learned that victory had eluded him. I wanted you to remain as a garrison in Ḥulwān with the son of the elder statesman of your mission (da'wah), the man under whose father you had glory and through whom your obedience became complete, 'Abdallāh b. Ḥumayd b. Qaḥṭabah. You, however, reached a point in leaguing together against him that he could neither tolerate nor endure, led by a man of your own. Numbering 20,000, you aimed at me, revolting against your leader with Sa'īd al-Fard,[699] to whom you [932] > listened and whom you obeyed. Then, under the leadership of al-Ḥusayn,[700] you revolted against me, deposed me, and reviled me. You seized me, imprisoned me, bound me, and you forbade me from mentioning some things. The hatred in your hearts and your disobedience became greater and greater. But I praise God, as one who has submitted to His command and accepted His decree. Peace!

699. Sa'īd "the Unique": The reference may be to Sa'īd b. Mālik b. Qādim. See p. 136, above.

It has been said: After Muḥammad had been killed and the tumult had ceased, and after a guarantee of safety (amān) had been given to all and sundry[701] and the people had become calm, Ṭāhir came into the city on Friday and led the people in worship, preaching to them an eloquent sermon in which he quoted the [verses called] al-Qawāri'[702] from the Qur'ān. Among what has been preserved of it is that he said: "Praise be to God, 'Master of kingship, who gives kingship to whom He will, and takes away kingship from whom He will; He exalts whom He will, and abases whom He will; in whose hand is the good; and He is powerful over everything.'"[703]—along with [other] verses of the Qur'ān, which he made to follow one after the other. He urged obedience and the maintenance of unity (jamā'ah) and exhorted the people to hold fast to the rope of obedience. Then he returned to his camp.

It is mentioned: When Ṭāhir ascended the pulpit on Friday, a large group of Hāshimites, commanders, and others were present before him. He said:

> Praise be to God, "Master of kingship, who gives it to whom He will; who exalts whom He will, and abases

---

700. For the attempted coup against al-Amīn under the leadership of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān, see pp. 108 ff., above.

701. Literally, "had been granted to white and black."

702. The original meaning of qawāri' [plural of qāri'ah] is "calamities," or "disasters," and it is used as the title of Sūrah 101 of the Qur'ān. However, the word came to be used to designate "verses that one reads when one is afraid of the jinn or men, so that one feels secure, such as the Verse of the Throne [2:255], the verses at the end of the Sūrah of the Cow [2:284–86], and the Sūrah of Yāsīn [36]; for they avert fear from whoever reads them, as if they upbraided the devil." (Lisān, V, 3597c).

703. Cf. Qur'ān 3:26.

whom He will; in whose hand is the good; and He is powerful over everything." "He does not set right the work of those who do corruption,"[704] and "He does not guide the devising of the treacherous."[705] Truly, the emergence of our victory came not of our own hands, nor from our own devising; rather, God has chosen [what is best] for the caliphate.[706] For He has made it a stay for His religion and a support for His servants, the governance of the provinces and the barring of the borders, the readying of provisions and gathering of tribute (fay'), the execution of judgment, the propagation of justice, and the revival of the [Prophet's] tradition (sunnah) after vanities and reveling in destructive lusts had sapped it. He who inclines toward this world thinks well of the call of its beguilement: he draws out the milk of its prosperity, cleaves to the flower of its garden, and loves the splendor of its beauty. You have seen the fulfillment of God's promise—He is exalted and glorified—against the one who behaved insolently against Him: how He brought His strength and retribution upon him after he had turned from his promise, rebelled against Him, and disobeyed His commandment; and how His prohibition replaced him, and His admonition brought about his destruction.[707] So hold fast to the firm cords of obedience, and follow in the paths of unity (jamā'ah). Beware the fate of those who disobeyed and rebelled, who kindled the spark of civil strife and divided a people that had been at unity, so that God requited them with loss of this world and the next. [933]

704. Qur'ān 10:81.

705. Qur'ān 12:52.

706. Either ikhtāra Allāhu li-l-khilāfah is to be rendered "has chosen [the best for] the caliphate"—a construction attested elsewhere (see Dozy, Supplément, I, 415)—or some words have fallen from the text. The version of the speech in al-'Iqd al-Farīd (II, 188 in ed. Bulaq; IV, 212 in the 1983 Beirut printing) reads: "God has chosen for the caliphate... him who will carry its burdens and assume its weight."

707. The text of the end of the sentence ("and how His prohibition...") is hopelessly corrupt. The phrase may originally have begun, "and altered His (i.e., God's) prohibition..." (wa-ghayyara nahyahu).

After Ṭāhir had conquered Baghdad, he wrote to Abū Isḥāq al-Muʿtaṣim[708]—one [authority] has mentioned that he in fact wrote this to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī,[709] but [most] people have said that he wrote it to Abū Isḥāq al-Muʿtaṣim:

> To proceed: It is distressing to me to write to a man of the caliphal family without having been given authorization to do so. However, it has been reported to me that you lean in opinion and incline in affection toward the promise breaker who has been deposed. If that is so, what I have written to you of it is quite enough. If it is not so, then peace be upon you, prince, and the mercy of God and His blessing!

At the bottom of the letter he wrote the following verses:

Your embarking upon the matter while the proper time for it was not made manifest was ignorance, and your heedless opinion was [indeed] heedlessness.
How ugly a world it is in which those who do wrong acquire the portion of those who do right, and the vain man is deceived!

The Army Mutinies against Ṭāhir

In this year, the army mutinied against Ṭāhir after the killing of Muḥammad.[710] Ṭāhir fled from them and went into hiding for [934] several days, until he set matters right with them. A report of why they mutinied against him and the consequences for him and them follows.

According to Saʿīd b. Ḥumayd, who mentioned that his father related [the following] to him: Ṭāhir's forces mutinied against him five days after the death of Muḥammad. Having no money at hand, he was hard pressed. He supposed that this had

---

708. He was the third son of al-Rashīd and ruled as caliph from 218/833 to 227/842.

709. Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī led a revolt against the rule of al-Maʾmūn in 202/817. See Ṭabarī, III, 1013–17, 1074–75, Cf. Fragmenta, 416.

710. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 207–8; Fragmenta, 416–17.

happened through the connivance of the people of the suburbs (arbāḍ) with them and that they were on the side of (the mutineers) against him. However, none of the people of the suburbs had made a move in the matter. The strength of his forces increased. Fearing for himself, he fled from the garden, and they plundered some of his property. He went to 'Aqarqūf,[711] having commanded the gates of the city and the gate of the palace to be guarded against Umm Ja'far and against Mūsā and 'Abdallāh, the sons of Muḥammad. Afterward, he ordered that Zubaydah, along with Muḥammad's sons Mūsā and 'Abdallāh, should be transferred from the Palace of Abū Ja'far to the Palace of al-Khuld. They were transferred on the eve of Friday, twelve nights before the end of Rabī' I (November 17, 813). They were taken the same night in a boat to Humayniyā on the west bank in the Upper Zāb district.[712] Afterward, he commanded that Mūsā and 'Abdallāh should be taken to their uncle [al-Ma'mūn] in Khurāsān by way of al-Ahwāz and Fārs.

When the soldiers mutinied against Ṭāhir and demanded their pay (arzāq), they burned al-Anbār Gate, which was by the trench, and the Garden Gate (Bāb al-Bustān), and they brandished their swords. They continued thus that day and the next and shouted, "Mūsā, O Victorious One!"[713] People said that Ṭāhir had acted with good judgment in sending Mūsā and 'Abdallāh away. Ṭāhir and the commanders who were on his side had withdrawn. Ṭāhir prepared to fight (the mutineers) and do battle with them, but when the commanders and notables learned of this, they went to him and apologized. They placed the blame on "foolish and immature persons" and asked him to pardon them, accept their apology, and be pleased with them. They guaranteed to him that they would never again do anything displeasing to [935]

711. 'Aqarqūf (vocalized 'Aqraqūf by Yāqūt) was a village four farsakhs (23.9 km, or 14.9 miles) from Baghdad on the Dujayl Canal, north of Baghdad and west of the Tigris. It was the site of a large mound, thought to be the grave of pre-Sasanian Persian kings. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.; EI[2] s.v. 'Aḳarḳūf.

712. Humayniyā (or Humāniyah) was a village on the west bank of the Tigris about 60 miles downstream from Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 37; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v. Humāniyah.

713. Yā Manṣūr—indicating their acceptance of al-Amīn's young son as caliph.

him, as long as he remained with them. Ṭāhir said to them, "By God, I departed from you only in order to bring down my sword upon you. I swear by God that if you ever again do anything like this, I will go back to my intention concerning you and will go out to do something you won't like!" In this way he broke their spirit. He commanded that the men be given four months' pay (rizq). One of the Abnā' said concerning this:

The commander swore—his word and his deed were true—in the assembly of the evildoers:
If any of them became unruly or rioted, wherever in the area it might be,
He would not argue with people from their assembly;
he would not delay, like a just man or one who grants a respite, Until he had brought upon them great tribulation that would leave their homes vacant ruins.

According to al-Madā'inī: After the soldiers had rioted and Ṭāhir had withdrawn, Sa'īd b. Mālik b. Qādim, Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid, and Hubayrah b. Khāzim rode to him with elders of the people of the suburbs (arbāḍ). They swore solemn oaths that none of the people of the suburbs had made a move during those days: what had taken place had not accorded with their opinion, nor had they wanted it. They guaranteed him the good behavior of their areas of the suburbs and that each of them would undertake in his area everything incumbent upon him, so that nothing disagreeable to him would befall him from any direction. 'Amīrah, the father of Shaykh b. 'Amīrah al-Asadī, and 'Alī b. Yazīd came to him with elders from the Abnā' and behaved toward him as Ibn Abī Khālid, Sa'īd b. Mālik, and Hubayrah had done. They told him that the Abnā' behind them were well disposed in their opinion and obedient to him. They had not been involved in anything his forces had done in the garden. Ṭāhir was pleased; however, he said to them, "The men are demanding their pay, and I have no money." So Sa'īd [936] b. Mālik guaranteed them 20,000 dīnārs and conveyed them to him. Ṭāhir was pleased and went back to his camp in the garden. Ṭāhir said to Sa'īd, "I accept them from you as a debt to be owed by me." "No," he replied, "it is only a gift and a little for your slave (ghulām) and for what God has made your due." So Ṭāhir accepted it from him and commanded that the soldiers be given four months' pay. They were satisfied and became quiet.

According to al-Madā'inī: There was a man named al-Samarqandī on Muḥammad's side. He used to shoot from *manjanīq*s that were on ships in the middle of the Tigris. Sometimes, the people of the suburbs (arbāḍ) would gain against Muḥammad's forces who were facing them in the trenches; so (Muḥammad) would send to (al-Samarqandī) and bring him to shoot at them. He was a marksman whose stones did not miss. (According to report, people had not yet been killed by stones at that time.) After Muḥammad was killed, the bridge was cut and the *manjanīq*s from which he had been shooting on the Tigris were burned. Al-Samarqandī feared for his life. Afraid that someone whom he had given cause to seek vengeance[714] would look for him, he went into hiding. The people looked for him. He hired a mule and left for Khurāsān, fleeing. While he was on the road, a man met him and recognized him. After he had passed on, the man said to the muleteer, "Alas for you! Where are you going with this man? By God, if you are taken with him, you will be killed. The least that will befall you is that you will be imprisoned." "Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return!" said the muleteer. "I recognized his name, by God, and had heard of him—God take his life!" So the muleteer hastened to his comrades—or he may have reached a garrison—and told them about him. The men [whom he told] were companions of Kundghūsh from Harthamah's forces. They took (al-Samarqandī) and sent him to Harthamah. Harthamah sent him to Khuzaymah b. Khāzim in the City of Peace, and Khuzaymah turned him over to someone whom al-Samarqandī had given cause to seek vengeance. He took al-Samarqandī out to the bank of the Tigris on the east side, and he was crucified alive.

People have mentioned: When they were about to fasten him to his beam of wood, a crowd gathered. Before they had fastened him, he kept saying, "Yesterday you were saying, 'May God [937] not cause your hand to fail, O Samarqandī!' Today you have prepared your stones and arrows to shoot me." When the beam was raised, the people approached him, throwing stones, shooting arrows, and thrusting spears, until they killed him. Even after his death they kept shooting. The next morning they burned him: they brought fire to burn him and lit it, but it would not ignite. They threw cane and firewood on him and set fire to it. Part of him burned; part of him the dogs tore to pieces. This took place on Saturday, the 2nd of Ṣafar (October 1, 813).

714. That is, by killing one of the man's relatives.

A Description of Muḥammad b. Hārūn, His Agnomen, the Length of His Reign, and His Age[715]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad[716] and others: Muḥammad b. Hārūn—Abū Mūsā—came to power on Thursday, eleven days before the end of Jumādā I 193.[717] He was killed the eve of Sunday, six days before the end of Ṣafar 198.[718] His mother was Zubaydah, the daughter of Ja'far al-Akbar b. Abī Ja'far. His caliphate lasted four years, eight months, and five days. His kunyah (agnomen) has also been given as "Abū 'Abdallāh."

However, Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Khwārizmī[719] is mentioned as having said: The caliphate passed to Muḥammad b. Hārūn on the middle day of Jumādā II 193 (March 6, 809). In the year

715. Parallels: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 202–5; Fragmenta, 342–44, 418. Cf. the biography in al-Ṣafadī, Kitāb al-Wāfī bi-al-wafayāt, V, 135–39 (repeated in al-Kutubī, Fawāt al-wafayāt, IV, 46–48).

716. Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib al-Kalbī (b. ca. 120/737, d. 204/819 or 206/821), often called "Ibn al-Kalbī" after his father (d. 146/763), who himself was a genealogist, historian, geographer, and Qur'ān commentator, was a Shī'ī native of al-Kūfah who wrote prolifically on many subjects. See EI^{2} s.v. al-Kalbī (Atallah).

717. I.e., 19 Jamādā I (February 10, 809). Compare the dates given on p. 2, above; Ya'qūbī, II, 536–37; Dīnawarī, 395–96; and Fragmenta, 342.

718. I.e., 23 Safar 198 (October 23, 813). Compare the date given on p. 181, above ("six days from the beginning of the month"). A confusion between the words khalawna ("having elapsed [since the beginning of the month]") and baqīna ("remaining [to the end of the month]") is possible. The 23rd of Ṣafar did indeed fall on a Sunday. Compare also the date given on p. 187 and implied below, placing al-Amīn's death on the 23rd of the previous month, Muḥarram.

719. Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Khwārizmī was a great mathematician and chronologist. See EI^{2} s.v. al-Khwārazmī (Vernet).

he came to power, Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, the governor of Mecca, led the pilgrimage. Abū al-Bakhtarī remained in charge of his governorship.[720] Ten months and five days after coming to power, Muḥammad dispatched ʿIṣmah b. Abī ʿIṣmah to Sāwah.[721] He appointed his son Mūsā heir apparent on the 3rd day of Rabīʿ I (December 15, 809). ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān was in charge of his police (shuraṭ). In the year 194, the pilgrimage was led by ʿAlī b. al-Rashīd. Ismāʿīl b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad [938] was in charge of Medina. Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā was in charge of Mecca. Between the appointment of his son [Mūsā as heir apparent] and the encounter of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān with Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn and the death of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān in 195 there was one year, three months, and twenty-nine days. The Deposed One was killed the eve of Sunday, five nights before the end of Muḥarram (September 25, 813). His period in power accompanied by civil war was four years, seven months, and three days. After Muḥammad had been killed and the report of this reached al-Maʾmūn in a pouch from Ṭāhir on Tuesday, 12 Ṣafar 198 (October 11, 813), al-Maʾmūn made the report public. He gave permission to the commanders, and they came into his presence; al-Faḍl b. Sahl stood up and read the letter containing the report. He was congratulated on the victory, and they invoked God's blessing upon him. After the death of Muḥammad, Ṭāhir and Harthamah received a letter from al-Maʾmūn, saying that al-Qāsim b. Hārūn should be deposed [from the succession]. They made this public and sent out their letters to this effect. The letter deposing him was read on Friday, two nights before the end of the month of Rabīʿ I 198 (November 25, 813). According to what has reached me, Muḥammad's entire lifespan was twenty-eight years. He was tall, bald over the temples, fair, small eyed, hook nosed, handsome, big boned, and broad shouldered. His birthplace was al-Ruṣāfah.

It has been mentioned that Ṭāhir said after killing Muḥammad:

720. That is, the governorship of Medina. See Ṭabarī, III, 739, where Abū al-Bakhtarī Wahb b. Wahb is listed as Hārūn's last governor of Medina.

721. That is, ʿIṣmah b. Ḥammād b. Sālim. See p. 44, above. The kunyah of Ḥammād b. Sālim was "Abū ʿIṣmah." The date is mentioned here apparently as the first sign of military hostility on al-Amīn's part.

I killed the caliph in his residence, and with the sword I caused his wealth to be plundered.

He also said:

I overcame people by force and strength, and slew mighty heroes.
I dispatched the caliphate to Marw, hastening its way to al-Ma'mūn.

Poems Composed about Muḥammad b. Hārūn and Elegies for Him

[939] Among the poems written in derision (hijā') of him was the following:[722]

Why should we weep for you? Why?—because of [your] raptures, Abū Mūsā [al-Amīn]? because of [your] promoting of amusement?
Because of [your] omission of the five [prayers] in their times, in your eagerness for the juice of the grape?
For Shanīf[723] I do not weep;
as for Kawthar, the thought of his death gives me no grief.
You did not know what was the measure of [God's] pleasure, nor did you know the measure of [His] wrath.
You were not fit to rule,
and the Arabs did not grant you obedience as ruler.
You who weep for him, may the eye of whoever caused you to weep have wept only for wonder!
Why should we weep for you?—because you exposed us to *manjanīq*s, and at times to being plundered,
And to people who made us their slaves—because of them the tail seeks to gain power over the head—
In torment and wasting siege that blocked the roads, so that there was no way to [obtain] one's needs?

722. Eleven verses of the poem with variants are quoted in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 205.

723. Apparently, Shanīf, like Kawthar, was one of al-Amīn's eunuchs.

They have alleged that you are alive and recruiting [soldiers]:
anyone who has said this has lied.
Would that whoever has said it, in isolation from all, were to go where he has gone!
God made it necessary for us to kill him:
when He necessitates something, it indeed becomes necessary.
By God, he was a trial for us:
God became angry with him and wrote [His decree].

'Amr b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Warrāq composed the following, lamenting Baghdad, deriding Ṭāhir, and speaking evil of him:[724]

Who has smitten you, Baghdad, with the [evil] eye?
Were you not for a long time the delight of the eye?
Were there not in you people possessing nobility, [940] who would meet me with good deeds and kindness?
Were there not in you people whose dwelling and whose residence were a great adornment?
Time cried to them of departure; so they separated.
How the pain of departure grieved me!
I commend to God people whom I never remember
but that tears flow from my eye.
They once were; then a fate separated and dispersed them:
for fate it is that separates the two sides.
How many of them were helpers to me against my fate!
How many among them were generous to me with assistance!
How goodly was the time that united us!
Where is the time that has departed? Whence [has it departed]?
You who are devastating Baghdad that you may reside in it,
you have destroyed yourself between the two ways.
The hearts of all people were one—ready money—and being ready money is not like [being] a debt [to be paid later]—

724. Five verses of this poem have been quoted on p. 137, above, with variant readings.

When you dispersed them. You divided them into parties, and the people one and all were [divided] between two hearts.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah[725]—Muḥammad b. Aḥmad
[941] al-Hāshimī: Lubābah, the daughter of 'Alī b. al-Mahdī, said:[726]

I weep for you not because of [lost] happiness and companionship, but because of exalted deeds, the spear, and the shield.
I weep for a mortal[727] by whose death I have been grieved, who made me a widow before the wedding night.

Some have said that this poem was composed by the daughter of 'Īsā b. Ja'far, who was betrothed to Muḥammad.

Al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Ashqar,[728] a mawlā of [the tribe of] Bāhilah, composed [the following], lamenting Muḥammad. One of Muḥammad's boon companions, he did not believe Muḥammad had been killed and expected him to return.

Best of your family (though they alleged otherwise), because of you I am sore wounded and grieving.
God knows that I have a liver that is thirsty because of you, and an eye that weeps.
Though I lament the loss I have suffered,
I hold within me more than I express.
Why did you not remain to meet our need

725. Abū Zayd 'Umar b. Shabbah (b. 173/789, d. 262/875), a traditionist and historian, was a pupil of al-Madā'inī. According to Ṭabarī, II, 168, Ṭabarī personally studied 'Umar b. Shabbah's Kitāb Akhbār ahl al-Baṣrah under the author. See Sezgin, GAS, I, 345.

726. The poem, with three additional verses, is quoted in Mubarrad, al-Kāmil, I, pt. 2, p. 773, with the following note in the margin: "Ibn Shādhān said that this poem about Muḥammad al-Amīn was by Lubābah, the daughter of Mūsā al-Hādī. She was al-Amīn's cousin and was betrothed to al-Amīn, but he was killed before the marriage was consummated." Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, al-'Iqd al-farīd, III, 225, gives the woman's name as Lubānah, the daughter of Rayṭah b. 'Alī. "Her verses for the occasion became the type for the use of noble ladies who lost their husbands before the marriage was consummated" (Abbott, Two Queens of Baghdad, 222). Cf. also Mas'ūdī, VI, 485.

727. Variant in Mubarrad and Mas'ūdī: "a horseman" (fāris); Ibn 'Abd Rabbih: "a master" (sayyid).

728. That is, the poet al-Ḥusayn al-Khalī'. Twenty verses are quoted in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 202–3.

forever? Why did harm not come to someone else?
You succeeded caliphs who came before,
but after you the succession will surely be wanting.
May your kin not sleep after their offense:
after it I have come to hate your kin.
By rending open your inviolability, they rent open the Prophet's sanctuary, before which [hang] curtains.
Your relatives who deserted [you] attacked:
all of them avow their disgrace.
When they came, they did not do at the shore
what a jealous, proud person would do.
They left their father's harem to be plundered, while the chaste women were screaming and shouting.[729]
Beside themselves, they allowed their ankles to be seen—the young girls among them—and the middle-aged lamented.
Their kerchiefs were snatched away: exposed was she who wore a veil, and earrings were wrested away.
Among the plunder the women were like [942] pearls that a shell has opened to reveal.
[He was] a king whose kingdom fate diminished, so that he grew weak: time's shiftings are various.
How unlikely it is that after you our[730] strength will endure and our honor last!

729. This line and the line below, "How unlikely it is that after you their strength will endure and their honor last," are quoted in Aghānī, VI, 204, with the following story: "According to al-Ṣūlī, from al-Ḥusayn b. Yaḥyā, who said that al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk had told him: 'I was determined to write an elegy for al-Amīn, giving free rein to my tongue, and relieving my grief. However, Abū al-'Atāhiyah met me and said to me, "Ḥusayn, I sympathize with you and like you. I know how you feel about al-Amīn. He deserves to be elegized by you. But you have given your tongue free rein from grief and pain over him, saying things that verge on disparagement and defamation of someone else and incitement against him. Al-Ma'mūn is about to descend into Iraq to come against you. Save yourself! Alas, do you dare to say...?"—and he quoted the two lines. "Curb your tongue's vehemence! Withdraw what has been published in your name, and remedy the excess you have committed." Realizing that he had given me good advice, I thanked him and stopped composing. Because of his advice I escaped—and just barely!'"

730. Aghānī reads "their strength," and "their honor," referring specifically to the members of the 'Abbāsid family who sided with al-Ma'mūn. See note 729.

They did not respect solemn documents, under which there is the grave for betrayers.
After an oath to God will you kill him?
Killing after a promise of safety is an outrage!
Tomorrow you shall know by an [evil] consequence the power of God; so consider and halt.
You whose sleep is diminished by sleeplessness,
the lamentations have subsided, yet your heart is grieving.
To me you were a sufficient hope;
then it passed away, and grief took its place.
The order of things became confused; things hateful to us became approved; and after your death, what was approved became hated.
Unity has been disrupted because of your loss:
the world is left untended,[731] and the mind is grieved.[732]

He also said, lamenting him:

Whenever the trustworthy one remembers, he laments al-Amīn;[733] even if the carefree man sleeps, he makes his eyelids hot [with tears].
Dwellings between Buṣrā[734] and Kalwādhā have not ceased to arouse sadness for me.
The courtyards of kingship are empty;

731. The metaphor implicit in the Arabic sudan is that of an animal left to pasture by itself. There is an allusion to Qur'ān 75:36, "What, does man reckon he shall be left to roam at will?"

732. The reading of ed. Cairo wa-l-bālu munkasifu ("the mind is grieved," literally, "eclipsed, darkened") is preferable to ed. Leiden's wa-l-bālu munkashifu ("the mind is uncovered"), which the Leiden glossary (CDLIII) explains as meaning "the covering of the heart is uncovered from fear."

733. The Arabic text could also be translated, "When al-Amīn is mentioned, he (the poet) laments for al-Amīn; even if he goes to sleep free of [other] care, he causes his eyelids to become hot [with tears]." There is a pun on the name "al-Amīn" and the adjective amīn, "trustworthy, faithful."

734. The town of Buṣrā (not to be confused with a similarly named city in Syria) lay on the Tigris about 10 farsakhs (37.2 miles) upstream from Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 50.

in them the winds blow to and fro, weaving them diversely.[735]
Time has diminished the might of their inhabitant—[time], which made sport of the ancient generations.
After they had lived in unity, time scattered them:
I used to cling to the goodness of their friendship.
After their departure I have not seen goodness like them, nor have the eyes of beholders seen them.
O my grief, though enemies rejoice [at his misfortune]!
Alas for the Commander of the Faithful!
After your death, those who seek bounty cannot find it, and the mounts of petitioners are left to rest.[736]
To your court every day they used to [943] come late and early with good fortune.
He was the mountain: the heights hurled themselves down at the sound of his collapse, and the righteous were seized with fear.
After your death the world will mourn for [your] protection, and after your death it will mourn for the religion that was defended [by you].
The brightness of everything has departed, and religion has again become outcast and despised.
The might of one linked with Kisrā[737] and his nation has become firmly established, and the Muslims have been humbled.

He also said, lamenting him:

O my grief over you! One closer [to you] in kinship than I has forgotten you, while my griefs for you increase!

735. The image is borrowed from the descriptions of abandoned campsites in pre-Islamic poetry, where the sand blown into delicate ripples by the wind evokes the passage of time and the loss of dear ones.

736. That is, people no longer tire their camels in long journeys to seek al-Amīn's patronage. The theme of the journey across the desert to a patron of great generosity is common in pre-Islamic poetry.

737. The Arabs called any of the Persian kings who ruled Iraq and Iran before the Arab conquest "Kisrā" [from Persian Khusraw]. The line alludes to al-Ma'mūn's "Persianness."

The following was composed by ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī al-Hudāhid, lamenting Muḥammad:

Flow, O tears: he has been cut off from his cord, and we have lost the copiousness of his rain.[738]
A disaster's hand snatched away your prosperity;
you became a thing whose misfortunes we bear with patience.
Death has come to have a banner among us:
death's tooth laughs from his banner.
What caused the blow of death to descend upon the most generous person who ever alighted on his family's soil—
God's viceroy (khalīfah)[739] in His creation?
The hands of kings fell short of his virtues;
The radiance of a moon shone from his face;
and from his light the darkness of its shadow was dispelled.
[944] The Earth was shaken in its quarters, when the sword was made to lap up his spilled blood.
Anyone whose soul is calm at his fall, whether he be an ordinary man or a member of his family,
May I see such a one in a situation like the one in which he saw [al-Amīn], so that they [all] taste something bitterer[740] than his illness.
How many a mighty one of a kingdom have we seen taken away from his family and his servants!
O king beyond whom there is no king
among the nations of the Seal of the Prophets:
You who were generous and gave life to the place where you dwelt,
and from whose rain an abundant dropping flowed:
If death desisted from a man worthy of trust, to the level of whose foot [and no higher] it (sc. death) was

738. The generosity of al-Amīn is compared to a continuous rain (dīmah, pl. diyam).

739. Both the title "caliph" and its literal meaning of "successor, viceregent" are intended.

740. The vocalization of ed. Cairo (tadhūqa l-amarra), followed here, yields a metrical line; ed. Leiden's vocalization tadhawwaqa l-amra is unmetrical.

made equal in strength;
Or [if death desisted from] a king whose power is not challenged, save as the grim-faced [lion] is challenged in his lair:
Nobility would have made you immortal, as long as night passes away, or the clouds of evening rise on high;
Sovereignty, when you clothed yourself in it, would have caused the teeth of evildoers to gnash from regret;
He of the [Heavenly] Throne would have made a mark upon your enemies, [945] as He made a mark upon His ʿĀd and His Iram.[741] May God not deprive of effect a Sūrah[742] that has been recited for the best caller [to Islam] He ever summoned into His sanctuary.
I was only like the dream of a dreamer who was made to enter the door of happiness in his dream;
Until, when his sleep released him,
he again felt the absence [of happiness].

He also said, lamenting him:

I say, being about to flee,
"May you be watered with rain, O Palace of al-Qarār!"[743]
Time's hand shot you with an arrow to the eye, and you became scorched by the smoke of fire.
Tell me of your assembly: Where have they alighted?
In what place may they be visited,[744] after [this] place of visiting?
Where are Muḥammad and his two sons? How is it that I see as traces of their habitation blackened buildings?

741. ʿĀd [an ancient tribe] and Iram [a city] are cited as examples of God's destruction of evildoers. The two names are juxtaposed in Qur'ān 89:6–7.

742. Following ed. Cairo Allāhu sūratan; ed. Leiden's Allāh ṣayyūratan is metrically difficult. Both readings are conjectural emendations of a single manuscript reading.

743. Arabic elegies often express the hope that the grave may be rained on, as water is a sign of blessing.

744. Ed. Cairo's mazāruhum is metrically preferable to ed. Leiden's zamruhum, "their company."

It is as if they had never been made at ease in a tranquil kingdom, that protected against kings by the best protector.
[He was] an imām who in times of trouble was a help to us, and a cloud bestowing rain.
Time has left the sons of his father overwhelmed by black seas.
They caused their sun to perish, so that misfortune came,
and they came to be in darkness without daylight.
They drove out from themselves a light-giving moon,
and the horses of evildoers trod them down.
Had they been a match for them and equal to them,
they would not have been crowned with crowns of shame.
Verily, the imām has departed, and his two heirs have made our bowels burn with fire.
[946] They said, "Al-Khuld has been bought." I said, "In ignominiousness that will bring its buyers to abasement."
Thus the kingdom will follow its former [rulers], when stability is cut off from al-Qarār [Palace].[745]

Muqaddis b. Ṣayfī said, lamenting him:

My friend, what have events brought upon you,
that weeping has become your obedient servant?
From disaster's heights has descended a disaster that hearts cannot resist.
In the cemetery of the garden is a grave:
dwelling beside his grave is an alien lion.
The disaster of his loss was grievous to anyone who has a portion in deeds of nobility.
For men such as he tears are shed,
and in assemblies to mourn him garments are rent.
Zubaydah held back no tears from him to be bestowed on kinswoman or kinsman.
Leave Mūsā his son to lament a calamity:
distress has befallen Mūsā his son.

745. The line puns on the meaning of qarār, "stability."

I have seen the assemblies of the caliphs empty of him; in their court there is no one who answers.
May it gladden you that I, a mature man, dissolve [in tears] for him, and my liver dissolves within me.
He who was far away was afflicted because of him and bowed down in grief;
he who caused disquiet saw his own day in him.[746]
I call from the bowels of the earth a person whom the summons would stir, but he does not reply.
If wars[747] announce the death of any soul to him,
the wars [themselves] have been grieved by his fall.

Khuzaymah b. al-Ḥasan wrote [the following poem], lamenting him through the words of Umm Ja'far:[748]

To the best imām, risen from the best lineage;
to the most excellent person who ever ascended the boards of a pulpit;
To the inheritor of the ancients' knowledge and understanding;
to the king al-Ma'mūn,[749] from Umm Ja'far:
As I write to you, my tears fall heavily [947]
from my eyelids and eye, O my cousin.
Harm and the abjectness of grief have befallen me;
my thoughts have banished sleep from my eye, O my cousin.
I am distraught because of what I suffered after his affliction:
my state is grievous and most loathsome.
I will complain of what I suffered after the loss of him to you, as one complains who is beside herself, overwhelmed.
I make request because of what has passed over me since I lost him, 746. The verse appears to be a veiled reference to al-Ma'mūn.

747. The text and meaning of the line are uncertain. The word "wars" (ḥurūb) is the editor's conjecture. The manuscript reads ḥurūf, "letters, sounds, words."

748. Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 203–4, quotes the text and adds: "After reading the poem, al-Ma'mūn wept and said, 'By God, I will seek vengeance for my brother—may God strike his murderers dead!'" Mas'ūdī, VI, 486–87, quotes eight verses. Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, al-'Iqd al-farīd, III, 215, quotes six verses of the poem and attributes them to Abū al-'Atāhiyah.

749. Both the proper name and its meaning "the trustworthy one" are intended.

for you are the best person to rectify and remedy my sorrow.
Ṭāhir came—may God not account Ṭāhir pure![750]
In regard to what he did, Ṭāhir will never be purified!
He made me go out with my face uncovered and without a head cloth;
he plundered my wealth and burned my homes.
Hārūn would be grieved by what I have suffered and what has befallen me from one who is deficient in nature, depraved.[751]
If what he perpetrated was because of a command you gave,
I will suffer patiently the command of a Powerful Ordainer.
Remember my kinship, O Commander of the Faithful:
I give my life as your ransom, worthy of reverence as you are, and given to remembering.

[948] He also said, lamenting him:

Glory be to your Lord, the Lord of might, the Everlasting!
How we were afflicted the morning of that Sunday!
How all Islam has been afflicted with the decline and weakening of its two stays!
Whoever was not afflicted by [the death of] the Commander of the Faithful, and did not come to be in peril, with anxiety increasing,
Yet I have been afflicted by him, until it has become evident in my mind and my religion, in my [enjoyment of] this world and my body.
O night, of whose passage Islam will complain—and all mankind—until the end of eternity,
You betrayed the king who presaged good fortune,
the imām, the valiant lion.
Fate came to him: it disquieted him;
it accosted him with a multitude of villains,
With shūrajīs[752] and people of unclear language,[753] led by

750. The verse puns on the meaning of the name "Ṭāhir": "clean, pure, blameless."

751. A'war ("one-eyed") seems to be used here in its extended sense of "bad, corrupt, abominable."

752. For the origin of this term, originally applied to slaves who worked reclaiming salt-encrusted land, see note 606.

Quraysh [al-Dandānī], with swords, in shirts of mail.
They encountered him when he was alone, having no one to help him against them, without supporters to bring him aid.
They made him drink of death, when he was unable to defend himself:
alone—and what an unequalled submitter he was!
He met their faces[754] with a face not lacking dignity, [949] more beautiful and unstained than new Qūhistān tunics.[755]
O my grief, when Quraysh closed in on him, and the sword was quivering in a quivering hand!
He did not move; he remained erect, with his head lowered; he did not say a word;[756]
Until, when the sword reached the middle of his head, his hands brushed it away, as one does who is calm.
He arose; his hands held fast to the base of his neck, like a fierce shaggy lion rushing into danger.
He dragged it;[757] it fell; he brought it to the ground with the hand of a cornered, angry lion.
He almost had killed him, had they not outnumbered him;
he rose, freeing himself from him, but he hardly could.
This is the report about the Commander of the Faithful;
I have not omitted a word from it or added anything.
May I not cease to mourn him until death, even though that destroyed him which destroyed Lubad.[758]

---

753. Aghtām are people who do not speak [Arabic] clearly or correctly. It is synonymous with 'ajam, Persians—just as the Greeks called all speakers of other languages "barbaroi," i.e., babblers. See Lane, Lexicon, VI, 2229.

754. The margin of the manuscript gives the alternate reading, "swords" [Leiden note].

755. Literally, than new qūhī garments; i.e., made of a white cloth imported from Qūhistān [Persian, Kūhistān] province. Cf. ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CDXLI.

756. Literally, "he did not [say] anything for the first time, nor anything for the second time." For the idiom, see Lane, Lexicon, I, 163.

757. Apparently the antecedent is the sword, but the pronouns are ambiguous and could refer to Quraysh [translate "him"].

758. That is, even though time or fate destroyed him, as it destroyed Lubad, the last of the seven vultures of the legendary sage Luqmān, whose life was to end with the death of Lubad. See Lane, Lexicon, VII, 2646; EI^{2} s.v. Luḳmān [Heller].

According to al-Mawṣilī, who said: When Ṭāhir sent the head of Muḥammad to al-Ma'mūn, Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn wept and said, "He has drawn down upon us people's swords and their [950] tongues. We commanded him to send him as a prisoner, and he sent him slaughtered." Al-Ma'mūn said to him, "What is past is past. Use your ingenuity to find an excuse for it." So the men wrote and kept at the task. Aḥmad b. Yūsuf produced a small piece of paper containing the following:[759]

> To proceed: The Deposed One was indeed the partner of the Commander of the Faithful in lineage and kinship; however, God made a distinction between them in right of succession and honor; for the one forsook the bonds of religion and departed from the common interest[760] of Muslims. God, the Mighty and Exalted, relating to us the story of the son of Noah, says, "He is not of thy family; he is a deed not righteous."[761] Thus, there is no obedience to anyone in disobedience to God, and there is no rupture [of the obligations of kinship] if the rupture takes place for the sake of God. My letter to the Commander of the Faithful comes after God has slain the Deposed One and clothed him with the cloak of his perfidy. He has set the affairs of the Commander of the Faithful on a firm basis. He has accomplished His promise to him and what was expected from His sincere promise, when by him He restored union after it had been broken, joined together the community after it had

759. For Aḥmad b. Yūsuf, al-Ma'mūn's secretary, also known for his letters, aphorisms, and verses, see *EI*² s.v. [Sourdel]. Qirṭās normally referred to papyrus at this period. Sourdel, Vizirat 'abbaside, 206 n., summarizes the attributions given by other historians to the letter. Parallels: Ya'qūbī, II, 536–37; Fragmenta, 418.

760. Al-amr al-jāmi': the phrase means "the business that joins [the Muslims] together."

761. Qur'ān 11:46. Cf. the preceding verses: "And Noah called to his son, who was standing apart, 'Embark with us, my son, and be thou not with the unbelievers!' He said, 'I will take refuge in a mountain, that shall defend me from the water.' Said he, 'Today there is no defender from God's command but for him on whom He has mercy.' And the waves came between them, and he was among the drowned."

been fragmented, and restored the banners of Islam after they had become tattered.

Some Aspects of the Conduct and Mode of Life of the Deposed Muḥammad b. Hārūn[762]

According to Ḥumayd b. Sa'īd, who said: After he became ruler and after al-Ma'mūn wrote to him and gave him his allegiance, Muḥammad sought out eunuchs and purchased them, spending inordinately on them. He appointed them to [attend on] his private quarters by night and by day, his provisions of food and drink, and his decisions commanding or forbidding. Some he enrolled into a special unit (farḍ) that he named "al-Jarādiyyah," and others, Abyssinians, he enrolled into a special unit which he named "al-Ghurābiyyah."[763] He forsook both free women and slave girls, so that they were sent away. Concerning this, a certain poet said:[764] [951]

O you who stay long at your residence in Ṭūs, far from your family, who cannot be ransomed by [other] lives:
You have left behind a husband for the eunuchs—someone who has endured the bad luck of Basūs from them![765]
As for Nawfal, he is a person of importance.
What a companion Badr is!

762. Parallel: Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 205–7.

763. Cf. the reference to the two groups in the poem quoted on p. 142, above, where the Jarādiyyah are identified as Ṣaqālib, or Slavs, and note 539, explaining the possible origin of the name. "Ghurābiyyah" is derived from the word for raven, ghurāb, with reference to their black skins. See Abbott, Two Queens of Baghdad, 210–11. On farḍ, troops not on the regular muster roll and paid contractually, see ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CDI; also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, glossarium, s.v.

764. Quoted with variants in Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 205–6.

765. The line echoes the proverb, "More unlucky than Basūs." The origin of the proverb was unclear even to the early Arabic lexicographers. One explanation is that Basūs was a pre-Islamic Arab woman whose camel caused a forty-year war between the tribes of Bakr and Taghlib. See Lisan, s.v. (ed. Cairo, I, 281). The translation follows the vocalization of ed. Leiden. I would prefer to vocalize taḥammalu (for tataḥammalu) and to translate, "a husband for the eunuchs, from whom you will endure the bad luck of Basūs."

Neither is Bashshār al-ʿUṣmī, when they are mentioned, the possessor of a lowly share with him;
Nor does young Ḥasan have a lowlier lot with him when the cups are passed round.
They have one half of his life;
in the other half he applies himself to drinking old wine.
Young women have no share with him, except frowning with a gloomy face.
If the chief is so ill,
how does it fare with us after the chief?
If the one staying in the residence of Ṭūs knew,
it would distress the one staying in the residence of Ṭūs!

[Continuing,] Ḥumayd said: After Muḥammad became ruler, he sent to all the countries in search of entertainers. He attached them to his court and paid them salaries. He went all out in buying swift horses. He obtained wild animals, lions, birds, and such things.[766] He secluded himself from his brothers, family members, and military commanders and held them in contempt. He divided whatever was in the treasuries and the jewels that were in his residence among his eunuchs, table companions, and confidants. Whatever jewels, stores, and weapons were in al-Raqqah were also brought to him. He commanded the building of audience rooms (majālis) for his villas (mutanazzahāt) and his places of retreat, amusement, and sport at al-Khuld Palace, al-Khayzurāniyyah, the Garden of Mūsā, ʿAbdūyah[767] Palace, al-Muʿallā Palace, Raqqat Kalwādhā, al-Anbār Gate, Banāwarī,[768] and al-Hūb. He ordered five barks (ḥarrāqāt) to be built on the [952] Tigris in the shape of a lion, an elephant, an eagle, a serpent, and a horse, spending a great deal of money on their construction. Abū Nuwās[769] said, praising him:

766. Cf. the anecdotes in Masʿūdī, VI, 431–33, about exotic fishes, lions, and so forth.

767. Also vocalized ʿAbdawayh.

768. Banāwarī (the reading is uncertain) was the name of the village (also called Bayāwarī) that had stood on the site of the Karkh suburb, south of the Kūfah Gate of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 67.

769. Abū Nuwās al-Ḥasan b. Hānīʾ al-Ḥakamī (b. 139/756, d. between 195 and 198) was known for his poems celebrating wine and young boys. See EI[2] s.v. Abū

God has made subject to al-Amīn riding animals that never were made subject to the master of the temple.[770]
Whereas the mounts of the latter traveled by land, the former has traveled on the water riding a lion of the jungle:
A lion that stretches out its arms, advancing quickly, wide of mouth, grim of teeth.
He does not master it with bridle or whip, or with pressure of his foot in the stirrup.
People marveled when they saw you on the image of a lion, moving as fast as the clouds.
"Praise God!" they shouted, when they saw you traveling on it:
What if they had seen you atop the eagle—
With its breast, its beak, and its wings, cutting through wave after wave;
Outstripping the birds in the sky whenever one urges it to speed in coming or going!
May God bless the commander and preserve him. [953]
May He preserve for him the garment of youth.
—A king for whom no praises are adequate,
a Hāshimite inspired to the right course!

According to al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk, who said: The Commander [of the Faithful] built a great ship on which he spent 3 million dirhams. He also obtained one in the shape of a sea-creature called the dolphin. Abū Nuwās al-Ḥasan b. Hāni' said about this:[771]

The "moon of the night" has mounted the dolphin;
rushing into the water, he has sailed the deep.
The Tigris shone with his beauty;
the people[772] shone and rejoiced.

Nuwās (Wagner); Sezgin, GAS, II, 543–50. The poem, with variants, may be found in Dīwān, I, 265–66; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 206, quotes six verses.

770. According to Qur'ān 34: 12–13, God subjected the wind and certain of the jinn to work for Solomon. The jinn assisted Solomon in his construction projects: "places of worship (maḥārib, pl. of miḥrāb, translated here as 'temple'), statues, porringers like water-troughs, and anchored cooking-pots."

771. The poem, with variants, can be found in Dīwān, I, 266.

772. Variant: "the banks (of the river)."

Never has my eye seen a boat like it, better at going forward or veering round.
Urged on by its oars,
it speeds over the water or goes at a gentle pace.
God has bestowed it upon al-Amīn alone, who has been crowned with the crown of kingship.

According to Aḥmad b. Isḥāq, who was the grandson of the Kūfan singer Barṣawmā,[773] and who said: Al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Jaʿfar was one of the important men [954] of the Banū Hāshim in strength, intellect, and deeds. He used to keep eunuchs (khadam, pl. of khādim). One of his favorite eunuchs, who was named Manṣūr, became angry with him and fled to Muḥammad. He came to the latter while he was in the palace of Umm Jaʿfar known as al-Qarār. Muḥammad received him very warmly, and the eunuch enjoyed unusually good favor with him.

One day the eunuch rode out with a group of Muḥammad's eunuchs who were called al-Sayyāfah ("Swordsmen"). He passed by the gate of al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh, wanting to show al-ʿAbbās's eunuchs his appearance and condition. Word of this was brought to al-ʿAbbās, who ran out in a shirt, without a turban, with a leather-covered staff in his hand. He overtook the eunuch in Suwayqat Abī al-Ward[774] and caught hold of the reins [of his horse]. The [other] eunuchs tried to put up a fight, but whenever he hit one, that one would lose courage, so that they finally scattered from him. Al-ʿAbbās led the eunuch back into his house. When a report of this reached Muḥammad, he sent a group of men to the house of al-ʿAbbās. The men stood in front of it, while al-ʿAbbās lined up his slaves (ghilmān, pl. of ghulām) and mawālī on the wall of his house with shields and arrows.

Aḥmad b. Isḥāq [continued his report,] saying: By God we 773. The musician Barṣawmā (actually a flute virtuoso, not a singer) was introduced to al-Rashīd's court by Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī. See *EI*², Supplement, s.v. Barṣawmā al-Zāmir (E. Neubauer).

774. A suwayqah (diminutive of sūq) is a small market. There was a well-known Sūq Abī al-Ward about half a mile south of al-Kūfah Gate in the Karkh suburb. Perhaps the two are to be identified. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 60.

were afraid that the fire might burn down our homes, for they wanted to burn down al-ʿAbbās's house. Rashīd al-Hārūnī came and asked to be admitted. He went before al-ʿAbbās and said, "What are you doing? Do you know what you are involved in and what has come upon you? If he allowed them, they would plunder your house at spearpoint! Aren't you under obedience?" "Yes," he said. "Then get up," he said, "and ride!" So al-ʿAbbās went out, wearing his black [court] robes. When he reached the gate of his house, he said, "Page, bring my horse!" "No way!" said Rashīd, "You shall go on foot." When al-ʿAbbās reached the street, he looked, and behold a crowd had gathered: al-Julūdī, al-Ifrīqī, Abū al-Baṭṭ, and al-Hirsh's forces had come for him. He looked at them. I saw him set off on foot, while Rashīd rode.

When a report of this reached Umm Jaʿfar, she went before Muḥammad and started to beg him. He said to her, "May I be [955] declared to be no relative of the Prophet, God bless him and grant him peace, if I don't kill him!" She began to implore him. "By God," he said to her, "I'll teach you a lesson!" She uncovered her hair and said, "And who will come into my presence when my head is uncovered?" While Muḥammad was in the midst of this—al-ʿAbbās had not yet arrived—the eunuch Ṣāʿid came before him, bringing news of the death of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān. Muḥammad turned his attention to this. Al-ʿAbbās remained in the antechamber ten days. Muḥammad forgot about him. Then he remembered him and said, "Let him be imprisoned in one of the rooms of his house. Let three of his senior mawālī have access to him to serve him. Let him be given a three-course meal every day."

Al-ʿAbbās remained in this condition until Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān revolted in the name of al-Maʾmūn and imprisoned Muḥammad. Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī and Muḥammad b. Muḥammad al-Maʿbadī then paid a visit to al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh. He was in a belvedere (manẓarah). The two said to him, "Why are you sitting still? Go out to [join] this man!" They meant Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī. So he went out and came to Ḥusayn. Then he stood by the Bridge Gate and left no abuse of Umm Jaʿfar unspoken, while Isḥāq b. Mūsā was receiving oaths of allegiance to al-Maʾmūn.

Before long, al-Ḥusayn was killed. Al-ʿAbbās fled to the Bīn Canal (Nahrabīn), to Harthamah. His son, al-Faḍl b. al-ʿAbbās, then went to Muḥammad and denounced to him what his father owned. Muḥammad sent men to al-ʿAbbās's house and took from it 4 million dirhams and 300,000 dīnārs, which were in bottles in a well. They overlooked two of the bottles. Al-Faḍl [later] said, "Nothing remained of my father's inheritance but these two bottles, with 70,000 dīnārs in them." After the civil war ended and Muḥammad was killed, he returned to his house and took the two bottles. He gave them...[775] He made the [956] pilgrimage in that year—that is, 198.

According to Aḥmad b. Isḥāq: Afterward, al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbdallāh used to say, "Sulaymān b. Jaʿfar said to me while we were in al-Maʾmūn's residence, 'Haven't you killed your son yet?' 'May I be made your ransom, uncle!' said I. 'Who would kill his own son?' 'Kill him,' he said to me, 'for he was the one who denounced you and your money and made you poor.'"

According to Aḥmad b. Isḥāq b. Barṣawmā, who said: After Muḥammad had been besieged and matters were pressing hard on him, he said, "Alas, there is no one to rely on!" "Yes, there is," he was told. "He is one of the Arabs, a Kūfan named Waḍḍāḥ b. Ḥabīb b. Budayl al-Tamīmī, one of the best of the Arabs, and a man of sound judgment." "Send for him," he replied.

So he came to us. When he had come to him, Muḥammad said to him, "I have been told of your conduct and judgment. Counsel us in our affair." He said to him, "Commander of the Faithful, today judgment has become unsound and has departed. However, use false rumors, for they are an instrument of war." So he appointed a man named Bakīr b. al-Muʿtamir, who used to go down to Dujayl.[776] Whenever Muḥammad suffered a reverse or defeat, he would say to Bakīr, "Come up with something, for we have suffered a reverse." Bakīr would then devise reports for him. But when the people spoke among themselves, they discovered that these were false.

775. There is a lacuna in the text.

776. A canal and a road in the Ḥarbiyyah suburb bore this name. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 127–31.

[Continuing,] Aḥmad b. Isḥāq said: I can still clearly picture Bakīr b. al-Mu'tamir—an old man with a large frame.

According to al-'Abbās b. Aḥmad b. Abān, the secretary (kātib)—Ibrāhīm b. al-Jarrāḥ—Kawthar, who said: One day, Muḥammad b. Zubaydah commanded that [cloths] should be spread for him on a raised bench (dukkān)[777] in al-Khuld [Palace]. A green carpet was spread for him on it, matching cushions and furnishings were placed on it, and a great many silver, gold, and jeweled vessels were made ready for him. He commanded the woman superintendent of his slave girls that [957] one hundred skilled slave girls should be readied for him. They were to be sent up to him in groups of ten, carrying lutes, and singing in unison. So she sent ten up to him. When they had settled themselves on the bench, they began to sing:

They killed him that they might take his place,
as once Kisrā was betrayed by his marzubāns.[778]

Muḥammad grumbled in displeasure at this, cursed her, and cursed the slave girls. He commanded, and they were taken down. He waited a while and then commanded her to send up [another] ten. When they had settled themselves on the bench, they began to sing:[779]

Whoever is glad at the death of Mālik, let him come to our women at the beginning of the day:

---

777. Dukkān usually means a sitting room or alcove provided with raised stone or brick benches built against the wall. Pillows would be placed on these for sitting. See Lane, Lexicon, III, 900. The parallel in Mas'ūdī, VI, 426, has al-Amīn sitting in a ṭārimah, a portable pavilion closed on three sides. The fact that he orders the structure to be torn down argues for some such interpretation. See Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial 'abbaside," 129, for a description of the ṭārimah.

778. The verse is by al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah, who was addressing the Banū Hāshim after the death of the caliph 'Uthmān. See Ibn al-Athīr, III, 28. Kisrā was the Arabic name for any king of the Sasanian dynasty of Iran; a marzubān was a noble charged with defending the borders of the Sasanian Empire.

779. The verses, by al-Rabī' b. Ziyād, are from an elegy for Mālik b. Zuhayr al-'Absī, whose murder launched a forty-year-long war between the brother tribes of 'Abs and Dhubyān in pre-Islamic times. The full text may be found in Abū Tammām, Dīwān al-Ḥamāsah, III, 34–41; German translation and commentary in Rückert, Hamâsa, No. 335–36.

He will find the women bareheaded, lamenting him, beating their cheeks before the glow of dawn.

Muḥammad became angry and did what he had done with the first group. For a long time he bowed his head in silence. Then he said, "Send up [another] ten." She sent them up. When they had taken their place on the bench, they started to sing in unison:

Kulayb, by my life, was a better defender
and less guilty than you, yet he became stained with [his own] blood.[780]

Muḥammad rose from where he had been sitting and ordered the place to be torn down, so ominous did he find what had happened.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Kindī—Muḥammad b. Dīnār, who said: Muḥammad the Deposed was sitting one day. The siege had closed in on him, and he was very worried and depressed. He called for his boon companions and for drink to divert himself. It was brought. He had a slave [958] girl whom he favored; he commanded her to sing, and he took a cup to drink. But God constrained her tongue, so that all she could sing was:

Kulayb, by my life, was a better defender
and less guilty than you, yet he became stained with [his own] blood.

He threw the cup he was holding at her. He gave orders concerning her, and she was thrown to the lions. He then took another cup and called for another girl. She sang:

They killed him that they might take his place,
as once Kisrā was betrayed by his marzubāns.

He threw the cup in her face. Then he took another cup from which to drink and said to another girl, "Sing!" So she sang:[781]

---

780. See note 649.

781. The poem by al-Ḥārith b. Waʿlah al-Dhuhlī may be found in Abū Tammām, Dīwān al-Ḥamāsah, I, 199–205; German translation and commentary in Rückert, Hamâsa, No. 43. The poem begins:

Arise, Umaymah, they have killed my brother...

He threw the cup in her face, kicked the tray with his foot, and returned to his dejection. He was killed a few days afterward.

According to Abū Sa'īd, who said:[782] Faṭīm, the mother of Mūsā, the son of the deposed one, Muḥammad b. Hārūn, died, and he showed himself to be greatly grieved. Word of this reached Umm Ja'far, and she said, "Carry me to the Commander of the Faithful." So she was carried to him, and he received her. He said, "My lady, Faṭīm has died!" She said:

May my soul be your ransom! Let grief not destroy you; for in your life there is a succession to those who have passed away.
With Mūsā as your compensation, every affliction has become insignificant;
after [the birth of] Mūsā there is no sadness for a woman lost.

And she said, "May God make great your reward! May He make your patience abundant, and make consolation for her your treasure!"[783]

According to Ibrāhīm b. Ismā'īl b. Hāni' (the nephew of Abū Nuwās)—his father [Ismā'īl b. Hāni'], who said [to Ibrāhīm]: Your uncle, Abū Nuwās, satirized Muḍar in his poem in which he said:[784] [959]

Arise, Umaymah, they have killed my brother;
and if I shoot, my arrow will hit me.
If I forgive, I forgive something enormous;
and if I assault, I weaken my own bone.

The poet's brother had been killed by his own tribesmen. The poet faced the dilemma of taking revenge against his own kin and thereby weakening his own tribe or allowing his brother's death to go unavenged.

782. Parallel in Mas'ūdī, VI, 430, where the name is given as Naẓm, with Faṭm as a variant.

783. That is, may God consider your bearing her death with patience as a meritorious deed to be kept as a deposit for your benefit on the day of judgment. See Lane, Lexicon, III, 956, s.v. dhakhara.

784. The poem praises the South Arabian tribes, to which Abū Nuwās himself belonged, and satirizes the North Arabian tribes. Muḍar was originally a powerful confederation of North Arabian tribes. Quraysh, the Prophet's tribe (and the tribe of the caliph) belonged to the Muḍar group. See EI[1], Supplement,

As for Quraysh, it has no reason to boast, except its profits from its trade.[785]
If you mention a claim to glory,
Quraysh comes slandering the one who overcomes her.[786]
When Quraysh gives her genealogy, (trade)[787] has half of her affiliations.

He meant [in the second line] that its noblest part is contested. This was reported to al-Rashīd during his lifetime, and he imprisoned Abū Nuwās, who remained imprisoned until Muḥammad came to power. Abū Nuwās, who had been Muḥammad's companion during the time he was prince, then said, praising Muḥammad:[788]

Remember, O trustworthy one of God[789]—and acquaintance should be remembered—how I stood and recited to you, while the people were present;
How I scattered pearls on you, O pearl of Hāshim—
Oh, who has ever seen pearls being scattered on pearls!
Your father [Hārūn] was one whose like never ruled the earth;
your paternal uncle was Mūsā [al-Hādī], his equal, the chosen;
Your grandfather was al-Mahdī, rightly guided, whose closest brother,
Abū al-Faḍl Ja'far, was the father of your mother.[790]
There are none like your two Manṣūrs—the Manṣūr of Hāshim, and the Manṣūr of Qaḥṭān, when claims to glory are counted.

---

s.v. Rabī'a and Muḍar. For the full text of the poem, with variants, see Abū Nuwās, Dīwān, II, 1–11.

785. The more martial Bedouin tribes looked down on tribes that supported themselves, as did Quraysh, from the caravan trade.

786. In the Dīwān, the second half of the line reads, "her merchants bring her most of it." The meaning of the text in Ṭabarī is unclear.

787. Dīwān: "We have," i.e., the Yemeni tribes of whom Abū Nuwās considered himself the spokesman. The scholium on the poem says that this alludes to the Yemeni and Azdi grandmothers of the Prophet's grandfather, 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.

788. Text, with variants, in Abu Nuwās, Dīwān, I, 241.

789. Punning on the name al-Amīn, which means "the trustworthy one."

790. Muḥammad's mother, Zubaydah, was the daughter of Abū al-Faḍl Ja'far, the son of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr.

Who is there who can shoot at the heights with your two arrows, when 'Abd Manāf[791] and Ḥimyar[792] are your two progenitors?

A slave girl sang these verses before Muḥammad. He said to her, [960]
"By whom are the verses?" He was told that they were by Abū Nuwās. "How is he?" he asked. He was told that he was in prison. "He has nothing to fear," he said. He sent to him Isḥāq b. Farāshah and Sa'īd b. Jābir (the latter had been Muḥammad's nursing brother). The two of them said, "The Commander of the Faithful mentioned you yesterday and said, 'He has nothing to fear.'" Abū Nuwās then composed some verses and sent them to him. They are these verses:[793]

I was wakeful, and slumber flew from my eye;
the evening companions fell asleep, but they did not share [their sleep with me].
O trustworthy one (amīn) of God, you have been made ruler of a kingdom in which the fear of God is your garment.
Your face sheds dew, whereby people in every place live.
It is as if mankind were in the likeness of a spirit having one body, with you as its head.
O Amīn of God, prison is a fearsome thing;
and you have sent, saying, "You have nothing to fear."

When it was recited to Muḥammad, he said, "He has spoken the truth. Fetch him to me." So he was brought at night. His fetters were broken, and he was taken out [of prison] and brought into Muḥammad's presence. He recited:[794]

Welcome! Welcome to the best imām ever shaped from the mettle of the caliphate in character.[795]

---

791. 'Abd Manāf was the father of Hāshim, the common ancestor of the 'Abbāsid family and the Prophet.

792. Ḥimyar was a Yemeni tribe. Through his grandmother Khayzurān, the wife of al-Mahdī, al-Amīn could claim Yemeni ancestry.

793. See Abū Nuwās, Dīwān, I, 242.

794. Text, with variants, in Abū Nuwās, Dīwān, I, 261.

795. For "in character" (naḥtan), the Dīwān reads, "purely" (baḥtan), which is probably the original reading.

O Amīn of God, God watches over you, when you are at rest and when you travel, wherever you go.
The entire earth is a habitation for you;
for God is your friend, wherever you are.

[961] Muḥammad gave him a robe of honor, freed him, and made him one of his companions.

According to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr al-Tamīmī—Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm al-Fārisī, who said: Once Abū Nuwās drank wine, and this was reported to Muḥammad during his days [as caliph]. He therefore ordered him to be imprisoned, and al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ put him in prison for three months. Muḥammad then thought of him and ordered him to be brought. The Banū Hāshim and others were with Muḥammad, and he called for the sword and leather mat,[796] to threaten Abū Nuwās with death. Abū Nuwās then recited the following verses to him:

Remember, O trustworthy one of God—and acquaintance should be remembered...

He continued with the poem we have quoted above, and added to it:[797]

This world has become beautiful with the beauty of a caliph who is the full moon, except that he always shines;
An imām who will rule the people for seventy years:
for that has he put on the garment and girdle [of rule].
Generosity points to him from his cheeks,
and looks from his sides when he looks.
O best object of hope, I am one who is held in custody, incarcerated in your prisons, destitute.
Three months have past since I was imprisoned, as if I had committed an unpardonable crime.
If I have committed no crime, why is fault being found with me?[798]

---

796. The naṭʿ or niṭʿ was a leather mat used to receive an executed man's head.

797. Text, with variants, in Abū Nuwās, Dīwān, I, 241–42.

798. The reading of the Dīwān is more likely to be original: "why am I being treated with rigor," reading taʿannutī for ed. Leiden's taʿaqqubī.

But if I have committed a crime, your pardon is greater. [962]

Muḥammad then said to him, "If you drink it—." "My blood," he said, "shall be yours to shed, Commander of the Faithful." He released him. Abū Nuwās therefore used to smell wine, but not drink it—as he said:

I will not taste aged wine, except as a fragrance.

According to Mas'ūd b. 'Īsā al-'Abdī—Yaḥyā b. al-Musāfir al-Qarqisā'ī, who said: Duḥaym, the slave (ghulām) of Abū Nuwās told me that Muḥammad reproved Abū Nuwās for drinking wine and imprisoned him. Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' had a maternal uncle who used to examine the inmates of the prisons, visit them, and investigate them. He entered the place where the Zindīqs[799] were being held and, seeing Abū Nuwās, whom he did not know, said to him, "Young man, are you with the Zindīqs?" "God forbid!" he replied. "Perhaps," he said, "you are one of those who worship the ram?" "No," he replied, "I eat rams, wool and all!" "Perhaps," he said, "you are one of those who worship the sun?" "In fact," he replied, "I find the sun so loathsome that I avoid sitting in it." "Then for what misdeed were you imprisoned?" he asked. Abū Nuwās replied, "I was imprisoned on a charge of which I am innocent." "Is it nothing but that?" he asked. "By God," he replied, "I have told you the truth."

So the uncle came to al-Faḍl and said to him, "Sir, you are not being good caretakers of God's blessings. Are people to be imprisoned [merely] on suspicion?" "What is it?" he asked. So the uncle told him what Abū Nuwās claimed about his misdeed. Al-Faḍl smiled and went before Muḥammad and told him about it. Muḥammad summoned Abū Nuwās and ordered him to avoid

799. The Zindīqs (Arabic zindīq, pl. zanādiqah) comprised mainly Manichaean dualists, and probably also Mazdakites and other remnants of once-flourishing Mesopotamian sects. They were subject to persecution. See G. Vajda, "Les zindīqs en pays d'Islam au début de la période abbaside," RSO, XVII (1938), 173–229; Gabrieli, "La ‹zandaqa› au I^er^ siècle abbasside," in L'élaboration de l'Islam, 23–38; Omar, "Some Observations on the Reign of the 'Abbāsid Caliph al-Mahdī 775–778 A.D.," in 'Abbāsiyyāt, 89–93; Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire and Medieval China, 83–84; and EI[1] s.v. Zindīḳ.

wine and drunkenness. "Yes," he said. He was told, "By an oath by God?" "Yes," he said.

